Preface

HIS Dictionary is not an ordinary compilation of knowledge, but a book of life, of Catholic life, past and present, in every part of the world. It contains not only definitions and explanations of every subject in Religion, Scripture, tradition, doctrine, morals, sacraments, rites, customs, devotions and symbolism, but also accounts of the Church in every continent, country, diocese; missions, notable Catholic centers, cities, and places with religious names; religious orders, church societies, sects and false religions. It has brief articles also on historical events and personages, on the Old Testament and New, and on popes, prelates, priests, men and women of distinction, showing what the Church has done for civilization and correcting many errors which have hitherto passed for history.

This volume contains articles on matters in philosophy, psychology and education, of special interest, on which there is a Catholic teaching or position; law, the laws of the Church, or canon law, and the influence of religion on civil law; ethics, social and political science; the arts which have served and derived inspiration from religion: painting, architecture, sculpture, music, literature, Catholic artists and authors. The relation of science with religion is treated in a special manner. Neat articles on each science tell what Catholics and Christians generally have done for it, and thus show the impossibility of conflict between the two.

If it be asked: why so many subjects? It should be remembered that the Catholic religion has a long history of its own, and that this history is rooted in the ages preceding its foundation. It is rich in doctrine, elaborate in ceremonial, regulated by laws which reflect the best there is in the civil and church jurisprudence of centuries. Its constitution is world-wide, organized by dioceses and missions in every part of the world. For almost every doctrine it teaches there is an error to correct. It has its enemies as well as its champions. It reaches into every field of human life, into philosophy, psychology, morals, education, art, and the sciences, physical and social.

This Dictionary is entitled "New" because it is entirely different from every other dictionary hitherto published in any language, and this part of the title will be retained permanently because the editors propose to publish at intervals new editions which will contain whatever is new concerning the topics treated. It is entitled “Catholic” because it is universal in scope so far as concerns religion, and all that is connected with it—and what of any importance in life is not so connected? It is Catholic also in the sense that it aims at giving as correctly as language can express the traditions, teachings, customs, pious practises and history of the Catholic Church, and its position on every question that affects human life. This will appear in the number of titles of ancient and of foreign origin. The Church is of all times, of all peoples, of every tongue. For all such titles the derivation is given, and derivations are as a rule the best definitions.

The chief merits of a dictionary are precision, accuracy, simplicity, and brevity. Fortunately, precision and accuracy are characteristic of Catholic theology, philosophy, literature and history. These qualities help to put an end to controversy. They make the truths of faith more intelligible and inspirational. Simplicity and brevity were the aims of the greatest of masters, Thomas Aquinas, to whom Catholic scholars since his time have all looked for guidance. He deplored that “beginners are greatly impeded by the writings of various authors, partly because of the heaping-up of useless questions, articles, and arguments; partly because the knowledge necessary for them is not presented in a strictly methodical sequence.” In religion and whatever goes with it we are all beginners.
The writers and editors of this Dictionary have used no waste words, and only such that all may understand. Moreover they have given much attention and space to the symbolism by which the Church everywhere and at all times has known how to express what language often obscures.

For readers who need further information than the articles contain, there is sufficient reference to well-selected books after each important article, and the complete bibliographical lists at the end of the volume are of exceptional value.

The compilation of this Dictionary has been the work of years. Over two hundred writers have contributed articles for it. We are pleased to express our gratitude to these scholarly and generous assistants. We are grateful also to the 10,000 who subscribed in advance for this Dictionary, and to the 650 patrons who kindly acted as underwriters to enable us to publish it. Since it would be impossible to produce without defect a work of so much variety and multitudinous detail, we shall welcome every criticism and suggestion that will enable us to make it as well-nigh perfect as a human production may be.

All regret profoundly that as the work neared completion one of the special editors, Dr. Pallen, was called unexpectedly from his labors, though no one will question that a spirit like his has continued to inspire and assist his devoted collaborators.

A

A.C. (Alpha, Omega), first and last letters of the Greek alphabet, used by St. John in the Apocalypse (1; 2; 22) to designate, once, the Eternal Father and, three times, Christ. In Exodus, 3, 14, God calls Himself "the beginning and the end," that is, the One by whom and for whom all things are made. Used of Our Lord it clearly implies His Divinity. The letters are often found on early coins, rings, paintings in catacombs, in frescoes of ancient churches, and on corner-stones to designate Christ.—C.E.

A.A. = Augustinians of the Assumption, or Assumptionists.

Aachen. See AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

Aaron, brother of Moses and high priest of the Old Law; chosen by Moses to be his spokesman before Pharaoh (Ex., 4; 7; 8). He caused the casting of the golden calf which the Israelites worshiped in the wilderness (Ex., 32), but at the prayer of Moses he was spared the fate of the three thousand worshipers (Deut., 9). The rod of Aaron blossomed as a sign that he had been chosen by God to be first high priest (Lev., 8). He was not allowed to enter the Land of Promise, but died on Mount Hor (Num., 20). His son Eleazar and descendants, Aaronites, were consecrated as an hereditary priesthood.—C.E.

Aaron of Caerleon, Saint, martyr in Wales during the Diocletian persecution in 303. He was the companion of St. Julius and is possibly Britain's proto-martyr. Feast, 1 July.

A.B. = Bachelor of Arts.

Abacus (Gr., abax, counting-table), the square, title-like upper member of a Norman capital from which the arch immediately springs.

Abaddon, Hebrew word meaning ruin, place of destruction, realm of the dead (Job, 31); also prince of Hell, evil angel of death and disaster (Apoc., 9); same as Apollyon, Destroyer. (Ed.)

Abandonment or Self-Abandonment, in mystical theology, the first stage of the union of the soul with God by conformity to His Will, involving passive purification through trials and sufferings, together with desolation following upon the surrender of natural consolations; the darkness of the soul in a state of purification.—C.E.; Caussade, Abandonment, tr. McMahon, N. Y., 1887.

Abba (Aramaic, father), title given to bishops in the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic Churches. With translation subjoined, it is used by Mark and Paul in the N.T. as a form of address to God. It is used as a title of honor for Hebrew scholars and forms part of many Hebrew names.

Abban, Saint, abbot (c. 570-620). The son of Cormac, King of Leinster, and nephew and disciple of St. Illor, he founded many churches in Wexford and the monasteries of Magheraoidhe (now Adamstown), New Ross, famous as a school, and Kilabbain. Feast, 27 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

Abba Salama (Aramaic, father of peace), title given to Frumentius, first Bishop of Abyssinia; still used by the head of the Abyssinian Church.

Abbe, a-ba' (Syriac, abba, father), French title applied primarily to an abbot, eventually to all wearing secular ecclesiastical dress; and to clerics, often not in Holy Orders, engaged as tutors or in other occupations.

Abbes (feminine of abbat), spiritual and temporal superior of a community of twelve or more nuns, signifying that the superior is like a mother to the community. The title is in use among Benedictines. Poor Clares, and certain colleges of canonesses. An abbess as a rule has a right to wear a ring, and bears the crosier as a symbol of her rank.
but has not the jurisdiction belonging to abbots.

—C.E.

Abbey, monastery canonically erected and independent, ruled by an abbot, if occupied by monks, and if by nuns, by an abbess. The community must number at least twelve religious. Principal parts of an abbey are: almonry, calefactory, cells for stores, cells, chapter-house, choir, cloister, refectory, and workshops. The chief abbey buildings are constructed around a quadrangle; in the more usual English plan the church is on the northern side. Monasteries of the Cistercians differ from those of other orders. Three sides of their quadrangular cloister are flanked by small three-room cottages occupied by individual monks. The church, refectory, and other buildings used in common enclose the fourth side.—C.E.

Abbeylubber, term of reproach for a monk after the Reformation, introduced in England to convey the impression that monasteries harbored lazy and good-for-nothing inmates.

Abbey Nullius [Lat., of no (diocese)], a territory belonging to no diocese, i.e., separated and distinct by proper boundaries from surrounding dioceses. It is ruled by a prelate, who exercises active jurisdiction over the clergy and people living in his territory. In the United States, Belmont Abbey, North Carolina, is an abbey nullius; in Canada, the Abbey of St. Peter, Muenster; in Australia, New Norcia; in Africa, Lindi.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Abbot, titular, one who holds the title of a bishop (non-exempt); those whose jurisdiction extends over a territory which is no part of any diocese (abbey nullius). These Abbot of Fleury, Saint, abbot and martyr (945-1004), b. near Orleans, France; d. Fleury. He entered the Benedictine monastery at Fleury, and was appointed director of the school at Ramsey Abbey, England, 985-87, and Abbot of Fleury, 988. He was energetic in protecting the interests of the Church, and introduced into his monasteries the reform of Cluny. To restore discipline in the monastery of La Réole, Gascony, he transferred thither several monasteries at Fleury. In a conflict which ensued between French and Gascon he was mortally wounded. Feast, 13 Nov.—C.E., I, 15.

Abbot (Aramaic, abba, father), title definitely fixed by St. Benedict and given to the superior of a monastery of monks having the nature of a private family and settled location, as the several branches of the Order of St. Benedict, including the Black Monks of St. Benedict, the Cistercians of the Three Observances, the Camaldolese, Vallumbrosans, Silvestrines, Olivetans, some houses of Canons Regular, of the Antonians, of the Armenian Benedictines, and of the Basilians, and the Premonstratensians. The office is elective and for life, the choice being made by secret ballot of the professed members of the community. The authority of an abbot in his monastery is twofold: one, paternal, by which he administers the property of the abbey and maintains discipline and the observance of the rule and constitutions of the order; the other, quasi-episcopal.

—Abbot, Lay, a layman to whom either a king or someone else in authority assigned an abbey in consideration of services rendered. The estate of the monastery was thus placed in the charge of the lay abbott, who received part of its income. The custom obtained chiefly in the Frankish Empire, from the 8th to the 11th century.

—Abbot, Regular, a prelate canonically elected and confirmed and exercising the duties of his office. There are three grades: those who preside only over members of their monasteries, and are under the jurisdiction of the bishop (non-exempt); those who are immediately subject to the Holy See, with jurisdiction beyond the limit of their abbeys over the people, clergy and laity, of a territory forming an integral part of a bishop's diocese (exempt); those whose jurisdiction extends over a territory which is no part of any diocese (abbey nullius). These —Abbot, Secular, cleric with the title and some of the honors of the office of abbot, who holds benefices which originally belonged to monastic houses, but which, since the suppression of the latter, are now secularized and transferred to other churches. There are three classes: those who possess quasi-episcopal jurisdiction and the right to assist at ecumenical councils, with decisive vote. All regular abbots elected for life are obliged, after their ecclesiastical confirmation, to receive the blessing, at which they are invested with the miter, crosier, pectoral cross, ring, and other insignia of their office.

—Abbot, Titular, one who holds the title of a suppressed or destroyed abbey.

—Abbot President or Abbot General, one who presides over a federation of monasteries or abbeys. By virtue of privilege they have a decisive vote in ecumenical councils.

—Abbot-Priemate, the title of the Abbot President of the Black Monks of St. Benedict, according to a decree of 16 Sept., 1803. The title is attached to the Abbey of St. Anselm, Rome.

—Archabbot, an honorary title bestowed upon superiors of such monasteries as are noted for their antiquity or preeminence, e.g., St. Vincent's Archabbey, Beauvais, Pa.

—Butler, Benedictine Monachism, N. Y., 1919.
Abbott, Tug, novel by Sir Walter Scott, sequel to “The Monastery,” dealing with Scotland during the Reformation; a book which enlightened many as to the beauty of the pre-Reformation Church.

Abbott of Unreason, title given to the leader of Christmas revels in Scotland before the Reformation.

Abbreviations (Lat., abbreviare, to shorten), the use of a single letter for the entire word, or a sign or mark for a word or phrase, a custom common from early days, especially in Greece and Rome, and adopted by Christians first as a means of keeping their secrets from enemies and then as a matter of economy in transcribing manuscripts. The abbreviations used by the Papal Chancery, the Bologna school of civil law became from the ninth century the standards for Europe. They abound in manuscripts of Roman and canon law, theology, civil and ecclesiastical documents, and chronicles. The invention of printing greatly influenced the use of abbreviations. Ecclesiastical abbreviations are: of administrative, as used in pontifical documents, once numerous, but all abolished by Leo XIII in 1878, except for the names of sees, forms of address, and titles of Roman Congregations and individual ecclesiastical authorities; liturgical, as in the description of or directions for liturgical acts; scholastic, as for academic titles and degrees; chronological, for the civil or ecclesiastical year. Well-known examples of abbreviations are: A.D., Anno Domini, Year of the Lord; B.C., Before Christ; A.M.D.G., Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam, For the greater glory of God; I.H.S., usually interpreted Jesus Hominum Salvator, Jesus Saviour of Men; R.I.P., Requiescat in Pace, May he (or she) rest in peace. The Roman Church recognizes the name of each religious order, priests, and congregations have their own abbreviations, e.g., O.P., Ordo Predicatatorum, Order of Preachers. Abbreviations in general ecclesiastical use and in titles of religious orders are given in their proper alphabetical places.—C.E.

Abbreviators, Ecclesiastical, officials of the Holy See employed in abbreviating papal documents, organized into a college under Pius II (1458-64), reduced by Pius VII (1800-23) to seven prelates, six lay or clerical substitutes and one sub-substitute, and let disappear entirely under Pius X.—C.E.

A.B.C., An, prayer-poem to the Blessed Virgin by Chaucer, each stanza beginning with a different letter, from A to Z. The first reads: “Almighty, all merciful Queen, to whom all this world fleeth for succor, to have release from sin, sorrow and trouble, Glorious Virgin, flower of all flowers, to thee I fly, confounded in error! Thou mighty, gracious lady, help and relieve me, pity my perils and trouble, Glorious Virgin, flower of all flowers, to thee I fly, confounded in error! Thou mighty, gracious lady, help and relieve me, pity my perils and trouble.”—Complete Works of Chaucer in Modern English, ed. Tatlock-MacKay, N. Y., 1926.

Abdias, Saint, martyr (421), Bp. of Susa, Persia. During the reign of Yazdegard, he destroyed a Zoroastrian fire-temple; in retaliation a general destruction of all churches was ordered, followed by persecution, and Abdas was clubbed to death. Feast, 5 Sept.

Abdenago, Babylonian name for Azarias, one of the three companions of the prophet Daniel at the Court of Nabuchodonosor.

Abdias or Obadiah (Heb., servant of Jehovah). The Book of Abdias is limited to a single chapter of twenty-one verses. It is the shortest book in the O.T. Its literary unity has been contested; yet the arguments in its favor are more solid. Abdias is the prophet of the God of Armies coming for judgment upon Edom. God calls to arms (verse 1). Edom shall be humbled and despoiled (2-7), no wisdom can save her (8-10), because she has rejoiced in the distress of Israel (11-14), God will punish all nations (15-16); while Israel shall be saved, Edom shall perish (17-18), whereas, in the LXX of Israel will be widened (19-20), and on Sion shall be established the kingdom of God (21). Its canonicity is based on the following considerations: though never cited in the N.T., it was ever embodied in the lists of Prophets; it is quoted by Jeremia, in chapter 49; it is comprised in the book of the Apocalypse. It is therefore recognized by the Church. It is in the Breviary on Friday the fourth week in November, but not in the Missal. The name of Abdias alone is known to us. The time when he lived is put by some as the first century A.D., while others regard him as the most ancient of minor prophets. Conservative opinion杀人verse was the author of the book. In a.D. 789, Pius X.—C.E.; Seisenberger, tr. Buchanan, Practical Handbook for the Study of the Bible, N. Y., 1911. (J. Z.)

Abdication, act of resigning or renouncing a benefice or clerical dignity; every such office may be resigned by the incumbent. The benefice must be resigned into the hands of the proper ecclesiastical superior. Abdication must be voluntary, and free from simony. Papal abdication should be made into the hands of the College of Cardinals, since that body must elect a successor (Ferraris). The following popes abdicated: Marcellinus; Liberius; Benedict IX; Gregory VI; St. Celestine V; and Gregory XII. Pius VII signed a conditional abdication in 1804, before setting out for France to crown Napoleon, to take effect if he were imprisoned.—C.E.

Abdon and Sennen, Saints, martyrs (c. 250), Persian noblemen, d. Rome. They were tortured and beheaded in the persecution under Decius. First buried in the house of Quirinus, their bodies were later translated to the cemetery of Pontianus. Patrons of cooperers. Relics according to Bollandists at Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 30 July.—C.E.; Butler.
Abduction (Lat., abducere, to lead away), also known as Rape, Force, or Violence, a diriment matrimonial impediment. It consists in the forcible carrying off or detention of a woman against her will, and it renders a marriage with her invalid so long as she remains in the power of the abductor.—C.E.; Ayrinaha, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919. (J. F. S.)

Abecedarians, 10th-century German Protestant sect, akin to Anabaptists. Depising all human knowledge, even of the alphabet (hence their name), as sinful, and theology especially as idolatrous, they held that God would grant the elect a knowledge of all necessary truth.—C.E.

Abel, second son of Adam, slain by his brother Cain because the latter’s oblivation was not accepted favorably by God, as Abel’s was. For his death in this way he is regarded as a type of Our Saviour. His death symbolizes, too, the bloody sacrifice of the Cross and the unbloody one of the altar. He is mentioned in the Canon of the Mass, and his name holds first place in the Litany for the Dying.—C.E.

Abelard, Peter (1079-1142), philosopher and theologian, b. Pallet, Brittany, France; d. Châlons-sur-Saône. While still quite young, c. 1101, he established schools of his own at Melun and Corbeil and in 1108 at Mt. St. Genevrière. Later he taught at the cathedral school in Paris, where he enjoyed great fame as a teacher of rhetoric and logic. At the height of his popularity when still a cleric in minor orders, he fell in love with Heloise, niece of Canon Fulbert; the discovery of their alliance incurred the displeasure of the Abbot of Saint-Denis, and his orthodoxy was questioned by St. Bernard, who obtained a condemnation at Ronle of some of his writings. Abelard was an Inconstant Scottish primate, 865-908, had a 5th-century church dedicated to St. Martin after the fact. The last abbot, Thomas Pente­wright, surrendered the abbey to the Crown, 1538. In 1507, it was united, 1860. Students (1925), 1800, of whom fewer than 20 are Catholics.—C.E.

Aberdeen, University of. The College of the Holy Virgin in Nativity (now called King’s Col­lege) was erected by papal bull, 1494, and established in 1497 by Bp. William Elphinstone of Aber­deen, Hector Boece being its first principal; the original chapel still remains. Marischal College was founded by the Earl Marischal in 1593 on the site of a chapel dedicated to St. Michael. Both universities were united, 1860. Students (1925), 1800, of whom fewer than 20 are Catholics.—C.E.

Aberdeen Breviary, the Sarum Office in Scott­ish form, compiled by Bp. Elphinstone (1483-1514), who composed the lessons which, for some saints, are all nine devoted to their biographies written with great accuracy. It was printed in 1507. By royal mandate it was to be used generally throughout Scotland, but it was never widely adopted and its use ceased at the overthrow of the Church in Scotland, 1560.—C.E. (ED.)

Abernethy, Perthshire, Scotland, site of the ancient Scottish primateal see, 603-908, had a 5th-cen­tury church dedicated to St. Bridget of Kildare, and a house of Culdees (1097), transferred to Augustinian Canons, 1272. It has one of the three “round towers” of Scotland, 73 ft. high.

Abilene, tetrarchy in Syria, east of Lebanon, mentioned by Luke as being governed by Lysias at the birth of Christ.

Abingdon, a manor of Berkshire, England, established by the Benedictines, 675. It was twice destroyed by the Danes. St. Ethelwold was abbot, 954. It was an important seat of learning before the Norman Conquest. The last abbot, Thomas Pente­cost, surrendered the abbey to the Crown, 1538.—C.E.

Abjuration, denial or disavowal under oath; in canonical language, the renunciation of apostasy, heresy, or schism.—C.E.

Abner, commander of Saul’s army and for a time enemy of David, afterwards reconciled, but treacherously slain by David's commander Joab. David bewailed his death.—C.E.

Abomination of Desolation, a portent of the ruin of the House of God mentioned by Daniel, and referred to by Christ as a sign to the faithful to flee from Judea; commonly interpreted as a symbol of idolatry in the Temple.—C.E.

Abortion (Lat., aboriri, to miscarry), in its widest sense, the ejection (by natural cause) or extraction (by artificial means) of a human fetus from the womb of the mother before it has come to its full development. A distinction is made between a viable fetus, one that is able to sustain life outside of its mother’s body (usually about the sixth or seventh month of pregnancy), and one that is not viable, i.e., unable to continue to live, even though it may live for a short period. Theologians distinguish between a direct abortion when the practitioner intends primarily to remove the fetus, and an indirect abortion, when the surgeon performs an operation on the mother, and through accident the child is injured or expelled. A further distinction is made between a uterine fetus, one that is located in the womb (uterus) of the mother, the normal or natural seat of pregnancy, and an extra-uterine, or ectopic (out of place), fetus, which for some reason or other is lodged outside of the uterus, usually within one of the Fallopian tubes. The moral principles with regard to abortion are as follows. Every direct abortion, even during the earliest period of pregnancy, is a grievous sin and tantamount to homicide. Indirect abortion is sometimes permitted, provided that there be sufficient and grave reason, such as the saving of the mother's life, and that every precaution be taken to save the life of the child and, in case the child’s life be in danger, that it receive timely baptism. The Catholic Church has always condemned direct abortion as a crime of the most heinous character. Pope Sixtus V in his Constitution “Effrenatam” (29 Oct., 1588) says that anyone guilty of abortion should be punished as an ordinary murderer. His Holiness also withdraws all ecclesiastical privileges from clerics who might have committed abortion and forbids their promotion to Orders. The New Code (can. 2350) says: “Persons perpetrating abortion, not even excepting the mother, incur, if the act meets its effect, excommunication reserved to the Ordinary, and if such persons are clerics, they are to be deposed.” Another canon (985, §4) states: “Those who have committed voluntary homicide or have secured the abortion of a human fetus, and all who cooperated thereto, are to be considered irregular a delicto.”—C.E.: O'Malley, The Ethics of Medical Homicide, N. Y., 1919; P.C. Augustine. (p. s.)

Abp. = archbishop.

Abraham (Heb., father of a multitude), patriarch, son of Thare and father of Ismael. He left Ur of the Chaldees and came to Haran, where his father died. At the command of God he took up his abode in Chanaan, the land promised to his seed. Famine forced him to Egypt. On his return, he remained in Chanaan whilst Lot chose the country about the Jordan. He rescued Lot, when taken prisoner by the King of Elam, and on his return was met by Melchisedech, King of Salem, who blessed him. God made a covenant with Abraham, changing his name from Abraem to Abraham and promised him that his descendants should be as numerous as the stars of heaven. He promised him, moreover, a son by the barren Sara. Then followed the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrha, the escape of Lot, the birth of Isaac, and the covenant with Abimelech. The faith of Abraham is tried by God's command to sacrifice his son Isam. An angel stays his hand, and as a reward of his unbounded confidence in God, makes known to him the greatness of his posterity. Sara died at the age of 127. Abraham then married Cetura by whom he had six children. He died at the age of 175.—C.E.

Abraham de Georgiis and Companions, Syrian martyrs in Mazua, Abyssinia, 30 April, 1593; cause opened, 30 Jan., 1899.

Abraham in Liturgy. The patriarch Abraham is specifically mentioned in the Roman Martyrology (9 October); in the Litany for the Dying; in the Breviary, at Quinquagesima, Shrove Tuesday, Passion Sunday, and in the Magnificat, Benedictus and Psaltery; in the Missal, in the third Prophecy on Holy Saturday, Epistle of the thirteenth Sunday after Pentecost, Offertory of the Mass for the Dead, blessing in a Nuptial Mass, and in the Canon of the Mass; in the Pontifical, in the preface of the Martyrology (9 October); in the Breviary, at Quinquagesima, Shrove Tuesday, Passion Sunday, and in the Magnificat, Benedictus and Psaltery; in the Missal, in the third Prophecy on Holy Saturday, Epistle of the thirteenth Sunday after Pentecost, Offertory of the Mass for the Dead, blessing in a Nuptial Mass, and in the Canon of the Mass; in the Pontifical, in the preface of the Martyrology (9 October). The companion of Abraham is named in the Missal, in the third Prophecy on Holy Saturday, Epistle of the thirteenth Sunday after Pentecost, Offertory of the Mass for the Dead, blessing in a Nuptial Mass, and in the Canon of the Mass; in the Pontifical, in the preface of the Martyrology (9 October). Abraham-men or Abram-men, name given in contempt in Reformation days to the poor who were forced to wander and beg aims after the dissolution of the monasteries in England, originating probably from the Gospel parable of Lazarus, the poor man received into Abraham's bosom.

Abraham's Bosom, expression used by Luke to indicate the abode of the righteous dead before their admission to the Beatific Vision after the death of the Saviour; the Fathers of the Church often use it to mean heaven. It suggests the return of the patriarch's posterity to his embrace.—C.E.

Abraham's Oak, an oak in the vale of Mamre, Chanaan (Quercus pseudo-coccifera), alleged to be the same near which Abraham camped on several occasions, and which is probably the one referred to by Josephus (Jewish Antiquities, 1, 10, No. 4). Numerous legends have been associated with it.
Abrogation, in law, the total abolition of a law, right, or privilege.

Absalom (Heb., father of peace), beloved son of David, renowned for personal beauty (2 Kings, 13-18). To avenge his sister's dishonor he killed his elder stepbrother, Amnon. Ambitious to attain the throne, he afterwards plotted against David; pursued by the royal forces, he was caught by his hair to the branches of a tree and there slain. David was inconsolable when he heard of his death.—C.E.

Absolute (Lat., absolutum, entirely free), in philosophy: (1) pure actuality; (2) that which is complete, perfect and unlimited; (3) that which exists by its own nature and is therefore independent of everything else; (4) that which is not related to any other being; (5) the sum of all being, actual and potential (Regel). In the first three meanings it is a name for God which Christian philosophy may readily accept.—C.E.; Mercier, Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy, tr. Parker, St. Lo., 1917-18; Dubray, Introductory Philosophy, N. Y., 1923.

Absolution (Lat., absolvere, to free from), the power conferred on the Apostles and their successors to forgive sin: "Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them" (John, 20, 23); it is implied permission or a request that the lessons be recited. In the Divine Office, it is a short prayer recited by the officiant before each group of lessons at Matins, implying permission or a request that the lessons be recited. The use of such absolutions at Rome in the 9th century is attested by Amalarius and monastic usage in the same century by Smapragus. A variety of such prayers, including those in the present Roman Breviary, is found in manuscripts of the 12th and 13th centuries.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss; P.C. Augustine; MacMahon, Liturgical Catechism, Dublin, 1926. (J. G. E.)

Absolution, General, given simultaneously without a confession of sin, where such confession is practically impossible, for instance, in the case of soldiers about to advance under fire, or in case of sudden death; there remains, however, an obligation on the part of the persons so absolved to mention their sins when they next make confession.

Abstinence, Law of, regards only quality of food, is binding on all those who have completed their seventh year, and forbids the eating of flesh-meat or soup made from meat, but not the use of eggs, milk, butter, cheese, or of condiments made from animal fat. The prohibition against eating fish and flesh at the same meal has been abolished. The regulations do not affect special in­

Abstinence is obligatory in English-speaking countries on the days mentioned below. UNITED STATES: Fridays; ember-days; vigils of Pentecost, Assumption, All Saints, Christmas; Ash Wednesday; Saturdays of Lent. The obligation is suspended on Holy Saturday at noon and on all feasts of precept, except those falling on week-days in Lent; and on vigils which fall on a Sunday, there is no abstinence on the Sunday or on the preceding Sat­

Abuse of Power is taken in canon law in the very wide sense of the evil and unlawful use of ecclesiastical power or office and the term is not restricted to tyranny. The Code devotes to it an entire title (XIX) of the Fifth Book. The first canon of the title states: "Abuse of ecclesiastical power shall, at the prudent judgment of the legitimate superior, be punished according to the gravity of the fault, the prescriptions of the canons which enact a certain punishment for the same abuses being observed." The remaining canons give the special sanctions decreed against abuses which take place in the general government of dioceses and of religious communities. Scattered through the Code provisions are to be found against other abuses, such as those committed in the administration of the sacraments, in the bestowing of benefices, etc.—P.C. Augustine; Woywod. (J. MacC.)

Abyss (Gr., abyssos, bottomless), primarily an adjective signifying very deep (Wisdom, 10); as the abode of the dead, or limbo, and the abode of waters, or primitive chaos, and as used in the N.T., the abode of the dead, or limbo, and the abode of evil spirits, or hell.

Abyssinia, independent monarchy in northeastern Africa; area, 350,000 sq. m.; estimated pop., 10,000,000. According to legend, Christianity was introduced by the eunuch Candace baptized by Philip the Deacon, and was firmly established in the 4th century under St. Frumentius, the first bishop. Since his time the Abyssinians have been members of the Monophysite heresy. The Abyssinian Church is the Monophysite Church, a body of Monophysite Christians in Abyssinia, governed by the Abuna, a vicar of the Coptic Patriarchate of Alexandria. Next in importance to the Abuna, who must be an Egyptian monk, is the Deftaras, a native Abyssinian who rules the monastic orders. Besides priests and monks, there is a class called Deftaras whose duty is to study the written ordinances. The liturgical language, Geez, shows a mixture of Greek and Arabic. They claim there is but one nature in Christ, reject all the eumenical councils since Ephesus, have some minor heresies of their own, and practise probably the lowest type of Christian worship. Discarded Christian customs, as immersion and infant communion, are observed, as well as many Judaistic rites, including circumcision and the dedication of children called "Nazarenus." Their Canon of Scripture contains many apocryphal books. The clergy are poorly, the monks better, educated.—C.E., I, 76.

A.C. = Ante Christum (before Christ); Auditor Camerum (Auditor of the Papal treasury).

Académie David, formerly St. Frederick's College, Drummondville, Quebec, Canada; conducted by the Brothers of Charity; professors, 12; students, 250; degrees conferred in 1929, 8.

Academie des Sciences, Roman, societies founded at Rome for the encouragement of scientific, literary, and artistic pursuits, and for promoting higher religious studies. Those founded by, or under the protection of, the popes are: "Pontificia Accademia dei Nuovi Lincei" (1847; scientific); "Pontificia Accademia degli Arcadì" (1690; literary); "Pontificia Accademia Romana di Archeologia" (1816; archaeology); "Pontificia Accademia dei Nobili Eclesiastici" (1710; religious); "Accademia Romana di San Luca" (1777; fine arts) and "Accademia di Santa Cecilia" (1588; music), now royal academies; and others. There are also the academies of art founded at Rome by the French (1666), the English (1821), the Spaniards (1801), and Americans (1889), and the "Societa di Convenzione di Sacra Archeologia," founded by De Rossi in 1875.—C.E.

Acaries, Madame. See Marie de l'Incarnation, Blessed.

Acathistus. (1) Title of a hymn or office in Greek liturgy, in honor of the Mother of God; when sung, the people are obliged to stand. (2) Day on which this hymn is used, i.e., fifth Saturday in Lent.—C.E.

Acca, Saint, confessor (c. 660-742), Bp. of Hexham, England. Bede dedicated several works to him. Driven from his diocese, 732, he took refuge in Galloway, but returned in 742. The Celtic cross at his grave in Hexham has been restored. Patron of learning. Feast, 29 Oct.—C.E.

Access (Lat., accedere, to approach). (1) The tenor of those prayers which are recommended to the priest to be said before Mass. (2) In canon law, a right at some future time to a certain benefice which is in abeyance through lack of age or other condition.

Acclamation (Lat., ad, to; clamare, to cry out), manifestation of public feeling; in republican Rome, a shout, often limited to certain stereotyped forms. These were the prototypes of most of the liturgical acclamations, called laudes, which originated when coronations assumed an ecclesiastical character and were performed in a church. A sort of litany was chanted by the herald while the people repeated each verse after the leaders. The laudes were also often repeated on festivals, at a bishop's election, and since about the eighth century, at the papal Mass. Now, after the Gloria and Collect of the Mass of the Coronation, the senior cardinal-deacon, standing before the pope enthroned, chants the words "Exaudia Christi" (Hear, O Christ), to which all present reply "Long Life to our Lord... who has been appointed Supreme Pontiff and universal Pope." This is repeated three times with other invocations and expands into a short litany, to which the response is, "Tu illum adjuva" (Do Thou help him). At the early councils the acclamations usually took the form of a compliment to the emperor. Other meanings attached to the word are: the applause of the congregation which often, in ancient times, interrupted the sermons and wishes found upon sepulchral monuments; brief liturgical formula, such as "Deo gratias"; a form of papal election in which the cardinals without previous consultation or the formality of balloting, unanimously proclaim one of the candidates Supreme Pontiff.—C.E.

Accolade (Lat., ad collum, to the neck), ceremony used in conferring knighthood, either by a kiss, or by a slight blow on the neck, the second form being still used in England; also, a form of salutation and farewell used in some countries by clerics or religious, like the peace salutation of clerics or religious, like the peace salutation

Accommodation, Biblical (Lat., accommodare, to adapt), the application of biblical words, because of some similarity or analogy, to that which was not intended by the author. The words, "O all ye that pass by the way, attend, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow" (Lam., 1), are spoken of Jerusalem personified, but may be accommodated by extension to any soul in extreme grief. An accommodation is not the sense of the text and is not a proof from Scripture.—C.E.; Schumacher. (H. J. G.)

Achaia, ｧ-く'ｨya, Roman province corresponding approximately to modern Greece. St. Paul was very active here (2 Cor., 1; 9), and founded a flourishing church in Corinth (Acts, 18).

Achaicus, Corinthian Christian who carried letters between Paul and the Corinthians (1 Cor., 16).

Achatus (Agathius), Saint, martyr (306), Cappadocian centurion. He was beheaded at Byzantium. Three churches were dedicated to him in Constantinople. Feast, 8 May.

Achilleus, Saint. See Nereus and Achilleus.

Achil, Giovanni Gracito, apostolic priest. b. Viterbo, Italy, 1803. He was suspended by ecclesiastical authorities for immorality, and later imprisoned by the pontifical government for revolutionary agitation. He gave anti-Catholic lectures in London; exposed by J. H. Newman (afterwards cardinal) he brought a libel action in 1822, in which Newman was fined £106, owing to the anti-Catholic prejudices of the judges. Achillii afterwards became utterly discredited (Ward, "Life of Newman"), and the incident caused a revulsion in favor of Newman.

Achimelech. (1) Priest of Nobo who entertained David in his flight from Saul. (2) A Hethite, companion of the outlawed David. (3) "Son of Abiathar," and an associate of Sadoc in the priesthood. (4) Name given to Achis, King of Geth, in Psalm 33.—C.E.

Achiropoeta, ｧ-け'り-ぷ-ｫ-た (Gr., acheiropoieia, not made by hands), pictures of supposedly miraculous origin. The Holy Face of Edessa, in the church of the Bartholomewites at Genoa, according to legend, is a portrait of Christ painted by Himself. The picture of Christ preserved in the chapel Sancta Sanctorum of the Lateran is supposed to have been outlined by St. Luke and completed by angels, and is said to have miraculously appeared.—Chandlery, Pilgrim Walks in Rome, St. L., 19:24; Cabrol, Dictionnaire d'archeologie chretienne, IV, 2078.

Achonry, a-ke-'o-ｧ-ry, Diocese of, Ireland, includes portions of Galway, Roscommon, and Offaly Counties; suffragan of Tuam. St. Finian was an early missionary. The long list of its bishops includes St. Nathy, reputed first bishop (c. 560); Eugene O'Hart, present at the Council of Trent; John Lyster; and Patrick Morrisroe, since 1911; residence, Ballaghaderreen. Churches, 41; priests, 45; college, 1; high schools, 3; primary schools, 10; trade schools, 8; institutions, 4; Catholics, 76,983; others, 1927.

Acolouthia (Gr., sequence), the arrangement of the Divine Office in the Greek Church, beginning with Little Vespers before sunset and Greater Vespers after it; the Orthos (Gr., dawn), in two parts, corresponding to Matins and Lauds of the Roman Rite, is said at midnight; little Hours are said during the day and the Office closes with the Apo-Acolyte (Gr., akolouthos, attendant, follower), an attendant, for subordinate duties, on the ministers officiating at a sacred rite, e.g., altar-boys; especially a member of the highest of minor orders in the Latin Church. The chief duties of this office are: to light the candles on the altar and to carry them in procession and during the solemn singing of the Gospel; to prepare wine and water for the Sacrifice of the Mass; to assist the ministers at Mass and other public services of the Church.—C.E.

Acre (formerly St. Jean d'Ac*r), seaport, Palestine, lying N. of Mt. Carmel, and W. of the mountains of Galilee. Under the Romans it was called Ptolemais. St. Paul landed here on his way from Asia Minor to Jerusalem (Acts, 21).

Acrístico (Gr., akrís, end; stichos, line), any composition in which the initial or final letters, syllables, or words of each line form other words or sentences; said to have been invented by Epicharmus. The poem of the Erethryan Sibyl thus produced the Greek words for "Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour," which also in turn yielded the letters ICHTHYS (fish), a mystical symbol of Our Lord. The Acrostic Psalm 9 (Heb., 9-10) is only appreciable in the original Hebrew. The term is also applied to passages in Scripture in which the texts begin with letters of the alphabet in consecutive order, e.g., Psalms, 110, 111, 118; Proverbs, 31.—C.E.

Acta Apostolica Sedis, a monthly publication established by Constitution, "Promulgandi," 29 Sept., 1898, as official journal of the Holy See; its authoritative official character is reasserted in Canons 9 of the Code. Decrees and decisions published therein are thereby officially promulgated and become effective three months from date of issue. (T. T. K.)

Acta Sanctorum Sedis, a monthly published at Rome, but not by the Holy See, from 1865 to 1908, containing principal enactments of the Holy Father and Congregations. Its contents were declared official and authentic in 1904. H. (C. R. M.) in Chronic Barberinus said that the work had been confiscated in such a way that scarcely any Catholic or Old Protestant could escape, no distinction being made between rebel and royalist. This new Act was based on the king's Declaration (1660) by which all the land was confirmed to the "adventurers" (speculators) and, with a few exceptions, to the soldiers. In most cases the estates of Protestants were to be at once restored. The Catholics were divided into "innocent" and "noxious" (q.v.). Those who established their claim to belong to the former class might be restored if they had taken lands in Connaught; the latter, if they had taken lands in Connaught, were not to be restored, even when they had adhered to the Peace of 1648. The Act of Explanatory (1665) was intended to protect and secure the interests of Protestants; thereby the Anglican Church regained its estates.
and its hierarchy was reestablished. The most inquisi-tionist provision excluded the whole body of 4000 innocent claimants, with the exception of about 600 whose claim had been heard. The Protestant landholders received more than two-thirds of the good land, and in 1689 two-thirds of them held their estates under these Acts.—C.E.; Lecky, History of Ireland during Eighteenth Century, Lond., 1902.

Act of Supremacy, passed in England, 1534, declared the king to be the supreme head of the English Church, and gave him full powers to make

Act of Tolerance, passed in England in the reign of William and Mary, granted freedom of religious worship to all, except Catholics and persons denying the Trinity.

Acton, John Emerich Edward Dalberg, Baron Acton (1834-1902), professor of modern history at Cambridge, b. Naples; d. Tegernsee, Bavaria. He studied at Oscott and under Döllinger at Munich, and became Liberal M.P. for Carlow, Ireland, 1859-63. At the time of the Vatican Council, he strongly opposed the declaration of the infallibility of the pope. The “Letters of Quirinus” have been attributed to him. The “Cambridge Modern History” was begun under his auspices.—C.E.; Gasquet, Lord Acton and His Circle, Lond., 1906.

Actor Ecclesiae (Lat., agent of the Church), medieval designation for an official deputed to defend the rights and revenues of a church or monastery, often confounded with Advocatus ecclesiae.
It has been practically superseded, in as far as the office still exists, by the terms “patron” and “ad-

Acts, Canonical, acts that produce a legal effect according to the rules of ecclesiastical law, and are either allowed or forbidden. They comprise acts of:
official administrators of ecclesiastical property; persons employed in ecclesiastical courts, judge, auditor, referee, “defensor vinculi” (e.g., for marriage), fiscal promoter and promoter of faith (for beatification and canonization), courier, assisting and strengthening the natural faculty while it is lacking permanence and is granted by God solely to assist and strengthen the natural faculty while it is in operation, it is correctly called actual.—C.E.; about A.D. 63 in Greek, and very likely when the writer was in Rome.—C.E.; Madame Cé-cilia, Acts, N. Y., 1925; Lynch,
The Story of the Acts of the Apostles, N. Y., 1917.

Actual Grace, a supernatural gift from Almighty God, received in the human intellect or will, accidentally perfecting these faculties and enabling them to elicit acts explicitly related to eternal life. Because the power thus received is above and beyond all natural excitement it is correctly called supernatural; because it lacks permanence and is granted by God solely to assist and strengthen the natural faculty while it is in operation, it is correctly called actual.—C.E., VI, 689; Pohle-Preuss, Grace, St. L., 1921.

Actual Sin, a personal act or omission that does not conform to God’s will or law. Actual sins may be divided into the following categories: sins of commission or omission, according to the precept which they violate; interior or exterior sins, according to the manner of committing them; sins against God, one’s neighbor, and one’s self, according to their object; mortal and venial sins, according to the degree of evil; mortal and non-capital sins, according to their effect on the soul; sins of ignorance, weakness, and malice, according to the cause which leads to them; capital or non-capital sins, according as they do or do not lie at the root of other sins.—
P.C. Augustine.

(s. a. m.)

Acus (Lat., needle), pin made of precious metal, sometimes jeweled, for attaching the pallium to the chasuble over which it was worn.
A.D. = Anno Domini (year of the Lord).

Adalard, Saint, abbot (c. 751-827). Grandson of Charles Martel, he was prime minister to Pepin the Short, and adviser to Louis the Short, and the Slavs. Feast, 2 Jan.

Adalbert (Teut., nobly bright), Saint, martyr (939-997), apostle of Prussia, Bp. of Prague, and Abbot of Corbie. Feast, 23 April.—C.E.; Butler.

Adalard, postle of Prussia, Bp. of Prague, and Abbot of Corbie (d. 827), b. 817, d. 827. Feast, 23 April.—C.E.; Butler.

Adam (Heb., man), the first man and father of the human race. God made him in His own image, and placed him in the Garden of Eden. He made a woman, Eve, from the rib of Adam and gave her to him for a wife. Adam and Eve were tempted by the devil, disguised as a serpent, to disobey God by eating of the tree of knowledge. For their sin God expelled them from Paradise and they were condemned to pain and hardship in the outer world.

Adam was the father of Cain and Abel, of Seth and of Noah. When he was 130 years old, and of many sons and daughters. He died at the age of 930 according to the scriptural computation. In the N.T. St. Paul alludes to Christ as the "last Adam," through whom all are saved, as in the first Adam all inherited the effect of his sin.—C.E.

Adam de Marisco (Marsby), Franciscan scholar (d. c. 1328), b. probably Somerset, England. Known as "Doctor illinistris," he helped to organize the teaching and discipline at Oxford.—C.E.

Adamnan (Eunan), Saint, abbot (c. 624-704), b. Drumhorne, Donegal, Ireland; d. Iona. He entered the monastery of Iona, 650, and was elected abbot in 679. On a visit to Ireland he introduced the Roman method of reckoning Easter. He is known by whom. There are 40 translations; the one by Canon Oakeley.—C.E.; Britt.

Adam's Peak, mountain, Ceylon, at summit of Adam's Peak mountain, Ceylon, at summit of Addai, Additus, or Thraddus, Saint, mentioned in the Syriac document, "Doctrina of Addai," as one of the 72 disciples of Christ, who preached at Edessa, converting King Abgar V and a great number of his people. The "Doctrina" is only a legend. No doubt there were Christians in Edessa before the end of the 2nd century but its first Christian king was Abgar IX (179-214). Feast, various dates.

Addeus and Maris, Liturgy of, written in Syriac. It was the usual liturgy of the Nestorians, composed, according to tradition, in the 1st century, by Addeus and Maris, who evangelized Edessa and Seleucia-Ctesiphon. It is now used chiefly by the Nestorians of Kurdistan, and, purged of Nestorianism, by the Chaldean Uniates of Kurdistan and Malabar.—C.E.

Adelaide, Archbishop of, Australia comprises, east of Spencer's Gulf, that portion of the province of South Australia south of Victoria and Burra counties and of the River Murray from the Northwest Bend to New South Wales, and Flinders, Musgrave, and Jervois counties and adjacent islands west of the gulf; area, 40,530 sq. m.; suffragans, Port Augusta and Victoria and Palmerston. Established as a diocese 1842, and as an archdiocese, 1887. Bishops: Francis Murphy (1844-58); Patrick Geogheghan (1859-64); Lawrence Shiel (1866-72); Christopher Reynolds (1873-93); John O'Reilly (1895-1915); Robert Spence (1915). Churches, 104; priests, secular, 42; priests, regular, 32; religious women, 473; colleges, 3; high schools, 28; primary schools, 51; institutions, 9; Catholics, 51,698.

Adeodatus I (Lat., given from God) or Deusdedit, Saint, Pope (615-618). He is said to have been the first to use bullae or leaden seals for pontifical documents, whence the name Bulls. Feast, 8 Nov.—C.E.

Adeodatus II, Saint, Pope (672-676). A monk of the Roman cloister of St. Erasmus, he was active in promoting monastic discipline and in repressing the heresy of the Monothelites, who believed that there was but one will in Christ, Le., no human will but only the Divine.

Adeste Fideles, or COME ALL YE FAITHFUL, hymn used at Christmastide, not in the Breviary or Missal. It was written in the 18th century, but it is not known by whom. There are 40 translations; the one commonly used is by Canon Oakeley.—C.E.; Britt; Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1925.

Adjuration, an earnest appeal to another to act or refrain from acting, under pain of Divine visitation or the rupture of the ties of reverence and love.—C.E.

Ad Libitum (Lat., at one's pleasure, choice), used in the order for the Divine Office when there is a choice of prayer at Mass.

Ad Limina Apostolorum (Lat., to the thresholds of the Apostles), a pilgrimage to the tombs of Sts. Peter and Paul, canonically required of all bishops every three to ten years, according to their distance from Rome. There they venerate the Apostles and render an account of their dioceses to the pope. A delegate may fulfill the obligation if the bishop is unable to go.

Ad Metalla (Lat., to the mines or quarries), sentence passed on Christians condemned to hard labor in mines or quarries.

Administration Apostolic, a special form of diocesan organization of which eight have been created in Europe since the World War: Feldkirch, Austria; Tütz, Germany; Miskolce, Hungary; Tírnava, Czechoslovakia; Targult-Siret, and Temesvar, Rumania; Subotica, and Veliki Bebek, Yugoslavia. In most cases, where a new boundary of a country intersected an old diocese, the section in the country remote from the diocesan seat was erected into an administration Apostolic, usually under a titular bishop.—P.C. Augustine.

Administration of the Sacraments, the act of the minister in conferring the sacraments on the individual faithful for the sanctification of souls. Since the whole efficacy of the sacraments is from Christ, the minister administers them in His name and by authority. As the chief means of sanctification, they are to be administered to the faithful frequently, while the faithful on their part are to receive them with reverence and holy dispositions.—Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, St. L., 1923.

(R. R. M.) Administrator. (1) A cleric, priest or bishop, who for grave and special reasons is appointed by the Holy See, to administer the diocese for an indefinite or for a specified time, which might be either till this particular see is vacant or, if vacant, until another bishop is appointed, when another diocese has the same episcopal jurisdiction as the former bishop, and in exercising it he is bound by the same laws. (2) Head priest of a cathedral in England: a priest who is appointed by the bishop to administer the affairs of a cathedral for the same reasons as those given above for a diocese. (3) In the United States, a priest appointed by the bishop to minister the affairs of a parish when an irremovable pastor makes an appeal to Rome against his removal from his benefice by the bishop; this administrator holds the office until a decision is given by the higher superiors. In Europe, a priest appointed by the superior of a convent to attend to the affairs of parishes which are under his jurisdiction. (4) The administrator of ecclesiastical institutions, as seminaries, colleges, hospitals, asylums, convents, is usually a priest who attends to both the spiritual and material affairs of these institutions. Laymen are frequently appointed administrators of Church property and ecclesiastical institutions, but usually they are co-workers of the clergy.—P.C. Augustine.

Admonitions, Canonical, a preliminary means used by the Church towards a suspected person as a preventive of harm or a remedy of evil. A paternal admonition is a secret remonstrance addressed either by a prelate or his confidential delegate to a cleric suspected of misconduct on a basis of public rumor. A third paternal admonition having failed of effect, the way is paved for canonical or legal admonition, which is to a great extent akin to a summons to judgment and a recognized part of the "acts" of future procedure. In religious orders or congregations, admonitions are given by a competent religious superior, or by one delegated by him, to a religious who has committed serious external misdemeanors, which, if not amended, will give sufficient grounds for instituting the judicial process of dismissal.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Adonai, lord, ruler, lord of lords, a name bestowed upon God in the O.T. (Ex., 6). It is the perpetual substitute for the name Yahweh.

Adoption, Canonical. In a legal sense adoption is an act by which a person, with the cooperation of the public authority, takes as his own the child of another. Under Roman law legal relationship was established, based on the natural relationship, and it was a bar to marriage. Its degrees were: civil fatherhood, between the adopter and the adopted and the latter's legitimate children; civil brotherhood, between the adopted and the legitimate children of the adopter; affinity, arising from the tie of adoption between the adopted and the adopter's wife, and between the adopter and the adopted's wife. The Church, receiving this law as her own, recognized adoption as a diriment impediment of marriage. The modification of the Roman law by the compilation of new codes led to discussions as to what extent this diriment impediment of legal relationship still exists in the eyes of the Church, and the principle was laid down by Benedict XIV that whatever, civil or religious, the legislator in the codification of Roman law introduces as to what extent this diriment impediment of marriage. In Great Britain and the United States legal adoption in the sense of the Roman law does not exist. In the United States it is regulated by State statutes and is generally accomplished by mutual arrangements as to what extent this diriment impediment of marriage. In the United States, adoption is not generally a diriment impediment of marriage, nor in the eyes of the Church in any way preventive of it.—C.E.; Ayrling, Roman Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919.

Adoption, Supernatural, the act by which God takes us as His own children and makes us heirs to the happiness of heaven. Unlike natural or legal adoption which alters the standing of the adopted one externally or socially, supernatural adoption affects our very life by transforming our soul into the likeness of Jesus Christ and making us His co-heirs to the kingdom of heaven. This is repeated in various terms, as by St. Paul in his Epistle to the Romans, 8, 15, "You have received the spirit of adoption of sons, whereby we cry: Abba (Father)." and by Sts. John, Peter, and James. It occurs frequently in the early liturgies and the Fathers stress the fact of our delivery, i.e., of our God-given and godlike life by virtue of this adoption which is the result of sanctifying grace.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, Grace, St. L., 1921.
ADOPTIONISM

Adoptionism, a heresy originating in the 8th century claiming that Christ as Man was only the adoptive Son of God. It was advocated by Eilipandus of Toledo and Felix of Urgel, but condemned by Pope Adrian I in 785 and 794. Abelard renewed this teaching in the 12th century, and his neo-Adoptionism was condemned by Pope Alexander III in 1177.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, Christology, St. L., 1922.

Adoration (Lat., ad, to; orare, to pray; or oris, mouth: from the pagan custom of expressing reverence for a god by wafting a kiss to the statue), an act of religion offered to God alone in recognition of His infinite perfection and supreme dominion, and of the creature’s dependence on Him. It is an act of mind and will expressing itself exteriorly by postures of reverence and prayers of praise. It is loosely used to express adoration and affection for creatures.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss.

Adoration, Perpetual exposition of the Blessed Sacrament day and night in continuity, during which time pious persons take their turns uninterruptedly as adorers. As a rule the object of this perpetual adoration is, reparation for the outrages of men against a God of goodness. The practise dates probably from the 12th or 13th century, when periods of adoration were sometimes prescribed by kings in thanksgiving for signal victories, and in the 15th century there were adorations in petition or thanksgiving for some special favor. The Forty Hours’ devotion, begun in 1534, developed the general practise of perpetual adoration, which is the special object of many pious associations and religious congregations established since that date.—C.E.; P. C. Augustine.

(P. W. N.)

Adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. The Catholic Church teaches that the highest type of worship (latraria) is to be given to the Blessed Sacrament. This doctrine follows logically from two revealed truths: that Jesus Christ, even in His humanity, on account of His Divine personality is worthy of Divine homage; and that Jesus Christ is really present in the Blessed Sacrament. Most illogical therefore is the attitude of those who admit the doctrine of the Real Presence, but refuse to give external adoration to the Eucharist. The manner of showing homage to the Blessed Sacrament has varied in the Catholic Church in different ages. In the Oriental rites a profound bow is the usual act of adoration. In the Latin Church a genuflection is made, single if the Blessed Sacrament is in the tabernacle, double if it is exposed.—Council of Trent, session 13, ch. 5. (F. J. C.)

Adoration of the Cross, a ceremony of Good Friday. The term is inaccurate, but it is sanctioned by long use. Veneration is the proper term. Following the Collects in the Mass of the Presanctified, the veiled crucifix is gradually uncovered, with the threefold chanting of “Ecce lignum crucis, in quo Salvator mundi pependit” (Behold the wood of the Cross, on which hung the Saviour of the world). The clergy then remove their shoes, an ancient sign of reverence, and kneeling, kiss the crucifix. The laity then venerate the crucifix by kissing it.—Missal; The Mass Every Day in the Year; Holy Week Book.

(J. F. S.)

Adoration of the Magi, the worship by the wise men from the East of the Divinity of the Infant Jesus, a favorite subject of the masters. Among the many who have painted this subject are: Fra Angelico, Botticelli, Del Sarto, Dürer, Ghirlandajo, Lippi, and Memling. The adoration of the Magi is commemorated in the feast of the Epiphany.

“Adoro Te devote, latens Deitas, or Hid­den God, devoutly I adore Thee,” hymn usually given in the “Thanksgiving after Mass,” in the Missal; it is often sung at Benediction. It was written by St. Thomas Aquinas (1227-74). There are about 25 translations. The English title given is by J. O’Hagan; the third verse reads:

On the Cross was veiled Thy Godhead’s splendor,
Here Thy Manhood lieth hidden too;
Unto both alike my faith I render,
And, as sue the contrite thief, I sue.

—C.E.; Britt.

Ad regias Agni dapes, or AT THE LAMB’S FEET we SING, hymn for Vespers from Low Sunday to Ascension Day; Ambrosian school, 7th century. There are about 30 translations; the English title given is by R. Campbell.—Britt.

Adrian I, Pope (772-795), founder of the temporal power of the popes. b. Rome; d. there. Elected when the Lombards were threatening to dominate all Italy, he summoned Charlemagne to assist him in averting this catastrophe, and the result of his appeal was the Donation of Charlemagne, for eleven centuries the basis of the temporal sovereignty of the popes. The Lombard Kingdom was vanquished, and the papacy delivered from its persistent foe and left free to promote peace and order in Christendom. Adrian presided over the Seventh General Council (Nicea, 787), in which the Catholic doe trine regarding images was expounded.—C.E.; Mann.

Adrian II, Pope (862-872), b. Rome, c. 792. Following minor orders he had married, and his wife and daughter were slain by Eleutherius, who had forcefully married the latter. He strove to maintain peace among Charlemagne's descendants and compelled King Lothair of Lorraine to take back his lawful wife. Through the Council of Constantinople (869) he effected the restoration of unity between East and West. He supported St. Cyril and Methodius in their evangelization of the Slavs, and approved their rendering of the liturgy into Slavonic.—C.E.; Mann.

Adrian III, Saint, Pope (884-885), b. Teano or Rome; d. near Modena. When on his way to an imperial diet he died and was buried in the monastery of Nonantula. His Mass is celebrated in Rome and Modena, 8 July.—C.E.; Mann.

Adrian IV (Nicholas Breakspear), Pope (1154-59), apostle of the North, b. probably Abbot's Langley, Hertfordshire, England, c. 1100; d. Anagni, Italy. He went abroad as a wandering scholar, and became an Austin Canon at St. Martin's, Paris. Later he was made Bishop of Albano and cardinal, and sent as papal legate to Scandinavia, where he erected the See of Trondhjem, and established the Abbey of Peterscences. He was unanimously elected pope, 1154. By interdict he subdued the populace of Rome, in revolt under Arnold of Brescia; brought Frederick Barbarossa to subdue Brescia; brought Frederick Barbarossa to subdue and made an agreement with William I of Scotland, which aroused the resentment of the emperor, and led to open strife. As for the "Donation of Ireland," whereby he is said to have bestowed the crown; and made an agreement with William I of Sicily which aroused the resentment of the emperor, and led to open strife. Adult Baptism. The Roman ritual has a distinctive rite for adults. After investigation, every adult convert, invalidly or not baptized, receives Baptism unconditionally; if doubtfully baptized the conditional form, "If thou art not baptized, I baptize thee," etc., is employed. For valid reception, the recipient has attained the age of reason.

Adultery. (Lat., adulterium), carnal intercourse of a married person and another who is not the wife or husband. It is a diriment impediment to marriage between two who, during the time of a legitimate marriage, commit the crime pleading themselves to marriage later; or, who commit it during the time of a legitimate marriage and one or the other brings about the death of one of the married parties.—C.E.; P. C. Augustine. (ED.)

Advent (Lat., adventus, coming), period of prayer and fasting in preparation for Christmas, anniversary of the Birth or Coming of Christ, including four Sundays, the first the nearest to the feast of St. Andrew (30 Nov.); it may be as early as 27 Nov. and as late as 3 Dec. It is the beginning of the ecclesiastical year in the Western Church. Its early history is obscure. It was observed in Spain in the 7th century. The Divine Office and the Sunday Masses are most devout preparation for the Christmas feast. Altar drapery and vestments are violet except on third Sunday, when rose color is used, and feasts.—C. E.; Güéranger, tr. Shepherd, The Liturgical Year: Advent, Dub., 1883. (J. P. S.)
Adventists, an American sect, founded by William Miller at Dresden, N. Y., in 1831. Miller believed that the second coming of Christ was to be in 1843 and would be followed by the millennium. Individuals in the existing churches held these sentiments until 1845, when a separate Church was organized. There are now five bodies of Adventists, varying in minor details, but all believing in the imminence of the second coming of Christ, baptism by immersion, and in congregational government; Advent Christian Church; Churches of God in Christ Jesus; Church of God (Adventist); Life and Advent Union; and Seventh-day Adventists (q.v.). In 1926 there were in the United States: 1586 ministers; 2490 churches; and 142,049 members.

Advowson (Lat., advocatio, legal assistance), in English law the right of presenting one to a vacant ecclesiastical benefice; so called because the patron advocates or defends the claims of the one presented. Originally the right of presentation was in English law the right of presenting one to a benefice, to strengthen allure means "one called to one's side" to strengthen. Seven advocates constitute the consistorial college, the officials of the Congregations. Their recompense of law and plead before or present their briefs to the officials of ecclesiastical tribunals. Besides canon and civil men or laymen who plead causes before Roman tribunals, the Church of England.-C.E.; Cambridge Modern History, XI, 560-568.

Advocate, title of Christ (I John, 2, 1). The word, the same as that transcribed Paraclete in St. John's Gospel, 14, where Our Lord promises to send "another Paraclete" (advocate), the Holy Ghost. Christ as Advocate defends the cause of Christian believers against their accuser, the devil (Apoc., 12). He is called in I John, 2, a just advocate: He claims that the virtue of His satisfaction be extended to all in fellowship with Himself. The word, which literally means "one called to one's side" to strengthen and plead, implies that the Christian effectually seeks His help. (w. s. k.)

Advocate of God, the promoter of the cause in a process of beatification or canonization.

Advocate of the Church, lay official, in the Middle Ages, charged with the defense of Church temporalities, both in civil courts and, in later times, in the field; he received in return part of the Church revenues. Under the feudal system the princes appointed the advocates by their own authority, and in many places the office became hereditary, which led to grave abuses.—C.E.

Advocates of Roman Congregations, clergymen or laymen who plead causes before Roman ecclesiastical tribunals. Besides canon and civil law they must know dogmatic and moral theology and profane and church history. Other officials known as procurators submit to them the facts of a case and they concern themselves only with points of law and plead before or present their briefs to the officials of the Congregations. Their recompense is a fixed sum, and nothing is charged the poor. Seven advocates constitute the consistorial college with five others called juniors.—C.E. (en.)

Advowson (Lat., advocatio, legal assistance), in English law the right of presenting one to a vacant ecclesiastical benefice; so called because the patron advocates or defends the claims of the one presented. Originally the right of presentation was conferred upon a person building or endowing a church, but in time this right became annexed to the manor and thus passed from owner to owner. It was then known as advowson appendant. If separated from the estate it was the advowson in gross. Advowsons are either presentative or collative; collative when the bishop himself is the patron, and presentative when the bishop installs one duly presented by another.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Ælan of Ferns, St., SAINT (c. 550-632), popularly MOGUE (Mo-Aedh-og, my dear Aedh), first Bp. of Ferns, b. Inisbreaffy, Ireland; d. Ferns. He founded 30 churches in Wexford and was given nominal supremacy over the Leinster bishops by the title of Ard-Escop (High Bishop). Patron of Ferns. Feast, 31 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Æedh of Kildare, SAINT (c. 609), King of Leinster. He resigned his throne to enter the monastery of Kildare, where he became abbot and bishop. Feast, 4 Jan.

Ægidius of Assisi or Giles, Blessed (d. 1262), companion of St. Francis. Assigned to the hermitage of Fabriano, he there led a life of contemplation. His wisdom led many to consult him; his "Sayings" have had many editions. Feast, 23 April.—C.E.; Robinson, The Golden Words of Blessed Brother Giles, Phila., 1906.

Ælfric the Grammarian (c. 955-1020), Abbot of Eynsham, Anglo-Saxon writer. His writings concerning the Blessed Sacrament occasioned controversy, Protestants contending that he denied transubstantiation; it is now conceded that his words are to be interpreted in the Catholic sense.—C.E.

Æneas Sylvius. See Pius II.

Ængus, Saint (d. 824), called THE CULDEE (Gael., Ceile De, servant of God), b. near Clonenagh, Ireland; d. there. He collaborated with St. Maelruain in writing a martyrology of Irish saints, and wrote the "Feliire," a poetical work on the same subject, which he concluded after he had left the monastery and resumed his hermit's life. Feast, 11 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Æon (Gr., aion, age), an age of the universe; ever-existing; eternal Divine power. In Gnosticism, one of the spiritual powers evolved from the eternal Divine being by progressive emanation and constituting the Pleroma (plenitude) or invisible spiritual world, as distinct from the kenoma (chaotic void) or visible material world.—C.E.

Æir (Gr., air), the largest and outermost covering of chalice and paten in the Greek Church; so named either from lightness of the material, or because held high in the air during the Creed.

Æsthetics (Gr., aisthenein, to perceive, feel), the perception of the beautiful; the science which determines the norm or rule by which beauty is perceived and the criticism which points out wherein a person, object, literary composition, poem, painting, statue, structure, or other artistic work, possesses or lacks the elements of beauty; a science of the fine arts based on philosophical principles. According to the variations of these principles the science differs. Materialists see beauty, or lack of beauty, only in matter, in things which appeal to the senses. Idealists perceive it only in ideals which suit their philosophy. As all beauty consists in order, proportion, symmetry, harmony, there is a spiritual and supernatural beauty, invisible to the senses but perceptible to the spiritual view or intuition, the conformity of a life with God’s law of life. This supernatural beauty may be perceived throughout the Holy Scriptures, but especially in every page of the Gospels; in lives of Christ, like that of St. Bonaventure, Le Camus (tr. Hickey), Coleridge’s “Vita Vite Nostre”. In lives of the Saints, such as Montalembert’s “Elizabeth of Hungary,” Fraser’s “Francesca of Rome,” Concannon’s “Columbanus,” Enid Dinse’s “Mystics All.” The conformity of human life and conduct with the divine idea is admirably explained in the “Art of Life,” by Mgr. Koble, and in the “Life of All Living, the Philosophy of Life,” by C. E.; U.K.; Dubray, Introductions to Philosophy, N.Y., 1923.

Æterna cali gloria, or O Christ, whose glory fills the heaven, hymn for Lauds on Friday; Ambrosian school, 5th century. There are 12 translations; the English title given is by J. Julian.—Britt.

Æterna Christi munera, or Th eternal gifts of Christ, hymn for Matins for the octave of the Epiphany, written by St. Ambrose (340-397). There are 13 translations; the English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Æterne Rector siderum, or RULER OF THE BREATH IMMENSE! hymn for Lauds on 2 Oct., feast of the Holy Guardian Angels. It was written by Card. Bonaime (1542-1621). There are seven translations; the English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Æterne Rerum conditor, or MAKER OF ALL, Eternal King, hymn for Lauds on Sunday, from the Octave of the Epiphany until the first Sunday of Lent, and from the Sunday nearest 1 Oct. until Advent. It was written by St. Ambrose (340-397). There are 18 translations; the English title given is by W. Copeland.—Britt.

Æterne Rex altissime, or Eternal Monarch, King Most High, hymn for Matins from Ascension to Pentecost; Ambrosian school, 5th century. There are 15 translations; the English title given is by J. Julian and others.—Britt.

Affections (Lat., ad, to; facere, to make), term used by writers on spiritual matters to denote emotions, dispositions, movements of the passions of love, desire, enjoyment of what is good, and of hatred, aversion, and disgust for what is evil. The training in virtue, devotion, asepticism, and mysticism in seminaries and novitiates is called school training in virtue, devotion, asceticism, and mysticism in seminaries and novitiates (Lat., ad, to; facere, to make), term used by writers on spiritual matters to denote emotions, dispositions, movements of the passions of love, desire, enjoyment of what is good, and of hatred, aversion, and disgust for what is evil. The training in virtue, devotion, asepticism, and mysticism in seminaries and novitiates is called school training in virtue, devotion, asceticism, and mysticism in seminaries and novitiates.—Koch-Preuss.

Affinity, a diriment matrimonial impediment preventing a valid marriage with certain blood-relatives of a previous wife or husband, unless a dispensation be granted. No marriage can be contracted with any relative of the deceased wife or husband in the direct line, that is, with any of her or his ancestors or descendants; and no dispensation can be given. In the collateral line the impediment extends to the second degree, first cousin, uncle or aunt, nephew or niece; and a dispensation may be granted for either the first or the second degree. Under the older laws there was an impedi-

African Methodist Episcopal Church, a community of Methodist Episcopal Negroes organized in April, 1816, in Philadelphia under the leadership of Richard Allen. It is in close accord with the doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and autonomous in its government. Seven periodicals are published. Foreign missionary work is carried on: in West Africa, including Liberia and Sierra Leone; South Africa, including the Transvaal, Orange Free State, Natal, and Cape Town; the West Indies; and Dutch and British Guiana, in South America. In 1916 there were: 156 stations; 4 missionaries, with 152 native helpers; 121 organized churches, with 29,000 members; and 6 schools, with about 1000 members. There were in the United States in 1925: 703 stations; 4 missionaries, with 152 native helpers; 52 organized churches, with 5360 members; and 698,029 communicants.

African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, a body of Negroes first incorporated as the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 1801, although separate and distinct from the preceding African Methodist Episcopal Church. It was not until 1849 that the name African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church was adopted. They are in close accord with the Methodist Episcopal Church, accepting the Apostle’s Creed “and adhering strictly to the doctrine of the new birth, regeneration followed by adoption, and entire sanctification.” Four periodicals are published by them. Foreign missionary work is carried on in Liberia and the Gold Coast Colony, West Africa, and in South America. In 1916 there were: 52 stations; 4 missionaries, with 60 native helpers; 52 organized churches, with 7000 members; and 10 schools, with 1870 pupils. In the United States in 1925 there were: 3400 ministers; 3442 churches; and 490,000 communicants.

African Missions of Lyons, a congregation of secular priests founded at Lyons, France, 1856, by Mgr. de Brésillac and Fr. Planque; the latter reconstituted it in 1859; constitutions provisionally approved, 1890, and definitively, 1906; revised and again approved by Sacred Congregation of Propaganda, 1922 and 1929. The fiftieth anniversary of the foundation was celebrated in 1906. It has charge of the Vicariate Apostolic of Bein and the Prefectures Apostolic of the Ivory Coast, Gold Coast, Nigeria, Dahomey, and the Delta of the Nile. Two Apostolic schools are at Clermont-Ferrand and Cork, Ireland, and two preparatory schools at Nanterre, France, and Keer-Maestricht, Holland. Statistics: 13 missions or vicariates; 135 establishments; 685 religious (of whom 515 are missionaries); and 897 aspirants. The mother-house is at Lyons.

Agapetus I (Gr., beloved), Saint, Pope (535-536), b. Italy; d. Constantinople. He confirmed decrees against the Arians, went to Constantinople in state to persuade Emperor Justinian to abandon his Italian projects, and while there deposed the heretical patriarch, Anthimus. The Orientals were impressed with his vigor and sanctity. Relics in St. Peter’s, Rome. Feast, 25 Sept.—C.E.; Butler, 20 Sept.

Agapetus II, Pope (946-956), b. Rome. Elected to the papacy, 946, he labored to restore ecclesiastical discipline, and supported Otto the Great in evangelization of the North, urging him with other nobles to invade Italy for the purpose of restoring order. He reigned well during a difficult period.—C.E.; Mann.

Agapitus, Saint, martyr (259-274), d. Palestrina, Italy. A youth of fifteen, he was thrown to the wild beasts in the arena, but was miraculously preserved; this miracle converted many; the judge therefore ordered the saint to be beheaded. Two churches in Palestrina are dedicated to him; his heroic martyrdom was an example to many early saints and martyrs. Invoked against colic. Relics at Palestrina and Besançon. Feast, R. Cal., 18 Aug.—Butler.

Agar (Heb., wandering), handmaid of Sara (Gen., 16: 21; Gal., 4) by whom Abraham begot Ismael. After the birth of Isaac, Sara caused the expulsion of Agar and her son from the dwellings of the patriarch. The unfortunate woman determined to abandon the boy to death in the wilderness but hearkened to the angel who foretold his future. (T. Mcl.)

Agatha (Gr., good), Saint, virgin, martyr (c. 251), b. Catania or Palermo, Sicily; d. Catania. According to her Latin Acts, which, however, are not older than the 6th century, she was annoyed by the Senator Quintianus with avowals of love; as his proposals were rejected, he had her subjected to various cruel tortures, including the cutting-off of her breasts; she died in prison. Her popular veneration was of very early date; her name occurs in the prayer, “Nobis quoque peccatoribus,” in the Canon of the Mass, and in some places bread is blessed after the Consecration of the Mass on her feast and called Agatha bread. Patron of nurses. Emblems: embers, tongs, veil. Feast, R. Cal., 5 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Agathangelus Nourry, Blessed (1598-1638), martyr, b. Vendôme, France; d. Dibauria, Abyssinia. He took the Capuchin habit at Le Mans, taught theology at Reims, and was sent to Egypt.

Agatho (Gr., good), Saint, Pope (678-681), b. Sicily; d. Rome. During his pontificate Wilfrid, Bp. of York, was restored to his see, Theodore, Bp. of Ravenna, submitted to papal authority, and the Monothelite heresy was ended by the Sixth Ecumenical Council, held at Constantinople. Feast, 10 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Agauum, Saint Maurice of, abbey nunnus of Augustinian Canons in the Canton of Valais, Switzerland, site of the martyrdom of the Theban Legion. Little is known of its foundation, which was probably renewed by Sigismund, King of the Burgundians. About 522 Abbot Ambrosius introduced the “Perpetual Psalmody,” as practised by the Accemete. Among its treasures is the famous chasse (reliquary) decorated with glass mosaic. Since 1840 its abbots have also been titular bishops of Bethlehem (Annuaire pontifical catholique, 1911, 595).—C.E.

Age, Canonical, the age fixed by canon law at which the Church permits or requires her members to receive the sacraments, enjoins observance of the rules of fasting and abstinence, determines for entrance into the religious state, for making simple or solemn vows, holding ecclesiastical offices, or receiving benefices. This age is given in the articles on these subjects.—C.E.; Woywod. (ED.)

Age, Impediment of, means that a party is too young for valid matrimony. See Youth, Impediment of.

Aged Poor Society. Apart from the benevolent activities still carried on by this old London Catholic charity, its survival serves as a link between some of the many widely known charities of today and those of the penal times when it was a capital offense for a priest to say Mass. The Report issued for the year 1820 quaintly reminded its supporters that, “The Aged Poor Society was instituted about the year 1708 . . . it has met with the approbation and support of many persons equally distinguished for piety and learning.” Its list of subscribers in the past includes such names as Poynter, Challoner, Talbot, Bramston, Griffith, Wiseman, and Manning. Low cost of administration is a characteristic of the society. Among other benevolent works, the society grants pensions of £26 per annum to 40 aged and necessitous Catholics who must be persons “reduced from a superior station of society.” The same condition applies to those who are admitted to almshouses conducted by the society at Hammer smith, some of whom are also eligible for an endowment of £20 a year.—Ratton, Historic Records of the Aged Poor Society, Lond., 1915. (E. V. W.)

Aged Poor Society, Bounded (1195-1236), Friar Minor, b. Pisa, Italy; d. Oxford, England. He was ordained, 1890, and excommunicated at the time of the Philippine insurrection (1899-1901). He was an officer of the insurgents against the United States troops and when obliged to surrender organized about 21 priests in a movement to protect the rights of the native clergy, seized many churches, and won over many people. The movement was more political than heretical. He established himself as “Pontifex Maximus” of the “Independent Catholic Church of the Philippines,” 1902, but in 1907 he began to lose his prestige and the schism soon disappeared.

Agnellus of Pisa, Blessed (1195-1236), Friar Minor, b. and d. Milan. At 13 she had mastered so many languages that she was called the “Walking Polyglot.” Her treatises on mathematics were well received by the foremost mathematicians. The plane curve known as versiera is also called the “Witch of Agnesi.” She was appointed by Benedict XIV to teach mathematics at Bologna. After several years as director of the Hospice Trivulzio of the Blue Nuns at Milan she joined the order.—C.E.

Agophon, Thomas, Bp. of Tyre, b. 21 Feb, 1795, restored some measure of religious liberty. Thomas Paine wrote his “Age of Reason” in a French prison, 1794; it is a rough-and-ready presentment of Deism.

Aggeus, tenth among the minor prophets of the O.T., came forward, 520 B.C. in the name of the Lord, to rebuke the apathy of the Jews in building the second Temple. The Book of Aggeus is made up of four prophetic utterances: It urges the Jews to resume the work of rearing the Temple; foretells that the new house which then appears so poor in comparison with the former Temple of Solomon will one day be incomparably more glorious; declares that as long as God’s House is not restored some measure of religious liberty. Thomas Paine wrote his “Age of Reason” in a French prison, 1794; it is a rough-and-ready presentment of Deism.
Agnes of Assisi (Gr., agnos, lamb); Saint, abbess (c. 1198-1253), b. Assisi; d. there. She was a younger sister of St. Clare, and in spite of opposition adopted a life of poverty and was chosen by St. Francis to found and govern a community of Poor Clares at Monticelli, near Florence. From there she established several monasteries in the north of Italy. Relics in church of St. Clare, Assisi. Feast, 16 Nov.—C.E.

Agnes of Bohemia (Agnes of Prague), Blessed, abbess (c. 1200-81), b. Prague; d. there. Daughter of Ottoeir, King of Bohemia, she was betrothed to Frederic II, Emperor of Germany, but availed herself of her canonical rights to enter the cloister. She became a Poor Clare in the monastery of St. Saviour, Prague, which she had erected, and of which she became abbess. Feast, 2 March.—C.E.

Agnes of Montepulciano, Saint, prioress (c. 1288-1317), b. near Montepulciano, Italy; d. there. She entered a monastery at nine, became prioress at fifteen, and founded a Dominican convent at Montepulciano, which she governed until her death. Canonized, 1726. Relics at Orvieto. Feast, 20 April.—C.E.; Butler.

Agnes of Rome, Saint, virgin, martyr (c. 304), b. Rome; d. there. Details of her early life are meager, but it is generally agreed that she was about twelve years of age and that she was tortured by fire or decapitated. Her virginity and martyrdom are renowned, and her name occurs in the prayer "Nobis quoque pecatoribus," in the Canon of the Mass. The catacombs of St. Agnes on the Via Nomentana grew up around her crypt there, on a small piece of property owned by her family. Two lambs blessed on her feast supply part of the wool of the pallia. Patron of Children of Bath, Rome; d. there. Details of her martyrdom vary, and there is no unanimity about when she lived. Her history goes back possibly to the 4th century.—C.E.; Lambing, The Sacramentals of the Holy Catholic Church, N. Y., 1907.

Agony of Christ. The word agony is used only once in Scripture, in Luke, 22, 43, to designate the anguish of Christ in the Garden of Gethseman. The incident is narrated also in Matthew and Mark, but only Luke mentions the sweat of blood and the visitation of the angel. The sweat of blood is understood literally by almost all Catholic interpreters; medical testimony has been alleged that such a phenomenon, though rare, is neither impossible nor preternatural.—C.E.

Agra, Acre now, British India, comprises United Provinces of Agra and Oudh, Northwest Frontier Province, parts of Bengal and Central Provinces, and Central India Agency; area, 91,843 sq. m.; suffragan sees, Ajmir and Allahabad; entrusted to the Capuchins. Fr. Felix was appointed missionary Apostolic, 1704. Under vicars Apostolic, 1820-96, the region was then constituted an archdiocese. P. Simon, ruler over the city of Sardana (United Provinces) and a convert from Mohammedanism, notably advanced the cause of Catholicism within her domain. She secured the appointment of one of the mission priests of her territory to the episcopal dignity, and is known for her numerous charities. Archbishops: Michael Jacopii (1886-91); Emmanuel Van Den Bosch (1892-98); Charles Gentili (1898-1916); Raphaele Bornechioni (1917). Churches, 49; priests, secular, 16; priests, regular, 38; religious women, 228; colleges, 2; high schools, 9; primary schools, 16; institutions, 6; Catholics, 10,016.

Agrapha, sayings (not discourses) attributed to Our Lord that have come down to us through channels outside the canonical Gospels, one, for instance, in Acts, 20, 35: "Remember the word of the Lord Jesus, how He said: It is a more blessed thing to give, rather than to receive."—C.E.
Agrida, à-grá'dà, MARIA DE, or MARIA OF JESUS (1602-65), Discalced Franciscan nun, superior of convent of Agrida. Her book, "The Mystical City of God, the Divine History of the Virgin Mother of God," provoked a bitter controversy over its claim to be a revelation. It was condemned by the Roman Inquisition, 1631, and by the Sorbonne, 1696; the Spanish Inquisition had previously pronounced in its favor.—C.E.

Agricola (Bauer), Georg (1494-1555), mineralogist and historian, b. Glauheim, Germany; d. Chemnitz. He studied in the mining district of Chemnitz, where he was also Saxon historiographer, and defended Catholicism amidst a Protestant society. His most important work describes contemporary mining and smelting methods. He is called the "Father of Mineralogy."—C.E.; U.K.

Aherne, Cornelius (1861-1929), pioneer of St. Joseph's Society for Foreign Missions, b. Ballyboys, Ireland; d. London. He was ordained in 1889, and was immediately appointed professor of science and natural philosophy at the Mill Hill College. Named rector, 1904, he filled this post until 1929. A man of profound learning, his humility and distaste for popular acclaim deterred him from any display of his knowledge. He wrote on the "Dublin Review" and "Irish Ecclesiastical Record."

Agricola, modern German form of Anro Main, bad spirit of Zoroastrian Iranians and Parsees.

Aidan or Aidhan, Æðan, SAINT (d. 651), apostle of Northumbria; d. Bamborough, England. He renounced the Bishopric of Clogher to become a monk at Iona. First Bp. of Lindisfarne, he helped Oswald to convert Northumbria. Represented in art with a stag crouching at his feet. Relics at Lindisfarne. Feast, 31 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Aignou, à-gwá'-yón, MARIE DE VIGNBROT DE PONTCOULAY, DUCHESS OF (1004-75), niece of Card. Richelieu. She married Antoine, Sieur de Combalet, 1620. Left a widow, 1622, she wished to be a nun, but was obliged to do the honors of Richelieu’s palace, and was created Duchess of Aiguillon. 1638. She busied herself with distributing charity, erecting churches, convents, seminaries, and hospitals, and patronizing lavishly the enterprises of Vincent de Paul. She caused the Hôtel-Dieu at Quebec to be erected, and with Bl. Olier conceived the plan of founding Montreal. After Richelieu’s death she carried out his designs for the completion of the Sorbonne and the National Library.—C.E.

Aikenhead, Mary (1787-1858), foundress of Irish Sisters of Charity, b. Cork; d. Dublin. She embraced Catholicism in 1802 and became active in charitable work. When she wished to enter the religious life Abp. Murray of Dublin desired her to found a congregation of the Sisters of Charity in Ireland. This she did, 1815, assuming the name of Sister Mary Augustine. As superior-general she directed her Sisters in their heroic work during the Asiatic cholera plague of 1832 in Dublin and Cork. At her death the order embraced ten institutions, besides missions and other charitable enterprises.—C.E.; Atkinson, Mary Aikenhead, Dub., 1882.

Aileboust, v'yō-bōöst, LOUIS DE COULANDES (d. 1696), third Governor of Canada, b. France; d. Montreal. He was associated in the foundation of Montreal, and in 1648 became Governor-General of Canada. During his term of office the Huron missions were destroyed. He later engaged in farming on lands granted him near Montreal and induced the Sulpicians to come there. He laid the cornerstone of one of the church of St. Anne de Beaupré.—C.E.

Ailler, v'yō (AILIÖN), JOSEPH DE LA ROCHE D' (d. 1656), Recollect missionary. He landed at Quebec, 1625; was among the Hurons, 1626; passed to the Neutral Nation, remaining with them three months, barely escaping death; returned to the Hurons; and published an account of his sojourn amongst the Neutrals, describing their country and customs.

Air Machine Blessing, a formula for blessing air machines, approved by the Congregation of Rites, 24 March, 1920, and inserted in the Roman Ritual, as follows: "O God who hast ordained all things for Thine own, and devised all the works of this world for human race; bless, we beseech Thee, this machine consigned to the air; that it may serve for the praise and glory of Thy Name and, free from all injury and danger, expel human interests and foster heavenly aspirations in the minds of all who use it. Through Christ Our Lord, Amen."

Aisle, in architecture, one of the divisions of a church, separated from the nave by rows of columns. In Gothic buildings, the roofs of the aisle are usually lower than that of the nave. Occasionally there is an upper story. Sometimes the aisles stop at the transepts, and often they are continued around the apse. The term is popularly used to describe passages between pews.

THE ALAMO

When Pierre le Moyne, Sieur d'Iberville, made a settlement at Old Biloxi, Miss., in 1699, he was accompanied by Fr. Paul du Ru, S.J., and by Fr. Anastae Douay, a Recollect who had come from France with La Salle in 1684. They were joined by Fr. Antoine Davion, missionary to the Indians from the Seminary of Foreign Missions at Quebec, and when the settlement had been removed to Fort Louis, or Old Mobile, in Alabama, in 1702, the missionaries were assisted by another Jesuit, Fr. Pierre Dogné. In 1704 the parish church of Mobile was founded at Fort Louis by Fr. Henri Roulleaux de la Vente of the Foreign Missions, installed as first pastor by Fr. Davion. Fort Louis proving an unsuitable site, the colony was established at the present Mobile in 1711. The Diocese of Mobile (q.v.), which comprises the state, includes also western Florida. The Catholic origin of place-names of the state is shown in the following: Holy Trinity, St. Bernard, St. Clair, St. Clair Springs, St. Fiacre, St. St. Stephens, Trinity. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Alabama:

Alabaster, a fine-grained variety of gypsium, much used for ornamental articles. The ancients used it for vases which held ungents, in the belief that it preserved them; hence the vases were called "alabasters," even when made of other material. Such was the "alabaster box of ointments," with which Mary Magdalene anointed the Saviour.

Alais, Peace of, treaty, signed, 1629, between the royal forces and the Huguenots of France by which the wars of religion were ended. The Edict of Nantes was renewed; an amnesty was granted, and the cities taken from the Huguenots.

Alamo, The, Franciscan mission founded at San Pedro Springs, Texas, c. 1718, under the name of San Antonio de Valera. In 1732 it was moved to the military plaza of San Antonio, Texas, and in 1744 to its present site, and renamed the Alamo. The buildings consisted of a church, hospital, and convent with walled enclosure. In the war for Texan independence it was valiantly defended by a small garrison against a large Mexican force under Santa Anna (1836); hence the slogan "Remember the Alamo."
Alan of Tewkesbury (d. 1202), English Benedictine abbot and writer. A supporter of St. Thomas Becket in his struggle with Henry II, he was removed from Canterbury to Tewkesbury. He wrote the life of St. Thomas.—C.E.

Clut of the Athabascan-Mackenzie district, with an Oblate priest, Fr. Heynen at Sitka. Of the nursing Sisters of St. Ann who came to Juneau in 1886, Sisters Pastolik, Picietaillic, and Stebben. Ten missions are at Kosefekni and Nulato, and the Eskimos in the Nome district are ministered to by the Jesuits. Alaska and the Aleutian Islands comprise the Vicariate Apostolic of Alaska, with 44 churches, 3 secular priests, 20 Jesuit Fathers, a cathedral, 9 schools, 7 charitable institutions, and a Catholic population of 9500.—H. Bancroft, History of Alaska, San Francisco, 1921; C.E.; U.K.

Alb (Lat., albus, white). (1) A full-length white linen vestment used at Mass, secured by a girdle; an adaptation of the tunic men wore at the time of its adoption in the 4th century. It is blessed before using. The alb symbolizes the garment in which Herod had Our Lord clothed, and the purity of soul with which the Holy Sacrifice should be offered. Putting it on, the priest says: "Make me white, O Lord, and cleanse my heart, that, made white, by the Blood of the Lamb, I may be able to serve Thee." (2) A white garment worn by newly-baptized persons from Holy Saturday until Low Sunday, called for this reason "Sunday in white."—C.E.; MacMahon, Liturgical Catechism, Dub., 1226.

Alban (Lat., white), Saint, one of Britain's first martyrs (c. 304), suffered at Verulamium (since called St. Alban's). According to legend, he was converted from paganism by a cleric, Amphibalus, whom he sheltered in his house. Alban, disguised in the cleric's cloak, gave himself up to the authorities, was scourged, and beheaded. Feast, 22 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Alban, Epscop (Bishop of Alban), title of the Bp. of St. Andrews, Primate of the Pictish Kingdom of Alban, in Scotland in the 10th century.

Albanel, Charles (1616-96), Jesuit missionary, b. Auvergne, France; d. Sault Ste. Marie, Canada. He joined the Canadian Mission, 1649; spent four winters among the Montagnais Indians; accompanied De Tracy's expedition against the Iroquois, 1666; and accompanied St. Simon to Hudson Bay, 1671-72, to take possession for the French King, his "Journal" of this expedition being in the "Jesuit Relations." On his return to France, 1674, he was captured by the English and sent back to Europe. In 1676 he returned to Canada, worked on the Ottawa missions, and was superior at Green Bay (De Pere, Wis.), 1677-78.

Albania, republic in the southwestern part of the Balkan Peninsula; area, 17,574 sq. m.; est. pop., 3,831,877, over two-thirds Mohammedan, the remainder Catholic and Orthodox. The Albanians were subjugated by Rome in the Illyrian wars and probably received Christianity through the Roman traders. According to tradition, the first bishop of the country was St. Cæsarius, one of the seventy-two disciples; his successor, St. Astius, was martyred under Trajan, a.d. 100. The country was overrun by Turks in the 14th century, and in the 15th century became entirely Mohammedan, though even among the Moslems Christian heroes are venerated.
and Christian traditions preserved, for apostasy was mainly the result of inadequate training and unwillingness to suffer exile. One prominent Catholic tribe, the Mirirottes, succeeded in practising their religion and at the same time serving as the sultan's faithful bodyguard. The Catholic Church administration is thus divided:

Alban of Mainz, Saint, 4th-century martyr.

He came from Naissus to Milan, whence he set out to evangelize the Gauls, and was probably massacred by the Huns at Mainz. Invoked against epilepsy, gravel, and hernia. Feast, 21 June.

Albany, capital of New York State, originally named Fort Orange, founded by Walloon settlers, 1623. In its earliest period the missions included in its territory were under the tutelage of Quebec and were ministered to by the Jesuits, among them Bl. Isaac Jogues. Under the Dutch regime there were few Catholic inhabitants but after its transfer to Great Britain their number was greatly augmented. In 1667 Catholics from the Netherlands settled there and were ministered to by the Franciscans. Hennepin. The city became the charge of John Carroll, Bp. of Baltimore, in 1790, and in 1797 St. Mary's church, the first church in the city and diocese, was begun and the corner-stone laid by Thomas Barry, a trustee. The first meeting to discuss the plans was held in the home of James Cassidy, grandfather of William Cassidy, editor of the "Albany Argus." It became the episcopal residence for the Diocese of Albany, 1847, and its first bishop, John McCloskey, utilized the old St. Mary's as a cathedral. A new cathedral, dedicated to the Immaculate Conception, was begun and dedicated by Abp. Hughes, 21 Nov., 1852. Bp. McCloskey erected other churches to accommodate the increase in immigration which had been brought about by the construction of the Erie Canal, and, to provide for Catholic education, installed the Religious of the Sacred Heart. His successor Bp. John J. Conroy, erected St. Joseph's church, established a home for the aged in care of the Little Sisters of the Holy Family, and orphanages under the direction of the Sisters of Mercy and the Sisters of St. Joseph. Educational institutions in addition to parochial schools include the College of St. Rose conducted by the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet, and the Christian Brothers Academy.-C.E.

Albany, Diocese of, New York, embraces counties of Albany, Columbia, Delaware, Fulton, Greene, Montgomery, Otsego, Rensselaer, Saratoga, Schenectady, Schoharie, Warren, and Washington, and parts of Herkimer and Hamilton counties; area, 10,419 sq. m.; suffragan of New York. It was the scene of the early missionary labors of Bl. Isaac Jogues and his companions, martyred within its confines. The cathedral was built by the first bishop, John McCloskey (1847-64), later cardinal. Succeeding bishops: John Conroy (1865-77); Francis McNeirny (1877-94); Thomas Burke (1894-1915); Thomas Cusack (1915-18); Edmund Gibbons (1919). Churches, 289; priests, secular, 901; priests, regular, 68; religious women, 1296; college, 1; seminary, 1; high schools, 20; primary schools, 67; students in parochial schools, 22,887; institutions, 16; Catholics, 224,500.

Albendorf, village in district of Breslau, Silesia; pop., 1513, all Catholics. Its shrine with miraculous image of the Virgin is annually visited by thousands of pilgrims. The church, built 1790, is modeled after the Temple of Jerusalem.

Albert (Teut., nobly bright) or Albrecht (d. 1229), Bp. of Riga, apostle of Livonia. Organizing a crusade to re-Christianize the inhabitants of Livonia, he sailed up the Duna with 23 ships, and founded the city of Riga, 1206. He established the Knights of the Sword and completed the conversion of the country by 1206.—C.E.

Alberta University Catholic College, Edmonton, Alberta; conducted by the Christian Brothers; affiliated with the University of Alberta; faculties of arts, sciences, history, and philosophy, professors, 3; students, 109.

Albert of Brandenburg (1490-1545), cardinal and Elector of the Holy Roman Empire, the son of Elector John, "the Cicero" of Brandenburg, he became Abp. of Magdeburg, 1513, Abp. of Mainz, 1514, and cardinal-priest, 1518. Having been entrusted with the publication of the Indulgences issued by Leo X, he employed Tetzel to do the preaching. To Albert, Luther addressed his protest. In his youth worldly and overfond of humanistic studies, he reformed and became a defender of the Faith in Germany.—C.E.

Albert of Brandenburg-Ansbach (1490-1568), 1st Duke of Prussia, b. Ansbach, Bavaria; d. Tapinu, East Prussia. Elected grand-master of the Teutonic Order, 1510, he seized Church property to defray the expenses of a disastrous war with Poland (1519-21). He met Luther (1522-23), on whose advice he secularized the order, and with the entire chapter and a majority of the knights adopted Lutheranism. By the Treaty of Crecow, 1525, with Sigismund, King of Poland, the lands of the order became a fief of Poland vested in Albert, on whose death Sigismund conferred the title of Duke of Prussia.

Albertus Magnus College, New Haven, Conn., founded 1925; conducted by the Dominican Sisters; college of arts and sciences; professors, 21; students, 74; degrees conferred in 1929, 22.

Alcraygeses, a neo-Manichean sect, associated with the Catharist (Puritan) movement, that flourished in southern France in the 12th and 13th centuries. They believed in a good spirit who created the spiritual, and in an evil spirit who created the material world, including the human body, which is therefore under his control. The good spirit created the soul but the evil one imprisoned it in the body, which is evil from its source. To deliver souls from this evil and punishment, the good spirit, God, sent Jesus Christ who is only a creature. Since the body is evil He could assume only a celestial one. They commended suicide especially by starvation, their exitus, and in general the extinction of human life, and advocated abstention from marriage, preferring concubinage as less evil. As they were a menace to governments and society generally, and resisted all attempts at their conversion, a crusade was organized by barons from France, Germany, and Belgium against Raymond VI, Count of Toulouse, who favored them. After defeating them with great carnage the barons, contrary to the designs of Pope Innocent III, con tinued a war of conquest. The sect disappeared in the 14th century.—C.E.

Albini, Charles Dominique (1790-1839), apostle of Corsica, b. Mentone, France; d. Corsica. He was superior of the seminary at Cimiez, 1822. Having entered the Society of Oblates of Mary Immaculate at Aix, 1824, he was professed, by Apostolic indult, after a few months novitiate. He was sent to Corsica, 1835, where his work in the pulpit and the confessional won many souls; he died exhausted by his labors. The cause of his beatification was introduced in 1915.—C.E. Suppl.

Albornoz, Úñ¡l Alvarez Camillo de (c. 1310-1367), Archbishop of Toledo, cardinal, general, and saint, b. Cuenca, New Castile; d. near Viterbo, Italy. He accompanied Alfonso XI against the Moors. Later he was forced to flee to Avignon for rebuking the crimes of Pedro the Cruel. Having led an army to Italy he regained the Papal States for the pope, 1354, but refused the tiara after the death of Innocent VI. His famous "Egidian Constitutions" for the Papal States, published 1357, remained in force until 1816. His will established the existing Spanish College at Bologna.

Albrights, The. See Evangelical Church (General Conference).

Alcalá, University of; Madrid, Spain, established at Alcalá de Henares as the College of San Ildefonso, 1508, by the Franciscan, Francisco Jiménez de Cisneros, prime minister of Spain. As early as 1499 this project had received the approval of Pope Alexander VI. The studies included theology, canon law, logic, philosophy, medicine, He-brew, Greek, rhetoric, and grammar. In 1836 it was removed to Madrid where it now forms a part of the University of Madrid. In 1817 the University of Alcalá published a collection of the compendia of the Bible called Exempla et Compendia from the ancient name of the town.—C.E.

Alcázar de Henares, al-ka'-zār dā h-nā'īrēz (ancient Complutum), town, Spain, 22 m. NE. of Madrid, on the Henares River; est. pop., 10,000. It was destroyed in 1000, rebuilt 1083 by the Moors, and became famous in the Middle Ages for its university (see ALCALÁ, UNIVERSITY OF). After the removal of the university to Madrid the buildings and the former palace of the Abp. of Toledo were converted into libraries. It was the birthplace of Cervantes and Catherine of Aragon.

Alcántara, Military Order of, religious order of Spanish knighthood, founded, 1156, as the Knights of St. Julian de Pereiro, for defense against the Moors. It became a religious society, 1176, received papal recognition as a military order, 1197, and in 1218 united with the Knights of Calatrava, accepting from them the Cistercian rule and costume, and adopting the name, Knights of Alcántara. The order acquired great wealth and power, resulting in internal dissension. The knights were released from the vow of celibacy, 1340. In 1808 the revenues were confiscated. Since 1875 the title has been conferred by the king for military services.

Alcantarines, members of the Spanish province of Displaced Friars Minor, of the reform of St. Peter of Alcántara.

Alciati, Giovanni Paolo (d. 1565), anti-Trinitarian heretic, b. Milan, Italy; d. Danzig. A partisan of the Reformation, he was a leader of the Italian refugees attracted to Geneva by Calvin. He became a disciple of Socinus, and denied the doctrines of the Trinity and the Divinity of Christ. Accused of heresy by the Calvinists, he fled to Poland.

Alcmund, Saint (d. 781), Bp. of Hexham, renowned for piety. His shrine was destroyed by the Scots in 1296. Feast, 7 Sept.

Alcuin, al'kw'in, Albinus, or Flaccus (c. 738-804), scholar, educator, and theologian, b. near York, England; d. Tours, France. He succeeded Alberic in 807, as head of the cathedral school of York and established its library. In 782 he was called by Charlemagne to organize education in his palace-school at Aix-la-Chapelle. Retiring in 796 to the Abbey of St. Martin of Tours, he founded a school there whose pupils became distinguished teachers. Among his works are treatises on grammar, rhetoric, dialectic, and astronomy; dogmatic writings; and poems. He revised the text of the Vulgate, established the Roman Rite, and compiled a Missal which was generally adopted.—C.E.; Gaskin, Alcuin, His Life and Works, Lond., 1904.

Aldegundis, Saint, virgin (c. 639-684), abbess. Daughter of Sts. Walbert and Bertilia, she founded the Benedictine Convent of Maubeuge, France. Inicted against cancer, Relics at Maubeuge. Feast, 30 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Aldhelm, Saint, confessor (c. 639-709), Abbot of Malmesbury, Bp. of Sherborne. He was an able administrator and one of the first Englishmen to cultivate classical learning with success. His chief prose work was a treatise in praise of virginity. He built the still-existing chapel of St. Lawrence, Bradford-on-Avon, Wiltshire. Feast, 25 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Aldric, Saint, confessor (c. 800-836), Bp. of Le Mans. As a youth he lived at the court of Charlemagne and Louis I. He became a priest at 21 years of age and bishop nine years later, and was distinguished by his public spirit in building aqueducts, as well as churches and monasteries. His fidelity to Charles the Bald resulted in his expulsion from his see, but Gregory IV reinstated him. Feast, 7 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Alemay, Joseph Samoc (1814-88), first Abp. of San Francisco, b. Vieh, Spain; d. Valencia. A Dominican missionary in Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, he was appointed Bp. of Monterey, 1850, and transferred in 1855 to the newly created metropolitan see of San Francisco. When he resigned in 1883, his province had grown from the 21 secularized missions of the Franciscans to a Catholic population of about 300,000. He inaugurated the first efforts for adjustment of the Pious Fund.—C.E.

Aleric (or Albert), antipope (d. 1102). An Italian, he was encouraged to succeed the antipope Theodorius by Emperor Henry IV. After a mock election at St. Peter's, 1102, he was dragged to the Lateran to the lawful pope, Paschal II, who imprisoned him and then sent him to St. Laurence's monastery at Aversa, where he died. —Mann.

Alse diei nuntius, or As the Bird, Whose Clarion Gay, Lyran for Lauds on Tuesday. It was written by Prudentius (348-413). There are 12 translations; the English title given is by W. Courtice.—Britt.

Alexander, Saint, abbot (d. c. 440), founder of the Aemeticus (Gr., without sleep), monks of Asiatic origin. He converted by a miracle the governor of Edessa, St. Rabulas. In the desert he converted 30 robbers and changed their den into a monastery. He also founded a monastery on the Euphrates. With 300 monks, he settled at Gomon in Bithynia, and divided them into six choirs to sing the Divine Office, so that it might ascend ceaselessly, night and day. Feast, 15 Jan.

Alexander, Saint, confessor, doctor of the Church (d. 326), Patriarch of Alexandria. His appointment excited Arius from that post. Although a supporter of Athanasius, he treated Arius with consideration; but he is said to have drawn up the Acts of the Council of Nicæa in which Arius was condemned. Feast, 17 April.

Alexander, Saint, martyr (251), bishop in Cappadocia. He was later coadjutor Bp. of Jerusalem; ordained Origen to the priesthood; and built a library at Jerusalem. After cruel tortures he died in chains. Feast, 18 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Alexander, Saint, martyr (c. 250), Bp. of Comana in Pontus. He was known as the "Charcoal Burner," because he assumed that occupation to escape worldly honors. Gregory Thaumaturges discovered his merits, and he was made bishop. He was burned to death in the persecution of Decius. Patron of charcoal burners. Feast, 11 August.—C.E.

Alexander I, Saint, Pope (c. 106-115), b. probably Rome; d. there. He was the fifth successor of St. Peter. As commemorated in the ninth lesson of Nocturn for his feast, he inserted in the Canon of the Mass the words commemorative of the institution of the Eucharist beginning "Qui pridie," introduced the use of holy water for blessing Christian homes, and suffered martyrdom. He is represented with his chest pierced with nails or spikes. Feast, R. Cal., 3 May.—C.E.

Alexander II (Anselmo Baggio or Anselm of Lucca), Pope (1061-73), b. Baggio, near Milan; d. Rome. While Bp. of Lucca and as pope he opposed simony and the lax observation of clerical celibacy. He was the first pope to be elected by the college of cardinals, according to the decree of Nicholas II, and with the help of his chancellor Hildebrand, afterwards Gregory VII, he succeeded in putting aside the antipope Cadalus and was formally recognized as pontiff, 1064.—C.E.; Mann.

Alexander III (Orlando Bandinelli), Pope (1159-81), b. Civita Castellana, Italy. He was a canonist, cardinal-priest, and papal chancellor. Elected pope almost unanimously, he was opposed with violence by the antipope, Card. Octavian, the imperial candidate, and took refuge in Anagni. He communicated the Emperor Frederick I, who submitted after seventeen years, and in England upheld the rights for which St. Thomas Becket suffered martyrdom, finally exiling them from Henry II. He convoked the third Lateran Council, 1179.—C.E.; Mann.

Alexander IV (Rinaldo Conti), Pope (1254-61), b. Anagni, France; d. Viterbo, Italy. Of the house of Segni, he became card. Bp. of Ostia and was well advanced in years when elected pope. Although a man of great virtue, he was unable to cope with the difficult political conditions of his time. His crusade against the tyrant Ezzelino was successful, but the spirit of the Crusades was dying out and his expedition against the Tatars was unsuccessful. Rome and a large portion of Italy were lost to papal control during his reign.—C.E.

Alexander V (Pietro Philarghi), Pope (1409-10), b. Crete, c. 1339; d. Bologna, Italy. He was a Franciscan and successively Bp. of Duroc, Ussaramenza, of Navoya and Abp. of Milan, created cardinal, 1405. He was instrumental in attempting to heal the Great Schism. At the Council of Pisa, 1409, he was the leading spirit and in June was elected to the papacy. He never reached Rome. Theologians are still undecided as to whether he may be considered a legitimate pope.—C.E.; Pastor.

Alexander VI (Rodrigo Borja), Pope (1492-1503), b. Xativa, near Valencia, Spain, 1431; d. Rome. He studied law at Bologna. He was adopted into the family of his uncle, Pope Callistus III, 1455, became cardinal-deacon, 1458, and cardinal-bishop, 1476, and dean of the Sacred College. From 1457 he officiated very successfully as Vice-Chancellor of the Roman Church. His election as pope met with general approval, and the attempts to attribute it to simony were never clearly proven. With great energy he labored to restore order in Rome and to stabilize its government. He was well versed in canon law, a patron of literature and science, a promoter of education, and the originator of missions to the New World. Gradually, by effective alliances with Milan, Venice, and Spain, he recovered the territories of the Papal States which had fallen under the control of petty tyrants, and finally overcame the Roman barons who were the causes of perpetual disorder in and about the city. He took advantage of his successes to promote the fortunes of his family, chiefly of those who were reputed to be his own children. He is the most maligned of all the popes. The enemies he was compelled to make did not spare his memory. Historians in times succeeding his death were bent on reviling the papacy. Gradually writers for and against him have cleared him of the worst things imputed to him, and their controversies have brought out the fact that the mistakes or even evil deeds of a pope, deplorable though they may be, are not to be laid to the sacred office he holds.—M. Creighton, History of the Papacy during the Period of the Reformation, Lond., 1887; P. De Roo, Pope Alexander VI, N. Y., 1924; Pastor. (ED.)

Alexander VII (Pablo Chigi), Pope (1655-67), b. Siena, Italy, 1599; d. Rome. Of the illustrious Chigi family, he fulfilled many papal diplomatic missions and was created cardinal, 1652. During his pontificate difficulties with Louis XIV led to the temporary loss of Avignon and acceptance of the humiliating terms of the treaty of Pisa. Alexander combated Jansenism by compelling the French clergy to sign his "formulary." A patron of art, he beautified Rome, enlarged the Vatican Library, and befriended men of letters.—C.E.

Alexander VIII (Pietro Ottoboni), Pope (1689-91), b. Venice, 1610; d. Rome. Son of the Chancellor of the Republic of Venice, he became governor of Terni, Rieti, and Spoleto, auditor of the Rota for 14 years, cardinal, Bp. of Brescia, cardinal-datary, and pope. Louis XIV restored Avignon to him. He pronounced the Declaration of Gallican Liberties void, assisted Venice against the Turks with subsidies, and enlarged the Vatican Library.—C.E.

Alexander Briant, Blessed (c. 1556-81), Jesuit martyr, b. Somersetshire; d. Tyburn. A pupil of Fr. Persons at Oxford, he was ordained at Reims, assigned to the English Mission, arrested, and executed after frightful tortures.—C.E.

Alexander Natalis (Noel Alexander; 1639-1724), historian and theologian, b. Rouen; d. Paris. He was a Dominican and wrote a history of the Old Testament, commentaries on the Epistles and Gospels, and a history of the first century of Christianity (24 vols., 1677-86). He originated the writing of history by dividing it into studies of special epochs or institutions and events. When corrected by the Holy See for Gallicanism, he submitted. Later he favored Jansenism but retracted.—C.E.

Alexander Newski, nyěks' skē, Saint, confessor (1219-63), Grand Duke of Novgorod and Kiev, b. Vladimir, Russia; d. Gorodetz. He was victorious over the Swedes on the River Neva, hence his surname. An organizer and reformer, he defended Russia against the Tatars, Relics at Leningrad. Feast, 30 Aug.

Alexander of Hales (d. 1245), theologian and philosopher, b. Hales, England; d. Paris. He joined the Franciscans, 1222, and was installed as the first Franciscan teacher of theology in the University of Paris, 1231. He was the earliest of the great 13th-century Schoolmen. Author of the unfinished "Summa Universae Theologica," the first attempted systematic exposition of Catholic doctrine following the introduction into Europe and knowledge of Aristotle's complete works, he gave definite form to the Scholastic method and its application to theology, and outlined the plan later followed by all the great Scholastics.—C.E.; Turner, History of Philosophy, Bost., 1905.

Alexander Sauli, Blessed (1533-92), apostle of Corsica, b. Milan; d. Pavia. He was a Barnabite and as Bp. of Aleria, Corsica, 1571-91, reclaimed the people from laxity and ignorance, rebuilt churches, founded colleges and seminaries, and placed the Church in a flourishing condition. He was Bp. of Pavia, 1591-92.—C.E.

Alexander III, the Great, King of Macedon (356-323 B.C.), b. Pella, Macedonia; d. Babylon. He is the subject of important mention in the opening of the First Book of Machabees.

Alexandria, seaport, Egypt, founded by Alexander the Great, 331 B.C. It was the world's intellectual and commercial center under the Ptolemies. Left to Cleopatra by Julius Cesar, 46 B.C., Augustus included it in a Roman province. Passing to the Byzantines and abandoned to the Arabs, its ruin was furthered by the Turks, 1517. It is now restored to commercial importance, and has a varied population of mixed creeds. Christianity was introduced by St. Mark, and it became illustrious as a seat of learned doctors, Pantenus, Clement, Origen, and as the see of Athanasius and Cyril. Under Dioscurus (444-454), successor to St. Cyril, the Eutychian or Monophysite heresy arose. It spread rapidly and eventually effected a severance from Rome and the Church of Alexandria's ruin. Its tenet of one nature in Christ was a reaction against Nestorianism teaching two distinct natures in Christ. Eutychianism minimized the completeness of the Humanity and exaggerated the effects upon it of its union with the Divinity, thus denying the reality of the human nature. It finally divided into two communions: the native Copts, bound to error; and the foreign Greeks, faithful to schismatic orthodoxy.—C.E.

Alexandria, Catechetical School of, founded by the Church of Alexandria, in latter half of 2nd Alexandria, Diocese of, a see of the Armenian Rite, comprising Egypt, with residence at Cairo; present bishop, John Couzian. Churches, 3; priests, 5; Catholics, 2300.

Alexandria, Diocese of, comprises northern Louisiana above 31° N. lat.; area, 22,212 sq. m.; suffragans of New Orleans. The see was transferred from Natchitoches to Alexandria in 1910. Early missionaries, Frs. Antonio Margil, Guzman, Maximin, O'Brien, and Timon, later Bp. of Buffalo. Bishops: Augustine Martin (1853-75); Francis Leray (1877-79); Anthony Durier (1885-1904); Cornelius Van de Ven (1904). Churches, 77; priests, secular, 27; priests, regular, 16; religious women, 220; colleges, 2; seminaries, 1; high schools, 4; primary schools, 17; students in parochial schools, 2950; institutions, 3; Catholics, 47,590.

Alexandria, Diocese of, Ontario Canada, embraces Glengarry and Stormont counties; erected, 1890; suffragan of Kingston. Bishops: Alexander MacDonell (1890-1905); Wm. A. MacDonnell (1906-20); Felix Couturier, O.P. (1921). Churches, 26; priests, secular, 26; priests, regular, 2; religious women, 229; academies, 3; high schools, 4; separate and parish schools, 22; pupils in separate and parish schools, 3409; institutions, 2; Catholics, 25,142.

Alexandria, Patriarchate of, founded in Egypt by St. Mark the Evangelist. Notable among its early patriarchs were Sts. Athanasius and Cyril. In the Coptic Rite, Hermopolis and Thebes are suffragan sees; patriarchal residence, Cairo; present administrator Apostolic, Bp. Mark Kousam of Thebes. Churches, 31; priests, 11; seminary, 1; high schools, 9; primary schools, 19; Catholics of city, 5500. In the Latin Rite, the patriarchate is titular only.

Alexiane Rite, one of the great parent rites of the East, used throughout the original Patriarchate of Alexandria, Egypt. One of its earliest peculiarities is the invocation of the Word of God and not the Holy Ghost after the words of Institution, or Consecration. It has three forms: the Greek Liturgy of St. Mark, no longer used; the three liturgies used by the Copts; and the uses of the Abyssinian Church (Ethiopic). The chief characteristics of this rite are the placing of the Benedictus at the end of the Sanctus.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914. (M. E. D.)

Alcians (Cellites), congregation under patronage of St. Alexius of Edessa, founded by Tobias at Mechlin, Brabant, in the 13th century, to nurse the sick and bury the dead during the Black Death. They became an order under the Rule of St. Augustine in 1469. The mother-house is at Aix-la-Chapelle. They have 18 houses in the United States, England, Germany, and Belgium, and are in charge of various hospitals and asylums.—C.E.

Alexis Falconieri, Saint, confessor (1290-1310), b. Florence; d. Mount Senario, near Florence. He became a member of the Ludesii, or Praisers of Mary, a society of laymen. On 15 Aug., 1235, an apparition of the Blessed Virgin appeared to him and six of his companions. Retiring to La Camarzia, and later to Mount Senario, the seven young men established the Order of Servites. Deeming himself unworthy of Holy Orders, Alexis embraced a life of poverty and humility, soliciting donations for the community in the streets of his native city. He spent much time in propagating devotion to the Blessed Virgin, and securing new members for the Order. Canonized, 15 Jan., 1888. Relics in Florence. Feast, 27 Feb.—C.E.

Alexius, Saint, confessor (d. 417), b. Rome. He was a recluse famed for his sanctity. According to legend he secretly left his wife on the night of their wedding, and after seventeen years at Edessa returned to Rome, living hidden in his father's house until his death. Patron of the Alexians, and of beggars, pilgrims, and belt-makers. Feast, R. Cal., 17 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Alfred, Michael (1587-1652), Jesuit missionary, b. London; d. St. Omer, France. He labored in England during the persecution and was the author of an important ecclesiastical and civil history of Britain.—C.E.

Alfred the Great (849-899), King of the West Saxons, b. Wantage, England. When he ascended the throne, 871, the Danish invaders were threatening his kingdom; after a long struggle he established Saxon supremacy. He repelled four other invasions by them (875-878), and defeated them decisively 15 years later. Alfred drew up good laws, rebuilt and founded monasteries, and encouraged learning. He translated Boethius's "Consolation of Philosophy" into Anglo-Saxon, adding much of his own; also translated Bede's "Ecclesiastical History," and the "Pastoral Rule" and "Dialogues" of Gregory the Great; and inspired the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle."—C.E.

Alien Houses (Alien Priories), former religious houses in England owned or controlled by foreigners, suppressed during the French War of 1415. Thus, the public park in South London now called Tooting Bec Common formed part of the lands of the Abbey of Bec, Normandy.

Alimentation (Lat., alimentum, nourishment), support or maintenance; whatever is necessary for life, as food and drink, a home, clothing, care in sickness and death. Under it would fail the obligation of children towards parents, husbands towards wives, of a religious order or congregation towards its members. For secular priests, maintenance is provided by means of the title for which they were ordained: a benefice, patronym, or pension. C.E.

Aliturgical Days, days on which the Sacrifice of the Mass is not allowed to be celebrated, e.g., Good Friday in the Roman Rite; and all Fridays in Lent, in the Ambrosian Rite.

All- prefix of many words with a religious significance, e.g.: All-father, the father of all, the universal father; all-good, wholly or infinitely good; all-holy, altogether or infinitely holy; all-might, omnipotence; allness, universality; all-wise, knowing all things, omniscient.

Allah, Arabic name of God, used by Mohammedans, whatever their language.

Allahabad, Diocese of, central British India; area, 60,800 sq. m.; suffragan of Agra; entrusted to the Capuchins; before its establishment as a diocese, 1886, known as the Vicariate Apostolic of Patna, Dr. Anastasius Hartman was the first vicar Apostolic, an office he held twice. Bishops: Francis Pesel (1886-96); Charles Gentili (1897-98); Victor Sinibaldi (1899-1902); Petronius Gramigna (1904-17); Angelo Poli (1917). Churches, 43; priests, secular, 10; priests, regular, 33; religious women, 137; seminaries, 1; schools, 19; institutions, 14; Catholics, 10,526.

Allard, Paul (1841-1916), historian of the persecutions, b. Rouen, France; d. Senneville-sur-Mer. Editor of Revue des questions historiques and president of the Congress of Catholics of Normandy in 1883. He also participated in the International Catholic Scientific Congress held in Paris, 1888-91. He was a member of the Academy of Rouen, the Academy of the Catholic Religion (Rome), and the Pontifical Academy of Archaeology. He was author of the following ecclesiastical histories of the early Christians: "Christian Slaves from the Early Days of the Church until the End of the Roman Power in the West"; "Christian Art under the Pagan Emperors"; "History of the Persecutions"; "Christianity and the Roman Empire"; "Saint Basil"; "Julian the Apostate"; "Ten Lessons on the Martyrs."—C.E.

Allegiance (Fr., liège, relation of subject to sovereign), obligation of respect and attachment to those who exercise authority, shown chiefly by observance of laws that are reasonable and justly applied. The position of Catholics in Great Britain and Ireland with regard to their allegiance is clearly defined in Newman's "Letter to the Duke of Norfolk" (1874), a crushing reply to W. E. Gladstone's "Vatican Decrees in their Bearing on Civil Allegiance."

Allegorical Sense, mystical meaning of parts of the Bible; the interpretation of some actually accomplished thing as being only the figure of some other thing. Thus, the serpent raised by Moses in the desert to heal the Israelites from their wounds represented, in an allegorical sense, Jesus Christ raised upon the Cross for the redemption of mankind.

Allegory (Gr., allegoria, inversion), a sustained metaphor. The greatest biblical allegory is the Canticle of Canticles. The allegory has but one sense, that which is conveyed by the metaphor or image. Allegories are interpreted at times by their author; thus Our Lord bids: "Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees," as a reference to their teaching. Other biblical allegories are to be explained by the aid of the context, by similar usage elsewhere in the Bible, or by tradition. Allegory should be distinguished from allegorical interpretation, which is a species of accommodation (see ALLEGORICAL SENSE).—C.E.; Schumann.

All Hallows. See ALL SAINTS.

All Hallows College, Dublin, devoted to the preparation of priests for missions in English-speaking countries; founded by John Hand, 1842. The institution is Apostolic; its professors labor without pay, and the students are instructed gratuitously. Vincentians have been in charge since 1892.

Allies, Thomas William (1813-1903), writer, b. Midgham, Wiltshire, England. He was educated at Eton and Oxford, and took Anglican orders, 1838. In 1850 he became a Catholic, and served as secretary to the Catholic Poor-School Committee, 1853-90. He wrote "The See of Peter," "A Life's Decision," and his masterpiece, "The Formation of Christendom." In 1885 he was created Knight Commander of St. Gregory and in 1893 Pope Leo XIII awarded him the gold medal for merit.—C.E.

Allies. Thomas William, son of preceding, b. Henley in Arden, Warwickshire, England. She was secretary to her father, 1873-90. Among her works are "Life of Pius VII." "History of the Church in England," and "Thomas William Allies."
All Praise to Saint Patrick, popular hymn written by Rev. F. W. Faber in the 19th century.

All Saints, Feast of, 1 Nov., instituted to honor all the saints, known and unknown. It owes its origin in the Western Church to the dedication of the Pantheon in honor of the Blessed Virgin and all the martyrs by Pope Boniface IV, 609, the anniversary of which was celebrated at Rome, 13 May. Pope Gregory III (731-741) consecrated a chapel in the Vatican basilica in honor of All Saints, designating 1 Nov. as their feast; Gregory IV extended its observance to the whole Church. It has a vigil and octave and is a holy day of obligation. The eve is popularly celebrated as Hallowe’en (q.v.).—C.E.; Kellner, Heortology, St. L., 1908.

All Souls’ Day, 2 Nov., feast in commemoration of the faithful departed in purgatory. Abbot Odilo of Cluny instituted it in the monasteries of his congregation in 998, other religious orders took up the observance, and it was adopted by various dioceses and gradually by the whole Church. The Office of the Dead must be recited by the clergy on this day and Pope Benedict XV granted the privilege of saying three Masses of the Dead to those in purgatory, one for the intention of the Holy Father, one for the priest’s, and one for the souls of all the faithful departed. If the feast should fall on Sunday it is kept on 3 Nov.—C.E.; Kellner, Heortology, St. L., 1908.

Alma (Heb., young woman), word used in the prophecy of Isaiah, 7, and interpreted by St. Matthew, 1, as applying to the Virgin Mother of the Messias.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss. (H. J. w.)

Alma Mater (Lat., nourishing or bounteous mother), title given by ancient Romans to certain goddesses; now applied to universities and schools, considered as “foster mothers” of their students. The Bull of Pope Clement V postponing the opening of the 15th (Ecumenical) Council, at Vienne, from 1 Oct., 1310, to 1 Oct., 1311, is entitled “Alma Mater.”

Alma Redemporis Mater, or Mother BENign of ouR reDEEMing LORD, antiphon of Our Lady for Vespers from the Saturday before the first Sunday of Advent to the feast of the Purification, inclusive. It is ascribed to Hermann Contractus (1013-54). There are several translations. The English title given is by D. Hunter-Blair; the first verse reads:

Mother benign of our redeeming Lord,
Star of the sea and portal of the skies,
Unto thy fallen people help afford—Fallen, but striving still anew to rise.

—C.E.; Britt.

Almeida (Meade), John (1571-1653), missionary (b. London; d. St. Joseph, Mich.). He entered the Society of Jesus, 1639, and went to Quebec as a missionary in 1660. There he became superior of the Three Rivers Mission, and vicar-general “of all the countries situated toward the north and west.” He founded the Mission of the Holy Ghost near Nash, Wis., and other missions, including St. Francis Xavier at De Pere, Wis., where a monument has been erected to his memory by the State Historical Society. He was one of the first to visit Lake Michigan, naming it “Lake St. Joseph.”—C.E.

Almone, an official distributor of alms; a chaplain of a charitable institution. The office or residence of an almoner and, in a wider sense, a place for distributing alms, is called an almory.

Alms (Gr., ἀλμώνια, compassionateness), material help given to the needy, prompted by Divine charity. Alms-bag, purse for collecting alms in church. Alms-box (Alms-chest), permanent receptacle for alms, in a church. Alms-day, Saturday (weekly alms being formerly distributed on that day in England). Alms-plate, dish on which alms-bags are deposited before being placed solemnly on an altar; also, plate carried by beggars. Alms-people (persons supported by alms). Alms-house, home for the needy, erected by private individuals; occasionally used in speaking of a poorhouse. Alms-Saturday, in Passion Week, when alms collected during Lent are sometimes given to the poor, so as not to interfere with the Holy-Week ceremonies.

Alms-deeds, the compassionate relieving of another’s material need for God’s sake. They enter directly or indirectly into all the corporal works of mercy. As such they are a divine institution for drawing closer the bonds uniting the members of human society in their common dependence on Him who has given the earth to the children of men to support the lives of all. They have, therefore, a necessary place in Christian society. The representation of almsgiving in art is associated with St. Martin of Tours, who gave his cloak to a beggar, St. Nicholas of Tolentino, St. Ivo of Chartres, and St. Elizabeth of Hungary, all noted for their charity to the poor.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss. (H. J. w.)

Aloysius Gonzaga, Saint, confessor (1568-91), b. Castiglione, Italy; d. Rome. The son of a princely family, he was educated at the courts of the Medici of Florence and of Philip II of Spain. Returning to Italy, he renounced his inheritance in favor of his brother, and entered the Society of Jesus, 1583. He distinguished himself in philosophy and theology, and pronounced his vows, 1587. In 1591, when famine and pestilence spread through Italy, he devoted himself to the care of the sick, was stricken, and died. Devotion to him is widespread, and the practise of receiving communion on six successive Sundays is observed in his honor. Patron of young Catholic students. Invoked against sore eyes and pestilence. Canonized, 1726. Relics in church of S. Ignazio, Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 21 June.—C.E.
Alpha and Omega. See AO.

Alphabetic Psalms, so called because their successive verses, or successive parallel series, begin with the successive letters of the alphabet (Psalm 118, “Blessed are the undefiled,” comprises 22 stanzas of 8 verses each, beginning with the same letter of the Hebrew alphabet in order. Another example of alphabetic arrangement in Hebrew poetry is found in the Lamentations of Jeremiah in the Office of Tenebrae during Holy Week. This feature is not discernible in the Vulgate or our English version save that the Hebrew letter name precedes each verse in the work of the prophet.

—C.E., XII, 543; Pope.

Alphonsus Liguori (Teut., adalbus, willing), Saint, confessor, Doctor of the Church (1696-1787), Bp. of Sant’ Agata dei Goti, b. Marianella, near Naples; d. Nocera de’ Pagani. He took his degree of Doctor of Laws at sixteen, and practised successfully for eight years. Humiliated by failure to win an important case, he entered a missionary society of secular priests, the “Neapolitan Propaganda,” was ordained 21 Dec., 1726, and devoted his time to missionary labor among the poor. In 1732, with the help of Bp. Thomas Falcoia of Castellamare, he founded the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer at Scala. He occupied the See of Sant’ Agata dei Goti, 1762-75, when he was permitted to retire. Enfeebled by illness and the constant struggle for recognition of his congregation by the civil authorities, Alphonsus continued to work diligently and practise mortification. As a moral theologian he advocated a middle course between rigorism and laxity. The fruits of his labors are treaties on theology, dogma, and asceticism, poetry, musical compositions, and letters. Canonized, 1839.

Alphonse Rodriguez (also Alonso), Saint, confessor (1532-1617), b. Segovia, Spain; d. Majorca. After the death of his wife (Maria Suarez) and his three children, he was admitted into the Society of Jesus as a lay brother, 13 Jan., 1571, either at Valencia or Gandia. At the end of six months he was sent to the college at Majorca where he remained as porter for 46 years. He exercised great influence on the members of the household and many others who came to him for advice and direction. He pointed out to St. Peter Claver his future work as apostle of the Negroes in South America. In 1620 he was declared Venerable, and in 1633 was chosen by the Council-General of Majorca as one of the special patrons of the city and island. His beatification was delayed until 1825, because of the expulsion of the Society from Spain in 1773. Canonized, 1887. Relics at Majorca. Feast, 30 Oct.—C.E.

Altar, the table on which a sacrifice is offered. In the Church founded by Christ the altar is the table on which the Sacrifice of the Mass is offered. It is a form of table filled with many signs so that the celebrant faced the laity. Later, church altars were placed against or near the wall of the apse, so that the celebrant faced the east and the people were behind him, in the manner which now generally obtains. Altars of the early Church were probably of wood. Altars of stone and precious metals were introduced at a later date, and ecclesiastical law now stipulates that to be consecrated an altar must be of stone. In the primitive Church two types of altars were used: the arcosolium or monumentum aeternum, consisting of an archlike niche hewn in the catacombs over the grave of a martyr, which was covered by a slab of marble; and the detached altar found in the cubicula, or sepulchral chapels, formed by a slab of stone or marble resting on columns, or on a structure in which were enclosed the relics of martyrs. A decree of St. Felix I stipulated that Mass should be celebrated on the tombs of martyrs.

Aloïsias Gonzaga, former German territory acquired by France at the Treaty of Versailles, 1819. It is divided into the departments of Bas-Rhin (pop., 670,985), Haut-Rhin (pop., 490,654), and Moselle (pop., 633,461). According to the census of 1910, there were 1,387,000 Catholics, 37,000 Protestants, 30,483 Jews. In the Middle Ages the country was divided into many principalities, which formed part of the Holy Roman Empire. Parts of Alsace were ceded to France in 1648, and by the Treaty of Ryswick, 1697, French possession was confirmed; Lorraine was formally united to France in 1766. The inhabitants were contented under French rule. In 1870, as a result of the Franco-Prussian War, the country was cut off from France. It formed part of the German Empire for 47 years. The industrial and commercial progress of Germany had an undeniable influence; the country prospered under a régime of efficiency, but political discontent was rife. Germany left nothing undone to spread her culture; but her alternate policies of severity and concession proved ineffectual in Germanizing the provinces. Emigration towards France began in 1872. Until 1914 there was continual agitation for return to France. At the outbreak of the World War, the uncertainty of the allegiance of Alsace was apparent; thousands deserted rather than fight against France. In Nov., 1918, the French government took over the administration of the territories until the treaty was signed. The administrative system was centralized under a commissary general. Readjustments in finance, education, and language were difficult problems of administration. Eighty per cent of the inhabitants did not know French, which was immediately introduced into the schools. The knowledge of France had been gained through hostile sources, and imparted by teachers who had to be replaced before the people could be assimilated to French civilization. In recognizing the French sovereignty in Alsace-Lorraine, the pope accepted the resignation of the German Bps. of Metz and Strasbourg. In April, 1919, President Poincaré nominated Bp. Ruck for the Bishopric of Strasbourg and Mgr. Pelt for that of Metz. This caused an animated debate in the French Chamber and led the foreign minister to explain that the policy of France was to uphold the Concordat. The nominees were given canonical institution by the pope.
The tomb or chest type of altar thus replaced the simple table, and every altar must now contain the relics of martyrs. In the Greek Church, the altar proper is square, and the top should be constructed of wood, or have at least one board in it. Two coverings are used on it, one of linen, and the other of brocade or embroidery. The term altar is also applied to that part of churches of the Greek Rite practically corresponding to the sanctuary in churches of the Latin Rite, including the altar proper, a small side altar, the seats of the clergy, and the throne of the bishop.

Altar, Bye, one subordinate to the high altar, usually applied to altars situated in the bays of the nave, transepts, etc.

Altar, Double, one having a double front so constructed that Mass may be celebrated simultaneously on both sides, often found in churches of religious communities when the community chapel is separate from the one to which others are admitted.

Altar, Fixed, a permanent stone structure formed of a consecrated table and support, erected on a solid foundation.

Altar, High or Main, the chief altar in a church, mounted by steps, and in the center of the sanctuary. At this altar most ceremonies take place.

Altar, Lady. See Altar of Our Lady (below).

Altar, Portable. See Altar-stone.

Altar, Privileged, one to which the Apostolic See has attached a plenary indulgence applicable only to the souls in purgatory, and gained every time Mass is offered upon it.

Altar, Stripping of the, a ceremony which takes place on Holy Thursday symbolizing the moment in the Passion of Christ when He was stripped of His garments by the Jews. The celebrant assisted by deacon and subdeacon removes from the altars of the church the altar-cloths and all ornamentation, leaving but the crucifix and candlesticks.

Altar-bell, a small bell kept at the epistle side of the altar, rung during Mass at the Sanctus and at the elevation of the Sacred Species, as an invitation to those present to take part in the act of adoration at the Consecration.

Altar-bread, round wafers of wheaten bread, unleavened in the Latin, Maronite, and Armenian Rites, used as one of the Eucharistic elements.

Altar-candles, candles made chiefly from beeswax and prescribed for use at Mass and other liturgical functions.

Altar-candlesticks, six candlesticks with candles, three on each side of the crucifix, kept on the main altar. Two, one at each side of the altar, must be used during low Mass. Extra candlesticks and candelabra are used for ornamentation. Altar-candlesticks may be of any kind of metal, or gilded or silvered wood. Their use became general only in the 16th century.

Altar-canopy. See Baldachinum.

Altar-cards, printed cards placed in the middle and at each side of an altar, containing certain prayers to be said by the celebrant at Mass.

Altar-carpets, ordinarily green, cover the sanctuary and altar-steps, or at least the upper platform or predella.

Altar-cloths, three coverings of linen or hemp used on the altar during Mass.

Altar-crucifix, a crucifix, large enough to be seen by both celebrant and laity, which must be on the altar whenever Mass is celebrated. If the crucifixion be the subject of the altar-piece or picture behind the altar, this will suffice for the altar-crucifix.

Altar-curtains, of linen, silk, or precious stuffs, formerly drawn around the altar during certain parts of the Mass.

Altar-frontal or Antependium, an appendage covering the entire front of the altar; a similar covering should be used at the back if it be seen by the people. It may be made of precious metals, wood, cloth of gold, or other precious materials. If the altar be of carved wood or marble it may be considered sufficiently ornamental, and the antependium deemed unnecessary.

Altar-herse, the framework used in the erection of a temporary canopy over an altar on special occasions. The name is probably derived from a cloth covered frame or hearse formerly used over the corpse in funerals.

Altar-horns, the projections at each corner of the Jewish altar. Though dropped in Christian usage, the name is still used to designate the four corners of the altar.

Altar-lamp, a lamp kept continuously burning before the tabernacle. Though it may be of any metal and form, it should be lighted by oil only, pure olive oil being recommended.

Altar-lanterns, lanterns used to protect the altar-candles and lamp if they cannot be kept lighted, and to accompany the Blessed Sacrament when it is transferred from one altar to another, or taken to the sick as Viaticum.

Altar-ledge, a step placed behind the altar for candlesticks, flowers, etc.

Altar-linens, certain linens used during the Sacrifice of the Mass. They are the corporal, pall, purificator, and finger-towels.

—ALTAR OF OUR LADY, that altar which occupies the most prominent position in a church after the main altar, viz., at the Epistle side of the latter.

—ALTAR OF REPOSE or Repository, a bye-altar where the Sacred Host consecrated Holy Thursday is reserved for Mass of the Presanctified.

—ALTAR-PIECE, painted or frescoed picture on the wall or hung in frame above the altar; a statue or statue group on the altar.

—ALTAR-PROTECTOR, ALTAR-COVER, VESPERALE, or STRAGULUM, a cover of cloth, baize, or velvet, of any color, though usually green or red, used on the altar outside the time of sacred functions, to prevent staining or soiling of the altar-cloth.

—ALTAR-RAIL, or COMMUNION-RAIL, a rail separating the sanctuary from the body of the church. It is of carved wood, metal, marble, or other precious material, about two and a half feet high.

—ALTAR-SIDE, that part of the altar facing the congregation. The Epistle side of the altar is termed the left, and the Gospel, the right, with reference to the altar-crucifix.

—ALTAR-STEPS, of wood, stone, or brick, extend around the altar on three sides. There are three, five, or seven at the high altar, while side altars must have at least one.

—ALTAR-STOLE, an ornament shaped as the ends of a stole and fastened to the front of the altar in the Middle Ages.

—ALTAR-TOMB, an oblong monument over a grave covered with a slab and resembling an altar.

—ALTAR-VASE, a vase used for flowers in decorating the altar.

—ALTAR-VESSELS, sacred vessels used in the worship of the Blessed Sacrament. They are the chalice, paten, ciborium, and ostensorium or monstrance.

—ALTAR-WINE, wine made from the genuine juice of the grape, used as one of the Eucharistic elements.

Altar (in Scripture). Many altars are mentioned in Scripture, e.g., those of Noah and Abraham, altars erected for the worship of idols, altars of holocaust and of incense, of the Tabernacle and of the Temple, and the altar described in the Apocalypse.

—ALTARS OF THE TABERNACLE. The altar of holocaust was within the court of the Tabernacle to the east of the entrance. It was of Cedar wood covered with plates of brass, the whole structure filled with rocks and earth, and measured 5 cubits square and 3 in height. The altar of incense, used for incense offerings in the Old Law, was within the Tabernacle. It measured 1 cubit in length, as much in breadth, and 2 cubits in height, and was of cedar wood overlaid with gold.

—ALTARS IN THE TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM. The altar of holocaust was located in front of the Temple proper and the altar of incense stood in the Holy Place before the veil covering the door to the Holy of Holies. The ordinances regarding the former are contained in Exodus, 20, and Deuteronomy, 17. Solomon’s altar was similar in form to that of the Tabernacle, but larger, measuring 20 cubits in length and width and 10 in height, and constructed of unhewn stone and earth.

—ALTAR BOYS, servers at the altar, not in minor orders, at Mass, Vespers, Benediction of the Blessed.
Sacrament, Marriage, Holy Communion, etc. See Acolyte.

Altar Societies (also called Tabernacle Societies), groups of devout persons, usually women, who make vestments and altar linens and keep them in repair, and provide altar vessels, furniture, and ornaments. Many of these societies give the fruit of their labors to missionary and poor churches.

Altar stone or Portable Altar, a small, flat slab of natural stone, consecrated ordinarily by a bishop, containing in a stone-covered cavity relics of two canonized martyrs, inserted in the center of the table of an altar which is not entirely consecrated. The host and chalice are placed on this stone during the Sacrifice of the Mass. The stone is portable and may be placed in any suitable altar; it really constitutes the altar.—C.E., I, 348. (J. C. T.)

Alternation, in liturgy, the response of a congregation praying in turn with the officiating minister, as in saying the Rosary or litanies; or the recitation of the Divine Office in choir, each side reciting a verse in turn.

Altham, John (d. 1641), Jesuit missionary. He accompanied Gov. Leonard Calvert to Maryland, 1633, and established the first chapel there. His missionary labors extended south of the Potomac.

Alto ex Olympi vertice, or FROM HIGHEST HEAVEN, THE FATHER'S SON, hymn for Lauds on the feast of the dedication of a church. Written in the 6th or 7th century, it is not known who the author was. The English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Altoona, Diocese of, Pennsylvania, comprises counties of Bedford, Blair, Cambria, Center, Clinton, Fulton, Huntingdon, and Somerset; area, 6710 sq. m.; founded, 1901; suffragan of Philadelphia.

Altri, Semitic word meaning: (1) mother, applied by Copts and Greeks to nuns and to ladies of rank; (2) vessel in which the wine offered by the people for the Holy Sacrifice was received in the early Church.

Amadeans, Friars Minor of the reform effected c. 1740 in Lombardy by Mendes de Silva, known as Amadeus of Portugal. The congregation was suppressed by Pius V, who distributed its members among other communities.

Amadeus VIII (Lat., love God), Duke of Savoy, an antipope under the name of Felix V (1383-1451), of Chambéry, France; d. Geneva. In 1439 he appointed his son regent of his duchy, and withdrew to Ripaille on the Lake of Geneva, where he formed the semi-monastic Order of St. Maurice. He was chosen pope by the schismatical Council of Basle, 1439, and crowned there, 1440. Excommunicated by Eugène IV, 1441. In 1449 he submitted to Nicholas V, thus ending the last papal schism, and was made a cardinal.

Amadew of Portugal, Blessed. See Mendes de Silva.

Amadeus of the Heart of Jesus, Mother Mary (Sarah Theresa Dunne; 1846-1920), Ursuline missionary among the Indians, b. Akron, O.; d. Seattle, Wash. Elected superior at age 35, 1874, she founded twelve Indian missions in Montana and the missions of Yukon Delta, St. Michaels, and Valdez, in Alaska, and was appointed provincial superior of the northern United States.—C.E., Suppl.

Amalarius of Metz (Fortunatus or Symphorus), 9th-century liturgical writer, b. Metz, Kingdom of the Franks. A pupil of Alcuin at Aixla-Chapelle, he was Bp. of Trier, 811-813, and later ambassador to Constantinople. He lived at a time when the liturgy was changing, when fusion of the Roman and Gallican uses was taking place, and he exercised a remarkable influence in introducing the present composite liturgy which has supplanted the ancient Roman Rite. The chief merit of his works is that they have preserved much accurate and valuable information on the state of the liturgy at the beginning of the 9th century and are therefore useful sources for the history of Latin rites.—C.E.

Amalberga (Amalia), Saint, virgin (742-772), b. Rodin, Flanders; d. Münster-Bilsen. As a youth Charlemagne sought her in marriage, and attempted to abduct her, but was unable to move her from the altar where she had taken refuge. She became a Benedictine nun at Münster-Bilsen. She is especially revered in Belgium. Emblems: crown, sieve, geeze, fish. Feast, 10 July.—C.E.

Amalberga (Amelia), Saint, matron (d. 690), b. Santes, Belgium; d. Maubeuge. Sister or niece of Pepin of Landen, she married Duke Witger of Louvain, and was the mother of Sts. Emembrent, Reneldis, and Guadula. Her husband became a monk, and she a Benedictine nun at Maubeuge. Invoked against bruises and fever. Relics at Binche. Feast 10 July.—C.E.

Amalecites, one of the fervest of Bedouin tribes, probably of Arabian origin, living within the borders of Palestine. Instead of showing ordinary humanity to the stragglers of the Israelites when emerging from Egypt, they slew them, and incurred the Israelites’ everlasting hatred. To Saul and Samuel their extermination was a religious duty, which David took up and the Simeonites finished.—C.E., I, 377.

Aman, See Esther.

Amana Society or Community of True Inspiration, a socialistic settlement of German Protestants founded in Buffalo, N. Y., 1843, by Christian Metz and Barbara Heinemann, and located at Amana, Ia., since 1843. It is the only one of similar settlements which has thrived for any length of time, owing, as its members believe, to religious motives. In 1955 there were 7 churches and 1534 members.

Amand, Saint, confessor (594-684), apostle of Flanders, b. Nantes, France; d. monastery of Elnon (now St. Amand). Cloidu II sent him to Flanders; his monasteries at Ghent and St. Blandin were the first in Belgium. For a while Bp. of Maastricht, he later labored in the Basque country (Navarre), returned to Belgium, and founded several other monasteries. Patron of inn-keepers, wine-merchants, brewers, and Boy Scouts. Emblems: church, chains, flag. Relics at St. Amand. Feast, 6 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Amarillo, Diocese of, Texas, comprises 70½ counties of northwestern Texas, approximately 72,000 sq. m.; founded, 1926; suffragan of San Antonio. First bishop, Aloysius Gerken. Churches, 75; priests, secular, 13; priests, regular, 12; religious women, 107; seminary, 1; high schools, 3; parochial schools, 9; students in parochial schools, 1428; institutions, 2; Catholics, 19,450.

Ambassador (M. L., ambasciare, to go on mission), minister of high rank sent by head of a sovereign state as personal representative. In Catholic countries the pope’s ambassador, nuncio, legate, or envoy has precedence over other members of the diplomatic corps. The first permanent envoys of the Holy See were the apocrisarii (Gr., apokriseis, an answer) sent to the court of Constantinople about the middle of the 5th century. The use of a private chapel for the ambassadors of a Catholic country at a Protestant court and vice versa is always allowed. The Sardinian, Neapolitan, Venetian, Bavarian, Portuguese, and Spanish ambassadors had their private chapels in London even when the Catholic religion was proscribed in England. The Sardiniain (erected, 1648), Bavarian (1747), and Spanish (1742) chapels were even opened to the public and became eventually ordinary parochial churches. The two former still exist; the latter was replaced (1890) by a handsome church. The Holy See has nuncios Apostolic in Argentina, Austria, Bavaria, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Paraguay, Peru, Poland, Portugal, Rumania, Spain, Switzerland, Venezuela, and Yugoslavia; internuncios in Central America (comprising Costa Rica, Honduras, Nicaragua, Panama, and Salvador), Haiti, Holland, Luxembourg; it has also diplomatic representatives in the Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Irish Free State, Liberia, and Uruguay. These nations send ambassadors to the Holy See: Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, France, Germany, Peru, Poland. Nations represented by ministers plenipotentiary are: Austria, Bolivia, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Great Britain, Haiti, Hungary, Irish Free State, Latvia, Liberia, Lithuania, Monaco, Nicaragua, Portugal, Rumania, Salvador, San Marino, Venezuela, Yugoslavia. The United States Legation, established in 1852, was suppressed in 1888.

Ambition (Lat., ambire, to go about), excessive or inordinate seeking of honors, so named from the practise of candidates for office in early Rome going about the city to procure votes.—C.E.

Ambitus Altaris (Lat., space around an altar), altar enclosure in ancient churches, usually separated from choir enclosure.

Ambo (Gr., an elevation), an elevated desk or pulpit with a flight of stairs on each side from which the Epistles and Gospels were read and the sermon preached; in later times, two ambones were used, one for the Epistle, the other for the Gospel. In the Russian Orthodox Church the ambo is a flight of stairs in front of the iconostasis (picture screen in front of the sanctuary); in the cathedral churches the priest stands on the ambo in the middle of the nave during part of the service. In the Greek Catholic Church the ambo is a table in front of the iconostasis, at which baptisms, confirmations, and marriages are celebrated. In the Russian Orthodox Church the ambo is a flight of stairs in front of the iconostasis (picture screen in front of the sanctuary); in the cathedral churches the priest stands on the ambo in the middle of the nave during part of the service. In the Greek Catholic Church the ambo is a table in front of the iconostasis, at which baptisms, confirmations, and marriages are celebrated.—C.E.; O’Brien, History of the Mass, N. Y., 1882.

Ambrose (Gr., immortal), Saint, Father and Doctor of the Church (340-397), Bp. of Milan, b. in Gaul, his father being Prefect of Gaul (modern France, Britain, Spain, and part of Africa). Am-
Ambrose distinguished himself as a lawyer and as consular governor of Liguria and Emilia, with residence in Milan. When striving to hold an orderly election of a bishop to that see in 374, the people acclaimed him, although, out of reverence for Baptism, he was still only a catechumen preparing for it. Baptized, he was ordained priest, and consecrated bishop, 7 Dec., 374. He gave his personal property to the poor, his landed possessions to the Church, studied the Scriptures and the Fathers, and preached every Sunday, frequently on virginity. His popularity enabled him to withstand the fierce Arian heretics and the encroachments of the secular powers on the Church. His influence over the rulers was such that when Theodosius had caused the massacre of thousands of citizens at Thessalonica, Ambrose insisted on his doing public penance. He was instrumental in the conversion of St. Augustine. Ambrose left many writings on Scripture, priesthood, virginity, and doctrinal subjects; he composed many hymns and is one of the founders of Christian hymnology, Ambrosian Chant, Hymnography, and the Milanese Rite are named after him. So also was the Order of St. Ambrose, founded at Milan in the 14th century, several Oblate congregations, and the Ambrosian Library, founded by Card. Federigo Borromeo. The chants now used in the Ambrosian, or Milanese, Rite, originated for the Roman, others Gallican, others Antiochene. In its present form it is greatly Romanized, having the whole Roman Canon in the Mass. Some notable peculiarities are: a procession with the oblations of bread and wine before the Offertory; the litany chanted by the deacon; the Creed said after the Offertory, Mass of the Ambrosian Library, one of the famous libraries of the world, founded by Card. Federigo Borromeo at Milan between 1603 and 1609. It consists of a single hall, 75 ft. by 29 ft., with bookcases along the walls, lighted by large semi-circular windows at each end. The books are procured by agents from all parts of Europe and also from the East. It was one of the first libraries to offer facilities for research, accessible to all students.—C.E.

Ambrosian Rite, the rite used in the Church of Milan, Italy, so called from St. Ambrose, Bp. of Milan, probably because he made a revision of it, or because its principal characteristics date from his time. It is sometimes called the Milanese Rite. Its origin is disputed. Some consider it an old form of the Roman, others Gallican, others Antiochene. In its present form it is greatly Romanized, having the whole Roman Canon in the Mass. Some notable peculiarities are: a procession with the oblations of bread and wine before the Offertory; the litany chanted by the deacon; the Creed said after the Offertory. It is used in the diocese of Milan, but not exclusively even in the city of Milan.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914. (M. E. D.)

Ambrosian Chant, hymns written in iambic dimeter form, whether by St. Ambrose, or his contemporaries, c. 374. Those attributed to St. Ambrose were syllabic in form and simple in rhythm, but the texts underwent many subsequent rhetorical and melodic changes. A comparison of various codices from different centuries made possible the restorations of Guido Drues, 1893. The chants now used in the Ambrosian, or Milanese, Rite, originated for the most part in later liturgical developments.

Ambrosian Hymnography of Ambrosian, hymns of the metric and strophic cast peculiar to the authenticated hymns of St. Ambrose and of his hymnodic school; by extension, a poetical form or a liturgical use. Under the Rule of St. Benedict, hymns to be used during the canonical hours were styled Ambrosianos. The four hymns universally acknowledged as authentic are: "Aeterna rerum Conditor," "Deus Creator Omnium," "Jam resurgit hora tertia," "Venit Redemptor gentium."
name America in honor of Amerigo Vespucci who claimed to have touched the western continent on his first voyage, 1497-98. Of the many claims to pre-Columbian discovery (Phoenicians, Basques, Celts, Norse, Italians, and Chinese), the Norse alone is accepted as historically certain. However, Ari Thorgilsson (d. 1148), most trustworthy of the historians of Iceland, records evidence of occupation of Iceland by Irish monks before the arrival of the Norse, and references are made to land in the western ocean called Ireland the Great in the "Saga of Thorfinn Karlsefni," "Eyrbyggia Saga," and narratives of Are Marson. Adam of Bremen, in "A Description of the Northern Islands" (1075), mentions Greenland and Vinland and gives the oldest written account of Norse discovery of America. Greenland was settled by Eric the Red c. 985, and the discovery of Vinland is ascribed to Leif, son of Eric, on his way back to Norway from Greenland where he had been sent by King Olaf of Norway to introduce Christianity (c. 1000). The first diocese in the new world was erected at Gardar, Greenland, c. 1125, and its existence is corroborated by several letters in the Vatican Library.

Columbus arrived at San Salvador (Watling Island) in 1492 and proceeded to Cuba and Haiti, discovered Jamaica in 1494, and in 1498 came to Trinidad and the mainland. Spanish exploration and conquest followed rapidly, and as Portuguese rivals disputed Spanish claims, an appeal was made by both governments to Pope Alexander VI, who in 1493 delimited two spheres of influence by a line drawn 370 leagues w. of Cape Verde Islands, the western to be Spanish, the eastern Portuguese. Spain began colonization of the larger Antilles in 1493. Balboa established the continental nature of America by discovery of the Pacific in 1513. Cortes conquered Mexico in 1521, Central America was subjugated in 1524, and in 1534 Peru was conquered by Pizarro. Within sixty years of discovery, all Central and South America, except Brazil, and a large part of North America belonged to Spain. Conversion of the Indians was stipulated in every royal contract with the explorers, and the Church undertook education and civilization of the Indians as soon as governmental administration was stabilized. The printing press was introduced into Mexico (c. 1536) for this purpose, and Franciscans, Dominicans, and other religious orders, especially Jesuits, became the protectors as well as the teachers of the natives. The Brazilian coast was discovered by Pedro Alvarez Cabral in 1500, and the methods of Portuguese colonists, though more commercial, resembled those of Spain, but in the 17th and 18th centuries they became dangerous to Jesuit missions through their practise of enslaving the Indians.

The first French colony was established in 1534 at the mouth of the St. Lawrence explored by Champlain, the first permanent settlement at Quebec in 1608, and French power in Canada was strengthened by the Jesuits, who strove to win the Iroquois to Christianity and friendship with France. Connection between the Great Lakes and the Mississippi was established in the 17th century by Marquette and Joliet. The French also colonized Louisiana, the Mississippi Valley explored by La Salle, some of the Lesser Antilles, and Guiana in South America, but their undertakings were on a smaller scale than the Spanish and less actively supported by the government.

The English flag was brought to America in 1497 by John Cabot, a Venetian navigator commissioned by King Henry VII, who landed near Cape Breton. In 1584 and 1607 settlements were made in North Carolina and Virginia under the patronage of the crown, and later by the Puritans in New England, and by Catholics in Maryland. The English were superior to the French in organization and displayed more individual enterprise and commercial tendency than the Spanish, Dutch and Swedish migrations followed, and in 1613 the colony of New Netherlands was founded, extending from Long Island up the Hudson River Valley. The colony of New Sweden, founded in 1638 on the shores of Delaware Bay, was ceded to the Dutch in 1655, and in 1664 Dutch possessions passed to the English. Unfortunately those in authority did not always encourage the civilization of the Indians but too often regarded them as obstacles to be removed.

American, a national Catholic weekly review founded by the Jesuits of the U. S., 1909. It aims to provide a "review and conscientious criticism of the life and literature of the day, a discussion of actual questions, and a study of vital problems from the Christian standpoint, a record of religious progress, a defense of sound doctrine, an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, a removal of traditional prejudice, a refutation of erroneous news, and a correction of misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices." ("America," 17 April, 1909). Circulation, 34,784.—C.E.

American and Foreign Christian Union, organized, 1849, by union of the American Protestant Society, Foreign Evangelical Society, and the Christian Alliance, to convert Catholics to Protestantism. It worked in North and South America and Europe, for a number of years, withdrew from France, 1866, and from all Europe, 1875, and ultimately limited its efforts to supporting an American church in Paris.

American Board of Catholic Missions, organized at Cincinnati, O., 1920, by a committee appointed by the bishops of the Catholic Church in America, and consisting of the Abps. of Cincinnati, New York, and Philadelphia, and Bps. of Omaha and Pittsburgh, to consolidate various missionary activities of the United States under authority of the hierarchy and coordinate them with Catholic missions of other countries under general jurisdiction of an international board selected by the Vatican.

American Catholic Historical Association, a national society for the promotion of study and research in the general history of the Catholic Church. It was founded in Cleveland, 1919, and has headquarters at the Catholic University of America, American Catholic Quarterly Review, established at Philadelphia, 1876, by Rev. James A. Corcoran, Rev. James O'Connor, and George Dering Wolff. The first issue appeared in January with Fr. Corcoran as editor-in-chief. The editorial policy of the review, as inscribed on the first page of each issue, permits complete freedom of expression outside of the domain of defined doctrines. The "Review" has had a strong influence in behalf of Catholic apologetics, and notably in the discussions which led to the foundation of the Catholic University of America.

American Federation of Catholic Societies, organization founded in Cincinnati, 1901, for the purpose of advancing the civil, social, and religious interests of Catholics, with membership composed of the leading Catholic organizations. It was influential in bringing about the correction of many errors concerning the Church in four general encyclopedias, in obtaining fair treatment for Catholics in the Philippines, and in developing interest among Catholics in public affairs in which religion is concerned. During the World War it was merged into the National Council of Catholic Men.

Americanism, a term rightly employed, according to Leo XIII in his letter to the hierarchy of the United States, "Testem benevolentiae" (Proof of Affection), to express the characteristic qualities which reflect honor on the American people, or on their condition, customs, and laws; but wrongly employed to express certain opinions that are not in accordance with Catholic principles, as, for instance, that the action of the Holy Ghost in these days renders spiritual guidance less necessary, that the natural virtues are to be more cultivated than the supernatural, that the active are more important than the passive virtues, that vows narrow true liberty, that time-honored methods of dealing with Protestants are now antiquated. (ED.)

American Protective Association (A.P.A.), a secret proscriptive society in the United States, which was a disturbing factor in most Northern States during 1891-97. It was founded by Henry F. Bowers, who established the first council at Clinton, Iowa, in 1887, and reached its height in 1894. Members were bound by oath to endeavor to exclude Catholics entirely from public offices. Propaganda was carried on by literature and lectures; forged documents were used, especially an alleged "papal bull" calling for a massacre of Protestants. Capital was made out of the coming of Mgr. Satolli, papal delegate, and also out of the parochial-school question. Few prominent men acknowledged membership. It was associated with the Republican party, and a great source of vexation to it. In failing to prevent the nomination of William McKinley (1896) and also to secure representation in the Republican platform for some principles of the order, its prestige received a blow from which it never recovered.

American Rescue Workers, formerly AMERICAN SALVATION ARMY, a group of workers under Thomas E. Moore, who withdrew from the Salvation Army in 1882, incorporated as a separate body in 1884, and the following year adopted a charter under the name of Salvation Army of America. In 1913 the name was changed to American Rescue Workers. Similar to the Salvation Army in belief and government, their church is Christian with the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper. They publish a quarterly periodical. In the United States in 1925 there were: 510 ministers; 150 churches; and 6946 communicants.

Amerigo Vespucci (1451-1512), cosmographer and navigator, after whom America is named. b. Florence; d. Seville. The fact that his discovery of the mainland (1497-98) antedated that of Columbus was responsible for the appearance of the name "America" for the first time in 1507 and for its application first to South America and afterward to the entire Western Hemisphere. Vespucci, a friend of Columbus, had no part in this appellation. The history of his voyages (1497-1508) appears in his "Letters" (1507) and "Novus Mundus" (1503 or 1504).—C.E., XV, 384; Havrisse, Discovery of North America and Americus Vespucius, Lond., 1895.

Amerikanisches Familienblatt, a monthly family magazine published in German at Rome, III., by the Society of the Divine Word; founded, 1901; circulation, 8059.

Amerikanski Slovenec, a daily newspaper, founded, 1891, published in the Slovenian (Yugoslav) language in Chicago; circulation, 7658.

Amice (Lat., amictus, garment), short linen vestment, square or oblong in shape, worn beneath the alb to cover the shoulders of the priest while celebrating Mass. When putting on it he touches the head with it, saying: "Put on my head, O Lord, the helmet of salvation, in order to repel the assaults of the devil."—C.E.; MacMahon, Liturgical Catechism, Dub., 1927.

Amida (Diärbeske), Diocese and Archdiocese of, Iraq. The diocese of the Armenian Rite was founded 1850. Churches, 10; priests, 18; schools, 12; Catholics, 5400. The archbishopric is of the Chaldean Rite dating from 1553, restored 1833; administrator, Israel Audo, Bp. of Mardin. The archbishop is also Abp. of Mejaferkin. Churches, 9; priests, 12; schools, 10; Catholics, 4180.

Amiens, city, France, capital of Department of Somme. It was the Samarobriva of Coosar, and capital of the Albiani, from whom it derives its name, known bishop of the diocese of Amiens was St. Liam of 11aaGon, jurist; Jean de Lagrange, cardinal; François Faure, who converted James II of England. The cathedral (1220-88), called the “Bible of the 13th century; the ground plan consists of a nave of six bays with aisle on either hand, flanked by chapels; extreme length, 442 ft., width midway at crossing, 194 ft. Pop., 91,576.—Bumpus, Cathedrals of France, Lond., 1927.

Ammon, DANIEL (1820-98), naval officer and author, h. Brown Co., O.; d. Washington, D. C. He served with Dupont’s fleet during the Civil War, was chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, 1869-71, and of the Bureau of Navigation, 1871-78. He designed the rain, Katahdin, and a life-raft, Almonite, 45 ft., length 205 ft., beam 31 ft., draft 16 ft. The first part (1-2) pictures God’s judgment upon the nations encircling Israel, and then upon Israel itself. The second part (3-6) develops God’s judgment upon Israel in three distinct discourses, St. Augustine calls attention to the power and the eloquence of the lamentation in chapters 5 and 6. The third part (7-9) records five visions; the fifth vision (9, verses 1-10) prepares the glorious perspective of Messianic blessings (verses 11-15). The book is one of the fairest specimens of Hebrew literature. Its arrangement is simple and artistic, its language plain but forceful, its wealth of imagery delightful and amazing. The reader is struck by the frequent recurrence of identical phrases, as in chapter 1: “For three crimes ... I will send a fire” (3-4, 6-7, 9-10, 11-12, 13-14, etc.); and in chapter 4: “Yet you returned not to me” (6, 8, 9, 10, 11). Amos is the prophet of the sovereign Lordship of God over all creation. The canonicity of the book is vouched for by a citation in Tobina (2, 6) and two citations in the Acts of the Apostles, where St. Stephen (Acts, 7, 42) quotes from Amos, 5, and St. James (Acts, 15, 16) quotes from Amos, 9. It is used in the Office for Thursday, the fourth week of November, and in the Mass for Wednesday of the Ember Week of September, first lesson (9, 13-15). Passages recommended for reading are chapter 1, verse 3, to chapter 2, verse 5, and chapter 4, verses 6-11, C.E.; Pope.

Amovability (Lat., a from; movere, to move), the term applied to the condition of those who hold a removable office. The difference between a removable office and an irremovable one is this: if there be a question of an irremovable office, the Ordinary cannot deprive a cleric of it, unless by means of a process carried out according to law; if there be a question of a removable office, the deprival can be decreed by the Ordinary for any just cause whatever, which is left to his prudent judgment, natural equity being observed, but he is not at all bound to follow a certain method of procedure, except in the case of removable parishes. —Code of Canon Law, can. 192, § 2 and § 5; can. 247-81. (J. MacC.)

is famed for his discoveries in electro-dynamics. In 1881 the Paris Conference of Electricians named the practical unit of electric current, the "ampère." He wrote "Mathematical Theory of the Phenomena of Electro-dynamics" and other scientific treatises.—C.E.

Amphitheater (Gr., amphitheatron, a double theater), a building where the scene of performance is entirely surrounded by seats for spectators; similar to the bowls and stadiums of today. That of Pompeii was built 80 B.C., the Roman Coliseum, A.D. 80. Remains of other Roman amphitheaters are at Verona, Capua, Pozzuoli and Pola, Italy; Lyons, Arles, Fréjus, and Tours, France; Seville and Tarragona, Spain. Many of these were scenes of Christian martyrdoms.

Amphora (Gr., amphi, on both sides; phero, carry), vessels, generally made of clay, and furnished with ears for handles; used for holding wine. Specimens have been found in the catacombs, inscribed with Christian symbols. In England, the Roman period was marked by a Benedictine foundation having lineal continuity with the ancient Abbey of Westminster. The present house was founded as the monastery of St. Lawrence, 1802, and erected into an abbey, 1890. The titular abbeys of Westminster and York and the cathedral priories of Durham, Worcester, Chester, and Rochester are attached to it. In 1928 there were 30 monks, who serve a number of missions in the vicinity and conduct a preparatory school and a college offering courses in preparation for university, navy, army, and air force examinations.

Ampleforth, Abbey of, Yorkshire, England, a Benedictine foundation having lineal continuity with the ancient Abbey of Westminster. The present house was founded as the monastery of St. Lawrence, 1802, and erected into an abbey, 1890. The titular abbeys of Westminster and York and the cathedral priories of Durham, Worcester, Chester, and Rochester are attached to it. In 1928 there were 30 monks, who serve a number of missions in the vicinity and conduct a preparatory school and a college offering courses in preparation for university, navy, army, and air force examinations.

Amphill, Odo Russell, Baron (1829-84), British diplomatist and ambassador, b. Florence; d. Potsdam. He was secretary of legation at Florence, and resident in Rome till 1870, where he was the real, though unofficial representative of England at the Vatican, and rendered Aib. Manning great service by preventing any outside interference in the affairs of the Vatican Council. From 1871-84 he was ambassador at Berlin, and was created a baron in 1881.—Dict. Nat. Biog.

Amphulæ (Lat., bottles), jars found in the catacombs, used for holding holy oils, or burial ungents; some are supposed to have held the blood of a martyr. In the Middle Ages they were carried by pilgrims and filled with oil from lamps in a martyr's shrine. Usually they bore the symbol of a saint.—C.E.

Amra, elegy or panegyric on a native saint in Ireland. The best known is that of Columb Cille (Columbia), attributed by tradition to Dallan Mac Forgaill, chief ollamh, or bard, c. 575.—C.E.

Amraphel, King of Sennaar, or Babylonia, one of the Mesopotamian kings mentioned in Genesis; now believed to be identical with Hammurabi (2250 B.C.).—C.E.

Amsterdam, capital of Netherlands, originally a college offering courses in preparation for university, navy, army, and air force examinations. Under Napoleon Amsterdam became capital of the Kingdom of Holland, and Catholicism was recognized by the Constitution of 1843. It became a deanery subject to the Diocese of Haarlem in 1853. The chief church is called the "Holy Room."—C.E.

Amulet (Lat., amuletum, a charm), an object of stone, metal, parchment, etc., worn as protection against disease, witchcraft, and other ills. Their use was common among early Egyptians, from whom the Romans adopted them. They were gradually repudiated by Christians as superstitions, and in 708 all religious houses were closed. Under Napoleon Amsterdam became capital of the Kingdom of Holland, and Catholicism was recognized by the Constitution of 1843. It became a deanery subject to the Diocese of Haarlem in 1853. The chief church is called the "Holy Room."—C.E.

Amabaptists (Gr., an, again; baptizo, baptize: rebaptizers), a Protestant sect of the Reformation period which appeared in 1521 at Zwickau. The principal tenets were: (1) rejection of baptism of infants as unscriptural, and its restriction to adults as a sign of Christian belief; (2) restoration of what they considered primitive Christianity, abolition of capital punishment, oaths, and the magistracy; (3) scripture as a rule of faith; (4) foundation of a new kingdom of God on communist grounds. They were of two types, the sober or moderate and the fanatical type. The former originated in Zwingli's reformation in Switzerland, when a portion of his followers at Zurich, 1522, seceded. The civil authorities compelled them to have their children baptized under penalty of banishment, and their meetings were prohibited. The moderates flourished in the Netherlands and adopted their new name, Mennonites, from a former Catholic priest, Menno Simons, who assumed their leadership. The fanatical Anabaptists were active in Saxony, Thuringia, and other parts of Germany, and were the so-called "Zwickau Prophets." Luther drove them from Wittenberg, but their leader, Storch, continued his propaganda, particularly in Thuringia where he was one of the principal legislators of the Peasants' War. Their later excesses, community, polygamy, community of women, led to their suppression in 1535. The Anabaptist tenets regarding infant baptism were adopted by the Baptists (q.v.), the lineal descendants of the sober Anabaptists.

Anaelactus (Gr., recalled), Saint, Pope (c. 79-90), martyr. According to tradition he was a Greek, convert of St. Peter, and ordained by him, and was his second successor. He may be identical with the Cletus spoken of by Augustine and other writers. He is mentioned in the Canon of the Mass as Cletus, was martyred, and buried near St. Peter. Feast, R. Cal., 13 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Anaelactus II, antipope. See Pienkzeone, Pietro.

Anagni, an Italian episcopal town, in the province of Rome; native place of Pope Boniface VIII. On 7 Sept., 1303, Nogaret and Sciarra Colonna, emissaries of Philip the Fair of France, at the head of several hundred soldiers, invaded the town where Boniface was then residing, plundered the papal palace, and offered all sorts of indignities to the pontiff who refused to abdicate or to convokve a general council. On 9 Sept. the inhabitants drove away the sacrilegious invaders.—C.E. (r. p. b.)

Anagostesc, the epistle-reader in the Greek Church.

Anagogical sense (Gr., anagogikos, that which leads up; e.g., the teachings of the Bible lead to eternal life), that division of the typical sense which includes blessings to be hoped for, and which refers particularly to the future life. The rest which the Israelites found in Chanaan is anagogically typical of eternal rest in heaven (Ps. 94; Heb. 4). Jerusalem in its anagogical sense is typical of the Church triumphant. (n. 1. c.)

Analecta (Gr., things gathered), selections from authors; often used as title, e.g.: “Analecta Sacra,” a Gnostic work; “Analecta Bollandiana,” review begun by the Bollandists in 1832.

Analepsis (Gr., taking-up), in the Eastern Church, the feast of the Ascension.

Analogy (Gr., ana, according to; logos, proportion), term used in natural theology to express the process of reasoning whereby we arrive at some knowledge, howsoever imperfect, of the nature of God. As He is the Creator of all the qualities there are in creatures, we argue that He must possess them all in their perfection.—C.E.; Crumley, Logie, N. Y., 1929; (ed.)

Ananmelech (Babylonian, Anu is prince), a god, whose worship the Sepharvites introduced and perpetuated in Samaria, after the overthrow of the Kingdom of Israel and the capture of the capital by Sargon, King of Assyria (4 Kings, 17); probably another name for the Babylonian god Annu. To Ananmelech the Sepharvites offered their children in holocaust. (F. J. L.)

Ananias. See Commemoration.

Ananias. (1) Member of the first Christian community. With his wife he was miraculously punished by Peter with sudden death, for hypocrisy and falsehood (Acts, 6). (2) Disciple at Damascus, figuring in the baptism and conversion of Paul (Acts, 9). (3) Son of Nedebaos and high priest about A.D. 47-59. He was acquitted by Claudius of Rome from an accusation of permitting violence, and murdered at the beginning of the Jewish war (Acts, 23; 24).

Anapheora (Gr., offering, sacrifice), in Greek Rite: (1) part of the service which corresponds to Latin Canon of the Mass; (2) offering of Eucharistic bread; (3) aer (veil); (4) procession in which these offerings are brought to the altar.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914.

Anarchy (Gr., an, without; archo, rule), a social theory which maintains that the restraint of law is an invasion of the right of a free, intelligent being, that the individual has the right to unlimited self-expression, and that the self-interest of the individual, if intelligently pursued, will best lead to the promotion of the general welfare. The origin of the theory is variously attributed to Diderot (1713-84), the Hebertistes of the French Revolution, and to Proudhon (1809-65). In method some anarchists are evolutionary, believing in the advent of anarchism through propaganda and the use of the ballot. Others are revolutionary and propose to establish anarchism by violence. Nihilists, who believe in the assassination of rulers and other violent acts of opposition to the existing forms of society, represent the radical extreme of revolutionary anarchists. Anarchism is founded on an unwarranted optimism regarding the potentiality of unrestrained human nature.—C.E.; U.K.; Vizetelly, The Anarchists, N. Y., 1911. (J. F. MCC.)

Anastasia (Gr., resurrection), Saint, martyr (304), d. Sirmium (modern Yugoslavia), in the Diocletian persecution. Later her cultus spread to Rome, where her church today gives its title to a cardinal-priest. Her name occurs in the prayer “Nobis quoque peccatoribus” in the Canon of the Mass, and she has the unique distinction of a special commemoration in the second Mass on Christmas. Feast, R. Cal., 25 Dec.—C.E.; Butler.

Anastasimatarion, a Greek Church book, containing the text with music of the various compositions sung during the Sunday Offices.

Anastasis (Gr., resurrection), Church of the, Jerusalem, erected over the Holy Sepulcher by Emperor Constantine I. It was razed by the Persians, 614, and restored by Modestus, Abbot of St. Theodore, c. 626. Its destruction, 1010, by Hakim, Caliph of Egypt, was an incentive to the First Crusade. Rebuilt by Constantine VIII, in 1024, it was incorporated in the French-Romanesque cathedral of the Crusaders, 1168. In the fire of 1808 the rotunda fell in upon the Sepulcher and the Orthodox Church obtained from the Turkish government exclusive permission to restore it. A new church, built by a Greek architect, was dedicated in 1810. The dome was rebuilt by France, Russia, and Turkey, 1868. In the middle of the rotunda is the Tomb of Christ. The church is used in turn by Catholics, and various Eastern schismatics.

Anastasius (Gr., resurrection), Saint, martyr (628), d. Bethsala, Assyria. A Persian magician and a soldier in the army of Khusrau, he was converted to Christianity when that monarch carried the Holy Cross from Jerusalem to Persia. He took the name of Anastasius and lived a monastic life for seven years. Desiring martyrdom he went to

Cassarea, where he reproached his countrymen for their magic and fire-worship. He was sent to Bethsaeoe, imprisoned, strangled, and decapitated. Patron of goldsmiths; invoked against headaches. Relics at Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 22 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Anastasius I, Saint, Pope (399-403), b. Rome; d. there. He was a friend of Augustine, Jerome, and Paulinus, and chiefly known for his condemnation of Origen and the Donatists. Feast, 27 April.—C.E.

Anastasius II, Pope (496-498). He caused the name of Acacius, Patriarch of Constantinople, to be removed from the tablets of the Church, although recognizing the validity of his sacramental acts; and condemned Traductionism.—C.E.

Anastasius III, Pope (911-913), b. Rome; d. there. He was active in determining the ecclesiastical divisions of Germany.—C.E.; Mann.

Anastasius IV, Pope (1153-54), b. Rome; d. there. He was Card.-Bp. of Sabina, and during his pontificate restored the Pantheon and ended the controversy over the archiepiscopal see of Magdeburg by recognizing Frederick Barbarossa’s candidate, Wichmann.—C.E.; Mann.

Anastasius Bibliothecarius (810-879), librarian of the Vatican, sometimes identified with the antipope. The latter was a Roman presbyter, later cardinal-priest, excommunicated by Pope Leo IV, 855, Upon Leo’s death, 855, he was elected pope by the imperial party, but the rightfully elected Benedict III gained the supremacy. His successor, Nicholas I, appointed as librarian, 867, an Anastasius who had been Abbot of Sancta Maria Trans-Tiberim, Rome, 858-867, and, if the same as the antipope, he must have been pardoned by Nicholas. Anastasius the librarian was appointed legate to Constantinople, 869, where he assisted at the Eighth Ecumenical Council and translated its “Acts” into Latin. He was confirmed in his office by Pope John VIII, 872.—C.E.; Mann.

Anastasius the Fuller, Saint, martyr (c. 304), b. Aquileia, Italy. He followed the fuller’s trade at Salona, Dalmatia. Under Diocletian he was arrested and thrown into the sea because he painted a conspicuous cross on his hide. His body was brought to Salona, where a church was built in his honor. In the 7th century his relics were transferred to Spalato, Patron of fullers and weavers. Feast, 26 Aug.

Anasthemia, an-ith-em’a (Gr., placed on high, as were offerings to the divinity in the temples), word used in the O.T. to mean something offered to God (Jud., 16); applied also to odious things, such as the head of an enemy, or of a felon, when exposed to view, hence execrable, accursed. Applied to the enemies of the Jews, it meant they were to be cut off and even exterminated. In the N.T. St. Paul used it to express exclusion from the society, or communion, of the faithful the same as minor excommunication (Gal., 1). It was used in this sense of sinners and heretics from the 5th to the 8th century, when it came to mean not only minor excommunication, but expulsion or major excommunication from the Church, promulgated solemnly by the pope.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Anatomy (Gr., anatos, up; temno, cut: cutting up, dissecting), the study of the composition, form, and structure of the bodies of living beings. As the purpose of this study is chiefly to discover means of preventing disease and preserving human life, and as the principal medieval and modern anatomists were physicians and surgeons, this subject is treated under the general title of MEDICINE. It is of special interest to Catholics because the leading pioneers in the science were Catholics, and with the encouragement of the Church, although the authorities of the Church have been erroneously, as is now admitted, accused of persecuting distinguished anatomists.—C.E.; U.K. (ED.)

Ancestor-worship, veneration of the departed spirits by sacrifices and sundry services of filial piety with a view to obtaining their aid for their descendants. It is practised among the American Indians, Iranians, Japanese, Chinese, Hindus, Polynesians, Fijians, Zulus and other African tribes.—U.K.

Anchieta, José de (1534-97), Spanish missionary, apostle of Brazil; d. Laguna, Tenerife, Canary Islands; d. Beritiga, Brazil. He entered the Society of Jesus, 1561, and went to Brazil, 1553, where in spite of delicate health he worked among colonists and savages for 45 years. Surnamed “Thaumaturgus,” on account of miracles and prophecies, it is said that he had a remarkable attraction for birds and even wild beasts. He wrote a Tupi grammar and dictionary and became rector of the College of St. Vincent, and later Jesuit Provincial of Brazil.—C.E.

Anchor (Gr., ankevra, hook), a symbol of hope, because it is an aid to mariners in danger of shipwreck. It was a favorite emblem in the early Church and is found frequently in the catacombs and elsewhere, often with a dolphin intertwined as a symbol of Christ. In modern religious art it is an emblem of St. Rose of Lima, steadfast in hope and courage in spite of great sufferings, St. Philomena, whose tomb in the catacombs it was found inscribed, and Pope St. Clement, miraculously freed when cast into the sea with an anchor bound to him.—C.E.; Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1926. (J. F. S.)

Anchor-cross, a combination of a cross and an anchor, emblematic of faith and hope. It was often used as a sacred symbol in the catacombs. (J. F. S.)

Anchorhold (same root as anchorites), a walled-up hermitage or anchorage built beside a church, having two windows, one opening outside through which the recluse receives food and the other into the church. It is the name and subject.
of an English chivalric tale by Enid Dinnis (Lond., 1922).

Anchorites (Gr., anachoreo, withdraw), men who renounce the world in order to spend their lives alone, in penance and promotion of the Church; women are known as anchoresses—C.E.

Ancien Régime, än-sə-än rä-zhm (Fr., old system), the established social and political system of France under the old monarchy, destroyed by the revolution of 1789.

Ancients, mentioned in the Apocalypse (4, 4; 5, 5; 7, 13; 19, 4; 21, 12-14) as part of the Court of the Lamb of God whom they adore and to whom they offer the prayers of the saints. They are clothed in white garments, have gold crowns, and number 24. The number is perhaps symbolical, representing the twelve Apostles and the twelve tribes of Israel or according to Bp. Blane, the twelve patriarchs of the Old Law. (N. G.)

Ancilla Dei (Lat., handmaid of God), title given in early Christian inscriptions to a deceased woman, but from the time of Gregory the Great, 7th century, only applied to nuns.—C.E.

Ancren Riwle, än-kren ˈriːl, or REGULA INCLUSA, 13th-century code of rules for anchoresses, sometimes called “The Nuns’ Rule.”—C.E.

Andeol, Saint, martyr (208), apostle of France. Feast, May 11. He was a Christian of noble birth and was martyred in the East. His relics were transferred to France in the 7th century, of which Seo de Urgel, in Spain, is the cathedral town; the chief town of the republic is Andorra La Vella (pop., 600).—U.K.

Andera, Antonio De (1580-1634), missionary, explorer of Tibet, b. Oliuros, Portugal; d. Goa, India. For four years he was the chief Jesuit missionary in the Indies. He succeeded in penetrating into Tibet, and establishing a mission at Champa-rangue. Recalled to Goa, he became superior of the Indies and died for the faith.—C.E.

Andrea, Giovanni B’ (c. 1275-1348), canonist, b. near Florence; d. Bologna. He was educated at the University of Bologna, taught at Padua and Pisa, and became professor of canon law at Bologna. Works: “Glossary of the Clementine books; Treatise, or Commentary on the decretal letters of Gregory IX”; “Mercuriales, or commentary on the six rules; Book of the revolution of Venus. In addition to several articles contributed to scientific papers, he was the author of “Geological Reconnaissance of Part of the Holy Land,” published by the U. S. Government.—C.E. of the praises of Saint Jerome; Addenda to the Speculum of Durandus."—C.E.

Andrew, Felix De (1778-1820), first superior of the Congregation of the Mission (Vincentians) in the United States, b. Demonte, Italy; d. St. Louis, Mo. He accompanied Bp. Dubourg to St. Louis in 1818, where the congregation had its first establishment, and died soon after exhausted by missionary labors. The process for his beatification was authorized by Benedict XV, 1918.—C.E.; Rosati, Felix De Andreis, St. L., 151.

Andrew (Gr., manly), Saint, Apostle (d. 60), b. Bethsaida, Galilee; d. Patrae, Achaea. Son of Jona, brother of Peter (Matt., 10; John, 1), and disciple of John the Baptist, he became a follower of Our Lord and was chosen as one of the twelve Apostles (Luke, 6). He is supposed to have preached in Cappadocia, Galatia, Bithynia, Scythia (Russia), Byzantium, Thrace, Macedonia, Thessaly, and Achaia, where he was crucified on an X-shaped or St. Andrew's cross by the Roman governor, Egeas. On St. Andrew's eve in Germany it is customary for girls to supplicate St. Andrew to reveal the identity of their future husband; on the day following the young people float cups in a tub, and if a boy's and a girl's cup drifting together are intercepted by a cup inscribed "priest" it indicates marriage. Patron of Russia and Russia and Scotland and of fishermen and old maids; invoked against gout and sore throat. Relics in cathedral of Analfi, Italy. Emblem: St. Andrew's cross. Feast, R. Cal., 30 Nov., till 1918 a holy day of obligation in Scotland; the Divine Office for his feast is one of the most devotional in the Breviary.—C.E.; Butler.

Andrew Avellino, Saint, confessor (1521-1608), b. Castronuovo, Sicily; d. Naples. His baptismal name was Lancelot, but he took the name Andrew when he entered the Order of Theatines. After studying canon and civil law at Naples, he took his degree and was ordained priest, 1547. He served as master of the novices and was later elected superior of the house at Naples. Renowned for his zeal for strict religious discipline and for his humility and piety, he was commissioned by his superior to found houses at Milan and Piacenza, and held the post of superior at several convents. St. Charles Borromeo was his intimate friend; Andrew’s letters were published at Naples, 1731. He died of apoplexy while saying Mass. Patron of Naples and Sicily; invoked against sudden death and apoplexy. Canonized, 1712. Relics at Naples. Feast, R. Cal., 10 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Andrew Bobola, Blessed (1590-1657), Jesuit martyr, b. Sandomir, Poland; d. Janow. He was superior at Bobruisk, where he distinguished himself during the plague. His success in converting the schismatics, in the Lithuanian mission, led to his torture and martyrdom by the Cossacks. Feast, Russia, Galicia, and Posnania, 16 May; in Poland, 21 Feb.—C.E.

Andrew Corsini, Saint, confessor (1302-73), Bp. of Fiesole, apostle of Florence, b. Florence; d. Fiesole. Repenting his dissolute youth, he joined the Carmelite Order. He was consecrated Bp. of Fiesole, 1360, and was sought everywhere as a peacemaker; at Bologna he made peace between the nobility and the people. Miracles multiplied at his death. He is represented holding a cross, with a wolf and lamb at his feet, and floating above a battlefield on a cloud or a white palfrey. Canonized, 1629. Relics at Florence. Feast, R. Cal., 4 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Andrew Dotti, Blessed (1526-1615), b. and d. Borgo San Sepolcro, Italy. Of noble parentage, he entered the Servite Order, 1278, was ordained to the priesthood, and occupied various positions of honor in the order. His zeal manifested itself principally in preaching and penance. The miracle which also bore that name. Among his works are "The Conspiracy of Titus Oates" and "Review of Foxe’s Book of Martyrs."—C.E.

Andrew of Crete, Saint, confessor (c. 650-c. 740), Abp. of Gortyna, Crete, hymnographer, b. Damascus, Syria. He was the author of many scriptural discourses, but is principally interesting as the inventor of the "Greek Canon," a form of hymnology previously unknown. Feast, 17 Oct.—C.E.

Andrew of Rinn, Blessed, martyr (1459-62), b. Rinn, Tyrol. At the age of three, he was cruelly put to death by Jews, through hatred of the Faith. Beatified by Benedict XIV. Feast, 12 July.

Andrew of Wyntoun, 14th-century Scottish chronicler. He was a canon regular of the Priory of St. Andrews, and later prior of the monastery of Lochleven. In his "Origynale Cronykil of Scotland," so called because it began with the creation of the angels, he incorporated the work of an unknown author, written in the same easy-flowing, octosyllabic, rhyming verse of the Scots vernacular. This work is the first attempt at scientific history writing in Scotland.—C.E.; XV., 151; Butler.

Andrew the Scot, Saint (d. c. 877), Archdeacon of Fiesole, b. d. Italy. He was a brother of St. Bridget the Younger, and accompanied Dossatus to Italy, becoming Archbishop of Fiesole, where he restored the church of St. Martin and founded a monastery. Relics in church of St. Martin, Fiesole. Feast, 22 Aug.—C.E.

Andronicus, kinsman and fellow-prisoner of Paul, mentioned in the Epistle to the Romans as "of note among the apostles," an "apostle" in the wider sense of preacher of the Gospel.

Anesthesia (Gr., an, without; aiathesis, feeling). In its strict sense the word connotes a loss of tactile sense but it has been extended to include absence of sensibility to any and all external impressions. It may be localized or general, and may occur naturally as well as caused by an injury or disease in the sensory nerve paths, or it may be produced artificially by the administration of anesthetics, as during operations. Although fatalities are the exception, it is advisable for a Catholic patient to receive the sacraments previous to the administration of an anesthetic. The reception of the sacraments has a psychotherapeutic value, as the patient's knowledge of having performed his religious duties makes him less susceptible to a shock which may terminate fatally. The sacraments affect body and soul and the Blessed Sacrament particularly is regarded as medicine to both. The Postcommunion of the Mass on 30 June, commemoration of St. Paul, speaks of its medicine operatio (healing remedy). It is wrong to use anesthetics to hasten the death of a patient.

N.Y., 1914.

Angel (Gr., angelos, messenger), a pure spirit, created by God, called angel because some are employed by God as messengers to man. "Pure spirit" means that the angelic nature is entirely spiritual, that an angel has no body and is dependent in no way, either for its existence or its operations, on matter. The angels were created at or near the time when the material world came into existence, and were placed by God in a state of probation or trial. Many of them sinned by pride and were cast into Hell forever; these are called devils, demons, or fallen angels. Those who remained faithful were rewarded with eternal happiness in the vision of God; and the term "angel" used without modification is generally applied only to these. From Scripture, we know that the angelic nature is vast multitudine, beyond the power of man to imagine or conceive. They differ, too, in perfection of nature and of grace. According to this diversity of perfection, they are classified in three hierarchies, each being applicable to all, is also used as a distinctive name for the lowest choir, from which the guardian angels (q.v.) are usually selected. Devotion to the angels can be traced to the earliest ages of the Church. We reverence their excellency and petition their ministrations. The month of October is specially dedicated to them and the feast of all the angels is celebrated in common with that of Michael, 29 Sept. There are also feast-days for Raphael and Gabriel who, with Michael, are the only angels mentioned by name in Scripture. As an emblem in art, an angel is the proper attribute and attendant of St. Matthew and is also associated with St. Roch, who was healed by an angel.—C.E.; O'Connell, The Holy Angels, N.Y., 1923; Vonier, The Angels, N.Y., 1928.

Angel, Tiny Holy, name applied to Our Lord in the Mass, in the third prayer after the Consecration.

Angela Merici, Saint, virgin (1474-1540), foundress of the Ursulines, b. Desenzano, Italy; d. Brescia. At an early age she became a tertiary of St. Francis. She established a school at Desenzano for the instruction of young girls in religion, and later founded a second school at Brescia. In 1535 she laid the foundation for the Ursuline Order by gathering together twelve religious companions at Brescia. Canonized, 1807. Relics in church of St. Agra, Brescia. Feast, R. Cal., 31 May.—C.E.; Monica, Angela Merici and Her Teaching Idea, N.Y., 1927.

Angela of Foligno, Blessed (1248-1309), penitent and mystical writer, b. Foligno, Italy; d. there. She was a worldly and frail woman who, after her conversion, established a community at Foligno of the Third Order of St. Francis. Her "Book of Visions and Instructions" record the history of her conversion. She is represented being invited by Our Lord to receive Holy Communion; and chaining the devil. Relics in church of St. Francis, Foligno. Feast, O.F.M., 4 Jan.—C.E.; Butler, ed. Thurston.

Angelico, Fra (Guido di Pietro or Giovanni da Fiesole; 1387-1455), religious painter, b. near Castello di Viechio, Tuscany, Italy; d. Rome. Entering the Dominican Order as Fra Giovanni, in Fiesole, 1407, the illumination of missals and manuscripts furnished his first training in art. For the Dominican convent in Cortona where he lived, 1414-18, he painted the well-known "Madonna and Four Saints," and for the baptistery a first "Annunciation." Returning to Fiesole in 1418, he painted the "Christ вос Святых," "Coronation of the Virgin," and "Christ as a Pilgrim." His finest work is in the chapel of Nicholas V in the Vatican, a series of frescoes depicting the lives of St. Stephen and St. Lawrence. The dedication of his art to religious subjects earned him the title of "Angelico," and the holiness of his life caused him to be beatified, so that he is also known as "Il Beato" (the Blessed). His work is noted for an extraordinary spiritual quality, bright decorative detail, and exquisite coloring.—C.E.

Angelic Salutation, part of the greeting of the angel Gabriel to the Blessed Virgin repeated in the prayer beginning Hail Mary (Lat., Ave Maria).
Angel-lights, in architecture, small circular lights between subordinate arches of window tracery, belonging especially to the English Perpendicular style.

Angelo Carletti di Chivasso, Blessed (1411-95), theologian, b. Chivasso, Italy; d. Coni. He was a Franciscan, appointed Apostolic Nuncio by Sixtus IV and Innocent VIII, commissioned by the former to preach a holy war against invading Turks, and by the latter to prevent the spread of Waldensianism. His “Cases of Conscience” is a famous dictionary of moral theology.—C.E.

Angel of Great Counsel (Magni Consilii Angelus), in the Introit of the third Mass of Christmas, a title of the Messias in the Greek Version of Isaiah, 9, 6, where we read according to the Hebrew text followed by the Latin Vulgate, “His name shall be called Wonderful, Counselor, Mighty God, a Father forever, Prince of Peace.” St. Jerome conjectures that the translators did not wish to apply such titles to the Messias and substituted this other title. Fr. Knabenbauer, S.J., in his commentary on Isaiah expresses the view that the Hebrew text used by the Greek translators may have been altered. No one thinks the Greek text right. The title it gives the future Messiah is, however, quite appropriate. Its meaning may best be explained by the Hebrew text: the envoy of God is to be a wonderful counsellor. (W. B. K.)

Angels in Art. They are seldom represented before Constantine’s time; the oldest fresco in which an angel appears is a 2nd-century “Annunciation.” The winged angel does not appear until the Apocalypse; though interpreted by Origen as meaning the guardian angels of the seven churches of Asia, they are usually considered as referring to the bishops at the time.—C.E.

Angels of the Churches, mentioned in the Apocalypse; though interpreted by Origen as meaning the guardian angels of the seven churches of Asia, they are usually considered as referring to the bishops at the time.—C.E.

Angelus, a devotion in honor of the Incarnation of Our Lord and venerating His Blessed Mother, recited at morning, noon, and evening at the sound of a bell. It consists of the Hail Mary said three times, with certain verses (little verses), responses, and a prayer. It takes its name from the opening word of the Latin form, “Angelus Domini nuntiavit Mariae” (The Angel of the Lord declared unto Mary). The evening Angelus probably owes its origin to the “curfew bell” (Fr., couve-feu, cover the fire), a signal for bedtime and evening prayer. The morning recital began at Parma, Italy, in 1318, as a prayer for peace. The noon Angelus, originally used only on Fridays, was extended to other days by Pope Callistus III in 1456. Champlain regulated that in New France it should mark the beginning and end of the day. An indulgence of 100 days is gained when the Angelus with three Hail Marys is said, and a plenary indulgence, conditional upon confession, communion, and prayer for the usual intentions, once a month for those who say it habitually. It is recited kneeling, except from Saturday noon to Sunday evening inclusively; but this is not necessary for gaining indulgence. During the Easter season it is replaced by the Regina Celi Lætare (Queen of Heaven Rejoice).—C.E.; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1918. (J. K. S.)

Angelus, The, famous painting by J. F. Millet (1859), showing a peasant man and woman standing in the fields at sunset, with heads bowed in prayer.

Angelus Bell, a triple stroke on the bell repeated three times as a signal for recitation of the Angelus.—Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1925.

Angelus de Scarpetti, Blessed (d. c. 1306), missionary, b. and d. Borgo San Sepolcro, Italy. He took the Augustinian habit, c. 1254, and was sent to England, where he preached and built many monasteries. Beatified, 27 July, 1921.

Anger (Lat., ango, distress), a strongly exciting emotion aroused by an evil that is present but not acquiesced in. Though commonly a self—regarding emotion, it may be aroused in behalf of others. Anger is not purely painful as it includes the agreeable consciousness of energetic reaction against evil, and is not of itself morally evil, but may be at times a high moral force in the form of virtuous indignation, called “just” anger. It needs restraint as it can easily become inordinate and lead to a purpose of revenge or pass into hatred where it is then a vice.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (J. K. V.)

Angers, University of, France; probably developed from the cathedral school; famous as a law school c. 1384. Faculties of theology, medicine, and arts were added by Pope Eugene IV, 1432. Today it has faculties of theology, law, arts, and science. Students: about 520.—C.E.

Anglesey, Henry Paget, 1st Marquess of (1708-1854), soldier and statesman, b. London. His most brilliant success was at Waterloo. Appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, he did all he could for the Irish people, and was recalled by the government for trying to relieve penal legislation against Catholics. In Parliament he pleaded for Catholic emancipation. Again appointed lord lieutenant, 1830, he strongly opposed the repeal of the union. He originated the Board of Education in Ireland.

Anglican, term used to denote the Established Church of England; used more commonly by the High Churchmen than by the Low to imply that the English Church of the Reformation is the same as the Ecclesia Anglicana, as the Catholic Church is named in the Magna Carta. Anglican belief and practise and statistics are given under CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

Anglican Councils, councils held in England at unknown places: 756, by Abp. Cuthbert, to appoint 5 June to be kept in memory of the martyrdom of St. Boniface and his companions; 797, by Ethelheard, preceding his visit to Rome to oppose the foundation of the Archbishopric of Lichfield.

Anglin, Timothy Warren (1822-96), statesman and journalist, b. Clonakilty, Cork, Ireland; d. Canada. He emigrated to St. John, New Brunswick, Canada, 1849; founded "The Morning Freeman" there, 1851; and opposed as too drastic and unworkable the measure prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors, passed by the legislature of New Brunswick, and repealed at its next session. He was the first Catholic returned to Parliament from the city and county of St. John, and became speaker of the Canadian House of Commons, 1874-77. He fought the anti-separate school legislation of New Brunswick, and forced a compromise allowing Catholics to have their own schools and teachers to give religious instruction before and after school hours. He became a member of the editorial staff of the "Toronto Globe," 1883, and editor-in-chief of the "Toronto Tribune," a Catholic weekly, 1874-85.—C.E.

Anglo-Catholics, Anglicans who favor Ritualism, claim to celebrate Mass, reserve the sacrament, use the Latin Missal, and in many ways imitate Catholics, as by having confessional and stations of the cross in their churches. Some of them reject the branch-theory, that the Anglican Church is a branch of the Catholic Church, and believe in the primacy of the pope, holding that their Church was only accidentally severed from the Catholic. Others still insist on the branch-theory. It is estimated that over 4000 ministers are enrolled in the Anglo-Catholic movement and several religious communities of men and women. In over 1000 Anglo-Catholic churches confessions are heard. Anglo-Catholics aim at union with the Greek and Russian Churches.

Anglo-Saxon Church, the church of the Teutonic tribes from northwestern Germany who invaded Britain south of the Rivers Forth and Clyde in the 5th century, displacing the Celtic inhabitants towards Wales and Cornwall. The invaders set up a number of independent kingdoms, often at war with each other; they were evangelized, as the chances of peace or alliance might offer, in the following order: Kent (See of Canterbury founded 597; Rochester, 604); Essex (London, 604); Northumbria (including the district of Deira; York, 625); East Anglia (Dunwich, 630); Mercia (Lichfield, 656); Wessex (Winchester, 669); Sussex, the neighboring kingdom to Kent, was the last to be converted (Selsey, 708). The Christian Celts who remained in Britain were too insignificant in numbers to convert their heathen conquerors, and the Celtic Church in Wales and Scotland seems to have made no effort to preach to the Saxons. Pope St. Gregory the Great, happening to see some fair-haired youths in the Roman slave-market, being told they were Angles from Deira, said: "Not Angles, but angels: De Ira Dei (from the wrath of God) they shall be saved." On the first opportunity he sent the Roman monk St. Augustine to convert Kent, and Augustine became the first Abp. of Canterbury. Northumbria was evangelized by the Irish St. Aidan, a monk of Iona, Scotland, who followed the Celtic traditions regarding the keeping of Easter, which differed from the Roman custom. He founded the monastery of Lindisfarne, from whence came the brothers Sts. Cedd and Chad, who were the apostles of Essex and Mercia respectively, St. Cuthbert, who labored in the north, and St. Wilfrid, who converted Sussex and reconciled Northumbria to the Roman Easter.

In the interests of anti-papal controversy, too much has been made of the divergent customs of the Roman and Celtic missionaries; the latter were thoroughly loyal in spirit to the See of Rome. At the Synod of Whitby, 664, Oswiu, King of Northumbria, elected to stand by "the Roman Keybearer" (St. Peter). The following councils and synods, presided over by bishops or legates appointed from Rome, promoted unity and restrained the mutual interference of the clergy: Hertford, 673; Hatfield, 680; that of 747, held at an unknown or unidentifiable place, made a thorough reform of the clergy; the Synod of Cealchethye (Chelsea ?), 787, recognized tithes, and made Lichfield an archbishopric. Ethelwolf, King of Wessex, gave the
ANGLO-SAXON CHURCH

Church a tenth of his lands. His son, Alfred the Great, showed great devotion to the papacy and in his code of laws he, conjointly with Guthrum, the Danish ruler of East Anglia, declared apostasy a crime, and commanded the payment of Peterspence. St. Dunstan, Abp. of Canterbury, 960-988, aided by St. Ethelwold of Winchester and St. Oswald of York, sought to replace the secular clergy by monks to remedy the custom of married clergy, and to establish a more intimate communication with Rome; henceforward the archbishops went to Rome to receive the pallium. King Canute made a pilgrimage to Rome, 1026-27, legislated in favor of the Church, and insisted on the payment of Peterspence. Under King Edward the Confessor there were appointed to English sees many foreigners, who were probably more devout and capable than any English priests available at the moment; competent Englishmen were not passed over; the papal legate who visited England in 1062 appointed the great native churchman, St. Wulstan, to the See of Winchester.

Latin was used in the Liturgy and in the canonical hours; the books were the Roman service books without any important additions of native growth. There was a strong likeness to the ritual of southern Italy, probably due to Adrian, Abbot of St. Augustine's, who brought the traditions of Monte Cassino to England. Interesting customs were: churclhyard procession on Palm Sunday; dialogue between the Sepulcher on Holy Saturday; episcopal benediction after the Pater Noster; multiplication of Prefaces; lay communion under both kinds. These were not peculiar to England, although some of them originated there. As regards the veneration of Our Lady, the Anglo-Saxons were far removed from the principles of the Reformation. Aldhelm, Abp. of Canterbury, 602-687, assisted by St. Alcuin sang her praises in Latin, Cynwulf in Anglo-Saxon; a 10th-century litany contains the following supplications to the Blessed Virgin (in Latin):

Holy Queen of the World,
Holy Saviouress of the World,
Holy Redemptress of the World.
Pray for us.

—C.E.; Lingard, History and Antiquities of the Anglo-Saxon Church, Lond., 1845.

Angustia loci (Lat., smallness of a place), a basis for dispensation from a diriment impediment of marriage, when, in the place of birth or domicile of a woman, her relationship is so widely spread that she is unable to meet anyone of a position equal to her own whom she can marry, except a relative by blood or by marriage, so that if no dispensation were granted she would be obliged to leave her country in order to marry.

Anicetus, Saint, Pope (c. 157-c. 168), martyr, b. Syria. He allowed St. Polycarp and the Eastern Christians to celebrate Easter on the 14th day of Nisan, regardless of whether it fell on Sunday. Feast, 17 April.—C.E.

Animatus, Saint, sanctificate me, or Soul of my Saviour, sanctify my Breast, hymn usually found in the “Thanksgiving after Mass,” in the Missal. It was written in the 14th century by an unknown author. There are about 15 translations; the English title given is found in “St. George's Hymn Book.” It was a favorite prayer of St. Ignatius Loyola.—Britt.

Animals, Worship of, a corruption of religio wherein an animal which apparently had been a mere symbol or emblem of an attribute, virtue, or quality, is considered either as the bearer of a tribe's tutelary spirit, as among the American Indians, and as such is the object of various degrees of worship; or, as in ancient Egypt's decaying religious life, is identified with the god whose characteristic it represents, and shares with him in Divine honors.

Animals in Christian Art have greater importance than in pagan art. In the catacombs we find the lamb, symbol of the soul, accompanying the Good Shepherd. The fish, symbol of Our Lord, is perhaps of widest distribution. After Constantine, most of the decorative schemes are derived from the Apocalypse: the dove is the Holy Spirit, the lamb the Son of God, the four Evangelists, and the “four living creatures” (man, lion, ox, and eagle) are personifications of the four Evangelists. The fantastic animals of Byzantine art are found in Romanesque sculpture. In the 15th century in the cathedrals of France, especially Notre Dame of Paris, animal sculpture reached great perfection. With the Renaissance, animals were used only as an accessory to the human figure, and no thought of individual symbolism was retained. Saints are often represented with animals; thus, the lion is the emblem of St. Jerome, the dog of St. Roch.—C.E.; Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1925.

Animism (Lat., anima, soul), the doctrine that an immutable principle is the basis of life; in ethnology, a ghost-theory of the origin of religion; the theory that all external bodies are animated by a soul like that of man.—C.E.; U.K.; Bruns­mann-Preuss, Fundamental Theology, St. L., 1928.

Anise, plant mentioned by Our Lord (Matt., 23, 23) as subjected to tithe by the Pharisees; a mis­translation for dill, which was made originally in the Wyclif version and let pass since, as of no consequence, dill and anise being of the same parsley family.

Anna (Heb., grace). (1) The pious and patient mother of Samuel. Vexed at the affronts cast at her long sterility, she made a vow, that should God put an end to her barrenness, she would consecrate her son to God (1 Kings, 1). Samuel's birth was the fruit of her prayers and tears. She brought Samuel to Heli, the high priest, and consecrated him to God. In the joy of seeing her hopes realized, Anna chanted the sublime Canticle of Anna (1 Kings, 2). She is regarded as an image of the Church: persecuted in the beginning, and later fruitful and glorious. (2) Wife of Tobias, who was taken with him into captivity by Salmanasar (Tob., 1). (3) A prophetess, daughter of Pshuel, of the tribe of Aser; the widow in the Temple who recognized Jesus, when presented to the Lord, as the Redeemer (Luke, 2).—C.E. (V. A. T.)
Annals (Lat., annalis, yearly), chronological records registering from day to day events of each year. The prototype of medieval annals is the "Chronographus" of 354, an official document of the Roman Empire. In England the custom arose of writing lists of events on margins of popular tables. Anglo-Saxon missionaries introduced the practise of annal-writing into other countries. The Carlovignian annals were at first concerned with monastic records; later, secular annals were written. Medieval annals usually are anonymous; the chronology is often inaccurate and, as is the case with chronicles, care must be taken to distinguish legend from historical facts.—C.E.

Annals of the Four Masters, sometimes called the Annals of Donegal, the most extensive and the earliest authentic records of Irish history, traditionally begun c. A.M. 2242 (1762 n.c.), and compiled (22 Jan., 1632; to 19 Aug., 1636), at the instance of Fr. John Colgan (d. c. 1657), the hagiographer and historian, mainly by Michael O’Clery, afterward a Franciscan monk. They continue down to A.D. 1616, but of the original compilation, the present name of which was conferred by Fr. Colgan, scarcely one volume remains. Michael O'Clery and his three assistants, Peregrine O'Clery, Farfassa O'Fulmorey, and Peregrine O'Duignan, are known as the "Four Masters." The Annals contain the reigns, deaths, genealogies, etc., not only of high-kings, but of provincial kings, chiefs, dignitaries, ecclesiastics, and others, with some account of battles, murders, and wars. They have been published in three editions, the principal one, in seven quarto volumes, being that of John O'Donovan, both in Irish and English, "Annala Rioghachta Eireann" (Annals of the Kingdom of Ireland), Dublin, 1851.—C.E., VI, 163.

Anna Maria Taigi, Blessed (1769-1837), b. Siena, Italy; d. Rome. In 1789 she married Dom- enico Taigi, some years later was received into the Third Order of Trinitarians, and thenceforth devoted herself to a life of holiness and good works. Soon after her death her name was venerated at Rome and she was beatified, 30 May, 1920.—C.E., XIV, 430.

Annas, Jewish high priest A.D. 6-15, son of Seth. His son-in-law, Caiphas, was high priest during the ministry of Our Lord, but Annas was still influential. He interrogated Our Lord and delivered Him bound to Caiphas and the Sanhedrin for trial (John, 28).—C.E.

Annates, first year's revenue of a benefice paid to the papal Curia; now paid on the occasion of appointments to dioceses not subject to Propagation.—C.E.

Anne (Heb., grace), Saint, traditional name of the wife of Joachim and mother of the Blessed Virgin. No records of her life are found outside of the apocryphal literature, the Gospel of Pseudo- Matthew and the Protoevangelium of James. From these we learn that Anne and Joachim had reached old age and still remained childless; their prayers were answered, an angel of the Lord announcing to Anne that the fruit of her womb would be blessed by all the world. The belief that Anne, in the conception and birth of Mary, remained a virgin was condemned by the Holy See, 1677. Devotion to her, popular from an early date in the East, began in the West at Douai and spread rapidly through the Church after 1584. There are shrines to her in many churches, and those at St. Anne d'Auray, Brittany, and St. Anne de Beaupré, Canada, are places of pilgrimage. Patroness of Brittany, France, Canada, housewives, women in labor, cabinet-makers, and miners. Emblem: a door. Feast, R. Cal., 26 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Anne of Denmark (1574-1619), Queen of James I of Great Britain, b. Skanderborg, Denmark. The daughter of Frederick II, King of Denmark, she married, 1589, James VI of Scotland (I of England). Her parents were Lutherans, but through companionship with a niece of Emperor Charles V she acquired a knowledge of and an affection for Catholicism. She was advised by the Scottish Catholic nobles to seek spiritual advice from Robert Burns, a Jesuit who received her into the Church, c. 1600. She proved the firmness of her Faith at the coronation, 1603, by refusing to receive the Protestant sacrament, declaring she preferred to forfeit her crown rather than take part in a sacrilegious profanation.—U.K.; Strickland, Lives of the Queens of England, Lond., 1851.

Annex-chapel, a special kind of chapel-of-ease.

Annihilation (Lat., annulare, to; nihil, nothing), the act of reducing to nothing. Annihilation is opposed to creation. As in creation the whole being is produced from nothing, so in annihilation the whole being is reduced to nothing. It is a tenet of the original Adventists, of the Catharists, and, as some believe, of the Buddhists. God alone can annihilate. There is nothing in theology or modern science to lead to the belief that anything will be annihilated.—U.K.; Joyce, Principles of Natural Theology, N. Y., 1923.

Annihilationism, school of thought which considers immortality itself to be a grace, and not the natural attribute of the soul; and that the finally impenitent will merely cease to exist.

Anniversary (Lat., anniversarius, returning with the year), a day celebrated yearly as it returns. The anniversary of the consecration of a bishop is celebrated in each diocese by a special Mass in the liturgy for this feast. The anniversary of the consecration (or dedication) of a church is celebrated by a special Mass and Office provided for this feast. The anniversary of the death of a person is celebrated annually and also on the third, seventh, and thirtieth day after the decease. There is a special Requiem Mass in the Roman Missal for the anniversary; it is customary also to offer other prayers and good works on this occasion. The anniversary of burial is sometimes commemorated instead of the day of death, with the same rites.—Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1918.

Annotinum Pascha (Lat., Easter), in the early Church, anniversary celebration for those who had been baptized the previous Easter.

Annuaire pontifical catholique, publication devoted to statistical information with regard to the Catholic Church, founded by Mgr. Albert Battandier, 1898, and published by Maison de la Bonne
The first twenty volumes cover the following topics: (1) the Roman Calendar, comprising the Latin and Oriental rites, causes of the Servants of God, reforms in the liturgy; (2) the Sovereign Pontiffs, comprising the family, birth, early life, and papal acts of the reigning pope and a list of popes with some biographical notes; (3) the Cardinals, comprising their sees, duties, and biographical notes; (4) the Episcopate, comprising the bishops, with their sees and biographical notes; (5) Missions, giving their scope, societies, and activities; (6) Religious Orders, comprising a general list of the Orders, with notes on each; (7) the Pontifical Court and prelates; (8) the Ecclesiastical Courts and Roman Congregations, comprising congregations, tribunals, offices, and commissions; (9) the Vicariate of Rome, comprising the Curia, parishes, cemeteries, hospitals, and population; (10) Miscellaneous, comprising information which is liturgical, theological, archeological, historical, statistical, bibliographical, and necrological. To the remaining volumes were added, from time to time, notes on the Church in different lands, new sees, a history of the Holy Year, notes on the popes in different centuries, a history of the Syrian Catholic Church, a general list of prelates, chapter-lains, and attaches to the pope, a list of all known titular sees, and, beginning in 1926, there is a general list of the cardinals of the first fourteen centuries which is continued in later volumes, etc. Its articles are valuable for historical as well as ecclesiastical information.—C.E.

Anoint (Lat., inunotio, besmearing), to touch any part of the body with oil. In Baptism it means the laying on of oil of catechumens, signifying a life of faith and good works, and oil of chrism, symbolizing union with Christ. It is also used in Extreme Unction and Holy Orders (qq.v.), and at the coronation of monarchs.—C.E.; Schuster, The Sacramentary, N. Y., 1924. (F. T. R.)

Ansgar (Ansgarius or Scharies), Saint, confessor (801-865), apostle of the North, b. Picardy, France; d. Bremen, Germany. A Benedictine monk at Corbie, he went as a missionary to Sweden and on his return was made first Abp. of Hamburg and papal legate of the northern nations. He revived the Abbey of Turholt in Flanders and established a school there. Winning the protection of King Eric I, of Sweden, he continued his missionary labors in Sweden and Denmark. A monumental cross has been erected in his honor on an island in Lake Malar, near Stockholm. The preface to his "Life of St. Willehad" is a masterpiece. Relics at Bremen, Hamburg, and Copenhagen. Feast, 3 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Ansegisus (Compendium), abbot (c. 770-c. 833). A Benedictine of Fontenelle, he was entrusted by Charlemagne and later Louis le Débonnaire with the reform and restoration of the monasteries of St. Sixtus, St. Memius, Flay, and Luxeuil. Becoming Abbot of Fontenelle he made this monastery famous for learning, discipline, and its library. He divided among various monasteries the riches he obtained from his diplomatic missions. His "Capitulars," or collection of the laws of Charlemagne, and Louis, are famous. Feast, 20 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Anselm (Compendium), Saint, confessor (1033-1109), Doctor of the Church, b. Aosta, Italy; d. Canterbury, England. He entered the monastery at Bec, studied under Lanfranc, and was made prior, 1063, and abbot, 1078. After the death of Lanfranc, Anselm succeeded him as Abp. of Canterbury, 1093. This see having been vacant for four years, the revenues had been seized by the state. Anselm devoted himself to abolishing this encroachment by the state and to reforming ecclesiastical circles, thus incurring the hostility of the king, against whose wishes he went to consult the pope on the question of investiture. Published by William, he was recalled by Henry I, but the quarrel was renewed and it was not until 1107 that settlement was made, resulting... in a victory for the Church. He influenced deeply Catholic philosophy and theology, his chief achievement in philosophy being the ontological argument for the existence of God, viz., that God exists in reality, because He is that than which nothing greater can be thought, and since to exist in reality is greater than to exist in the mind. He therefore has real existence. Feast, R. Cal., 21 April.—Rule, Life and Times of St. Anselm, Lond., 1883; C. E.; Butler.

Anselm of Lucca, Saint, bishop (c. 1036-86), called the Younger to distinguish him from his uncle, Pope Alexander II, b. Mantua, Italy; d. there. Made Bp. of Lucca by his uncle, he accepted lay investiture from Henry IV of Germany, and in remorse became a Benedictine. Gregory VII ordered him to return to his see, where he made many reforms. He wrote against lay investiture and the antipope Gilbert. Patron of Mantua. Because through his prayers was obtained the rout of the enemies of Gregory VII, he is represented before an army in confusion. Feast, 18 March.—C. E.; Butler.

Anthony, Thomas Chisholm (1816-73), lawyer and politician, b. London; d. Bombay, India. After his conversion he championed Catholic interests in Parliament, where he represented Youghal, Ireland. Later he became attorney-general of Hong Kong and was suspended on account of radical reforms he inaugurated. A judge at Bombay, he was forced to resign for denouncing commercial abuses in the Bengal government; later he practised law in Bombay with great success. He wrote pamphlets on legal and political subjects.—C. E.

Ant. = antiphon.

Antecedent Grace, an illumination of the intellect, or an inspiration of the will, due partially to the vital activities of these faculties, partly to Divine intervention in the mind's natural process. Both the illumination and inspiration transcend in intrinsic worth the natural good thoughts and desires of man, by reason of the dignifying influence of God's assisting activity in the eliciting of the thought or desire. The antecedence in question is relative to the subject's deliberation. Consequently antecedent grace is the gift of God, preceding, ennobling, and elevating man's mental actions.—Pohl-Freuss, Grace, St. L., 1921.

Antediluvians (Lat., ante, before; diluvium, flood), the people who lived before the time of the Flood.

Antependium (Lat., ante, before; pendere, hang), the curtain covering the altar, hanging from the table to the floor.

Anterus, Saint, Pope (233-256), b. probably Greece; d. Rome. Little is known of his pontificate of 42 days, except that he caused notaries to collect the Acts of the Martyrs, and had them deposited in the Roman archives, for which act he was probably martyred. His tomb, with his name in Greek, is in the papal crypt of the cemetery of Callistus. Feast, 3 Jan.—C. E.

Anthony, Saint, abbot (251-c. 356), founder of Christian monasticism, b. Coma, Egypt; d. Mt. Cotzin, near the Red Sea. At the age of twenty he divided his inheritance among the poor and retired to a cell in the mountains. Later he withdrew to Der el Memun, a mountain on the east bank of the Nile, and lived there in solitude for 20 years. About 305 he emerged to organize monastic life for the crowds who followed him. He again retired to the desert lying between the Nile and the Red Sea, and lived there for 45 years on the mountain where stands the monastery named for him, Der Mar Antonios. During this time he made two visits to Alexandria: in 311 to strengthen the Christian martyrs in persecution, and in 350 to preach against the Arians. Patron of Hospitalers, domestic animals, butchers, brush-makers, basket-makers, grave-diggers, and graveyards. Invoked against pestilence, epilepsy, erysipelas, and skin-diseases. Emblems: tau-shaped cross (St. Anthony's cross), small bell, hermit, pig, book. Relics near Vienne. Feast, R. Cal., 17 Jan.—St. Athanasius, St. Anthony the Hermit, N. Y., 1924; C. E.; Butler.

Anthony, Sister (Mary O'Connell; 1815-97), nurse, b. Limerick, Ireland; d. Columbusville, O. She became a Sister of Charity in 1835, and during the Civil War in America was called "Ministering Angel of the Army of the Tennessee." The Hospital of the Good Samaritan, Cincinnati, was a gift to Sister Anthony from some Protestant business men of that city; she was in charge, 1865-82.

Anthony Daniel, Blessed (1601-48), b. Dieppe, France; d. near Ontario, Canada. Having joined the Society of Jesus in 1621, he arrived in Canada, 1632, and was stationed at Cape Breton. He was sent to the Huron mission, Iohnatiria (1634-48), where he was slain in the Iroquois attack and his body was thrown into the burning chapel in which he had just celebrated Mass.—C. E., IV, 621; Wynne, Jesuit Martyrs of North America, N. Y., 1925.

Anthony of Padua, Saint, confessor (1195-1231), b. Lisbon, Portugal; d. Vercelli, Italy. Educated at the cathedral school, he joined the Canons Regular of St. Augustine in 1210; in 1212 he retired to the Convent of Santa Croce where he remained for eight years in study and prayer. He became a member of the Order of Friars Minor; set sail for missionary work in Africa, but was shipwrecked off the coast of Italy; and retired to the hermitage of Montepaolo to celebrate Mass for the lay brothers. He later won a reputation as a preacher and teacher of theology and received the praise of St. Francis; made numerous converts and performed many miracles; and was made provincial of the monastery at Limousin, France, 1226. Devotion to him is popular throughout the Church. Aims given to obtain his intercession is known as "St. Anthony's bread." Patron of sailors, of pregnant women, and of travelers; invoked for recovery of lost things and against shipwreck. Em-

Anthony's Fire, SAINT, a form of erysipelas. Miraculous cures having been brought about by the intercession of St. Anthony, whence the name, the Order of Canons Regular of St. Anthony was founded, 1090, for the relief of those afflicted with this disease.

Anthony Zaccaria, SAINT, confessor (1502-39), founder of the Barnabites, b. Cremona, Italy; d. there. He studied theology and medicine and received Holy Orders, 1528. He worked among the poor at Milan, and established the Confraternity of Eternal Wisdom and the congregation of secular clergy to relieve the conditions in northern Italy. Canonized, 1897. Feast, R. Cal., 5 July.—C.E.

Anthropology (Gr., anthropos, man; logos, science of), strictly speaking, should embrace the study of all that constitutes a human being, body and soul, social relations, past history and development, but its meaning is restricted to the study of the physical or bodily characteristics of a human being only, measurements, anatomy, etc., of the body, shape of head, jaw, hand, color of skin, eyes, hair, characteristics of speech. Too often the term is confused with ethnology which properly considers the racial and social traits of man and data for the comparative study of religions. The conclusions to which anthropologists have so far arrived are not of great importance, nor are they well established.—C.E., XII, 620.

Anthropomorphism (Gr., anthropos, man; morphe, form), representation or conception of the Deity under a human form or with human attributes and subject to human vices and passions. This was very common among the pagans of Greece and Rome. In the 4th century, some few Christians in Syria and Scythia, under the leadership of Audoous, interpreted certain texts of Genesis literally, held that God had a human form; they were called Anthropomorphites. That the numerous anthropomorphic expressions in the Bible are to be understood metaphorically, is evident from the emphatic teaching of the Scriptures that God is an infinitely perfect spiritual being.—C.E.; E.K. (u. v. w.)

Anti- (Lat., against, opposed to), prefix in common use designating opposition or counteraction, as in anti-Catholic, and anti-Christian, anti-Trinitarian.

ANTIBES LEGION, troops organized at Antibes, France, by Napoleon III, and placed at the disposal of Pope Pius IX in 1866, for the defense of Rome against the Italian government.

Antichrist, in general, any person, idea, or organization opposed to Christ and His Church; in particular, a signal enemy of Christ who is to appear before the Last Judgment and seduce many before his destruction by Christ. Daniel, 7, speaks of him as the "man of sin." Some see allusions to him in the "False Christs," the "abomination of desolation," and "the one who shall come in his own name" of the Gospel. St. Paul in 2 Thessalonians, 2, quite fully describes him and his destiny. In his first two epistles St. John speaks of several Antichrists, but more especially of one par excellence.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, Eschatology, St. L., 1892.

Anticipate (Lat., ante, before; capio, take), to read the Divine Office, in private but not in choir, before the time usually assigned for it; e.g., to read Matins, which should be read before Mass, on the evening before, i.e., after 2 p.m., and Vespers in Lent an hour before noon instead of afternoon.

Antidomiamariientes (Gr., antidomians, opponents; Marian, Mary), name given by Epiphanius, about the end of the 4th century, to adversaries of the Divine maternity and of the perpetual virginity of Mary.—C.E.

Antidoron (Gr., anti, instead of; doron, a gift), in the Greek Rite, remains of loaves from which portions have been cut for Consecration, distributed after Mass for consumption by the faithful.—C.E.; O'Brien, History of the Mass, N. Y., 1882.

Antigonish, DioceSe OF, Canada, comprises An­tigonish, Cape Breton, Guysborough, Inverness, Pictou, Richmond, and Victoria counties, in Nova Scotia; transferred from Arichat in 1886; suffragan of Halifax. Early missionaries: Fr. Angus MacEachern; Abbe Lejamtel; Frs. Alexander MacDonell, William Chisholm, Colin Grant, James Grant; Fr. Vincent, founder of former Trappist monastery at Tracadie. Bishops: William Fraser (1844-51); Colin MacKinnon (1852-77); John Cameron (1877-1910); James Morrison (1912). Churches, 115; priests, 114; religious women, 611; university, 1; high schools, 30; primary schools, 28; institutions, 8; Catholics, 83,847.

Antigua, island of the Leeward Group, British West Indies, administered by a nominated executive council and a legislative council; area, 108 sq. m.; est. pop., 29,470. Ecclesiastically Antigua belongs to the Diocese of Roseau (q.v.) in the Island of Dominions, B.W.I. It has 1 church, 1 priest, and 400 Catholics.

Antimasons, members of a political party in the United States (1827-35) formed to combat the Freemasons, under the belief that legislatures, judges, juries, and newspapers were under their influence. The party originated in N. Y. State under Thurlow Weed, W. H. Seward, and others, following upon the mysterious disappearance in 1826 of William Morgan of Batavia, N. Y., a Mason who had threatened to divulge the secrets of the order. The party nominated Gen. William Wirt for president in 1832, and he received seven votes in the Electoral College. In 1875 the party was revived as the "American Party."—Annual Report of the American Historical Society, 1902; U.K.

Antimensum (Gr., anti, instead of; Lat., mensa, table), consecrated corporal of silk or linen containing relics of saints, which is spread on the altar of Greek churches for the celebration of Mass.—C.E.; O'Brien, History of the Mass, N. Y., 1882.

Antinomianism. See ANTINOMY.

Antinomies (Gr., anti, against; nomos, law). In his classic analysis of the historical significance of the Catholic Church, Charles Stanton Devas enumerates and explains away ten of its apparent contradictions or inconsistencies:
The Church appears in opposition to intellectual civilisation and yet to foster it; appears in opposition to material civilisation and yet to foster it; represents a religion of sorrow and yet of gladness; teaches a morality which is austere and yet joyful. The deduction is logical, but Luther repudiated it and preached earnestly against it.

The law. The deduction is logical, but Luther repudiated it and preached earnestly against it. Though often acted upon by some extremists in good, or works, argued Agricola, do not help to salvation so evil ones do not hinder it and therefrom the opposition and the support of the State: its rival and yet its ally. The deduction is logical, but Luther repudiated it and preached earnestly against it.

Liturgy of St. James became the rite of the whole patriarchate, i.e., all western Syria. In its oldest form, the Liturgy of St. James is Greek, but was translated into Syriac. The Greek St. James is now used but twice a year by the Orthodox. The Syriac version is used by the Jacobites in Syria and Palestine, and by the Syrian Uniates. For another form see MARONITE RITE.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914.

Anti-pedobaptists (Gr., ἀντί, against; παις, child), those who object to infant baptism; sometimes applied to the Baptist sect, in America and elsewhere.

Antipas, SAINT, martyr (92), d. Pergamum. In the reign of Domitian he was Bp. of Pergamum, where he suffered martyrdom. In the Apocalypse he is called a "faithful witness" of Jesus Christ, Feast, Nov. 11.

Antipasch. Low Sunday in the eclesiastical year of the Greek Orthodox Church.

Antiphon (Gr., ἀντί, against; φωνή, voice: singing opposite, alternate chanting). (1) A psalm or hymn sung in alternate chant by two choirs or by choir opposite, alternate chanting). A form of chant introduced in the West about the 4th century gradually displaced the responsorial form. (2) A short verse or sentence sung before and after a psalm or canticle to determine its musical mode and to provide the key to its liturgical or mystical meaning. Antiphons are of three kinds: psalterial, from the psalm with the antiphon; historical, from the mystery or festival; mixed, from the psalm and feast. (3) An anthem.

To double antiphon is to recite the entire antiphon both before and after the psalm. To announce antiphon is to recite the antiphon before the psalm, only as far as the asterisk.—C.E. (J. G. K.)

Antiphonary, liturgical book for use in the choir, containing music and texts of all sung portions of the Roman Breviary. The Gregorian Antiphonary, attributed to Pope Gregory I, is an official codification of the collection of antiphons occurring in Divine Office.

Antipodes (Gr., ἀντί, against; πόδα, foot), term designating the position of human beings on the other side of the earth "with their feet against ours" when the earth was supposed to be flat. Churchmen like Augustine were interested in the question only because it cast doubt on the unity of the human race. The apostle of Germany, Boniface, imputed this among other erroneous opinions to Vergilius, a missionary in Bavaria. Pope St. Zachary bade Boniface to bring him to trial for his perverse teachings. There is no evidence that he was ever tried or condemned. On the contrary, he became Abp. of Salzburg and is revered as a saint. He must have made it clear that he did not believe in a race of human beings not sprung from Adam.—C.E. (ed.)

Antipope, a false claimant to the Holy See in opposition to a pontiff canonically elected. The following is a list of the 37 antipopes, whose histories will be found under their respective names: Aleric; Amadeus VIII, Duke of Savoy; Anastasius Bibliothecarius; Benedict XIV; Boccadiforca, Teobaldo; Cadalodis, Peter; Conti, Gregorio; Cossa, Baldas-sare; Dioecerus; Eulalius; Franco, Boniface; Frangipani, Landolfo; Felix II; Gregory VI; Guibert of Ravenna; Guido of Crema; Hippolytus; John; John, Abbot of Struna; John, Bp. of Sabina; Laurentius; Luca, Pedro de; Maginiul; Maurice; Aby, of Braga; Minicius, John; Muhoz, Gil Sanchez; Novatian; Octavian; Pecahel; Philagathus, John; Philip; Pierleone, Pietro; Rainalduccel, Pietro; Robert of Geneva; Theodore; Theodoric; Tiberius; Ursicinus.—C.E.; U.K.

Anti-Semitism, the agitation in European countries to oppose the commercial, political, and financial interests of the Jews.

Antitrinitarians, those who deny the Trinity of Persons in the Godhead; in early days, the Sabellians, Macedonians, and Arians; in later times Protestant bodies such as the Socinians and Unitarians.—Pohle-Preuss, The Divine Trinity, St. L., 1922.

Antitype (Gr., anti, corresponding to; types, types, same one or something prefurred or typified by biblical persons, or objects, or events. Adam, Noe, Moses, David are some of the O.T. types of Christ. He is their antitype.

Antonelli, Giovanni (1806-76), cardinal, secretary of state to Pius IX, b. Sonnino, Italy; d. Rome. He held various offices under Gregory XVI. and became cardinal, minister of finance, apostolic prefect of the sacred palaces under Pius IX. He arranged the flight of the pope to Gaeta, where he was made secretary of state, and returned to Rome with the pope, 1850. Until 1870 he was practically the temporal ruler of Rome, and vigorously defended the rights of the Holy See. He has been much praised and severely criticized; he was a statesman rather than a churchman, never having been ordained priest, although zealous in his religious duties.—C.E.

Antonians, popular name for the members of various orders under the patronage of St. Anthony or professing to follow his rule. The original society was founded in the 4th century by St. Anthony. Types are now four important orders so known: Maronite Congregation of Aleppo, or Aleppoines, founded in 695, having in 1910, 10 convents, 8 hospices, 75 priests, and 45 lay brothers; Maronites of the Baladite Congregation, founded in 1695, having in 1910, 31 convents, 27 hospices, 400 priests, and 300 lay brothers; Maronites of the Congregation of St. Matthias, founded in 1700, having in 1925, 22 convents, 9 residences, 20 parishes, 12 hospices, 15 schools, 150 priests, and 100 lay brothers; Chaldean Antonians of the Congregation of St. Hormisdas, founded in 1808 by Gabriel Dembo, and having 3 convents and 70 religious, of whom 20 are priests.—C.E., I, 555.

Antoninus, Saint, confessor (1289-1450), Abp. of Florence, b. Florence; d. there. In 1403 he entered the Dominican Order and was a zealous promoter of the reforms of Bl. John Dominic. He was made vicar of the convent of Foligno, 1414, and governed several other convents until in 1446 he was raised to the archiepiscopal see of Florence. Among his writings are a valuable work on moral theology and a history of the world. He was among the first to attempt to adapt economic traditions to modern developments. Emblems: scales, Ily. Canonized, 1523. Feast, R. Cal., 10 May.—C.E.

Antonius of Pamiers, Saint, apostle of the Rouergue (1st century), b. Frebelacum (later Palmiers). Having embraced Christianity he visited Rome, was ordained, and returned to Gaul to preach the Gospel in Aquitania, and especially on the frontier of the Rouergue where he is credited with many miracles. Relics at Pamiers and Palencia. Feast, 2 Sept.

Antre deserti, teneris sub annis, or Thou, in thy childhood, to the desert caverns, hymn for Matins on 24 June, feast of St. John the Baptist.

Antwerp, city, Belgium, on the Scheldt, 60 m. from the sea. In the 10th and 11th centuries, capital of the Margravate of Antwerp, it rose to the height of its prosperity in the 16th century under Charles V, at whose death it fell to Austria. France held it from 1794 to 1815, and Holland, from 1815 to the foundation of the new Kingdom of Belgium in 1830. As an intellectual center it was the home of Plantin, Lipsius, Ortelius, Mercator, and De Backer, the Jesuit biographer. As an art center, it encouraged Metsys, Rubens, Van Dyck, Jordaens, Teniers, and Leys. It also sheltered the English religious orders who fled persecution in England. The cathedral, built 1534-1530, is cruciform, with triple aisles and an ambulatory, has a tower 400 ft. high, and contains Ruben's "Descent from the Cross." Other churches are St. Charles Borromeo, St. Jacques, and St. Paul. Antwerp was the seat of a diocese from 1550 to 1801, suffragan of Mechlin.—C.E.

Antwerp Bible, a great polyglot Bible in six volumes, the "Biblia Regia," published at Antwerp, 1569-73, by the Plantin press at the expense of Christopher Plantin.

Anvil, emblem in art associated with St. Eligius, goldsmith and metal-worker.

A.P.A. See American Protective Association.

Apelles, Saint, martyr, Bp. of Smyrna. Paul greeted him as "approved in Christ" (Rom., 16).

Ape-men, apes resembling man and therefore considered by evolutionists as beings midway between ape and man, the link between man and ape. They claim to have found in the last few decades several specimens of real ape-men. There are apes resembling man in anatomical structure and physiological functions; they are known in zoology as anthropoids (Gr. anthropos, man; eidos, like) and include the gorilla, chimpanzee, and orang-outang. Yet man is essentially different from them all, for he is rational; and no matter how defective, or even deranged, a human being may be, he is never essentially irrational as the animal is. As regards the alleged specimens of real ape-men, it is well to distinguish two classes. The first are the rather extensive finds of races hitherto unsuspected, such as the Neanderthal and the Cro-Magnon race. Judged by their mode of burial, these must be classed as men, though perhaps of a race now extinct. The second are bold reconstructions from a few parts of a skeleton, e.g., the famous Java man, or pithecanthropus erectus (ereat ape-man), determined from the top part of a skull, a thigh bone, and two molar teeth (which may not have belonged to the same individual), and the Heidelberg man built up from a jaw. There is no authority, however, for the accuracy of these reconstructions. In spite of resemblances in anatomical structure, man is essentially different from the ape, and to the unprejudiced student it would seem that the wish is father to the thought; that the evolutionists find ape-men because they are necessary to sustain the evolutionary theory.—Devivier, ed. Messmer, Christian Apologetics, N. Y., 1903.

Apriarius of Sicca, priest of the Roman Province of Africa, whose appeal to Rome from his bishop’s sentence of excommunication for misconduct (c. 418) led to a dispute between the African Church and the popes about the regulation of local discipline. This case has been much of by opponents of papal supremacy; it was merely an expression of the desire of African bishops to retain privileges they had been allowed to assume during periods of persecution.—C.E.

Apocalypse, the book placed last in the Bible.
The author, named John in 1, 1, and 22, 8, tradition has gotten of the Ap: Apocalypse was written either during the persecution of Nero (54-68) or of Domitian (90-94), during St. John’s exile at Patmos, to encourage the persecuted Christians by foretelling the fall of Rome as an anti-Christian power and the trials but complete victory of the Church. The work is prophetic, dealing with the future, rather than with the present, not without many references to events of St. John’s own time. He pictures various phases of the Church’s conflict with the world by means of diff erent symbolical visions. The book is very difficult of interpretation; at each new crisis its prophecies seem fulfilled, the end seems at hand and yet it does not come. Its message seems to be: “Watch, for ye know not what hour the day nor the hour.” The introduction (1, 1, to 3, 22) gives the title and description of the book and, after a prefatory salutation, seven Epistles to various Churches of Asia Minor, commending those who are faithful, reproving and warning the lukewarm and the sinful. Chapters 4, 1, to 11, 10, contain a description of the judgment and destruction of Jerusalem. Chapters 12, 1, to 19, 10, describe the struggle between the Church and the world, ending in the destruction of Babylon. In chapters 19, 11, to 22, 5, are related the final triumph of the Word of God and the glory of the New Jerusalem. The epilogue (22, verses 6-21) insisting on the credibility of the Apocalypse and the quick fulfillment of its prophecies. The Apocalypse takes us to the very court of heaven picturing for us God in all His Majesty, surrounded by angels who do His bidding in heaven and on earth, and Christ, the Lamb of God, slain for man’s Redemption but now surrounded by the elect who have kept His word.
Satan, too, the great dragon, appears as the Church’s chief enemy, but is finally conquered, bound, and cast into a pool of fire.—C.E.; Gigot.

iii, N. Y., 1915; Blaeu, Les Visions de Saint Jean, Paris, 1924.

(N. g.)

Apocalyptic Number, the mystical number, 666, in the Apocalypse. The Greek letters of the word Latinos (i.e., pagan Rome) are also numerals which, added together, amount to this number.
There are other interpretations, e.g., Antichrist.

Apocatastasis (Gr., apo, from; kata, down; histemi, stand), the doctrine of the final salvation of all mankind; a restoration.

Apocrees, in the Greek Rite corresponds to Sexagesima Sunday; the last day on which meat may be eaten before Lent.

Apocrypha (Gr., apokryphos, hidden), originally writings that claimed a sacred origin and were supposed to have been hidden for generations;
later, a well-defined class of literature with scriptural or quasi-scriptural pretensions, but lacking genuineness and canonicity, which were composed during the two centuries before Christ and the early centuries of our era. Protestants apply the term improperly to denote also O.T. books, not contained in the Jewish canon, but received by Catholics under the name of deuterocanonical.
The following is a list of the Apocrypha:

Apocrypha of Jewish Origin.—Jewish Apocryphal Gospels of Catholic Origin: Protevangelium Jacobi, or Infancy Gospel of James, describing the birth, education, and marriage of the Blessed Virgin; Gospel of the Pseudo-Matthew; Gospel of the Pseudo-Marcion; Apostle of Peter; Acts of John;
Acts of James; Acts of Philip; Acts of Simon; Acts of Andrew; Acts of Bartholomew; Gospel of the Pseudo-John, or Infancy Gospel of James, describing the death and assumption of the Blessed Virgin.

Apocrypha of Christian Origin.—Before we consider the canon meaning, we must examine books which are not contained in the Catholic Bible but which were supposed to have been hidden for generations; later, a well-defined class of literature with scriptural or quasi-scriptural pretensions, but lacking genuineness and canonicity, which were composed during the two centuries before Christ and the early centuries of our era. Protestants apply the term improperly to denote also O.T. books, not contained in the Jewish canon, but received by Catholics under the name of deuterocanonical. The work is prophetic, dealing with the future, rather than with the present, not without many references to events of St. John’s own time. Westminster Version of the Sacred Scriptures, IV, Apostles (Gr., apostasis, a standing-off), a total defection from the Christian religion, after previous acceptance through faith and baptism. Refusal to accept a particular tenet of the faith is properly called heresy. Apostasy may be merely interior, or exteriorly manifested as well. It may be formal (with full consciousness of the obligation to remain in the faith), or material (without such consciousness). Exterior formal apostasy involves excommunication, reserved in a special manner to the Holy See (can. 2314). Apostasy from religious life is the unauthorized departure from a religious house of an inmate under perpetual vows, with the intention of not returning; or, if the departure be legitimate, a subsequent refusal to return in order thus to withdraw from the obligations of religious obedience (can. 644). Such apostates incur excommunication (can. 2986).—C.E.; F.C. Augustin.

Apostle (in liturgy), name given, in the Greek Church, to the Epistle of the Mass, which is invariably of Apostolic origin and never taken from the Old Testament, and also to the book containing the epistles and antiphons for every Sunday and feast-day.—C.E.

Apoldeipnon (Gr., the after-supper service), the last part of the Greek Divine Office, corresponding to the Latin Compline.

Apodosis (Gr., apo, back; didomi, give), the last day on which prayers in commemoration of a feast are said in the Greek Church.—C.E.

Apollinarism, heresy begun by Apollinaris the Younger, Bp. of Laodicea, c. 376, teaching that Christ had a human sensitive soul, but had no human rational mind, the place of which was taken by Divine Logos. It was condemned by Roman Councils, 377 and 381, and the Council of Constantinople, 381. The sect persisted about 416, some members returning to the Church, while the rest became Monophysites, believing that Christ had only a divine, but no human, will.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, Christology, St. L., 1922.

Apollinaris, Saint, martyr (c. 79), first Bp. of Ravenna, b. probably Antioch; d. Ravenna, Italy. According to his Acts he was a disciple of St. Peter, by whom he was raised to the See of Ravenna. He suffered almost constant persecution, but persisted in preaching. Banished from Ravenna with the other Christians, by a decree of Vespasian, he was discovered while passing through the gates, tormented, and put to death. Emblem: sword. Relics at Ravenna. Feast, R. Cal., 23 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Apollinaris Claudius, Saint (2nd century), Bp. of Hierapolis, Phrygia. He wrote against heretics. His eloquent “Apologia” (c. 177) for Christians was addressed to Marcus Aurelius. Feast, 8 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Apollo (1st century), learned Jew, b. Alexandria. He was renowned for his knowledge of the Scriptures. Although imperfectly instructed in Christian doctrine, he was teaching at Ephesus, when Aquila and Priscilla (q.v.) brought about his complete conversion and baptism. A friend of St. Paul, he preached the Gospel in Corinth with great success (Acts, 18).

Apollonia, Saint, virgin, martyr (c. 249), deaconess, d. Alexandria. She was seized by the insurgent heathen populace who tortured her by knocking out her teeth. A pile of faggots was prepared to burn her and the other martyrs, but, threatened with death, Apollonia chose to embrace it voluntarily and sprung into the fire. Invoked against toothache and diseases of the teeth. Emblems: tooth, pincers. Feast, R. Cal., 9 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Apologetics (Gr., apologia, apology, defense), the theological science which aims at explaining and justifying religious doctrine in order to show its reasonableness in answer to objections of those who deny the reasonableness of any religion, especially of a revealed religion, such as Christianity, and more particularly the reasonable grounds of the Catholic religion. Since the name of apologetics has not the same significance in English as the Greek word from which it is derived, theologians today prefer to call the science fundamental theology, which explains the grounds of religion, revelation, Christianity, and Catholicity. See FUNDAMENTAL THEOLOGY.—C.E.; U.K.; Walsh, Catholic Apologetics, Lond., 1926.

Apologetia, a defense or vindication, such as Plato’s “Apology” of Socrates, “Apology” of Thomas More, Newman’s “Apologia Pro Vita Sua” (Vindication of His Own Life).

Apologetist, Christian, one who writes or speaks in defense of Christian beliefs and practices. Some of the Fathers of the Church in the 2nd and 3rd centuries, e.g., St. Justin, St. Irenaeus, are called by that name because it devolved upon them to defend the Church against her first enemies within and without the fold. (L. A. A.)

Apolusia, in Eastern rites, washing of catechumens in church, eight days before Baptism. They are also given white garments, which they must wear until baptized.

Apology (Gr., dismissal), the blessing by the Greek priest at the end of Mass, Matins, or Vespers.—C.E.

Apolychiton (Gr., dismissed), a dismissal prayer or hymn said or sung at the end of the Greek Mass, and during Matins and Vespers.—C.E.

Apostles (Gr., apostasis, a standing-off), a total defection from the Christian religion, after previous acceptance through faith and baptism. Refusal to accept a particular tenet of the faith is properly called heresy. Apostasy may be merely interior, or exteriorly manifested as well. Apostle (in liturgy), name given, in the Greek Church, to the Epistle of the Mass, which is invariably of Apostolic origin and never taken from the Old Testament, and also to the book containing the epistles and antiphons for every Sunday and feast-day.—C.E.
APOSTLES 56 APOSTLES

those first selected by Christ. They are distinguished from the other disciples by the general power of jurisdiction and teaching. Their names are as follows (Matt., 10; Mark, 3; Luke, 6): Simon Peter, Andrew, James the Greater, John, Philip, James the Less, Thomas, Bartholomew, Matthew, Matthias (elected in place of Judas), Thaddeus or Jude, Simon. Though not one of the twelve Apostles, St. Paul is numbered as an Apostle of the first rank. The name is also given to St. Barnabas.
—C.E.

(Apostles' Creed, a formula of belief which contains the statements or "articles" the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, and whose authorship tradition ascribes to the Apostles. It is not certain whether the Apostles themselves actually composed it. In substance, however, it may be attributed to them, for all its elements are found in the N.T. At a very early date the Western Church required catechumens to learn and recite it before admitting them to Baptism.—C.E.; Mac-Donald, The Apostles' Creed, St. L., 1925. (P.K.)

Apostles of Prayer, a pious association, otherwise known as a league of prayer in union with the Heart of Jesus, founded at Vals, France, by Francis Gautrelet, 1844. It owes its popularity to Henry Ramiere, S.J., who adapted its organization for various Catholic institutions, 1861. Its object is to promote the practise of prayer for the mutual intentions of the members, in union with the intercession of Christ in heaven. Three practices constitute three degrees of membership: first, a daily offering of one's prayers, good works, and sufferings; second, daily recitation of a decade of rosary intentions of the members, in union with the special intentions of the Holy Father; and third, reception of Holy Communion with the motive of reparation, monthly or weekly. The general of the Society of Jesus is its moderator-general.
The "Messenger of the Sacred Heart" is a magazine edited monthly by this association. Among 75 nations there are 1,500,000 subscribers. In 1929 circulation was: U.S., 340,122; England, 27,- 000; Ireland, 255,000; Canada, 37,500; Australia, 52,000. It is published in 38 languages: English, French, Spanish, German, Italian, Hungarian, Portuguese, Danish, Finnish, Flemish, Dutch, Polish, Greek, Rumanian, Lithuanian, Czech, Albanian, Catalan, Breton, Basque, Irish,

Apostles of Erin, THE TWELVE, Irish saints of the 6th century, who studied at the school of Clonard, Meath; although not apostles, strictly speaking, they were so called by ancient Irish writers. They are said to have been: Ciaran of Sai-ghir (Seir-Kieran), Ciaran of Clonmacnoise, Brendan of Birr, Brendan of Clonfert, Columba of Tirida-glasl (Terryglass), Ruadhan of Lorrha, Senan of Iniscaith (Scattery Island), Columba of Iona, Mofft of Glasnevin, Ninmhid the Saintly of Loch Erne, Lassianer mac Nadraeche, and Canice of Ag-haboe.—C.E.

APOSTLES

Apostle Spoons, any set of 13 spoons, usually of silver, with figures of Our Lord and the Apostles on the handle ends. They were favorite baptismal gifts in the 15th and 16th centuries. The place of Judas Iscariot was supplied sometimes by Paul, more often by Matthias.—C.E.

Apostolicæ Sedis Gratia (By the Favor of the Apostolic See), title used by bishops in formal documents, since the 12th century.

Apostolic Camera, once the central board of finance in the papal administration; the officers are now quasi-honorary.—C.E.

Apostolic Churches, term used from the 2nd to the 4th century to signify the Churches founded or ruled by an Apostle; e.g., Alexandria, by St. Mark. Later “Apostolic church” was used frequently to mean the whole Church, especially in connection with the expression, Catholic Church.—C.E.

Apostolic Church Ordinance, 3rd-century pseudo-Apostolic collection of moral and hierarchical rules and instructions, which served as a law-code for the Egyptian, Ethiopian, and Arabian Churches, rivaling the Didache, under which name it often went.—C.E.

Apostolic Constitutions, a 4th-century collection of independent treatises on Christian discipline, worship, and doctrine, wrongly purporting to be instructions of the Apostles compiled by Clement of Rome.—C.E.

Apostolic Dataria, an office of the Roman Curia, which looks into the fitness of candidates for nonconsistorial benefices reserved to the Holy See; composes and expedites the Apostolic letters for the conferring of such benefices; grants exemption from conditions required in conferring a benefice, the collation of which does not pertain to the Ordinary; attends to pensions and burdens imposed by the supreme pontiff when conferring the aforementioned benefices. The dataria is presided over by the cardinal-datatype. He is assisted by a subdatatype, or regent, and several subordinate officials and consultors. This office dates back to the 13th century. It used to grant besides concessions pertaining to benefices other graces of the external forum, such as matrimonial dispensations. Leo XIII gave it a more modern form and Pius X reorganized it completely. The Code of Canon Law outlines its functions as noted above.—P.C. Augustine; Woywod. (H. L. M.)

Apostolic Delegate, a papal representative who in the territory assigned to him has the power and duty of watching over the status of the Church and of keeping the Roman pontiff informed regarding the same. Besides this ordinary power he has faculties that are delegated to him by the Holy See. In countries that have established relations with the Holy See the papal representatives have also a diplomatic character because of their office concerning the relations between the Church and the respective state or states. In countries that have no established relations with the Holy See the representatives of the pope have a purely ecclesiastical character. To this latter class belongs the Apostolic delegate. The prescribed exercise of the delegate's office does not interfere with the jurisdiction of the local Ordinaries, because the powers and duties of both offices flow from the properly constituted government of the Church. The function of vigilance in its regular course brings about a strengthening of the general condition of the Church throughout all ecclesiastical units of the delegate's territory, and thus confirms, unifies, and facilitates the labors of the Ordinaries. The delegate takes precedence in honor over all Ordinary of his territory who are not cardinals. He likewise enjoys several other concessions of an honorary nature. The Apostolic delegation is not a tribunal of justice, but the delegate may decide conflicts in competence, as specified by church law (can. 1612, 2). The Roman pontiff's right to send representatives to any part of the world flows from the constitution of the Church, i.e., from the papal primacy of jurisdiction. Since the pope himself cannot personally fulfill the office of vigilance over the condition of the Church in the various countries of the globe, it is logical that he should have representatives who perform this duty for him and forward to him the necessary information. Hence we find the exercise of this right contemporary with the freedom and spread of Christianity. As early as the 4th century the Holy See had a permanent representative in Illyricum. In the 5th century the Vicariate of Arles was constituted as the territory of the pope's representative in Gaul. Throughout the centuries the exercise of papal representation kept pace with the spread of the Gospel into new territories.—P.C. Augustine; Woywod. (H. L. M.)

Apostolic Indulgences, those which the Roman pontiff attaches to pious articles, such as crucifixes, rosaries, and medals, when he, or one authorized by him, blesses them. Painted or printed pictures, and crosses and crucifixes, etc., made of pewter, iron, lead, or fragile material, are excluded. The blessed article must be carried on one's person, if possible, otherwise kept in a suitable place, and the prescribed prayers recited.—C.E.; Beringer, Les Indulgences, Paris, 1905. (A. C.)

Apostolicity, one of the marks by which the Church founds the Church of Christ on His Apostles and can always be recognized among the large number of dissident creeds. It implies Apostolicity of mission, that is, Christ's Church is a moral body, possessing the mission entrusted by Him to His Apostles of baptizing and teaching all men in His name and transmitted through them and their lawful successors in the episcopacy in an unbroken chain to their present representatives. His Church being infallible, there is also implied Apostolicity of doctrine, which means that the deposit of faith entrusted to the Apostles has been preserved intact.—C.E.; Gibbons, Faith of Our Fathers, N. Y., 1917.

Apostolic King, hereditary title borne by the kings of Hungary, St. Stephen (c. 975-1038) is supposed to have received it from Pope Sylvester II. It was first used by Emperor Leopold I (1657-1705) as King of Hungary.

Apostolic Letters, broadly speaking, all documents issued by the Holy See. Before Pius X these were divided into bulls and briefs. Now the term is restricted to documents in brief form used for lesser appointments and for erecting and dividing mission territory, designating basilicas, and approving religious congregations. (J. B.)

Apostolic Mission House, a Catholic missionary union, affiliated with the Catholic University of Washington, founded 1902, under the management of the Paulists. Its object is to prepare priests for giving missions in city and rural parishes; students, 29.

Apostolic Schools, name given to institutions founded as preparatory schools for boys or young men of insufficient means, who desire to enter a missionary order, or to join the secular clergy with the intention of laboring in a mission field. The first of these schools was established by Fr. Alberic de Foresta, S.J., in 1885, at Avignon, France. The pupils were admitted at twelve years of age, or later, and studied the classics, modern languages, and mathematics, so as to be ready for the novitiate of an order, or for later courses in a seminary. They were supported by the contributions of the faithful, augmented by voluntary offerings from their parents. Within a decade there were schools at Amiens, Poitiers, and Bordeaux in France, and in Italy, and Turnhout in Belgium. Nearly all the religious orders have followed the Jesuits in establishing such institutions. There are well-known apostolic schools at: Mungret, Ireland, under the Jesuits; Wernhoutsburg, Holland, under the Vincentians; Tourmal, Belgium, under the Salesians; and Freshfield, England, under the Missionaries of St. Joseph's, Mill Hill. Among these schools in the United States are those at Cornwells, under the Fathers of the Holy Ghost; Perryville, Mo., under the Congregation of the Mission; South Langhorne, Pa., under the Society of Mary; and San Antonio, Tex., under the Oblates of Mary.—C.E., XIII, 585.

Apostolic See, the seat or diocese of the pope because only he personally has the right from the Apostles to convert the whole world. From the earliest Christian centuries Rome was called the Apostolic see. A see founded or governed by an Apostle was called an Apostolic see, e.g., Alexandria, founded by St. Mark.—C.E. (j. B.)

Apostolic Signatura (Lat., signare, to sign), or tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura, a tribunal of the Roman Curia, which exercises ordinary jurisdiction in matters referring to: (a) violation of secrecy by the auditors of the Sacred Rota, and damages inflicted by said auditors in consequence of their placing an invalid or unjust act; (b) exception of suspicion against an auditor of the Sacred Rota; (c) complaints of nullity against a rotal sentence; (d) petition of restitution in integrum against a rotal sentence that has passed into a res judicata; (e) recourses against rotal sentences in matrimonial causes which the Sacred Rota refuses to submit to a new investigation; (f) conflict of competence between certain inferior tribunals. It exercises delegated jurisdiction regarding petitions to the Holy Father for the introduction of certain causes before the Sacred Rota. The sentences of the Signatura have full force even if they do not contain the reasons in fact and in law. The Signatura is composed of several cardinals, one of whom acts as prefect, or presiding official. The method of procedure is determined by the Code of Canon Law and by certain rules established for this tribunal. The history of this institution dates back to the 13th century. Originally a double Signatura, it was divided in 1492 into two distinct Signaturas, one of grace, and one of justice. Pius X suppressed both and created the Apostolic Signatura in its present form.—P.C. Augustine; Waywood.

Apostolic Succession, the uninterrupted succession of lawfully-ordained bishops extending from the Apostles down to the present bishops of the Church, who thus have received the powers of ordaining, ruling, and teaching bestowed on the Apostles by Christ.—C.E.

Apostolic Union of Secular Priests, association of secular priests who observe a rule embodying the common duties of their state, afford mutual assistance in the functions of the ministry, and keep themselves in the spirit of their vocation by spiritual conferences. It had its origin in the association of secular clergy founded in Bavaria in the 17th century by Ven. Bartholomew Holzhauser, who was revived and reorganized in France in the 19th century by Canon Lebeurier, and was established by papal brief, 1802. There are diocesan associations in France, Belgium, Austria, Ireland, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, United States, Canada, South America, Australia, and parts of Asia. The Union had the special commendation of Pius X, who was a member of it. Its official organ is “Etudes Ecclésiastiques.”—C.E.

Apotheosis (Gr., deification), elevation of a human being to the rank of a god; especially among the Greeks (Philip of Macedon; Alexander the Great), and the Roman emperors. It is often used to signify the transition of a person from this life to eternal life and glory.—C.E.

Apparition of Our Saviour, representation in art associated with St. Martin of Tours and St. Francis of Assisi, to both of whom Our Saviour appeared.

Apparition of the Infant Jesus, representation in art associated with St. Anthony of Padua, because of his vision of the Infant Jesus; St. Francis of Assisi, by reason of his vision when receiving the stigmatas; St. Christopher, as ferryman carrying the Infant Jesus.

Apparitions, extraordinary and remarkable appearances or manifestations of some object presented to man by God in a most singular way. They are also called corporeal visions, because in them the objects themselves, or at least their species, make an organic impression upon our senses. The senses perceive an objective reality naturally invisible to man. It is not necessary that the object perceived be flesh and blood, it suffices that it be a sensible or luminous form.—Tanqueray, Théologie Ascétique et Mystique. (M. J. W.)

Apparitor (Lat., public servant), an officer of the former ecclesiastical courts, who acted as constable and sheriff. The Convocation of the Anglican Church still employs an official thus named.—C.E.
Infant Christ is represented holding an apple, but is the strawberry-tree, emblems and of life; Sodom's apple symbolizes sin, or religious symbolism and ecclesiastical art, the sinful lust. The apple is used as a decoration on a church; the fruit of paradise that became the cause of Adam's fall; it is also (rare) the apple of obedience and of life; Sodom's apple symbolizes sin, or sinful lust.

Appellation Controversy, a dispute occasioned by the refusal of the Sorbonne and certain French ecclesiastics and bishops to accept the Bull "Unigenitus" of 1713, which condemned the Jansenist doctrines as set forth in Quesnel's "Moral Reflections." The name has also been applied to the dispute in England known as the Archpriest Controversy (q.v.).

Appetite (Lat., ad, to; potere, to seek), best of mind or body for attaining some object; of mind for truth, of will for affection, of each sense for its proper object under due control of reason.—C.E.; Maher, Psychology, Lond., 1909. (Ed.)

Appian Way, road constructed by Appius Claudius in 312 b.c. between Rome and Capua, and later extended to Brindisi. St. Paul journeyed over it on his way to Rome. It is mentioned frequently in the Roman Martyrology as the site of the sufferings and burial of many martyrs.—Chandlery, Pilgrim Walks in Rome, St. L., 1924.

Apple, the fruit, Malus communis, Pyrus malus, or Malus pumila. The native home of which is said to be Asia Minor. In the Bible (Gen., 3) it is identified as the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge eaten by Adam and Eve. The tree, in Hebrew tappuakh, is referred to in Canticle of Canticles, 2 and 8, whence such place-names as Tappuah or Taphua (Jos., 12 and 15) or Beth-tappuah (Jos., 15). Adam's apple (Pomum Adami) is the prominence in the fore part of the throat so called from the belief that a piece of the forbidden fruit lodged in Adam's throat. Apple of Sodom, or Dead Sea apple, is a fruit said to grow on or near the site of the biblical Sodom; it turns to smoke and ashes when plucked. Apple-of-Cain is not an apple but is the strawberry-tree, Arbutus unedo, in religious symbolism and ecclesiastical art, the apple is used as a decoration on a church; the Infant Christ is represented holding an apple, the fruit of Paradise that became the cause of Adam's fall; it is also (rare) the apple of obedience and of life; Sodom's apple symbolizes sin, or sinful lust.

Appropriation (Lat., appropriare, to make one's own), in theology the attributing of certain names, qualities, or operations to one of the Persons of the Blessed Trinity in preference to, but not to the exclusion of, the others; thus we characterize the Father by omnipotence, the Son by wisdom, the Holy Ghost by love, though all three possess these essentially and in an infinite degree.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, The Divine Trinity, St. L., 1922.

Apricus (c. 589-569 B.C.), Egyptian king, the Pharao of Jeremias, 37. He incited Judah and Phoenicia to rebellion against Nabuchodonosor, and was later defeated and killed by his own general, Amasis.

Apronianus, Cemetery of, Christian burying ground, of the 2nd century, on the Latin Way, near Rome, discovered, 1596, and containing remarkable drawings and inscriptions.

Apsis (Lat., apseis, arch), semicircular or polygonal termination to the choir or aisles of a church, in which the altar was placed; so called from being vaulted. The term may be applied to the canopy over the altar; a dome; the arched roof of a room; the bishop's seat; a reliquary; a semicircular recess with a roof. The apse is always solid below, generally with windows above. The chevet is an apse enclosed by an open screen of columns, opening into an aisle, then into three or more apsidal chapels. The term was first used in reference to a Roman basilica, of which the apse was an important feature and was retained after the basilica was transformed into the Christian Church. It was retained in Byzantine basilicas, was universally adopted in Germany, and was common in France and Italy. England preferred the square termination. In the larger Gothic churches of France the apse is polygonal and becomes the chevet, with its radial chapels. —C.E.

Apsidal Chapel, a chapel radiating from one of the bays of the apse and reached by an ambulatory (passageway). St. Martin's, Tours, France, is the common example of the ambulatory and radiating chapels. It is a continental form rare in England.—C.E.

Apsidiole (Apsidiali), a small or secondary apse, one of the apses on either side of the main apse in a church with three apses, or one of the apse chapels by which they project from the exterior of the church.—C.E.

Aquamanile (Lat., aqua, water; manuale, ewer), ancient name for the basin in which the priest washes his hands during Mass.

Aquarians (Lat., aqua, water), a group of early sects, notably the followers of Tatian (2nd Aquileia, a city at the head of the Adriatic Sea, Italy, for many centuries seat of a patriarchate. A city of the empire under Charlemagne, it became in the 11th century a feudal possession of its patriarch, whose temporal authority was disputed by the nobility. The see, according to tradition, was founded by St. Mark, and numbered Hermagnos and Helarus among its martyr bishops. In the 6th century its patriarchal dignity caused a schism, which lasted fifty years, and resulted in the establishment of the Patriarchate of Aquileia in Grado. After a brief revival of power under the Church of the Holy See was taken by the Venetians, in 1750 the pope divided the patriarchate into the two archdioceses of Udine and Gorz, leaving to Aquileia only the parish church, directly subject to the Apostolic see. Its rector was granted the use of the episcopal insignia seven times a year.—C.E.

Aquileian Rite, a variation of the liturgy that developed from the 4th century in the Province of Aquileia. It differed from the Roman Rite and was probably a variation of the Gallican Use, and related to those of Milan and Ravenna. In 1250 the Aquilian province adopted the Roman Rite.

Aquinas, See Thomas Aquinas, Saint.

Arabia, country occupying the most southwestern peninsula of the Asiatic continent, including the Sultanate of Nejd, the Imamate of Yemen, the British Protectorate of Aden, the Principality of Asir, the Hadramaut, the Sultanate of Oman, the Sultanate of Koweit, and the Emirate of Bahrein; approximate area, 1,250,000 sq. m.; est. pop., 8,000,000, practically all Mohammedans. Though Christianity in Arabia dates from Apostolic times, the Arabs, being of a lax and sensual nature, were indifferent in the practise of their religion, fell easily into the heresies of Arianism, Nestorianism, and Monophysitism, and lost all traces of Christianity after the appearance of Islam. Missionary work has been conducted along the coasts, but the interior of the country is almost impenetrable. The Catholic Church is represented by the Vicariate Apostolic of Arabia, established as a prefecture Apostolic, 1875, erected into the Vicariate Apostolic of Aden, 1888, and the name was changed to Arabia, 1889. It is entrusted to the Capuchins, Vicar Apostolic: Angé de Treppio, M.P. Cap. (1927). Churches, 8; priests, 12; brothers, 14; Catholics, 1,500.—C.E.; U.K.

Aragon, former kingdom in the Iberian peninsula, now forming the provinces of Huesca, Saragossa, and Teruel in Spain. After conquest by the Carthaginians, Romans, and Arabs, the realm arose from several independent counties in the mountains, principally Sobrarbe recovered from the Moors at the beginning of the 8th century under Garcia Ximenes. It was taken by Sancho, King of Navarre, at the end of the 9th century, and the Aragonese monarchy was definitely established in the 11th century by Ramiro, son of Sancho the Great and ruler of Aragon, Ribagorza, and Sobrarbe. He made generous donations to the Church, founded several abbeys, notably that of San Juan de la Peña, and paid tribute to Pope Alexander II when the Roman liturgy was introduced into Aragon. Sancho Ramirez (1069-94) recovered from the Moors a large part of the valley of Cinca. His son, Alfonso the Fighter (1104-34), took Saragossa and willed his lands to the military orders of Jerusalem, but his subjects obliged his brother Henry, a monk, to accept the crown, and the pope dispensed him from his vows. By the marriage of his daughter to Ramon Berenguer V, Count of Barcelona, Aragon and Catalonia were united. Alfonso II completed the reconquest of Aragon and Pedro II the Catholic (1196-1213) made the kingdom a dependency of the Holy See. To check the invasion of Alemannian heretics the Inquisition was introduced into Spain by Jaime I the Conqueror who recovered Valencia from the Moors, 1238. Pedro II (1276-85) took possession of Sicily. As John I and Martin (1395-1410) died without heirs the Compromiso de Caspe awarded the crown to Ferdinand of Antequera, Infante of Castile. The marriage of his descendant Ferdinand the Catholic with Isabella of Castile united the two kingdoms.

Aramaic (from Aram, a country in southwestern Asia), a Semitic language, used in Babylonia, Mesopotamia, Syria, etc., and spoken by the Jews during and after the Babylonian exile (606-536 B.C.). It was used by Christ. Fragments of the O.T. (Dan., 2, 4, to 7, 29) and St. Matthew's Gospel were written originally in Aramaic. Free paraphrastic translations of the Hebrew Bible into Aramaic (see Targum) were made at first orally in the synagogues and later reduced to writing.—U.K.; Gramm.

Aran, Monastic School of, on the island of Aran, off Ireland. It was an ancient center of sanctity and learning. c. 500-800, St. Enda attracted followers thither, among them, Brendan the Navigator, Finnian of Clonard, Columcille, and Ciaran. Nearly all the "Twelve Apostles of Erin" visited Aran. Remains of distinct monasteries at Killeeney, Kilronan, Kilnlurvey, and at the "Seven Churches," can now be seen side by side with the ruins of pagan architecture.—C.E.

Arbroath, Benedictine abbey in Forfarshire, on the east coast of Scotland, founded, 1178, by King William the Lion. There remain extensive ruins of a 13th-century church and other buildings of the monastery. The monks constructed a harbor and placed the bell on Inchca pe Rock, a dangerous reef in the North Sea 12 m. sq. of the abbey, the subject of Southeby's ballad. Of the 32 mitered abbots the last was Card. Beaton.—C.E.

Arbuthnott Missal, written by James Sibbald, priest of Arbuthnott, Scotland, 1491, and now in the Paisley Museum. It was written on vellum in Gothic characters with illuminations, and is the only extant missal of the Scottish Use. It mainly follows that of Sarum.—C.E.

Arcadelt, Jacob (c. 1514-c. 1575), composer, b.
Netherlands; d. probably Paris. He went to Rome, 1539, where he directed the boys' choir at St.
Peter's, and from 1540-49 sang in the papal choir.
Six books of his madrigals appeared at Venice, 1558-66, and three books of Masses and other sacred compositions, in Paris, 1557. As a musician of the Netherland school his influence helped to found the 16th-century Italian school.—C.E.

Arcadius, Probus, Paschasius, Eutychianus, and Paulillus, Saints, martyrs (437) b. Salamanca.
The last three are brothers, the youngest of whom, Paulillus, was sold into slavery and died later of exposure. They accompanied the Vandal King Genseric to Africa, but when persecution broke out were banished from court.
Imprisoned for using the Nicene Creed they died under torture and are considered the proto-martyrs of the Vandal persecution. Relics at Medina del Campo, Spain. Feast, 13
Nov.

Arch (Gr., archos, chief, head), in etymology, a prefix forming, with other terms, compounds signifying a person, unit, or institution that has preeminence over other persons or institutions, e.g., archbishop.

Arches, in architecture, a structure built of separate and rigid blocks shaped like wedges and put together on a curved line so as to keep their position by mutual pressure when the arch is supported only at its two ends. The separate blocks are called voussoirs or arch-stones, the lowest members of which are termed springers, and the uppermost or central one, when a single stone is thus used, is called the keystone. The under or concave side of the voussoir is called the intrados or soffit; the upper or convex, the extrados. The supports of the arch are called piers, pillars, and abutments, the two former receiving the vertical pressure and the latter resisting the lateral thrust. The upper part of the pier is the impost, the span between the opposite imposts, above the line of which the highest point of the intrados is called the rise. The thrust is the pressure exerted outward, and is counteracted by the abutments or buttresses.
Of the various types exemplified in the illustration the pointed arch is stronger than any other kind.

Archaeology, Christian, that branch of the science of archaeology which has for its ultimate object the study of ancient Christian life, as inferred from the remains of the Christian monuments (supplemented by literature, objects of art, etc.) erected during the first six centuries of the Christian era.
The Roman catacombs are the great treasure-house of the monuments of primitive Christianity; the Bible is the first indispensable literary source.
Many Catholics and other Christians have made valuable researches in the field of Christian archeon.

Catholics.—Paul Allard (1841-1916) had a minute knowledge of Christian archaeology, especially in regard to the Roman catacombs. He translated Northcote and Brownlow's "Roma Sotterranea" (1874) and enriched it with valuable notes and additions. Plauto Biondo (1388-1550) was the author of Pope Eugenius IV, was the author of a valuable study of the ancient monuments of Rome, Antonio Bosio (1575-1629), known as the "Columbus of the Catacomb" and the "Father of Christian Archeology," was the first to begin the systematic exploration of the Roman cemeteries. After his death the results of his investigations were edited by the Oratorian Severano and published at the expense of the Order of Malta under the title of "Roma Sotterranea." Jean-Jacques Bourasse (1813-72) gave a course of archaeology at the preparatory seminary at Tours and made researches that entitle him to be considered a veritable pioneer in France of the science of Christian archaeology. The best known of his various works is "Arché­ o logie chrétienne," 1841. Giovanni Giustino Ciampini (1633-98) was the author of some minor archeological studies and of an investigation of "Liber Pontificum" (1693), as well as two useful works, one a history of the ancient churches built by Constantine the Great, and the other a history of the art of mosaic art. Giovanni Battista de Rossi (1822-94) elevated Christian archaeology to the dignity of a science.
He was commissioned by Pope Pius IX to systematically investigate the catacombs on scientific principles; his immense learning and careful observations were shown by his voluminous literary output. His "Roma Sotterranea" (1864) is almost indispensable to the student of Christian archaeology, as is his periodical "Bulletin d'archéologie cristiana," a publication begun in 1863 and ended in 1894. Raffaele Garucci (1812-85), Jesuit, edited the notes of Jean L'Heureux on the Roman catacombs and wrote a general history of early Christian art, Franz Xaver Krenz (1840-91), priest and professor, began his literary ca­ career with small works on the history of early Christian literature in the first centuries and in the Middle Ages and was led on to the study of Christian archaeology in general and then to Christian art in all its aspects; in this field of research he accomplished valuable work, and published meritorious volumes of description and criticism. Edmond Pédéric Le Blant (1818-97) was inspired by De Rossi to undertake in France the scientific work which Rossi had undertaken in Rome. He was commissioned to collect the inscriptions of the earliest days of Christianity in Gaul, and made an investigation of manuscripts, printed books, museums, churches, and the Gallo-Roman cemeteries. He wrote learned articles on the method of Christian epigraphy, on Christian art, on the origin, progress, popular beliefs, and moral influence of Christianity in ancient Gaul. The most important of his works are "Recueil des inscriptions chrétiennes des Gaules antérieures au VIIIe siècle" and "Études sur les sarcophages chrétiens de la Gaule." He was elected a member of the Académie des Inscriptions et Belles Lettres, and in 1883 became director of the Ecole Française at Rome.

Giuseppe Marchi (1795-1860), Jesuit, proved the Christian origin of the catacombs, discovered the grave of St. Hyacinth in the Catacomb of St. Hermes, and inspired his famous pupil De Rossi to great achievements. He planned an exhaustive work on the Catacombs, and published one volume of it in 1841, but various things prevented the completion of his task. Joseph Alexandre Martigny (1808-80), canon of Belley, published "Dictionnaire des antiquités chrétiennes," Paris, 1865, the first work of its kind; the vast erudition displayed therein has caused the book to be justly valuable. James Payne, Norwott (1821-1907), convert, priest, and president of Oscott College, collaborated with William R. Brownlow (1836-1901), who was later bp. of Clifton, in writing "Roma Sotterranea," a comprehensive work on the catacombs which has become a classic reference. He was also the author of "A Visit to the Roman Catacombs" (London, 1877), "Epitaphs of the Catacombs" (London, 1877), "Epitaphs of the Catacombs" (London, 1877), etc. Joseph Marie Pannier (1530-68), Augustinian monk, inaugurated the scientific study of Christian antiquity. Most important among his published works are one on the basilicas of Rome and one on the cemeteries and sepulchral rites of the early Christians, Jean Baptiste François Pitra (1812-89), Benedictine, cardinal, and librarian of the Vatican, made many important archaeological discoveries; perhaps the best known is his deciphering of the inscription on a sepulchral monument at Autun, which inscription he included in "Spicilegium Solesmense" (Paris, 1852). He also contributed numerous archaeological articles to various scientific periodicals of France, Charles Rohault de Fleury (1801-75) was the author of several important books, all splendidly illustrated. Among them are "Un Tabernacle chrétien du Ve siècle" (Arras, 1880) and "La Messe, études archéologiques sur ses monuments" (Paris, 1883-98).

Other Christians.—Joseph Bingham (1668-1725), clergyman, was the author of an important work on Christian antiquities, Samuel Cheetham (1827-1908), an English divine of the Established Church, wrote a history of the Christian Church during the first six centuries, and other similar books, but is best known for his "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities," of which he was co-editor with Sir William Smith. Sir William Smith (1813-93) edited several valuable archaeological works, "Dictionary of Christian Biography," etc., and collaborated with Samuel Cheetham in editing the important "Dictionary of Christian Antiquities."
ARCHIEPISCOPAL CROSS or PATRIARCHAL CROSS, a cross with two cross-bars, which forms a part of the heraldic arms of an archbishop. It is carried before him in processions, etc., in his own ecclesiastical province. (J. H. S.) Archdeacon (Gr. archos, chief; hieros, holy), Greek word for bishop, used in Greek prayer-books in services corresponding to the pontifical services of the Roman rite.—C. E.

Archimandrite (Gr. archos, chief; mandra, monastery), superior of a monastery in several of the Oriental Churches, including the Melchite or Uniat Greeks; also an honorary title of certain officials attached to the chanceries of the great Oriental patriarchates.—C. E.

Archiparaphonista, a chief officer of the Roman Schola Cantorum (school of singers). His duties included: choosing the chanters for a Pontifical Mass; preceding the pope and placing a kneeling stool before him; and bringing the water to the sub-deacon during the celebration of Mass.

Archippus, Saint (1st century), companion of St. Paul; possibly of Colossae or of Laodicea. In his Epistle to the Colossians, Paul bids him "take heed to the ministry which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou fulfill it." According to tradition he was one of the 72 disciples. He is honored as a martyr. Feast, 20 March.

Architecture, Ecclesiastical, the architecture of Christian and Catholic edifices such as churches, cathedrals, chapels, and monasteries. Strictly Christian and Catholic styles are the Latin or Basilican, the Byzantine, Romanesque, and Gothic. Ecclesiastical architecture in general comprises: (1) Early Christian, Latin, or Basilican, dating from the edict of Constantine (A.D. 313) to the time of Pope Gregory the Great, a chronology, however, which is somewhat obscure. An example is St. Paul-without-the-Walls, Rome. In England, this school of architecture, modified by the Celtic, formed the Anglo-Saxon. (2) Byzantine, of which examples are numerous, with particular reference to St. Sophia's, Constantinople, and St. Mark's, Venice. It dates approximately from the time of Justinian. Under Justinian as emperor the architects Anthemius and Isodorus designed its principal examples. (3) Romanesque, which was developing at the end of the Byzantine period, flourished after the decline of the Roman Empire, and lasted until the rise of the pointed arch in the 13th century. An example is the cathedral of Speyer. This style included Italian, French, German or Rhenish, Spanish, Anglo-Saxon, and Norman. The name of Einhard is associated with Romanesque design, although many nameless ecclesiastical architects labored only for the glory of God. (4) Gothic, beginning at the end of the 12th century, before the decline of Romanesque. It includes numerous sub-styles such as English and French Gothic. An example of pure Gothic is the Cathedral of St. Stephen's, Vienna. Lincoln Cathedral, an example of Early English Gothic, is said to have been the beginning of this particular style, among the exponents of which Alan of Walsingham was responsible for the finest examples of

(5) Renaissance, which began in Italy in the early part of the 15th century, an example of which is St. Peter's, Rome. It includes Italian, Florentine, French, German, Spanish, and English (including Elizabethan), numbering among its distinguished designers Bramante and Michelangelo, and may be said to have ended with the Barocco or Baroque or Rococo, best exemplified by the works of Bernini and Borromini. Barocco flourished in the 17th and 18th centuries, an example of which is the church of S. Maria della Salute, Venice. (6) Modern ecclesiastical architecture begins with a Gothic revival in the early 20th century, associated principally with the name of Augustus Welby Pugin (1812-52) through the impetus which he had given it during his time. Other names distinguished in modern ecclesiastical art are those of Bentley, Scott, Morris, and Morris and Loyd. Gothic is the style generally accepted for ecclesiastical building, since the present era is one of appraisal and criticism, and there are, in consequence, no new striking or individual styles. Consult special articles on these styles of architecture and on architectural terms such as Apse, Arch, Architrave, etc.

Architrave, in classical architecture the lowest of an entablature, the epistyle (a stone beam). In the case of a square opening it may be any moulded or similarly ornamented band framing a square window or door, or projecting from it. A banded architrave is one spaced at intervals by projecting blocks. A jack architrave is, in certain orders, the lowest fascia (band or strip) of the architrave proper. Architrave trim is a casing carried around the sides and top of an opening; it resembles an architrave.

Archives, Diocesan, a compartment established at or in a safe and convenient place, in which all written matter, which pertains to the temporal as well as the spiritual affairs of the diocese, is deposited and guarded under lock and key. Within these archives there is another called the secret archives, in which the documents must be preserved secretly. Canon law requires that a catalog or an index of all the documents, with a summary of the individual papers, be made. The archives are to be locked, and permission of the bishop or of both the vicar-general and the chancellor are required for admission, or to take out papers. The chancellor keeps the key.

Archives of the Holy See (VATICAN ARCHIVES), collections of documents pertaining to the acts of the Holy See; also the place where they are kept. Compiled for administrative purposes, they furnish a mine of information for historians, and are the most important archives in the world. They existed in the earliest days of the Church, but extensive remains of documents do not antedate the thirteenth century. According to a fairly reliable estimate of the arranged documents, the principal sections of what are called the Secret Archives total in round numbers 35,000 volumes and 120,000 loose documents. The management of these archives is entrusted to a cardinal with various workers under him. There are in the Vatican other archives besides the secret archives.—C.E., XV, 268.
Archpriest Controversy, a dispute that divided the clergy of England, on the occasion of the appointment of George Blackwell in 1598 as arch-priest with jurisdiction over the English and Scottish secular priests, the ancient hierarchy having been extinguished some years earlier. An appeal to Rome against the legality of the appointment was denounced by Blackwell as schism; the Holy See at last upheld the appointment but censured Blackwell for his severity and freed the appellants from the charge of schism. This ended the controversy, but some mistrust and friction still remained and in 1621, on the death of the third archpriest, the office was abolished and the first vicar Apostolic appointed.
Arcosolium (Lat., area, arch; solium, seat), arched recess used as a burial-place in the catacombs, especially in Rome in the 3rd century. Mass was often celebrated on the marble slab placed horizontally over the opening. It was sometimes decorated with symbolic frescos in the vault of the arch and in the lunette.—C.E.
Arch (Gr., arkhos, bear; ouros, guardian), a bright star in the constellation Boots, so called because it is near the constellation of the Great Bear. The name is mentioned four times in the Vulgate and twice in the Authorized Version, the only common reference being in Job, 9. It is difficult to identify Hebrew names of stars, and though it may refer to the Great Bear, more probably Pleiades was intended.
Arcula (Lat., dim. of area, box), small boxes of gold or other precious metal worn suspended from the neck and probably used by the faithful to carry the Blessed Sacrament. They date from the 2nd century and were found in the Roman cata-combs.
Ardagh, ar-dagh', DioceSE OF, Ireland, includes nearly all Longford, greater portion of Leitrim, and parts of Offaly, Westmeath, Roscom-mon, Cavan, and Sligo counties; established in the 5th century; suffragan of Armagh. St. Patrick consecrated the first bishop, St. Mel. Several of the O'Feral clan occupied the see, 14th and 15th centuries. Under Bp. Flynn, 1729, the Diocese of Clonmonaos, seat of the famous ancient abbey and school, was united with it. Present bishop, James McNamee, consecrated 1927; residence, Longford.
Churches, 75; priests, secular, 97; priests, regular, 4; college, 1; high schools, 8; intermediate schools, 3; industrial schools, 2; national schools in many parishes; institutions, 3; Catholica, 94,827; others, 7553.
Ardagh Chalice, vessel of Irish workmanship of the 9th or 10th century, found near Ardagh, now in the Irish Academy, Dublin. It is a "ministerial" chalice, with two handles, made of silver alloy, richly ornamented with gold and enamel. The inscription gives the names of the Apostles. It is probable the work of the School of Clonmacnoise.
Ardchattan, ard-chat'tan (Gael., the height of St.
Chatnian), PRIOVY OF, Loch Etive, Argyleshire, Scotland, a house of the Order of Vallis Caulinus, founded by Duncan Mackoul, later incorporated into the Cistercian Order, and secularized at the Reformation. It is the only ancient monastery in Scotland part of which remains in actual use.—
C.E.
Area (Lat., field), name given to the open-air cemeteries (as distinct from catacombs) of the early Christians, especially in Africa.
Areopagite (a mem-er of the court of the Areopagus). See Dioxysius THE AREOPAGITE.
Areopagitica, famous series of four ecclesiastical treatises and ten letters by an unknown author, probably a 5th-century Syrian, professing to be the composition of Dionysius the Areopagite (q.v.).
Arethas and Companions, SAINTS, martyrs (523), inhabitants of the Christian city of Nedshran (Negran), Arabia, killed by the Jew Dhu Nowas (Dunawan), King of the Hymertes. Are-thus, ninety-six years old, was beheaded; some of the others were burnt alive. Feast, 27 July.
Argenson, Pierre De Voyer, Viscount D' (1626-1710), fifth Governor-General of Canada. Of an old Touraine family he was educated for the Church, tonsured in 1636, but entered the army, taking an important part in the sieges of Portolongone, La Bassée, Ypres, and Bordeaux, and the battle of Lens. As councillor of State and governor of Canada (1657-61), D'Argenson advised the French king to grant self-government to the Canadian colonists. Conflicts between Church and State were constantly arising during the French rule because of D'Argenson's wish that his noblemen rank above the ecclesiastical dignitaries. He was a devout churchman, however, and so affected by his inability to get along with the bishop, and other hardships which he was forced to suffer, that he requested his own recall, and in 1661 returned to France.—C.E.

Argenteuil, town, Seine-et-Oise, France, near Paris. The original monastic foundation was changed into a nunnery by Charlemagne, and the repentant Héloïse, beloved of Abelard, was for a time abbess. The parish church contains the relic known as the Holy Coat, the seamless garment of Christ, an object of pilgrimages since 1247.

Argentina, republic occupying the southeastern portion of South America; area, 1,153,119 sq. m.; est. pop., 9,613,306. Christianity was introduced by the Spanish explorers in the 16th century, and today Catholicism is the established religion, required for the presidency, though freedom of worship is granted by the constitution to all others. Ecclesiastical appointments are subject to the approval of the state, which provides a subsidy for clergy and churches. The civil marriage ceremony, established by monks on certain days; some repasts (suppressed by the exceptional severity of certain fasts); ee...
Translators and commentators carried on his system in Persia, Armenia, Syria. From these sources the Arabs derived it and they with its followers in Byzantium, who had always cultivated it, were the channels through which it reached the University of Paris in the 12th century. The Scholastics favored it because of its logical method and because it emphasized the reality of things outside human consciousness. They, and principally St. Thomas Aquinas, purged the system of the materialistic and pantheistic elements the Arabs had introduced into it and by means of it established the consistency of reason with faith. In the revival of Scholastic philosophy by the movement known as neo-Scholasticism, Aristotle is still looked to as the exponent of principles which serve to refute the subjective philosophers which have had vogue since Descartes.—C.E.; Turner, History of Philosophy, N. Y., 1903; Glenn, History of Philosophy, St. L., 1929.

Arius (c. 250-336), heresiarch, b. Libya; d. Constantinople. He quarreled with the Bp. of Alexandria over Christ’s Divinity (see ARIANISM); in 325 his views were condemned at the Council of Nicaea, and he was banished. Supported by Eusebius of Nicomedia, a friend of Emperor Constantine, he created constant trouble for Athanasius in Alexandria. Later he demanded that Alexander of Constantinople give him communion by the emperor’s orders, but his sudden death prevented the sacrifice. —C.E.

Arizona, the 5th state of the United States in size, the 45th in population, and the 48th state to be admitted to the Union (14 Feb., 1912); area, 113,810 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 334,162; Catholics (1928), 93,881. Spanish Franciscans began missionary work among the Moki Indians about 1629, but massacres during the revolt of 1680 put a temporary end to their activities. One of the first Jesuit missionaries to the Indians of the region was Fr. Eusebius Francisco Kino (Kuhn), who established the Mission of San Xavier del Bac, in Upper Pimeria, just south of Tucson, about 1700. This and nine other missions, including Guevavi, later replaced by Tumacacori, were given over to the Franciscans after Spain had ordered the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767. Fr. Francisco Garces, O.F.M., was killed with several companions in 1781. Two years later the foundations of the present fine Byzantine church of San Xavier were laid, two miles south of the earlier mission. It was completed in 1797. After the Spanish missionaries had been driven out by Mexico in 1822, religion suffered a severe setback until the appointment in 1853 of Rt. Rev. John B. Lamy as bishop of the new Diocese of Santa Fé. In 1859 he sent Rev. Joseph P. Machebeuf to Tucson, where Mass was first said in a private house. In 1863 the Jesuits took over the parish and Mass was again offered in the abandoned church of San Xavier del Bac. The Diocese of Tucson (q.v.) comprises the state. Catholic influence on place-names in Arizona appears in the following: Christmas, St. David, St. Johns, St. Michael, San Carlos, and San Simon. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Arizona: Catholic Church 84,742; Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (Mormons) 12,496; Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. 4,353; Methodist Episcopal Church 3,712; Northern Baptist Convention 2,927; Protestant Episcopal Church 2,234; Disciples of Christ 1,853; All Other Denominations 2,815; Total Church Membership 117,014. —C.E.; U.K.; Shea.

Ark (Lat., arca, chest), the vessel of timber daubed with pitch, 300 cubits long, 30 broad, and 30 high, which Noe constructed at the command of God for the preservation of him and his family and two of all living creatures during the Deluge; also the chest in which were kept the tables of the Law, called the Ark of the Covenant (q.v.).—C.E.

Ark and Dove, names of the vessels in which the first colonists arrived in Maryland on 25 March, 1634, under the leadership of Leonard Calvert, as governor, and the spiritual direction of the Jesuit chaplains Andrew White and John Altham. (Ed.)

Arkansas, the 26th state of the United States in size, the 25th in population, and the 25th state to be admitted to the Union (15 June, 1836); area, 53,535 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 1,752,204; Catholics (1928), 26,319. The Indians of eastern Arkansas were visited by Fr. Marquette on his voyage down the Mississippi in 1673. Jesuit missionaries labored among them as early as 1809 and until 1730, with little encouragement, however, one of them, Fr. Paul du Poisson, having been killed by the Indians of Mississippi in 1729. An earlier victim was Fr. Nicholas Poucalt of the Foreign Seminary, killed also in Mississippi, in 1702. When Arkansas, as part of Louisiana, was ceded to the United States in 1803, the memory of Catholicity had almost died out. Missionary priests from the Diocese of New Orleans visited the region in 1822 and 1824, and about 1826 a chapel was built at the Post of Arkansas and another soon after at Pine Bluff, although in 1830 there was still no resident priest. In the next two years two priests were sent there by Bp. Rosati of St. Louis, but little progress was made until a bishop was named to care for the 700 scattered Catholics of the territory. The Diocese of Little Rock (q.v.) comprises the state. Catholic influence on the place-names of the state is shown in the following: Getsemane, St. Charles, St. Francis, St. James, St. Paul. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Arkansas: Catholic Church 84,742; National Baptist Convention 174,157; Southern Baptist Convention 115,192; Methodist Episcopal Church, South 130,993; African Methodist Episcopal Church 30,457; Churches of Christ 26,229; Colored Methodist Episcopal Church 15,269; Disciples of Christ 14,275; Methodist Episcopal Church 12,419; Presbyterian Church in the U.S. 10,762; African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church 7,568; Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. 7,451; All Other Denominations 40,207; Total Church Membership 583,209. —C.E.; U.K.; Shea.
Ark of the Covenant, sacred chest measuring about 45 × 27 × 27 in. (Ex., 37) and containing the Tables of the Law and perhaps also a golden vessel of manna and the rod of Aaron (Ex., 16; Num., 17; 3 Kings, 8; cf. Heb., 9). It was constructed of setim-wood overlaid with gold within and without, and furnished with rings through which passed setim-wood bars for carrying it. Upon its cover, termed the “propitiatory,” were two cherubim of beaten gold. The ark was the only piece of furniture placed in the inner room (holy of holies) of the Temple. The one time it was carried to battle by the Hebrews, it fell into the hands of the Philistines who, however, were soon compelled to restore it to Jerusalem (1 Kings, 4). From Carthaginian David brought it solemnly to Jerusalem, and Solomon had it later on placed in the Temple. According to a tradition, the value of which is much discussed, the Ark, with the Tabernacle and the altar of incense, was hidden by Jeremias before the siege of Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor (2 Mach., 2); however, the view that it was carried to Babylon as a trophy (4 Esd., 10) seems to enjoy greater probability.—C.E.; Arnold, Ephod and Ark, Cambridge, Mass., 1917. (C. L. S.)

Ark of the Covenant, a title given to the Blessed Virgin Mary to signify her Divine motherhood, that as the ark of old, made of incorruptible wood and adorned with pure gold, contained the precious treasures of the Divine law and the manna from heaven, so she, the true ark, bore within her not merely the law but the Law giver, not merely the Divine presence as manifested over the ark of the covenant, but the Divine One Himself, and the Living Bread from heaven. (N. M. W.) A. R. M. = Alma Redemptoris Mater (Loving Mother of the Redeemer).

Arma Christi (Lat., armorial bearings of Christ), the instruments of the Passion arranged heraldically on a shield; much used in devotional art in the 15th century.

Armada, The Spanish, the naval and military force sent by Spain to invade England, 1588. Philip II had grievances against England in the buccaneering voyages of Drake and other privateers and in the subsidizing of the Protestants in the Netherlands. Spain, however, was unwise to attempt to prohibit all traffic to her colonies; and the cruelties of Alva in the Netherlands embittered the struggle. After long delay the Armada left Lisbon, 20 May. It consisted of 130 ships, at least half of which were transports, and 30,493 men, two-thirds of whom were soldiers. The commander was the Duke of Medina Sidonia, who had no experience in naval matters. In the first engagement the English proved to be superior in guns and naval tactics. In the battle off Gravelines the Spanish were entirely defeated. The retreat around the north of Ireland caused a loss of half the fleet and three-quarters of the men. The sympathies of Catholics outside England were with the Armada. Pope Sixtus V promised a large subsidy when they should land in England, and also to renew the excommunication of Elizabeth. On account of Spain’s slowness, he did neither. In England, however, the Catholics, with few exceptions, fought against the Spanish invaders. —C.E.

Armagedon, är-mä-gé'don (Heb., har-megiddo, mountain of Megiddo), mentioned in the Apocalypse, 16, as the scene of the battle which will be fought on Judgement Day, between the kings of the earth and the host of Antichrist. Catholic Authorities locate it at Mageddo (Heb., Megiddo, place of troops), fortified Chanaanite capital, E. of the Plain of Esdraelon.

Armagh, är-mül', Archdiocese of, primatial see of Ireland, comprises County Louth, and parts of the counties of Armagh, Down, Tyrone, and Fermanagh. Suffragans: Armagh, Clogher, Down and Connor, Dromore, Kilmore, Meath, Raphoe. St. Patrick built a stone church here in 446; he held a synod here in 448, one of the still-existent canons of which states that cases of conscience, if too difficult to be disposed of by the Abp. of Armagh, should be referred to Rome. King Brian Boru captured the city, 1004, but acknowledged its primacy; he was buried here. The twelfth-century cathedral, on the site of the church built by St. Patrick, has been in Protestant hands since the Reformation. The last historical mention of the Cuddees (q.v.) is at Armagh in 1633, when they were incorporated in the Catholic cathedral chapter by Primate Hugh O’Reilly; to this day, their estates belong to the “vicars choral” of the Protestant cathedral. Notable in the long line of archbishops are: St. Malachy O’Morgair, patron saint of the diocese (1134-37); Robert Wauchope (1559-81), who introduced the Jesuits into Ireland and assisted at the Council of Trent; Peter Lombard (1601-25); Hugh O’Reilly (1629-53), who took part in the Confederation of Kilkenny, and became generalissimo of the Catholic forces; Bl. Oliver Plunket (1669-81), martyr; Hugh MacMahon (1714-37), who, in the penal times, said Mass and administered Confirmation in the open air; Patrick Curtin (1819-32), who advanced the cause of Catholic Emancipation; William Crolly (1835-49), who began the new cathedral; Paul Cullen (1849-52), who became Abp. of Dublin and cardinal; Michael Logue (1887-1924), first Cardinal-Primate of Armagh, who completed the cathedral, which was consecrated 24 July, 1904; Patrick O’Donnell (1924-27), second cardinal-primate; Joseph MacRory, present archbishop. Parishes, 55; priests, secular, 148; regulars, 39; religious women, 274; college, 1; seminary, 1; high schools, 14; primary schools, 224; Catholics, 140,626, out of a total population of 233,332.

Armagh, Book of, technically known as Liber Arum. ARMACHUS, celebrated Irish-Latin MS., preserved at Trinity College, Dublin. It is a vellum in small quarto of 221 leaves, written in the Irish hand with fine penmanship. It was known as the "Canon of Patrick," but was discovered to be really the work of Ferdonnach of Armagh (d. c. 845). The earliest extant specimen of a continuous narrative in Irish prose, it contains valuable writings relating to St. Patrick.—C.E.

Armagh, School of, oldest and most celebrated of the ancient schools of Ireland, c. 457. It numbered St. Patrick, Benignus, and Gildas the Wise among its teachers. Plundered many times by the Danes in the 9th and 10th centuries, it was finally destroyed in the 12th.—C.E.

Armenia, Socialist Soviet Republic of, eastern Asia Minor; area, 11,945 sq. m.; pop., 876,557. There is some uncertainty as to the introduction of Christianity into Armenia, some historians connecting the Apostles Bartholomew and Thaddeus with its evangelization. This honor, however, is generally attributed to St. Gregory the Illuminator, who, in the third century, converted King Tiridates and many of his subjects, thus making Armenia the first Christian state. Hospitals and charitable institutions were founded about 365 and the Bible translated into Armenian in the 5th century. The first signs of heresy appeared in the 6th century with Gnosticism and Paulicianism, and later Nestorianism and Monophysitism (see Monophysite). This latter gained a great hold among the Armenians who rejected the Council of Chalcedon, which condemned it and adopted the Monophysite doctrine of a single nature in Christ, thereby breaking away from the papal allegiance and establishing a separate church, called the Gregorian or monophysite. Some of the Armenians, however, accepted the authority of the Council of Chalcedon and continued to use the Gregorian rite. Numerous efforts at reconciliation with Rome have been attempted but the Church has remained split into two factions, the greater number of Armenians belonging to the Gregorian or non-Uniat Church while the members of the Uniat Church, mainly scattered outside Armenia, acknowledge the primacy of the See of Rome. The Holy See exercises jurisdiction over a military diocese, composed of chaplains and members of the armed service of the government. At present the Abp. of New York is Bp. Ordinary of the U. S. Army and Navy. (E. B. M.)

Arnold of Brescia (c. 1100-55), demagog, b. Brescia, Italy; d. Rome. He became a priest, headed a movement in Brescia to secure an independent temporal position for the Church as a whole, which he finally succeeded in obtaining. He was a leader of the Second Lateran Council, which confirmed his views. After his death, his followers organized a heretical body called the "Arnoldists," which flourished for a time but finally disappeared. His most famous work is "Imitation of Christ," a manual for spiritual life. His teaching was condemned at the Council of Trent and his letters and works were burned by the Inquisition. He is venerated as a saint by the Church.
the young King Dagobert, he resigned all his offices and ended his life in monastic solitude. One of his sons was the father of Pepin of Heristal, the founder of the Carolingians. Patron of Metz, and of brewers and millers; invoked as finder of things lost. He is represented wearing armor under his cope; extinguishing a fire by his blessing; and finding his episcopal ring inside a fish. Relics at Metz. Feast, at Metz., 19 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Arphaxad, the third son of Sem. From Arphaxad in a direct line proceeded Heber, Abraham, Jacob, and consequently all the people of Israel (Gen., 10). Following the Vulgate, Arphaxad was 35 when his son Sale was born, and lived 303 years after that (Gen., 11).

Arrow, emblem in art associated with St. Sebastian and St. Ursula, because of the manner of their martyrdom, and St. Giles, who saved a hind shot by arrows.

Art, Christian, a term which may be applied to the fine arts either when they are representative of Christian ideals, or when they are used directly in the service of the Church. The beginnings of art inspired and guided by the Christian religion are to be found in the Roman catacombs. In the earliest days of the Church the decoration of these burial-places, in imitation of the earlier Roman custom, gradually developed a symbolism which represented Christian truths to the initiated. The triumph of Christianity under Constantine, in the 4th century, permitted a freer decoration of the catacombs, and the first churches, basilicas adapted from the plan of Roman courts, offered wall-spaces which were soon filled with mosaic figures of Christ and His Apostles, or with scenes from the Old Testament. These served not only to adorn the house of God, but also to instruct the faithful. As St. Gregory said: "The picture is to the illiterate what the written word is to the educated"; and it was the growing importance of this phase of art that led later to strict rules governing the representation of Bible scenes or incidents from the lives of the saints. With the emergence of the Church from the catacombs came also the beginnings of Christian sculpture, in sarcophagi of stone or marble adorned with carvings typifying belief in immortality. Constantinople, the former Byzantium, became the new art center of the world and the Byzantine art developed there under the patronage of the Church, preserving art through the ages when western Europe was overrun by barbarians. A temporary rebirth of art in the West, where it had persisted at least in church architecture under the Merovingian kings, was fostered by the schools of Charlemagne in the 8th and 9th centuries. Everywhere too the great monasteries offered an ideal shelter for the development of arts, as at Mount Athos, Chhyn, Monte Cassino, or Fulda. Miniature, perfected in the illumination of Bibles, had a large part in the development of wall-painting. Missions over the spread of religious orders carried art from one country to another, and Crusade and pilgrimage helped in the same way.

Italian art, which gradually replaced Byzantine and substituted nature for the stiff formalism of the latter, had its birth in the tender piety of St. Francis of Assisi. Giotto and his followers inaugurated a reverent but human treatment of religious themes, which was developed through such artists as Fra Angelico, Sandro Botticelli, Filippo Lippi, the Bellini, and Perugino, and crowned by the glorious masterpieces of Raphael, Michelangelo, Da Vinci, Titian, and Tintoretto. In Flanders, too, religious art progressed from exquisitely spiritual beginnings in the work of the Van Eycks, through Memling and Quentin Metsys, to the great achievements of Rubens and Van Dyck. In Germany the highly religious School of Cologne fostered an art that grew to maturity in Dürrer, and Holbein. In Spain religious art flourished early in architecture and handicraft, and reached its climax in painting, later than the rest of Europe, with Velasquez and Murillo. For centuries art was devoted almost exclusively to the decoration of church, or monastery, or commemorative chapel. It was only during the Renaissance that the adornment of homes or public buildings took on any importance. Even the lesser arts were developed mainly in the service of the Church, in illuminated manuscripts, carved ivories, sacred vessels of wrought gold or silver, jeweled clasps, memorial brasses, embroidered vestments, rich tapestries, and silken hangings.

In architecture, churches are the living monuments of the influence of religion. Basilicas in Rome, Asia Minor, or northern Africa; Byzantine edifices of Constantinople, Italy, or France; Romanesque churches in southern Europe; Norman in France and England; marvels of Gothic architecture which were the glory of the 13th century, as the cathedrals at Chartres, Reims, York, or Cologne; Renaissance churches, like St. Peter's in Rome, which adapted the classic styles to the uses of Christianity; even the over- elaborate Baroque edifices; all these still testify to the fact that the glorification of religion was the chief preoccupation of artist and artisan almost to the 17th century. In medieval France sculpture and stained glass achieved what painting did in Italy, and religious truth was taught in chiseled portico or glowing window. In Italy and Germany, too, sculpture had its place, and the names of such artists as Donatello, the Pisani, Ghiberti, Verrocchio, Veit Stoss, Peter Vischer, and Adam Kraft are associated with carved ornamentation, baptismal fonts, bronze doors and tombs, altars of stone or wood. The preponderating influence of religion in art ended with the Reformation and the rise of Puritanism. In Germany and England there was no longer a place for art in the church. Elsewhere, too, after the Renaissance a growing luxury offered a new field to art, and kings and wealthy patrons replaced popes and cardinals in employing artists. Religion however still inspired important movements in art, as in the creation of what was called the "Jesuit style" in architecture, typified by the Gesù in Rome, a protest against Reformation coldness; or in the German return to primitive religious simplicity, inaugurated early in the 19th century by Overbeck and the Nazarenes, Schadow and the School of Düsseldorf. The English Preraphaelites were inspired by the religious ideals of medieval Italy, and in our own day an important movement... in ecclesiastical art is sponsored by the Benedictines of Beuron. See Catacombs; Architecture; Painting; Sculpture; Brasses; Ivory; Manuscripts; Vestments.

Artemius Megalomartyr (Gr., great martyr), saint, martyr (363). Appointed, by Emperor Constantius, imperial prefect of Egypt, he was a fanatical Arian, hunting down Athanasius and other bishops, monks, and virgins. Converted to the Catholic faith after the death of Constantius, he was accused by heathens of destroying idols, was conducted to Antioch, and after many tortures put to death. Feast, 20 Oct.—Butler.

Arthur (Celt., art, stone), King, 6th-century British chieftain. He championed the oppressed natives against Angle and Saxon invaders. A cycle of romance grew up about his adventures and his “Knights of the Round Table” which inspired Malory’s “Morte Arthure,” Spenser’s “Faerie Queene,” and Tennyson’s “Idylls of the King.” Arthur is the type of perfect Christian knighthood.

Articulo mortis (Lat., at the point of death), phrase used in such expressions as: an indulgence granted to a person in articulo mortis, i.e., about to die.

Artoklasia (Gr., artos, bread; klaso, break), concluding service of Vespers in the Greek Church, in which five loaves of bread, a measure of wine, and a measure of oil are incensed and blessed.—C.E.

Arundell, Humphry (1513-50), landowner, of Landerne, Cornwall, England, b. England; d. Tyburn. He was executed at Tyburn as leader of the uprising of Cornish-speaking people (1549) in favor of the Catholic Church and against the imposition of the “Book of Common Prayer.”

Arundell, Thomas (1560-1639), 1st Lord Arundell of Wardour, Wiltshire, England, soldier. He was imprisoned in 1580 for refusing to attend Protestant services. As a patriotic Englishman he contributed liberally to the defense of England against the Armada. He went abroad and was distinguished for valor in imperial service against the Turks in Hungary, 1535. In 1603 he was created baron by James I for his loyalty.

—Thomas (1584-1643), 2nd Lord Arundell of Wardour, son of preceding, d. Oxford, England. He fought for Charles I against the Parliament, in 1642, and was wounded in battle. His wife, Lady Blanche Arundell (1583-1649), was the daughter of Edward, Earl of Worcester. During the absence of her husband, in the spring of 1643, she defended Wardour Castle for eight days, with 25 men against a Parliamentary force of 1300. She refused the proffered terms of quarter for women and children only, and succeeded in obtaining mercy for all.

—Henry (1607-94), 3rd Lord Arundell of Wardour, son of preceding, d. Breamore, Hampshire, England. He arranged the preliminaries of the secret Treaty of Dover between Louis XIV and Charles II. Falsely implicated in the Oates Plot he was imprisoned in the Tower for five years. He was made Keeper of the Privy Seal by James II, 1687.—C.E.

Asaph (A.SA), Saint, confessor (c. 550), second bishop of the Welsh See of St. Asaph. Local tradition at Tengelen, near Holywell, points out its ash-tree, well, and valley (Onen Asa, Fynnon Asa, Llanasa, Fantasa). Feast, Eng., 1 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Ascendancy, term used to express the assumption or claim of Protestants in southern Ireland to a position of advantage or superiority over the Catholics there.

Ascension (Lat., ad, to; scandere, to climb), the elevation of Christ into heaven through His own power on the fortieth day after His Resurrection, in the presence of His disciples (Mark, 16; Luke, 24; Acts, 1). It probably took place on Mount Olivet; an oratory has been erected on the site, the original Christian basilica having been destroyed and rebuilt and finally destroyed by the Mohammedans. It is commemorated on Thursday, the fortieth day after Easter, and is an ecclesiastical feast and consequently a holy day of obligation, having a vigil and an octave. According to St. Augustine, the observance of the feast is of Apostolic origin. Early customs connected with the liturgy were the blessing of beans and grapes after the Commemoration of the Dead in the Canon of the Mass, blessing of first fruits, blessing of a candle, wearing of miters by deacon and subdeacon. The paschal candle is extinguished after the Gospel of the Mass. Among the many masters who have painted the subject of the Ascension are Fra Angelico, Perugino, Tintoretto, Della Robbia, and Pinturicchio.—C.E.; Schuster, The Sacramentals, II, N. Y., 1925.

Ascent of the Scorpion, place-name in the Book of Josue, identical with Acharim; probably Naq-bes-Safa, between Hebron and Petra.

Asceticism or Asceity (Lat., ascetica, hermitage), a monastery or home for monks; a house of retreats, place of retirement for spiritual exercises, especially those of St. Ignatius; name given to the first of such houses erected at Milan by St. Charles Borromeo.

Ascetical Theology, that branch of theology which comprises the rules of Christian perfection, formulated by the monastic leaders beginning with the Fathers of the Desert, gathered together and systematized. Ascetics is the outcome of supernatural charity urging to a most perfect following of Christ and calls very particularly for a direction in every respect an art. Ascetical theology examines and defines Christian perfection; explains the call, the obligations thereby induced, and the renunciation of worldly goods otherwise lawful in-Ascertical Theology

Included in the call. It expounds, in the degree proper to this mode of life, the Christian virtues of poverty, chastity, obedience, humility, mortification, charity, etc.; the external custody of the senses, the interior discipline of the soul by recollection, the presence of God, and conformity to His will; the vows giving permanence to this life; the various modes of ordinary prayer corresponding to progress made; how to discover and frustrate the devil’s snares, to recognize God operating in the soul, and to free oneself from false notions and scruples that hinder progress. Among theologians Fr. Alvarez de Paz holds an honorable place; the practical treatise of Fr. Alphonsus Rodriguez is known everywhere. Mystical theology is classed with ascetical rather for convenience than for any intrinsic relation. The ascetic way is complete in itself. By it the highest perfection is reached. One might almost at any stage begin the mystic, should God permit.—Devine, A Manual of Ascertical Theology, Lond., 1902.

(\textit{H. J. W.})

Ascerticism (Gr., \textit{askesis}, exercise), spiritual exercises in the pursuit of virtue. Its object is the attainment of Christian perfection, the rules and principles of which are formulated and expounded by ascetical theology (q.v.).—C.E.

Aseity (Lat., \textit{a}, from; \textit{se}, self), the property by which a being exists of and from self, a property belonging to God alone, who exists without other cause than Himself, who is independent and self-sufficient; regarded by many Fathers and theologians as the best way of expressing the very essence of God.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss.

Aser (Asher). (1) Eighth son of Jacob and Zelpha, handmaid of Lia, Jacob’s wife. (2) One of the 12 tribes of Israel, descended from Aser. Its territory, described in Josue, included 22 cities, one of which is the modern Acre. The fertility of the land gave rise to the saying that in Aser oil flowed as a river. The tribe plays an unimportant part in history.—C.E.

Asker. (\textit{Asher}.)

Ash Color, Vestments of, occasionally used in France.—Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1925.

Ashes, Blessed, a sacramental of the Church, used on Ash Wednesday to remind the faithful of their last end and of the necessity of contrition and penance during the Lenten season. The use of ashes to express humiliation and sorrow was common in ancient religions, and is frequently mentioned in the O.T. Probably this practice was introduced into the early Church by converts from Judaism. For some centuries the ashes were imposed only on public penitents, those who had given great public scandal; they appeared at the door of the church in penitential garb on Ash Wednesday and were sprinkled with ashes. Later, c. 1100, it became customary for all Catholics, including the clergy, to receive the ashes. They are placed on the head of each person, with the words, in Latin: “Remember, man, that thou art dust, and unto dust thou shalt return.” They are obtained by burning the blessed palms of the previous Palm Sunday, and are blessed before the principal Mass of Ash Wednesday.—C.E.; Schuster, The Sacramentary, II, N. Y., 1925.

\textbf{Ash Wednesday}, the first day of Lent, so called from the custom of marking the foreheads of the faithful with blessed ashes. Its date depends upon that of Easter.—C.E.

Asia, Proconsular, a Roman province which embraced the western parts of the peninsula, Asia Minor, including Mysia, Lydia, Caria, and a great part of Phrygia; called proconsular to distinguish it from the continent of the same name. Some of its inhabitants were present at Pentecost (Acts, 2), and its evangelization took place during St. Paul’s third journey, when “all who dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord, both Jews and Gentiles” (Acts, 19).

Asia Minor, westernmost peninsula of Asia, name first used by Orosius, c. 400; also known as Anatolia and the Levant. After receiving Greek civilization through the victories of Alexander it became a prosperous Roman province, combining the advantages of both civilizations. Christianity was introduced by the Apostles Peter, Paul, and John, and spread more rapidly than in any other part of the Roman Empire. It was the home of Sts. St. John, Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, Basil the Great, and John Chrysostom, and the seat of the first General Council (Nicea, 325). Divided into two ecclesiastical provinces, Asia under Constantinople, and Pontus under Antioch, it included more than 300 episcopal sees, one for practically every town. Though protected for a short time from the Moslem invasions by the Byzantine Empire, Asia Minor has been controlled by the Turks since the 11th century, and a vicariate Apostolic has replaced the ruined sees. See Turkey.—C.E.; U.K.

Asmodeus (Ashmedai), demon, mentioned in the Book of Tobias, who fell in love with Sara, and slew her seven successive husbands on the night of their nuptials. At last Tobias drove him off and he fled to Egypt. In the Talmud he plays a great part in the legends concerning Solomon.—C.E.

A solis ortus cardine, or of lands that see the sun arise, hymn for Lauds on 25 Dec., feast of Christmas. It was written by Sedulius in the 5th century. There are 18 translations. The English title given is by J. Neale.—Britt.

Asp, word occurring 10 times in the Douay Version of the Bible, standing for four Hebrew names: (1) \textit{Pethén} (Deut., 32), the cobra; (2) “\textit{Akkhashib},” (Ps., 13; Rom., 3), a highly poisonous viper, also mentioned once in the Hebrew Bible; (3) \textit{Shôbîl}, (Ps., 90), a snake; (4) \textit{gphônî}, (Isa., 59), called “the hisser.” —C.E., I, 517.

Asperges (Lat., \textit{aspergere}, to sprinkle), the sprinkling of the people with holy water on Sundays before the principal Mass. The ceremony takes its name from the first word, in Latin, of a verse of the 50th Psalm, recited and sung: “Thou shalt sprinkle me with hyssop,” etc. During the paschal time “\textit{Vidi Fluorem}” is sung instead of “Asperges.” —C.E.; MacMonn, Liturgical Catechism, Dublin, 1927.

Aspergillum (Lat., \textit{aspergere}, to sprinkle), a small brush or instrument for sprinkling holy water in liturgical services.
Aspirations (Lat., aspiro, to breathe), any prayer said in a breath, containing therefore not more than 12 or 15 words; another term for ejaculatory prayers. It is always applied to very short prayers, containing lofty sentiments, expressed in choice language, sometimes in rhyme, similar to proverbs, e.g., "My Jesus mercy!"; "O Sweetest Heart of Jesus I implore, that I may ever love Thee more and more"; "O Mary conceived without sin pray for us who have recourse to thee." Many of these are indulgenced.—Beringer, Les Indulgences, Paris, 1905.

(R. J. M.)

Ass, animal mentioned over 130 times in Holy Scripture. It was popular for riding in the Holy Land because of even gait and surefootedness, and was ridden not only by the common people but also by those of highest rank. The triumphant entrance of Our Lord into Jerusalem on the first Palm Sunday was upon an ass: "Fear not, daughter of Zion: behold, thy king cometh, sitting on an ass's colt." (John, 12.)

Ass, in caricature of Christian beliefs and practices. Onolatry (ass-worship) was attributed by Roman writers to the Jews and later to the Christians. The famous caricature of the Palatine represents a Christian worshiping a crucified figure with the head of an ass. There are other representations of the early centuries. In the Catacombs there is a fresco in which the ass represents Satan or heresy.

Ass, teaching of the ass represents Satan or heresy.—C.E.

Assam, Prefecture Apostolic of, British India, comprises the provinces of Assam, Bhutan, and Manipur; established, 1889; entrusted to the Salesians of Don Bosco (Turin, Italy); Prefect Apostolic, Louis Mathias (1922); residence at Shillong. Churches, chapels, and stations, 198; priests, 11; religious women, 37; schools and institutions, 51; Catholics, 7307.

Assemblies of God, a religious organization incorporated in Arkansas and in Missouri in 1914. An individual and evangelistic type of mission began in a number of churches, missions, and assemblies after the great revival in 1907. In 1914 a meeting was called and a group banded together under the name Assemblies of God. Basing their teaching on the Armenian doctrine, they emphasize the inspiration of the Scriptures. Although loyal to the government of the United States, they claim that, as followers of the Prince of Peace, they cannot take part in war. They are governed by a combination of the Congregational and Presbyterian systems. They have two periodicals. In 1925 there were in the United States: 1155 ministers; 900 churches; and 60,386 communicants.

Assemblies of the French Clergy, representative meetings of the clergy of France to apportion their liabilities under the impost laid by the French kings upon the Church. Originally held every five years, they later became ten-yearly meetings and, after the suspension of the meetings of the States-General, became practically the only representative body during 200 years. The organization provided for the election of four deputies from each ecclesiastical province; parish priests and even subdeacons were competent to act as delegates, but those selected were nearly always from the higher ranks, and a bishop invariably acted as president. A receiver-general was appointed for each ten years, over whom two ecclesiastics known as Agents Généraux had jurisdiction. These Agents Généraux were also privileged to speak before the king's council; among them were Montesquieu and Talleyrand. The clergy had practically a separate administration apart from the state, a tribute to their reputation for reliability and fair dealing, the records showing the confidence with which private individuals made rental contracts with the Church. Several features were worthy of note for their progressiveness, notably the plan of converting annuities for the reduction of interest. During the Crusades contributions were frequently exacted from ecclesiastical property and immense sums for the defense of the kingdom were subscribed by the association at various times, notably during the wars of religion of the Reformation period, the siege of La Rochelle, and later wars, even for the expenses occasioned by the American Revolution. French kings on several occasions thanked the Assembly for their services to the monarchy and the fatherland, and their relations with the throne continued till the Revolution, the last meeting being in 1788. Doctrinal and spiritual matters were also considered and the Conference of Poissy was assembled to discuss Protestantism and the reform doctrines and to devise measures to meet heresies and schisms. Against the philosophers of the 18th century, the Assembly strove to encourage and arouse Christian writers. The Assembly of 1682 was summoned to consider the claim known as the Régale, by which the French kings assumed the right to appropriate the revenues of vacant sees and to appoint successors to benefices. The controversy was decided in favor of Louis XIV, who asked the Assembly to define the authority of the pope. Axed by the power of the king, the Assembly drew up the "Four Articles," which will be found under the title GALLICANISM.

Assic (Asicus), Saint, confessor (5th century), medieval miracle play, "Processus prophetarum," in which Balaam and his ass figured prominently. It was especially popular in northern France but was suppressed in the 15th century because of the indecency into which it had degenerated.—C.E.

Assic (Asicus), Saint, confessor (5th century), bishop, d. Racoyn, Donegal, Ireland. He was a convert of St. Patrick, and, being an expert worker in metals, became his coopersmith. He was later consecrated bishop. Feast, Ireland, 27 April.—C.E.

Assideans, maintainers of the Mosaic Law against the invasion of Greek customs. They joined the Machabeans in the struggle against Antiochus IV. Some think that they are identical with the later Pharisees.—C.E.

Assistance of the Holy Ghost, aid by which God prevents the teaching Church from falling into error, failing in her mission or losing His direction.

In Christ's discourse to the Apostles at the Last Supper several passages occur which clearly imply this promise: "I will ask the Father, and he shall give you another Paraclete, that He may abide with you for ever. The spirit of truth ... he shall abide with you and shall be in you. ... But the Paraclete, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he will teach you all things and bring all things to your mind, whatsoever I shall have said to you” (John, 14).

Assistant at the Pontifical Throne, prelate belonging to the papal chapel, who, in cope and miter, stands near the throne of the pope at solemn functions. All patriarchs belong by their office to this body, others are specially appointed by the pope. The throne-assistants rank next after the cardinals and are Counts of the Apostolic Palace.

---C.E.

Association Catholique de la Jeunesse Française (Catholic Association of French Youth), organization founded, 1886, by Robert de Roquefeli, and six other students, at the suggestion of Albert de Mun, in order to unite Catholic youth of France in cooperative effort for the reestablishment of Christian social order. Non-political and without social distinction, its program is formulated in its motto, “Piety, Study, Action.” In 1914 it counted 4000 groups with 150,000 members, and, despite heavy war casualties, it still flourishes.

Associations Cultuelles, designation given to certain “moral persons” or associations which, by Law of Separation of the Churches and the State, 1905, the French Republic, without any previous understanding with the Holy See, wished to call into existence in each diocese and parish, for religious worship, to receive as proprietors church properties and revenues, with responsibility of taking care of them. By Article 8, it belonged to the Council of State, a purely on sufferance and without any legal title; and further by a law passed 28 March, 1907, permitting exercise of religious worship as public meetings, and abolishing, with respect of all public meetings the anticipatory declaration required by the Law of 1881 which the Church refused to make. By this precocious arrangement the Church carried on until 1923 when a new method of administering church properties was inaugurated without opposition from the government.—Acta Apostolica Sedis, 13 Jan., 1923.

Associations Law, enacted by the French Government, 1901, providing that no religious congregation of men or of women could be formed without a legislative act, which should determine the functions of such a congregation. This enactment was part of the scheme laid down previously by the Grand Orient Freemasons, by which the Catholic Church and Catholics as such in France were to be deprived of their rights. Further attempts to this effect were made in 1905, but, though the Church was seriously hampered in its activities for a while, it succeeded in carrying on until in 1928 these restrictions and others became inoperative.—U.K.

Assuerus, a biblical name, denoting Xerxes I, King of Persia, who reigned from India to Ethiopia over a hundred and twenty-seven provinces ... the city Susa was the capital of his kingdom” (Esth., 1), and to whom, in the beginning of his reign (c. 485 B.C.), the Samaritans addressed their complaints (1 Esd., 4), against the inhabitants of Jerusalem. He made Esther, a Jewess, his queen in the place of Vashti (Esth., 2).

Assumption Abbey, Richmond, N. D., Benedictine abbey of the Swiss American Congregation, founded as the monastery of St. Mary by Vincent Wehrle, O.S.B., 1899, raised to an abbey, 1903. It conducts a seminary, college, and high school. Priests, 8; clerics, 1; brothers, 4.

Assumption College, Sandwich, Ontario, Canada, founded 1870; conducted by the Fathers of St. Basil; professors, 13; students, 375.

Assumptionists. See Augustinians of the Assumption.

Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the assumption (Lat., ad; sumere, to take) of her body into heaven upon her death. According to Benedict XIV, it is a probable opinion, which it is impious to deny, though not an article of faith. It is commemorated by a special feast, 15 Aug., the origin of which is not known but it was... celebrated in Palestine before 500. It is a holy day of obligation, its vigil being a fast day, in all English-speaking countries except Canada. Amongst the many masters who have painted the subject of the Assumption are Fra Angelico, Ghirlandajo, Rubens, Del Sarto, and Titian.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, Mariology, St. L., 1922; Orate Fratres, Collegeville, Minn., 11 Aug., 1929.

Assyria (Heb., Aram-Naharaim, Aram of the two rivers), a country which occupied the northern and middle part of Mesopotamia, extended as far south as the Persian Gulf, and included Babylonia and Chaldea. The Assyrians were probably of Semitic origin, descendants of Assur, one of the sons of Sem (Gen., 10), and an independent Assyrian kingdom began about the seventeenth century B.C. The sources of Assyrian history are the O.T., the Greek, Latin, and Oriental writers, and the records and remains of the Assyrian people. Their religion and civilization were in many respects identical with that of Babylonia, their language belonged to the Semitic family, closely related to the Hebrew, and they had a cuneiform (Lat., cuneus, wedge) system of writing. Their most famous rulers were Tiglath-Pileser III (1120-1118 B.C.), under whom Assyria rose to the height of military glory; Asshur-nasir-pal (885-860 B.C.), in whose reign Assyria first came into touch with Israel; Tiglath-Pileser III (745-727 B.C.), founder of the second Assyrian empire; Sargon II (722-705 B.C.), who conquered Samaria and destroyed Israel; Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.), who invaded Judah and crushed the rebellion of Ezechias (4 Kings, 18); Esarhaddon (681-668 B.C.), a great ruler who conquered Egypt and destroyed Sidon; and Asshur-bani-pal (668-626 B.C.), greatest of all Assyrian kings, to whom we owe part of our knowledge of Assyro-Babylonian history, as he caused the most important historical texts and inscriptions to be copied and placed in a fine library which he built in his palace. With his death, Assyrian power declined. In 606 B.C. Nineveh was destroyed by the Medes and Babylonians, and Assyria became a province of these countries.—C.E.; U.K.

Assyrian Captivity, the exile of the Israelites in the provinces of the Assyrian Empire. In 723 B.C. Tiglath-Pileser III conquered Israel and deported many of the leading Israelites to Assyria (4 Kings, 15). Twelve years later (722 B.C.), Sargon destroyed Samaria, and carried off the upper classes to Mesopotamia and Media (4 Kings, 17; 1 Par., 5). The Book of Tobias gives a glimpse of the lot of these exiles, who on the whole enjoyed a considerable amount of liberty, but were at times subjected to persecution (Tob., 1). There is no record of their return to Palestine. (H. W.)

Astaroth (Phenician, Ashtoreth, Astarte), a Syro-Phenician female deity worshipped at Sidon and Tyre, in Carthage, Cyprus, and even Britain. She has been identified with the Babylonian goddess Ishtar, the Grecian Aphrodite, and the Latin Venus, and was regarded as the goddess of love and fecundity. In 4 Kings, 28, she is described as the "idol of the Sidonians." (A. H.)

Astericus Anastasius or Astrik-Anastaz (Slavie, Radla), apostle of the Magyars (c. 955-c. 1036), first Abp. of Gran, Hungary, b. Bohemia. He entered the Benedictine Order and became cooperator with St. Stephen in establishing the Catholic religion in Hungary, being sent by the latter to beg papal approval for the organization of the Church there and to ask for the crown of that kingdom. In 1000 he crowned Stephen first King of Hungary. Feast, Hungary, 12 Nov.

Asterisk (Gr., asteriskos, dim. of aster, star), a utensil used in the Greek Rite, made of two silver or gold curved bands crossing each other to form a double arch, and placed over the blessed bread in the early part of Mass, to prevent contact with the veil.—C.E.

Astronomy (Gr., astron, star; nomos, knowledge), a pseudo-science dealing with the influence of the stars on human fate, or on the weather. The former is termed mundane or judicial astrology, and its predictions rely upon the planets' positions, at the time of a human being's birth, in the twelve houses into which the heavens are divided. The houses symbolize such factors as riches, success, children, etc. The signs of the zodiac, each of which rules over a certain part of the human body, exercise a particular influence on the bodily health of an individual and the position of the sun in the zodiac at the moment of birth is a vital factor in determining his fate. The calculations essential to the settling of these positions are called casting the horoscope. The second division, termed natural astrology, predicts weather variations as effected by the positions of the planets, especially the moon. The Assyrians and Babylonians were the leading exponents of this science among the ancients, while the Egyptians developed it approximately to its present condition. The Assyro-Babylonian and Egyptian priests expounded these astrological views to the Greek astrologers, whence knowledge of it came to the profane world and to Rome where for about five hundred years it ruled public life. The advent of Christianity and its active antagonism to astronomical teachings, as illustrated by Constantine's edict of death to the Chaldeans, Magi, and other astrologers, dealt a severe blow to it, effective for several centuries. Early Christian legend distinguished between astronomy and astrology and St. Augustine (De Civitate Dei, VIII, xix) vigorously opposed the amalgamation of the two. During the Middle Ages, owing to Jewish scholars, astronomy became important again and numbered emperors and popes among its votaries, including the Emperors Charles IV and V and Popes Sixtus IV, Julius II, Leo X, and Paul III. Petrarch continually attacked it, and it met successful antagonists in the Catholic scientists and philosophers, Pico della Mirandola and Paolo Toscanelli, and, in the later Renaissance, the Franciscan, Nas. The victory of the Copernican system, the recognition of the moral and psychical dangers of astrology and the progress of experimental science reduced it to the status of a superstition, a position it still occupies, in spite of the recent revival of occultism.—C.E. positions, constitution, and relations of the heavenly bodies and of the earth in its relation to them. Valuable contributions to the science have been made by Catholics and other Christians.

Catholics.—Giovanni Domenico Cassini (1625-1712) determined the period of rotation of Jupiter, Venus, and Mars, made researches on lunar librations and on the zodiacal light, advanced a theory of comet motion, discovered four Saturnian satellites, suggested oval paths in place of the ellipses of Kepler which were named "Cassinians" in his honor, and was first director of the Paris Observatory. Mary Agnes Clerke (1842-1907) wrote several standard astronomical works, most important of which was "A Popular History of Astronomy in the Nineteenth Century." Nicolaus Copericus (1473-1543), Dominican, originated the Copernican system which superseded the Ptolemaic. Andrew Claude de la Chevotier Crommelin (1865-1897), assistant at Royal Observatory, Greenwich (1891-1927), made valuable investigations on eclipses, and in conjunction with P. H. Cowell, on Halley's Comet, 240 B.C.-A.D. 1910; author of several astronomical works. Francesco Denza (1834-94), Barnabite, did notable photographic research on the heavenly bodies, was instrumental in establishing over 200 meteorological stations in Italy, and rebuilt the Vatican observatory for that purpose.

Hervé Auguste Etienne Albans Faye (1818-1907) discovered the comet known by his name, made advances in the system of astronomical measurements, and discovered the zenithal collimator. Galileo Galilei (1564-1642) did distinguished telescopic work; he discovered the gibbous phase of the moon, the four satellites of Jupiter known as the Galilean satellites, the phases of Venus, and the daily and monthly librations of the moon, co-discovered the rings of Jupiter, did research on sun-spots, and made improvements on the telescope. Edward Heiskell (1806-72) founded the "Journal of Astronomy, Meteorology and Geography," first ascertained the point of departure of meteors, drew up a chart of naked-eye stars visible from Central Europe, which indicated 5421 stars, included the first authentic map of the Milky Way, and has been used as a basis for other star charts, and made valuable observations of variable stars. Johann von Lamont (1805-77), director Munich Observatory, determined the mass of Uranus, made geodetic and meteorological researches, and invented an instrument for recording phenomena in this field. Urbain Jean Joseph Le Verrier (1811-77) made the mathematical discovery of the planet Neptune, first developed the gravitational method of determining solar parallax, did brilliant research on the planetary system, and computed the orbits of Mercury and Uranus. Giuseppe Piazzi (1746-1826), Theatine, discovered the first planetoid Ceres, 1 Jan., 1801, and was author of a star catalog including about 7000 fixed stars. Lorenzo Respi (1824-89) distinguished chiefly for spectroscopic research, notably on stellar luminosity and protuberances on the sun, discovered three comets and drew up a catalog of the declination of 2534 stars. Giovanni Santo Gasparo Santini (1787-1877) computed paths for several comets and did important research work on planets. Christoph Scheiner, S.J. (1575-1650), first made a systematic investigation of sun spots. P. Angelo Secchi, S.J. (1818-78), invented the "meteorograph," an instrument for the automatic registration of meteorological phenomena, made important measurements of double stars, observations on solar protuberances, and the extensive spectroscopic classification of stars known by his name. Wilhelm Tempel (1821-1898) discovered several nebulae and comets and drew up valuable star maps. Francesco de Vico, S.J. (1805-1889), directed the Observatory at Rome and made valuable observations of the comets and Saturn.

Other Christian Astronomers.—Johann Bayer (1572-1660) compiled a famous Uranometria comprising 51 maps of the heavens, and inaugurated the system of designating the stars of a constellation by Greek and Latin letters which are usually assigned in order of brightness. Friedrich Wilhelm Bessel (1784-1846), first to successfully measure stellar parallax when he measured 61 Cygni, founded a system of reduction, improved the use of the heliometer, and was director of the Observatory at Königsberg. Tycho Brahe (1546-1601) initiated precision in astronomical observations, discovered (1572) a nova of Cassiopeia, compiled a catalog of 777 fixed stars, drew up a plan of the cosmos known as the Tychonic plan, drafted a chart of refraction, made numerous corrections on astronomical observations, and rediscovered lunar variation. Sir Thomas Maddougal Brisbane (1773-1860), distinguished in nautical astronomy, drew up tables for computing time from the altitudes of celestial bodies, established the first important Australian observatory, and compiled the Brisbane Catalogue of 7355 stars. Johann Franz Encke (1791-1865) furnished data on transits of Venus which aided in obtaining the distance of the sun, proved that the periodic comet named in his honor moved in an elliptical orbit, and directed work of charts of the celestial equator. John Flamsteed (1646-1719), author of the famous "Historia Coelestis Britannica," drew up the catalog of fixed stars designated by his name, first demonstrated the construction and use of the quadrant, initiated a method of determining the position of the equinox, and made important researches on sun spots whence he drew up a theory of the sun's constitution; he was first astronomer royal of England. Sir William Herschel (1738-1822), foremost astronomical discoverer and explorer of the 18th century and "founder of sidereal science," initiated an era of astronomical optics and stellar photometry, discovered the planet Uranus and two of its satellites, Oberon and Titania, discovered the sixth and seventh satellites of Saturn, first determined Saturn's rotation period, did noteworthy researches on variable stars, discovered that in the binary systems the stars circulated around each other, thus demonstrating that the same law of mechanics functioned in the stellar system as did in our solar systems, first indicated the approximate position of the apex of the sun's way, first determined the direction of the sun's motion, added about 2400 nebulae to the known number of 103, compiled famous star catalogs, constructed a reflecting telescope with an aperture of four feet and a focal length of forty, and discovered the infra-red solar rays. Sir John Frederick William Herschel (1792-1871) continued the stellar researches of his father and completed his work on luminaries and nebulae, made valuable photometric observations of stars' magnitude, e.g., discovered that a star of the first magnitude is 100 times as bright as a sixth magnitude star, invented a reflector for telescopic observations, was the author of theory of meteoric origin of sun spots, initiated the use of the terms positive and negative in photographic representations, did research on the stellar distribution in heavens and drew up his famous catalog of southern stars. Johann Hevelius (1611-87) founded lunar topography, did valuable work on sun-spots, first suggested that the orbits of comets were parabolic, discovered four comets, made the discovery of the libration of the moon in longitude, and compiled a catalog of 1564 stars. Sir William Huggins (1824-1910), pioneer in astronomical photography, spectroscopy, and spectrum analysis, did noted research on the chemical stellar composition, discovered spectroscopically that luminous gas composed the irregular and planetary nebulae, proved that cometary light was mainly derived from incandescent carbonic vapors, made the first investigation with a spectroscope of a temporary star, and proved the presence of calcium in the chromosphere and solar prominences. Johann Kepler (1571-1630), author of the Keplerian planetary theory, established the three great laws of planetary motion designated by his name, viz., the laws of equal areas, elliptical orbits, and of the relation between distances and periods, made notable researches on the orbit of Mars and an explanation of lunar attraction causing tides, and established a theory of vortices; he made an exposition of refraction by lenses and of the inverting telescope and may be considered the founder of the science of dioptrics. Joseph Louis Lagrange (1736-1813) supplied the analytic foundation for calculus of variations, did valuable researches on differential equations, and made contributions to the solution of equations particularly by the method of combination. Canon A. Stark (d. 1839) did researches valuable in ascertaining sun-spot periodicity.

Asylum (Gr., asylus, safe from violence), a place in which a person threatened with danger is protected from harm. Historically, the term commonly refers to the custom of endowing holy places, shrines, churches, etc., with the right of asylum against secular force. This meant that a person pursued by the officers of the law or other secular power, could by fleeing to such a place escape arrest. The practise was founded upon two principles, that the exercise of secular power in a place dedicated to God was irreverent and sacrilegious, and that the secular power was too often tyrannical and unjust, and that a refuge was needed in which it was powerless to abuse the innocent. The decay of religious faith and the growth of civil order have both brought it about that the right of asylum is today neither claimed nor exercised. The present use of the word is in reference to institutions in which the helpless are relieved from their necessities; e.g., the asylums for such dependent classes as the orphans, aged, insane and feeble-minded, and the hopeless poverty-stricken. Such institutions were practically unknown among pagan peoples. Their origin may be traced to Our Lord's insistence on the corporal and spiritual works of mercy as a necessary condition for attaining heaven (Matt., 25). The care of widows, the poor, and orphans, was characteristic of the first Christians; and all through history, the faithful have generously supported and endowed institutions for such purposes, while the founders of many religious orders of men and women have made service in such asylums the chief purpose of their orders. With good reason, modern social workers insist that the dependent, especially orphans and children, should in every possible case be placed in normal family life. The individual's own family society should be aided or corrected, when that is possible. If that is impossible, a foster home suited to his character and needs should be provided. Only when this is impossible, should resort be had to the institutional asylum, when the given case is, for physical, moral, social, or economic reasons, beyond hope of normal treatment. The proper Christian view is that charity must always work for the greatest good, as well as for the highest motives. Hence stubborn insistence on the old-fashioned institutional methods is not true charity, when others are available that procure better the physical, moral, educational, and spiritual well-being of the dependent. Catholics, therefore, find in modern childplacing, mothers' pensions, old-age insurance, etc., simply the opportunity for more effective charity, and thus inform these very modern and technical works with age-old Christian motives and virtue. At the same time, the Catholic will insist that the institutional asylum still has work to do; and that those who contribute to it and those who serve it out of spiritual motives are doing an admirable work blessed with much spiritual merit. Ateneo de Manila, established, 1859, by Jesuits and directed by them; comprises a military school, preparatory school, and high school, and classical, scientific, pre-medical, and college courses leading to degrees of A.B. and M.S.; professors, 57; students, 1,100. There is a night school for working men under its patronage.

Athalia, tragedy by Racine, based on the story in the Books of Kings and Paralipomenon. Christianitv is foreshadowed in many moving passages and its destiny hangs in the balance. It was first performed, 1690, and has been the theme of numerous composers.

Athanasiian Creed, one of the ecclesiastically approved formulaires of faith which contains a brief but philosophically exact summary of the fundamental doctrines of the Trinity and Incarnation together with a cursory reference to other dogmas. Shortly after the 5th century it was quite generally accepted both in the East and West. Nothing certain is known as to its origin and time of composition. For about ten centuries St. Athanasius of Alexandria was erroneously taken to be its author. Since 1644, however, scholars regard it as being of Western origin. Nevertheless, the creed undoubtedly owes its existence to Athanasian influences, for it contains a clear and succinct statement of his doctrine on the dogmas mentioned above. Some think it originated during the second half of the 4th century, while others assign it to the 5th. The Church enjoins its recitation at Prime on certain Sundays of the year. It is accepted by orthodox Protestants.—C.E.

Athenasius (Gr., immortality), SAINT, confessor, Bp. of Alexandria (296-373), Bp. of Alexandria, called “Father of Orthodoxy,” as the chief champion of belief in the Divinity of Christ, b. and d. Alexandria. As secretary to Bp. Alexander of Alexandria, he attended the Council of Nicaea, 325, and upon Alexander’s death, 328, succeeded as bishop; he spent seventeen of the forty-six years of his episcopate in exile and fought for the acceptance of the Nicene Creed. Refusing to readmit Arian to ecclesiastical communion, he was accused on false charges by Eusebius of Nicomedia, and brought to trial at Tyre, 335; but, as he could not hope for a fair trial, he withdrew from Tyre, appealing to the Emperor Constantine who banished him to Trier. He returned to his see, 337, with the permission of Constantine II, but again met with opposition by the Eusebian faction, and fled to Rome, where his innocence was proclaimed by Pope Julius. After the death of Gregory, Bp. of Alexandria, in 345, Athanasius again returned to his see. Condemned at a council in Milan, 355, in which his enemies predominated, he was exiled to Egypt, where he lived a monastic life for twenty years. After another short occupancy of his see he was banished, 364, by Emperor Valens. He was recalled by his flock after four months, and spent the remainder of his life proclaiming the Divinity of Christ, thus well deserving the title “Father of Orthodoxy.” Writing: “History of the Arians” and “On the Incarnation.” Relics in S. Croce, Venice. Feast, R. Cal., 2 May.—C.E.; U.K.; Butler.

Athenasius, Saint, confessor (d. 872), Bp. of Naples, b. Naples, Italy; d. Veroli. He restored the sacred edifices, including the church of St. Januarius, destroyed by the Saracens, founded a hospice, and instituted a service for the ransom of captive Christians. Because he resisted simoniacal practices, he was imprisoned by his nephew Sergius, Duke of Naples. The clergy and people of Naples forced his release. Feast, 15 July.

Atheism (Gr., a, without; theos, God), denial of God’s existence; system opposed to deism or theism, maintaining the existence of God and of one God only; in its extremist form, the denial of the existent of a First Cause; in less extreme, the substitution of matter, external and self-subsistent, for a God spiritual and personal; often confused with agnosticism and pantheism. Moral atheism comprises those ethical systems which teach that the morality of human acts has no reference to a Divine law-giver, i.e., godlessness in conduct regardless of a system of morals or of religious faith.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, God: His Knowability, Essence and Attributes, St. L., 1921. (Ed.)

church architecture an open court, consisting of a large quadrangle, with colonnaded walks on four sides, forming a cloister between the porch and the body of the church, and containing a fountain for washing the hands. Here the first class of penitents congregated to solicit prayers, and here, too, Christians were buried. The covered portion near the church was the narthex, which exists only occasionally now and has been reduced to a narrow inner entrance.—C.E.

Attala, Saint, abbot (d. 627), b. Burgundy; d. Bobbio, Italy. He became a monk and joined Columbanus, whom he followed into exile, and with him founded the Abbey of Bobbio near Genoa, of which he became abbot. Relics at Bobbio. Feast, 10 March. —C.E.

Attention (Lat., ad, to; tendere, to stretch), earnest direction of the senses and mind to some occupation or duty, as prayer and administration of the sacraments. In vocal prayer it implies mindfulness of the words or purpose of the prayer; in mental, attention to the matter of meditation and to the spiritual affections aroused. In administering the sacraments sufficient attention is required to avoid any distraction that might occasion a mistake, and at the time of the Consecration at Mass avoidance of wilful distraction. The obligation to recite the Divine Office is satisfied by avoiding any action that is inconsistent, but to recite it properly some internal attention to the words is required. So also external attention suffices for fulfilling the obligation of assisting at Mass, but internal attention is required to assist at it with due devotion. (Ed.)

Attila (d. 453), King of the Huns, called “the Scourge of God.” He welded the disorganized Scythian warriors into a compact body that became the terror of Europe and Asia. Emboldened by the success of an invasion of the Roman Empire, he swept through Austria, Germany, and Gaul with unheard-of ferocity. Allied Romans and Visigoths defeated him at Chalons, 451, and averted the peril which menaced Western civilization. Attila went to Italy and laid Lombardy waste, 452. Approaching Rome, he was met by Pope Leo I near Mantua, and was dissuaded from sacking the city. He died shortly after.—C.E.

Attilanus or Atlanus, Saint, confessor (c. 936-1009), Bp. of Zamora, b. Tarazona, Spain; d. Zamora. He founded, together with St. Froilan II of Leon, the monastery of Moreruela, on the banks of the Esla. Canonized by Urban II, 1095. Relics in St. Peter’s church, Zamora. Feast, 5 Oct.

Attiret, Jean Denis (1702-68), painter; b. Dôle, France; d. Peking. After studying art at Rome, he entered the Society of Jesus as a lay brother, and was sent to China. His skill as a portrait painter led to his appointment as painter to the emperor, who made him a mandarin. To meet the wishes of his patron, most of his work was executed according to Chinese taste and methods.—C.E.; U.K.

Attra (Aragh), Saint, virgin, contemporary of St. Patrick, b. Sligo, Ireland. She was the foundress of several religious houses in Galway and Sligo. Pius IX authorized her office and Mass to be revived in the Irish Church. Patroness of Achenory, and of the “Men of Lugna.” Feast, 11 Aug. —C.E.

Attributes, Divine, characteristics which we conceive as belonging to God. Though God is absolutely one and simple, yet to establish form a better idea of Him and to unfold as far as possible what is implied in saying that He is All-perfect, we apply or attribute to Him certain perfections which we find in creatures. In doing so, however, we do not use the words in the sense in which we apply them to creatures but with a far different meaning: what is limited and often imperfect in creatures is infinite and perfect in God. These perfections implying neither limitation nor defect are called pure, e.g., justice, goodness, truth, power, freedom. When an attribute suggesting limitation is used in speaking of God, e.g., “at the right hand of God,” it is a figure of speech. Among the Divine attributes most modern authorities select asy; or self-existence, as the most distinctive characteristic, the one from which the others may be best and most vigorously deduced, and therefore they call it the metaphysical essence of God. The attributes of God most commonly mentioned are: almighty, eternal, holy, immense, immortal, immutable, incomprehensible, infinite, intelligent, invisible, just, loving, merciful, most high, most wise, omnipotent, omnipresent, perfect, provident, self-dependent, supreme, true.—Lessius, tr. Campbell, Names of God, N. Y., 1912.

Attrition (Lat., atterere, to rub), contrition for sin without perfect motive; a sorrow of soul and a hatred of sin committed, with a firm purpose of never sinning again, the sorrow being based not on the pure love of God, whom sin has grievously offended, which would be perfect contrition, but on some inferior though supernatural motive such as the loss of heaven, or the punishment of hell, or the heinousness of sin itself.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Auckland, Diocese of, New Zealand, comprises the territory of the provincial district of Auckland, surrounding islands, and the Kermadec group; area, 21,665 sq. m.; erected, 1848; suffragan of Wellington. Bishops: Jean Baptiste Pompallier, Vicar Apostolic of the Western Pacific (1836-48), and bishop (1848-68); Thomas Croke (1870-75); Walter Steins (1879-81); John Luck (1882-96); George Lenihan (1896-1910); Henry Cleary (1910).

Churches, 131; priests, secular, 59; priests, regular, 24; religious women, 394; high schools, 8; primary schools, 47; institutions, 6; Catholics, 55,000.

Auctor beate saculi, or O beata Creator, the world's Creator bright, hymn for Vespera on the feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. It was written in the 18th century by an unknown author. There are eight translations. The English title given is by F. Husenbeth.—Britt.

Audi benigne Conditior, or O Kind Creator, bow thine ear, hymn for Vespers on Sundays and week-days in Lent. Pope St. Gregory the Great (540-604) was its author. There are 22 translations. The one given in Britt is by T. Lacey; the fourth verse reads:

Give us the self-control that springs
From discipline of outward things,
That fasting inward secretly
The soul may purely dwell with Thee.

Audiences, Papal, receptions given by the pope to clerical or lay persons having business with or interest in the Holy See. Requests for audiences are made to the master of the chamber (Maestro di Camera), even those which ambassadors present through the cardinal secretary of state. The pope receives every day the cardinal prefect of one of the sacred congregations. At these audiences decrees are signed and counsel given by the pope. Bishops come from every nation to consult the pope. Prelates connected with various institutions either in Rome or abroad, generals and procurators of religious orders, are also received on stated days. Formal audiences to sovereigns and princes are invested with special ceremonies. For ordinary audiences to clerical or lay persons having business with or interest in the religious upheaval. By this compact the re-creating the pretensions of the German princes to dictate a religion to their subjects and by securing to the adherents of the Augsburg Confession all Catholic property which they had held from the beginning of the religious upheaval. By this compact the religious schism in the empire was definitely established, and the Catholic and Protestant estates were made opposing camps.

Augsburg, Religious Peace of, compact arrived at in 1555 by the Diet of Augsburg in vain effort to secure religious harmony, by recognizing the pretensions of the German princes to dictate a religion to their subjects and by securing to the adherents of the Augsburg Confession all Catholic property which they had held from the beginning of the religious upheaval. By this compact the religious schism in the empire was definitely established, and the Catholic and Protestant estates were made opposing camps.

Augsburg, Bishops of, list of bishops of Augsburg:
- T. Lacey (d. 1524), bishop, patron of Malmesbury, he convoked a synod of the Celtic
- Henry Cleary (1910).

Augouard, PHILIPPE PROSPER (1852-1921), missionary, Vicar Apostolic of Upper French Congo, b. Poitiers, France; d. Paris. During the Franco-Prussian War he served with the Papal Zouaves. He entered the Congregation of the Holy Ghost, opened the first mission station of St. Augustin, East Africa, 1881, and assisted French exploration by erecting hospitals and schools. In 1896 he was created Chevalier and in 1913 an officer of the Legion of Honor. Belgium awarded him the Order of Leopold. He was appointed titular Abp. of Casiopeia, 1915.

Augsburg, Religious Peace of, compact arrived at in 1555 by the Diet of Augsburg in vain effort to secure religious harmony, by recognizing the pretensions of the German princes to dictate a religion to their subjects and by securing to the adherents of the Augsburg Confession all Catholic property which they had held from the beginning of the religious upheaval. Augustine Novelius (MATTEO DE’ TERMINI), BLESSED (d. 1309), general of the Hermits of St. Augustine, b. Termini, Sicily; d. San Leonardo, near Siena, Italy. He filled various civil offices, and was appointed chancellor by King Manfred of Sicily, whom he accompanied in his war against Charles of Anjou. He then became an Augustinian monk, and later general of the order, which post he resigned for a life of retirement and prayer. The title Novellus (Lat., new) was a tribute to his virtue and learning. Feast, 19 May.

Augustine of Canterbury, Saint, confessor (d. 604), apostle of the English, 1st Abp. of Canterbury, b. Rome; d. Canterbury, England. From the monastery of St. Andrew, in Rome, Pope Gregory I, learning that the pagans in Britain were disposed to embrace the Faith, sent Augustine and his Benedictine brethren to instruct them. Augustus landed on the Isle of Thanet and was hospitably welcomed by Æthelberht, King of Kent, who, though pagan, was married to a Christian, Bertha. Æthelberht soon embraced the Faith, and on Christmas Day 10,000 of his people were baptized. Augustine went to Gaul to receive episcopal consecration from the Abp. of Arles, and on his return, at a spot still called “Augustine’s Oak” in Malmsbury, he convoked a synod of the Celtic bishops of southern Britain, in an unsuccessful attempt to introduce ecclesiastical uniformity in Britain. His remains were interred outside the church of Sts. Peter and Paul, Canterbury, which he had begun. Feast, R. Cal., 28 May.—C.E.; U.K.; Butler.

Augustine of Hippo, Saint, confessor, Doctor of the Church (354-430), Bp. of Hippo, b. Tagaste, Africa; d. Hippo. He was the son of Patricius, a pagan, and of St. Monica, and received a Christian education but, on proceeding to Carthage to study law, he became a slave to immorality and eventually embraced Manichaeism. He went to Italy, 383, and taught rhetoric at Milan, where he was baptized by Ambrose, 387. Returning to Tagaste, 388, he distributed his goods to the poor, and was ordained, 391. Consecrated assistant Bp. of Hippo, 396, he introduced religious poverty and community life into his residence, which became a nursery of African monasteries and bishops. For 34 years he wrote and preached against the heresies of the times; becoming renowned as a philosopher, a theologian, and especially as the Doctor of Grace. His writings cover the whole field of theology; his "Confessions" and the "City of God" are the best known. His conversion is the classic instance of the efficacy of a mother's prayer. His description of his last days with St. Monica, at Ostia, is the most sublime passage in his "Confessions." Patron of theologians, brewers, and printers, invoked against sore eyes. Emblems: dove, child, shell, and pen. Relics at Pavia and Hippo. Feast, R. Cal., 28 Aug.—Moriarty, Life of St. Augustine, Phila., 1879; Woods, Augustine and Evolution, N. Y., 1925; C.E.; U.K.

Augustine Schoeller, Blessed, martyr (1829-51), b. Mittelbronn, Germany; d. Son-tai, Indo-China. After studies in the seminary at Pont à Mousson and the Grand Seminary of Nancy, he entered the Society of Foreign Missions at Paris, 1846, and was sent to the mission of Tonkin in Indo-China, 1847. His Apostolic labors began on his voyage to the East, and during his sojourn at Hong Kong, early in 1848, he preached to the native heathens. Arriving at Tonkin in the midst of a terrible persecution, he occupied himself with the study of the language and fulfilling the duties of the ministry throughout the province of Souda. In 1851 he penetrated farther into the country and labored at Bono, a large Christian parish. Here he was instrumental in the soldiers who were executing the general edict against Christians, was beheaded, and his head was thrown into the Song-Ka River. His body was buried in a neighboring village. Beatified, 1900.—Wegener, Heroes of the Mission Field, Techy, 1924.

Augustine Webster, Blessed, martyr, Carthusian, prior of Agholme, Lincolnshire, England, executed at Tyburn, 1535, for refusing to take the Oath of Supremacy under Henry VIII.—C.E., VIII, 405.

Augustinians of the Assumption or ASSUMPTIONISTS, a congregation which had its origin in the College of the Assumption, established in Nimes, France, in 1843, by Rev. Emmanuel d’Alzon, to combat irreligion in Europe and schism in the East. It was formally approved by a brief, 26 Nov., 1864, and suppressed in French territory in 1900. At the time of its suppression this congregation had 20 Apostolic schools, with hospitals, orphanages, and branches in 80 dioceses; and "La Bonne Presse" which issued periodicals, pamphlets, and books in great numbers, the chief publication being "La Croix." These institutions were all closed but the Assumptionists have opened similar ones in Belgium, England, Italy, the United States, and Chile. In the Orient, especially Turkey, 300 Fathers and Brothers and nearly 400 Sisters, Oblates of the Assumption, conduct missionary stations, hospitals, and schools. The mother-house and the procurator-general, formerly at Paris, are now in Rome. Statistics: 4 provinces, 3 vicariates, 93 residences, 864 religious of whom 19 were of the Byzantine rite, 105 lay-brothers, and 98 novices.—C.E.

Augustinianism, term used sometimes to designate the entire body of the philosophical doctrines of Saint Augustine, but often used exclusively to designate his explanation reconciling the theories of the Fall, grace, and free will in the solution of the problem of freedom and grace, i.e., of the part taken by God and man in the affair of salvation.—Pohl-Preuss, Grace, St. L., 1921.

AUGUSTUS, CALIGULA CAESAR OCTAVIANUS (62 B.C.-A.D. 14), Roman emperor at the time of the birth of Christ, b. Rome. He was the heir of Julius Caesar and formed a triumvirate with Antony and Lepidus to control the affairs of Rome. After punishing Caesar’s murderers, he eliminated Lepidus, and with Antony governed the Roman world. Antony's repudiation of his wife Octavia, sister of Augustus, led to civil war, and with the defeat of the former at Actium, Augustus soon welded the Roman state into a compact whole. The emperor patronized art and science, and legislated to reform public morals. He confirmed Herod as King of the Jews, and on Herod’s death divided his territory among his sons. The centre taken by Augustus's legate is important in fixing the date of the Nativity of Christ (Luke, 2).—C.E.

Aulneau, Jean Pierre (1705-36), missionary and martyr, b. Moutiers-sur-Hay, France; d. Mascare Island, Minn. He entered the Society of Jesus, 1720, arrived in Quebec, 1734, and was sent on a mission to the Cree and Assiniboine nations and to penetrate to the Mandan Indians. Arriving at Lake of the Woods, in the fall of 1735, he wintered in Fort Charles, Minn., and in June, 1736, set out with a party to procure provisions and ammunition. They were overtaken by Sioux Indians and murdered. Relics in the chapel at Fort Charles.

Aurore (Lat., aurum, gold), oval or elliptical rays of light such as are at times visible about sun or moon, adopted early in the Middle Ages as symbol of the heavenly honor of the saints, and varying in significance under the forms of halo, glory, nimbus. Strictly, it should surround the entire figure in oval form, or the bust in circular. In early Aureole of the Saints. According to Thomas Aquinas, the three aureoles are particular rewards added to the essential happiness of eternity, three special points of resemblance to Christ: victory over the flesh in virginity, victory over the world in martyrdom, victory over the devil in preaching truth.—Devine, A Manual of Ascetical Theology, Lond., 1902.

Auricular Confession (Lat., auris, ear), the manifestation of one's sins to the priest alone, to obtain their sacramental pardon; in contradistinction to public confession. The testimony of the first three centuries regarding confession, while not abundant, affords unquestionable evidence that, although public confession was very common, auricular confession, especially of secret sins, was in use. Frequently, however, auricular confession was followed by public penance. From the 4th century auricular confession has been the prevailing method of the Church.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss. The Sacraments, III, St. L., 1924.

Auriesville, site of Mohawk village of Ossernon, Montgomery Co., N. Y., where Isaac Jogues and his companions, Goupil and Lalonde, were martyred by Indians, Goupil in 1642, Jogues and Lalonde, 1646. In 1884 Fr. Joseph Loyzance, S.J., erected a small shrine on the hill, with the title of Our Lady of Martyrs. The first pilgrimage was in August of that year.—C.E.

Aurora caelum purpurat, or The Morn had spread her crimson rays, hymn for Lauds from Low Sunday to the Ascension; Ambrosian school, 4th or 5th century. It has 27 translations. The English title given is by R. Campbell.—Britt.

Aurora jam spargit polum, or The Dawn is sprinkling in the East, hymn for Lauds on Saturday; Ambrosian school, 4th or 5th century. It has 12 translations. The English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Aurora soli praevia, or O Rosy Dawn! That dost proclaim, hymn for Lauds on 11 Feb., feast of the Apparition of the Blessed Virgin. It is not known when and by whom it was written. There are two translations. The English title given is by the Benedictines of Stanbrook.—Britt.

Austerities (Gr., austeros, harsh, rough), rigorous forms of corporal penance self-imposed by holy men and consisting in painful exercises or privations, such as long fasts, abstinence from lawful pleasures, flagellation, to repress and to control the animal passions. These austerities were sometimes abused; but where they were done in private and joined with a sincere attempt to acquire interior perfection, they were good. St. Jerome wrote of them to Celantia: "Be on your guard when you begin to mortify your body by abstinence and fasting, lest you imagine yourself to be perfect and a saint; for perfection does not consist in this virtue. It is only a help, a disposition, a means for the attainment of true perfection."—(W. o. B.)

Austin Canons. See Canons and Canonesses Regular.

Austin Friars, monastery of Hermits of St. Augustine (q.v.) in the heart of the City of London; founded, 1253, by Bohun, Earl of Hereford. The ground was considered specially holy, and many famous men were buried there. It is now a Dutch Reformed church and the name of a street.

Australasia (Southern Asia), usually signifies Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand; also synonym of Oceania, including Micronesia, Melanesia, Malaysia, and Polynesia, as well as Australasia proper. It is used in this wider sense by the Apostolic Delegation of Australasia, the seat of which is at Sydney, Australia. See Australia.

Australia, island continent of the southern hemisphere and self-governing federal state of the British Empire. Originally a penal settlement during the Orange reign of terror in Ireland towards the end of the 18th century, many Catholic priests and subsequently many prominent political offenders were deported to the convict establishment at Botany Bay. Among the first convicts were three Catholic priests, but they were not allowed to exercise their ministry. In 1803 Fr. Dixon was conditionally emancipated and celebrated the first official Mass in Sydney; his privileges were rescinded in the following year. Catholics received no further ministrations but were forced to attend Protestant services. In 1817 Fr. Jeremiah O'Flynn, appointed Prefect Apostolic of New Holland, was arrested soon after landing in Australia and deported. This action brought matters to the notice of the British authorities and in 1821 Frs. John J. Therry and Philip Conolly were appointed chaplains; but they were hampered by numerous restrictions. In 1833 the Benedictine Fr. William Ullathorne (afterwards Bp. of Birmingham, England) was appointed vicar-general of Australia, and in 1834 the mainland, Tasmania, and adjacent islands were formed into the Vicariate Apostolic of New Holland, with John B. Polding, a Benedictine, as first bishop. The Church Act, passed in 1836, was Australia's first charter of religious liberty, and thenceforward the Catholic population increased rapidly, necessitating the erection of numerous dioceses. In 1882 education was secularized and state aid withdrawn from denominational schools; Catholic primary schools, however, proved self-supporting. Patrick F. Moran was created Australia’s first cardinal in 1885, and in 1914 an Apostolic delegate was appointed. In Sept., 1928, the International Eucharistic Congress was held in Sydney, Australia, with the state of Tasmania and the territory of Papua, included in 1931, the following ecclesiastical divisions: archdioceses of Sydney, Melbourne, Hobart, Adelaide, Perth, Brisbane; dioceses of Maitland, Goulburn, Bathurst, Armidale, Ballarat, Sandhurst, Rockhampton, Lismore, Port Augusta, Sale, Wollongong, Forbes, Geraldton, Wagga-Wagga; Vicariate Apostolic of Cooktown; prefectures Apostolic of Kilcoy, Barambah, Northern territory; and the Abbey Nullius of New Norcia. Each of these is treated under its title. In the 780 districts, there are 1600 churches, 1176 secular priests, 412 regular priests, 776 religious brothers, 8246 nuns, 9 ecclesiastical seminaries, 57 colleges for boys, 201 boarding-schools for girls, 202 superior day-schools, 1046 primary schools, 118 charitable institutions, 185,111 children in Catholic schools, and a Catholic population of 1,151,098.—O’Brien, Life of Archipriest Therry, Sydney, 1922; O’Brien, Dawn of Catholicism in Australia, Lond., 1928; Australian Encyclopedia, v. Roman Catholic Church; M. Daly, Catholicism in Australasia, in Irish Ecc. Record, Dec., 1928; C.E.; U.K.

 authentic, Authenticity (Gr., authentos, real author), terms applied to: (1) the Scriptures, because its books have been written by the persons whose names they bear, because they are genuine and trustworthy, officially acknowledged, and express faithfully all those things which belong to the substance of the Divine writings; (2) the document authenticating a relic; (3) four modes of authority: (a) the moral authority of a Higher Power for there is no power but from God; (b) the moral authority of the civil state, but freedonl of worship for all is secured by it; (c) the moral authority of the Church, and subjects have no rights. The theologian Suarez, as defender of the rights of the people, argues that spiritual authority is not vested in the crown, and that it is not immediately the gift of God to the king, but given by God to the people collectively and by them transmitted or confided to the ruler. From these classifications, authority is both natural and universal, but the distribution of authority or form of government is a human convention and is subject to change. The principle that the state is established by God and did not happen by chance or compact, but is a Divine and necessary institution. God forbids anarchy and chaos, and that there must be authority everywhere, and that this authority must be obeyed under some form; but it is untrue to hold that men are bound to live under any particular form of authority, and that it cannot not be subverted. Authority rules by Divine right under whatsoever form it is established, but no one form of government is more sacred or more inviolable than another; hence when a change of government is complete the new government rules by right of accomplished fact. There are limits, however, to civil obedience and to compliance with civil authority. The authority of the State is absolute, i.e., full and complete in its own sphere and subordinate to no other authority within that sphere. The state, however, is not to be obeyed as against God, neither can a state command anything and everything; thus to dictate to conscience, to interfere with man's eternal destiny, or his relation with his Maker, to formulate civil laws in conflict with the moral law, to deny the parents' right in the education of the child, and to prevent religious instruction are beyond the power of the state. The arbitrary use of authority is called tyranny and the liberty of the subject is based on the doctrine that the state is not omnipotent. Neither is it true to hold that man is "all citizen," for besides his political interests, he has his eternal, domestic, intellectual, and artistic interests. According to the theories of Hobbes and Rousseau, authority resides in and originates from the community, the state is omnipotent, though in its origin it is an artificial thing constituted by the citizens; while Hobbes holds that authority is vested permanently in the individual, Rousseau states that this authority is revocable at the will of the citizens. Hegel further developed the notion of state absolutism in which the citizen is wholly subordinated to the civil power. The fallacies that "The State is the source of all right and its rights are unlimited," and "Authority is nothing else than numbers and its rights are unlimited," were condemned by Pius IX. The theories would also embrace the fallacies that right is necessarily attached to majorities, that one man is as good as another, and that the rule of numerical majority is of universal application. Pope Leo XIII in his Eneylecelle, "Immortale Dei," thus sums up the true doctrine: "Man's natural instinct moves him to live in civil society. Authority no less than society itself is natural and therefore has God for its author. Hence it follows that public power itself cannot be otherwise than of God."—C.E.; U.K.; Holy See.—C.E.

Auto-da-fé (Port., act of faith), term applied to the public ceremony comprehending the official and ultimate announcement of a sentence of the Inquisition (q.v.). Features of the ceremony included: a procession to a place specially designated in which those to be condemned as guilty of heresy, and those to be publicly reprimanded, participated; a religious discourse or exhortation followed by the wearing in of secular authorities who vowed obedience to the inquisitor in matters pertaining to putting down heresy; the "degrees of mercy" which comprised the remission, alleviation, etc., of sentences previously imposed, for those who had become reconciled with the Church; and finally, pronouncement of sentence on the guilty. These latter were then surrendered to the civil power. The ceremony attained its height in the 16th century in Spain.

Autocephali (Gr., autokephalois, independent), certain bishops in early Christian times, not subject to any patriarch or metropolitan, but dependent directly on a triennial provincial synod or on the Holy See.—C.E.

Autos Sacramentales, religious plays performed in the streets of Spanish cities at Corpus Christi. They were supposed to teach Eucharistic doctrine, but the religious character was not always maintained. The best were written by Lope de Vega and Calderon. Abuses connected with them were attacked by Moratini, 1762, and they were officially suppressed, 1765.—C.E.

Autun, Inscription of, discovered, 1839, in which Pectorius (3rd century) celebrates in Greek verse the Ichthus (fish), symbol of the Eucharist: "Take the food, honey-sweet, of the redeemer of the saints, eat and drink holding the Fish in thy hands."

Auxentius, Saint (d. after 469), archimandrite in Bithynia, b. Constantinople. He gave up his military career and retired to Mt. Oxia (Koiich-dagh), near Chaleced. Celebrated for austerity and miracles he was called to the Council of Chaleced to influence the bishops to acknowledge its decrees. After the council he became a recluse on Mt. Sinope (Skopas), near Chaleced. At the foot of the mountain he founded the monastery of Trihemion. Relics, near Chaleced. Feast, 14 Feb.—Butler.

Auxerre, former diocese, Yonne, France, founded by Peregrinus, 258; united to the Archbishop of Sens, 1821. Of its 103 bishops, 27 were saints, including St. Germain. The Council of Auxerre, 586 or 578, formulated 45 canons, important as illustrating life among newly-converted Christians. Many decrees were directed against pagan customs.—C.E., XIII, 718.

Auxiliary Bishop, one deputed by the Holy See to assist the diocesan in the performance of pontifical functions. As such the auxiliary lacks ordinary jurisdiction in the diocese and has not the right of succession to the diocesan see.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

AUXILIUM CHRISTIANORUM, title in the Litany of the Blessed Virgin; also a feast. See Help of Christians.

Avalon, in Welsh mythology, kingdom of the dead; afterwards an earthly paradise in the western seas; finally in Arthurian romance, the last resting-place of heroes, such as King Arthur. It has been identified with Glastonbury, England, owing to the intimate connection of that place with Arthurian legend.

avarice (Lat., averto, to crave) or CUPIDITY, the inordinate love of temporal goods usually estimable in terms of money. This love of money becomes inordinate when it makes a man hard-hearted, causes him to be niggardly in spending it, too eager and absorbed in acquiring and preserving it, or prepared to do what is wrong in order to obtain it.—Koch-Preuss.

Avellana, 6th-century collection of canons, many of them unique, so called because its oldest known MS. was bought for the Abbey of Santa Croce Avellana by Peter Damian.

Ave Maria, first words of the Latin version of the Hail Mary.

Ave Maria, a literary and religious monthly Catholic magazine, published by the press of the University of Notre Dame du Lac, Indiana. Founded 1875 with the financial aid of Empress Eugénie of France, it was edited from 1875 to 1929 by Daniel E. Hudson, C.S.C.; present editor, Eugene Burke, C.S.C. It has had the singular distinction of being the fireside Catholic magazine, always devotional and scholarly and so judicious and eloquent in its criticisms that its genial ex-editor will be always regarded as mentor of Catholic editors as well as their dean for so long a period. No other Catholic periodical in the United States has done more to bring out Catholic writers. (Ed.)

Ave Maria (Slovenian), magazine published twice monthly in the Slovenian (Yugoslav) language at Lemont, Ill., by the Slovenian Franciscan Fathers; established, 1910; circulation, 4300.

Ave Maria Stella, or HAIL, THOU STAR OF OCEAN, hymn for Vespers on feasts of the Blessed Virgin Mary. It dates at least from the 9th century; the author is unknown. There are 19 translations. The English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Ave Regina Caeroum, or HAIL, O QUEEN OF HEAVEN, ENTHRONED, antiphon recited from the end of Compline on 2 Feb. until Maundy Thursday, exclusive. It is uncertain when and by whom it was written, but it has been used since the 12th century. There are at least five translations. The English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Averrhoes (Ibn Rosdho; 1126-98), Arabian philosopher, b. Cordova, Spain; d. Morocco. He is the author of an important medical work, and is also known for his "Commentaries" on Aristotle and original philosophic treatises. Thomas Aquinas, although refuting him, spoke of his views with respect.—C.E.; Turner, History of Philosophy, Boston, 1903.
Avitus (Aelius Ecdicius), Saint (c. 431-525), poet, Bp. of Vienne, b. Vienne (now France). He opposed Arianism and advocated papal authority as the main bulwark of religious unity. He is the author of a poem dealing with the scriptural narration of original sin, expulsion from paradise, the Deluge, and crossing of the Red Sea; Milton made use of this in preparing "Paradise Lost." Relics at Vienne. Feast, 5 Feb.—C.E.

Aviz, Order of, military body of Portuguese knights, founded, c. 1146; the castle of Aviz was their headquarters. They adopted the Cistercian rule and became affiliated with the Spanish Knights of Calatrava. Under Infante Fernando they achieved deeds of valor in Africa. After 1531 the grand masthip of the order was vested in the king, who used their wealth for his own purposes. The knights were dispensed from the vow of celibacy in 1492. They were suppressed in 1834.—C.E.

Avranches (Aurincalae), former diocese, Manche, France, founded, c. 500, added to Coutances, 1802. It was an important city of the Gallo-Roman period. The Council of Avranches, 1172, imposed penance on Henry II of England for the murder of Thomas Becket, forbade the conferring of benefices on children, and recommended observance of the Advent fast.—C.E.

Awl, tool for making holes in leather, in art associated as an emblem with St. Benignus.
Ax, tool or weapon generally with wooden handle and edged metal head, in art associated with St. Bartholomew, Apostle, probably by analogy for knife with which he was slain; St. Matthew, Apostle, by analogy for sword with which possibly he was killed; St. Matthew of Beauvais, beheaded; St. Olaf of Norway, who carried an ax in battle.

Axinomancy, divination by ax-heads.

Ayllon, Lucas Vasquez de (d. 1536), Spanish discoverer of Chesapeake Bay. He founded the settlement of San Miguel de Guandape, near the site of Jamestown, Va., 1526.—C.E.

Ayr, capital of Ayrshire, Scotland. Bruce called together the Scottish parliament in the old church of St. John, 1315; Dominicans and Franciscan Observants had houses here before the Reformation. The town is associated with Robert Burns, who was born nearby.

Azarias, Brother (Patrick Francis Mullany; 1847-93), educator, b. Killenaule, County Tipperary, Ireland; d. Plattsburg, N. Y. He entered the Brothers of the Christian Schools, N. Y., taught in Albany, New York, Philadelphia, and Rockhill College, Md., of which he became president. Later he was professor of literature at the De La Salle Institute, New York, and lecturer at the Catholic Summer School, Plattsburg. He wrote essays on literary subjects.—C.E.

Azevedo, Luis de (1573-1634), apostle of the Agaus (Nubian tribe), b. at Carracedo Montenegro, Portugal; d. Ethiopia. In 1588 he entered the Society of Jesus and in 1605 went to Ethiopia, where he spent 29 years on the mission. He compiled an Ethiopian grammar and translated the New Testament and other works into that tongue.—C.E.

Azure Vestments. See Blue.

Azymes (Gr., a, without; zyme, leaves), unleavened or unfermented cakes used by the Jews in their sacrifices and religious rites.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914.

Azymes, Feast of, Jewish feast, commemorating Israel's deliverance from Egypt. It began the 15th day of Abib (Nisan) and continued for seven days. Later it was identified with the feast of the Passover.—C.E.

Azymes, term of reproach used by schismatic Eastern Churches, from the 11th century in speaking of Catholics, Armenians, and Maronites, because they celebrate the Holy Eucharist with unleavened bread.—C.E.
Babylon, ancient empire in Asia in the region of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. Semitic in language and civilization, and founded c. 2800 B.C. by Sargon I, its greatest ruler was Hammurabi (c. 2100 B.C.) who united Babylonia and became famous for the exhaustive code of civil and criminal law compiled during his reign. In 710 B.C. Babylonia was subjugated by Sargon II of Assyria, but regained independence c. 626 B.C. under Nabopolassar whose son Nebuchadnezzar conquered Syria, destroyed Jerusalem (586 B.C.), and subjected Tyre. After him the empire declined, becoming a province of Persia upon the victory of Cyrus the Great in 538 B.C. Babylon, ancient capital of Babylonia, is regarded as the site of the Tower of Babel (q.v.).—C.E.; U.K.

Babylonian Captivity, the 70 years of exile (606-536 B.C.) of the Israelites in Babylon. Three invasions of Judea by Nebuchadnezzar are recorded (4 Kings, 24 and 25; 2 Par., 36). After each of these a large portion of the population of Jerusalem and of other Judean cities was carried away to the banks of the Euphrates. There the exiles seem to have enjoyed a considerable amount of liberty. They preserved their old clan relations (1 Esd., 2); had their own judges and magistrates (Jer., 29; Dan., 13); and some rose to positions of honor and responsibility (Dan., 1; Jer., 52; Esth., 2). Cyrus gave permission for the exiles to return to Palestine to rebuild Jerusalem and the Temple, and a large number (42,350 Jews and 7357 servants) availed themselves of it (1 Esd., 2). Other expeditions followed under Esdras and Nehemias (1 Esd., 7-10; 2 Esd., 1-13). (H. w.)

Bachelor (M.L., baccalarius, cowherd, or husbandman). (1) A young knight following the banner of another. (2) An apprentice of a guild, also a religious novice. (3) A holder of the lowest degree granted by a university (Bachelor of Arts); first applied in 1231 to students who, while studying for the Master's degree, were granted the privilege of teaching younger students after passing an examination called “determination” which proved their fitness to enter upon the second stage of the master's work. At Paris and on the Continent, in the 18th century, students “determined” after one or two years, but at Oxford and Cambridge the course was four years. The arts curriculum consisting in medieval times of grammar, rhetoric, and dialectic, has undergone many changes resulting from the humanistic movement, the development of scientific knowledge, and the institution of the elective system. (4) An unmarried man.—C.E., 1,756; U.K.

Babylon, a Dé themselves named Babool. In 1873 a mission was established at Stuart Lake by Fr. Herbolnez. Present number about 610, all Catholic.

Babool, a Dé tribe of British Columbia, included under general term Takullu. They lived by hunting and fishing, had a matrarchial system and totems, and were ruled by petty chiefs who owned the land. Polygamy was practised. They believed in immortality and buried their dead. Their first contact with whites was in 1812. In 1846 they were evangelized by Fr. Nobili. In 1873 a mission was established at Stuart Lake by Fr. Herbolnez. Present number about 610, all Catholic.

Baboon (A., bab, baboon, France; d. Paris. He is best known for his work in optics. His compensator is used in the study of elliptically polarized light. He also invented an air-pump, a hygrometer, and a goniometer.—C.E.

Baboon (A., bab, gate, i.e., through none other than which may man find salvation), the name of a religious, political, and social sect or system founded at Shiraz, Persia, c. 1843, by Mirza Ali Mohammed, who assumed the name Bab-ed-Din (gate of faith). It is a pantheistic Mohammedanism which is a development of certain tenets of Islam, colored with Gnosticism, Buddhism, and Judaism. It encourages monogamy and abstinence from alcohol, and forbids asceticism, mendicancy, and concubinage.

Babylon (A., bab-ill, gate of the god), ancient city on the Euphrates River, about 60 m. s. of Baghdad. As early as 2872 B.C. it was the capital of Sargon of Agade. From 2250 it was the capital of Babylonia and the holy city of western Asia. After being destroyed by Sennacherib, 689 B.C., it was rebuilt by his successor. After the downfall of Assyria, Babylon again, under Nabopolassar, became the seat of empire. Nabuchodonosor made it one of the wonders of the world. It was captured by Cyrus, 539 B.C. In 275 B.C. it was destroyed and the inhabitants transferred to Seleucia. Among its buildings were the temples of E-Zida and E-Saggila. It is mentioned in Apocalypse, 17, as the city of abominations. The Patriarchate of Babylon was founded 1622, for the Chaldean Rite. Present patriarch, appointed, 1900, Emmanuel Thomas, residing at Mosul, Iraq. Charches, 27; priests, secular, 46; priests, regular, 39; schools, 17; Catholics, 31, 900.—U.K.
from the office of secretary to the general of the society, which he filled, 1647-68, he commenced his important "Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu," published, 1676. Based on the earlier works of Frs. Ribadeneira and Alegambra, it is a work of accurate research, marked by tolerant judgment and careful style.—C.E.

Bacon, Roger (c. 1214-c. 1294), philosopher and scientist, b. near Ilchester, Dorsetshire, England; d. Oxford. He studied in Oxford and later in Paris, 1244-52. Returning to Oxford, he taught there until 1257 when his superiors obliged him to discontinue. He had become a Franciscan, but just when is not known. Jerome de Ascoli, the General of the Franciscans, condemned the writings of Roger Bacon in 1278, and ordered him confined in a monastery. How long he was detained is unknown, but he was free in 1292 when his "Compendium of Theology" appeared. His most noted works are the "Opus Majus," "Opus Minus," and "Opus Tertium," comprising recommendations for reform in ecclesiastical studies and in the system of education. He was more interested in mathematics, the natural sciences, and languages than in his great contemporaries, and placed great emphasis on the experimental sciences. In his writings he even mentions automobiles and flying machines.—C.E.; U.K.; DeWulf, History of Medieval Philosophy, Lond., 1926.

Badin, bá-dén, Stephen Theodore (1768-1853), pioneer missionary in Kentucky, b. Orleans, France; d. Cincinnati, O. He entered the Sulpician Seminary at Orleans, completing his studies in America, where he was ordained, the first in the United States, 25 May, 1793. Appointed to the Kentucky mission, he labored for many years, forming congregations and building churches. After a sojourn in France, 1819-28, he returned to America and undertook missionary work among the Pottowatomies, being named Vicar-General of Kentucky when is not known. In 1846 he became rector of a French mission in Illinois. His published works include a history of the Kentucky missions, two Latin poems, and "Letters to an Episcopalian Friend."—C.E.; Shea.

Baegert, bá'gert, Johann Jakob (1717-77), Jesuit missionary and ethnographer, b. Schlettstadt, Alsace; d. Neuburg, Bavaria. He spent 19 years on the Californian mission, till the expulsion of the Jesuits, 1767. In 1773 he published a work on Lower California, which gives an account of the topography, the Indian customs and language, and the history of the mission. A revised edition was issued by the Smithsonian Institution, 1863-64.—C.E.

Baumer, Stuttbert (1845-94), liturgist, b. Leuchtenberg, Germany; d. Freiburg. After studying at Bonn and Tübingen, he entered the Benedictine Abbey of Beuron, 1865, and was ordained, 1869. Besides acting as critical adviser of the printing house of Désêle, Lefebvre, and associates at Tourne for their editions of the Missal, Breviary, Ritual, and Pontifical, Dom Baumer wrote several valuable essays on liturgical subjects, a treatise on the history and content of the Apostles Creed (1893), and a classical history of the Breviary in which he condensed the labors of former students of the Breviary and the best critical results of the modern school of historical liturgists.—C.E.

Baghdad, Archdiocese of, Mesopotamia (Iraq), see of the Latin and Syrian Rites. (1) In the Latin Rite the see is directly dependent on the Holy See. Founded at Damascus in 1029, transferred to Baghdad, 1742, and raised to an archbishopric, 1848, it comprises the missions of Baghdad, founded, 1721, and entrusted to the Diocese of Mosul, dating from 1750 and placed in care of the Dominicans. The archiepiscopal residence is at Mosul. Francis Berré was appointed to the see, 1921, succeeding John Druve, archbishop from 1902. Catholics, 54,000. (2) The see of the Syrian Rite was established in 1862, and comprises Baghdad and Bassorah. Churches, 2; priests, 5; Catholics, 1300.

Bahamas, colony of the British Empire, in the British West Indies, administered by a governor and commander-in-chief, assisted by an executive council, a legislative council, and a representative assembly; area, 4404 sq. m.; est. pop., 58,101. The first time a Catholic priest visited the Bahamas was in 1845 when Fr. Duquesney sojourned six weeks at Nassau and conducted services in a private residence for a few Catholic Cubans and Haitians. In 1863 Rev. J. W. Cummings of New York, and in 1865 Rev. T. Byrne, each spent several weeks in Nassau and ministered to the settlers. Beginning in the year 1866, Rev. Dr. Nelligan of Charleston paid regular visits to the islands and they were considered part of the Diocese of Charleston, S. C. In 1880 Bp. H. P. Northrop stopped here, and at his suggestion the Vicar-General of Nassau was placed in the jurisdiction of the Abp. of New York. In Feb., 1885, Rev. C. G. O'Keefe of New York, then in Nassau, assembled the Catholics, and on 25 Aug., 1885, the cornerstone of the first Catholic church in the Bahamas was laid. Fr. O'Keefe was in charge until 1889, and in Oct. of that year Rev. D. P. O'Flynn arrived in Nassau with four Sisters of Charity from Mount St. Vincent, N. Y., and immediately erected a free school for colored pupils, and a private school. A new mission was organized at Salvador Point, Andros Island, in 1893, and in 1897 the Sacred Heart mission was founded in the eastern part of Nassau. During the first quarter of the 20th century the Catholic Church here has progressed owing to the zealous labors of the Benedictine Fathers who have opened new churches.
missions, and schools throughout the islands. The Bahamas belong ecclesiastically to the Archdiocese of New York (q.v.). In 1929 there were 10 churches, 16 mission stations, 3 regular clergy and the vicar forane, 1 academy, 6 primary schools, 1 nursery and dispensary, and about 500 Catholics. —U.K.

Bahia, bá'ī-a (Port., bay), or SÃO SALVADOR DA BAHIA DE TODOS OS SANTOS, city, capital of the state of the same name, Brazil. Thomé de Sousa, first governor of Brazil, arrived at Bahia in 1549 with six Jesuits, the first to come to the New World, and two days later the first Mass was said there. In 1553 Ven. José Anchieta, S.J., the apostle of Brazil, founded a native mission near the city. The seminary at Bahia was founded by Damasus de Abreu Vieira, O.F.M., and in 1583 the Benedictines established the Abbey of São Sebastião. In the beginning of the 19th century Bahia contained houses of the Benedictines, Franciscans, Carmelites, Augustillians, Italian Catholic tertiaries, a Mercy hospital, a leper hospital, two orphanages, and many schools. It is the seat of a vicar forane; 1 academy, 16 primary schools, 1 nursery and dispensary, and about 500 Catholics.

Baker, Francis Asbury (1820-65), co-founder of the Paulist Institute, b. Baltimore, Md. He became an Episcopalian minister, 1839; was converted as a result of the Oxford Movement, 1853; entered the Redemptorists; and was ordained priest, 1856. Later he severed his connection with the Redemptorists to assist in establishing the well-known Paulist Institute, which is largely indebted to him for its impressively juridical observance and its tradition of short practical sermons; his own are models of lucidity and neatness.—C.E.

Baker City, Diocese of, comprises central and eastern Oregon; area, 68,000 sq. m.; established, 1903; suffragan of Oregon. Bishops: Charles O'Reilly (1903-18); Joseph McGrath (1919). Churches, 54; priests, secular, 18; priests, regular, 9; religious women, 117; academies, 5; industrial school, 1; students attending Catholic schools, 1018; institutions, 3; Catholic, 7851.

Balaam, bā'lam, a prophet in Old Testament history. As he was a sorcerer of wide repute, the help of his curses was invoked by King Balak of Moab against the hosts of Israel who were marching on the Dead Sea and the Jordan. On the road to Balac, Balaam beat the ass he rode for starting in fear from the roadway. The ass startled him by rebuking him for his cruelty. He then suddenly became aware of the presence of an angel who warned him not to disobey God. All his efforts at enchantment against Israel only ended in multiplied benedictions on the Hebrews. His seer's vision showed him a glorious star and a mighty scepter to rise out of Jacob. By his advice, however, women were used to seduce the Hebrews into idolatry, not without success. In the resulting war many of the chosen people as well as many of the Medes, with Balac and Balaam, lost their lives (Num. 22:24 and 31).—C.E.

Baldina, SAINT, virgin, martyr (130). She is believed to have been the daughter of the tribune and martyr, St. Quirinus. Her relics are claimed to be in the cathedral at Cologne. Feast, 31 March.—C.E.

Baldachinum, a dome-like canopy in wood, stone, or metal erected over a high altar, either supported by columns or suspended by a chain; also known as a ciborium. It originated in the altar-canopy, a square covering suspended over the altar to protect it from dust or material falling from the ceiling. The most notable example is that of St. Peter's in Rome, designed by Bernini for Urban VIII. The name is derived from Baldacco, Italian form for Baghdad, whence came precious materials used for these canopies. The term is also applied to movable canopies which are used in processions or to those placed over an episcopal throne.—C.E.

Baldred, Saint, Bp. of Glasgow, d. Alclame, Haddingtonshire, Scotland, c. 608. He was of Irish ancestry, and succeeded St. Kentigern in the See of Glasgow. The disturbed conditions of the time forced him to retire from his see, and he is said to have ended his life as a hermit. He has often been confounded with the hermit Baldred, or Balderh (d. c. 750), who was associated with the See of Lindisfarne. Relics in various churches throughout Scotland. Feast, 6 March.—C.E.

Baldwin of Canterbury (d. 1190), archbishop, b. probably near Exeter, England; d. Acre, Palestine. He was Abbot of the Cistercian Abbey of Ford, in Devonshire. Consecrated Bp. of Worcester, he was elected Abp. of Canterbury, 1180. He preached the Third Crusade, and set out for the Holy Land, 1190. While there he acted as viceregent of the patriarch. He died during the siege of Acre.—C.E.

Ball and the Cross, The, the title of a fantastic and symbolic novel by G. K. Chesterton (Lond., 1910), in which Catholicism and atheism are opposed, first in the persons of an antiquated monk and a “Professor Lucifer,” and, second, in those of a Highland Catholic and a London atheist. The title, suggested by the ball on St. Paul’s Cathedral and the cross on the Westminster dome, is also the title of a caption for an editorial section of the Catholic World.—Catholic World, Sept., 1910.

Ballarat, Diocese of, Australia, comprises the western part of the state of Victoria; established, 1874; suffragan of Melbourne. Fr. Patrick Dunne was the first priest appointed to the region. Bishops: Michael O’Connor (1874-83); James Moore (1884-1904); Joseph Higgins (1905-15), and Daniel Foley (1916). Churches, 173; priests, secular, 77; priests, regular, 8; religious women, 344; colleges, 2; high schools, 12; primary schools, 59; boarding schools, 10; institutions, 3; Catholics, 59,696.

Ballerini, Antonio (1805-81), Jesuit canonist, b. Verona, Italy. He wrote a condemnation of usury, defended the Probabilist theory in morals, and edited the summae of Sts. Antoninus and Raymond. His masterpiece, executed at the desire of Benedict XIV to refute the defective version of Quesnel, is a complete edition of the works of St. Leo the Great.—C.E.

—Girolamo (1702-81), theologian and canonist, brother of preceding. He edited the works of Card. Nolli of Verona, of Matteo Giberti, Bp. of Verona, and the sermons of St. Zeno.—C.E.

Balm or Balsam, an aromatic resin from the terebinth tree and other plants; it is mixed with the olive oil which is blessed as the Holy Chrism. It symbolizes the sweet odor of virtue.—C.E., II, 226. (J. P. S.)

Balmes, balmès, Jaime Luciano (1810-48), priest and philosopher, b. Vich, Spain; d. there. He was educated at Vich and at Cervera. His “Fundamental Philosophy,” an exposition of St. Thomas’s system in the light of 19th-century intellectual conditions, won for him a place among the philosophers of modern times. “Protestanism Compared with Catholicism in Their Relations with European Civilization” (1844), a reply to Guizot’s “History of Civilization in Europe,” is a philosophy of Christianity, with a critical analysis of the basic principles and influence of the two systems of religion.

Baltasar (Greek and Latin name for the Hebrew Aramaic, BELSHAZZAR: Babylonian, BELSHĀSU, “Bel protect the king”), according to the Bible the son of Nabuchodonosor, and the last king of Babylon. While he was giving a banquet a mysterious hand wrote on the wall the words, Mane, Thedel, Pharaoh, interpreted by Daniel as: “God hath numbered thy kingdom and hast finished it; thou art weighed in the balance and art found wanting; thy kingdom is divided and is given to the Medes and Persians” (Dan., 5). That night Darius and the Medes invaded the city and Baltasar was slain.

Berosus, Herodotus, and the cuneiform inscription seem to agree on Nabonidus as the name of the last king of Babylon. Josephus calls Baltasar his son and a grandson of Nabuchodonosor. Several cuneiform inscriptions tell of Baltasar, so-called son of Nabonidus, leasing a house, purchasing wool, leasing money, residing in Tema, or with his army in Aegypt, fleeing from Sippar, and finally being imprisoned in Babylon.—C.E.

Baltimore, city, Maryland, named for the Catholic founder of Maryland, Cecil Calvert, second Lord Baltimore, and see of the oldest diocese of the Catholic Church in the United States. The first white man settled on the site in 1682, and the town was planned and named in 1730. Complete religious liberty was enjoyed until seizure of the government by the Puritans (1652-58) after which it was restored until 1692. The first German Catholic congregation was established in 1702, and in 1755 nine hundred Catholic Acadians went to Maryland, and though Catholics were forbidden to harbor them, they obtained an unfinished house in Baltimore to serve as a chapel. A Catholic school established in the city in 1757 was forced to close by the violent persecution of Protestant clergymen. The mission at Baltimore was first attended by priests from the Hickory Mission (founded 1720), and in 1766 the Jesuits arrived. The church was subject to English religious superiors until in 1784 Rev. John Carroll, brother of Charles Carroll of Carrollton, was appointed prefect Apostolic for the United States. He established residence in Baltimore c. 1785, and was consecrated bishop in 1790. He established a house of Sulpicians (St. Mary’s Seminary) in 1791, and in 1793 the first priest was ordained in the city. In 1791 the first diocesan synod in the United States was held in the bishop’s house ecclesiastical persons, ecclesiastical property, the sacraments, Divine worship, uniformity of discipline, and education of youth. The Third Plenary Council (1884) made further regulations for parochial and diocesan government, the sacraments, education of the clergy and Catholic youth, church property, and ecclesiastical trials; decreed six holy days of obligation for the country, appointed a commission to prepare a catechism for general use, to be obligatory when published, and signed the postulation for the introduction of the cause of the beatification of the Jesuit martyrs Isaac Jogues and Rene Goupil and the Iroquois virgin Catherine Tekakwitha. Baltimore has been the seat of a line of illustrious archbishops, including Kenrick, Spalding, and Gibbons, whose personal popularity and love of American institutions disarmed much prejudice and put the Church in a new light before many who had misunderstood its teaching and position. Parishioners of the cathedral have included the most distinguished Catholics of their times, and some of the most prominent figures in American history, notably Charles Carroll of Carrollton, signer of the Declaration of Independence, and Chief Justice Roger Brooke Taney. An undenominational college was conducted under the auspices of St. Mary’s Seminary of St. Sulpice from 1803 until 1852 when Loyola College was founded by the Jesuits. St. Patrick's school, begun by Rev. John Moranville (d. 1824) preceded all public schools in the city. In 1828 the Colored Oblate Sisters of Providence were founded by Rev. Jacques Joubert, and in 1831 the Carmelites arrived in Baltimore. The Jesuits were formally established there in 1833, and in the same year Abp. Whitfield erected from his private fortune St. James’s church for English-speaking Catholics, which passed later to the Redemptorists who built there the first convent of their order in the United States. The Visitations Nuns were established in 1837 under Mother Juliana Matthews, Sisters of Notre Dame, 1847, of Mercy, 1855, of the Good Shepherd, 1864, in a home donated by Mrs. Emily Machtavish, Little Sisters of the Poor, 1869. St. Francis Xavier’s church for colored Catholics was dedicated in 1864 and placed in charge of the Josephites brought from Mill Hill, England (1871). On the occasion of the diocesan centenary (1889) the leading Catholic laity participated in a Catholic congress, the first in the United States. There are 60 Catholic churches in the city and 56 parochial schools.—C.E.; U.K.

Baltimore, Archdiocese of, Maryland; embraces all the counties of Maryland west of Chesapeake Bay, and the District of Columbia; area, 12,862 sq. m.; diocese, 1799; archdiocese, 1809; suffragans: Charleston, Raleigh, Richmond, Savannah, St. Augustine, Wheeling, Wilmington, and the Abbey Nullius of Belmont. Bishops: John Carroll (1790-1815), Leonard Neale (1800-17), Ambrose Maréchal (1817-28), James Whitfield (1828-34), Samuel Eceleston (1834-51), Francis P. Kenrick (1851-63), Martin J. Spalding (1864-72), James R. Bayley (1872-77), James Cardinal Gibbons (1877-1921), Michael J. Curley (1921). Churches, 242; priests, secular, 260; priests, regular, 540; religious women, 217; universities, 2; seminaries, 2; colleges, 8; academies, 27; elementary schools, 150; pupils at elementary schools, 47,000, Institutions, 490 Catholic, 204,926.

Baltimore, Lords. See Calvert.

Baluze, bă’lüz, Etienne (1630-1718), historian, b. Tulle, France; d. Paris. A critical student of the origins, customs, and institutions of the French nation, his writings were based solely on genuine documents and original sources, and stimulated a scientific spirit in historical Britain. While librarian to Colbert he amassed a quantity of material of the greatest use to 19th-century historians. His chief writings are: “The Capitularies of the Frankish Kings”; “The Works of Marius Mercator”; and “Lives of the Avignon Popes.”—C.E.

Bamberg, city, Bavaria, and former principality of the Holy Roman Empire. It grew up in the early 10th century around the Castle of Babenburg and was the seat of a bishopric erected by Emperor Henry II (1008) who gave large temporal possessions to the diocese. Gifts from princes and emperors increased the territory until it included many estates in the Duchies of Carinthia, Salzburg, the Upper Palatinate, in Thuringia, and on the Danube, and the granting of many privileges established the secular power of the bishops. From the 13th century, a succession of 63 bishops, among whom were Luidger (1040-65; later Pope Clement II) and St. Otto I (1102-39), ruled this principality as princes of the empire, exercising temporal jurisdiction, disturbed at times by revolts in the city, over a territory of about 2900 sq. m. In 1802 Bavaria seized the prince-bishopric, then measuring 1276 sq. m. with a population of 207,000, from the last prince-bishop, Franz von Buseck, and secularization was accomplished in 1803, the territory passing to the Elector of Bavaria. By the terms of the Concordat between Rome and Bavaria, 1817, the present Archdiocese of Bamberg was erected. Besides in its present Romanesque form in the 13th century, there are the 11th-century basilica of St. James, the 12th-century abbey-church of St. Michael, and the palace of the prince-bishops built in 1695 by Lothair Franz. —C.E.; U.K.

Bambino (It., child), a figure of the Infant Jesus, usually represented as in the manger or crib at Bethlehem, and exposed in Catholic churches from Christmas to Epiphany. It owes its origin to the devotion of St. Francis of Assisi in the early 13th century. Il Santo or Santissimo Bambino is the name given to a jeweled, wooden figure of the Infant Saviour in the Franciscan church of Ara Coeli, Rome. According to legend it was brought from the Holy Land about 1647. It is carried in procession on Christmas Day as well as on the Epiphany, and is reputed to possess miraculous powers. Of the various other celebrated bambini the most notable are in the Trappist monasteries at Kensington, London, Staplehill in Dorset, and Mount St. Bernard in Leicestershire, England.

Bancroft, George (1800-91), historian and statesman, b. Worcester, Mass.; d. Washington, D. C. As secretary of the navy, 1845, he built the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and as temporary secretary of war, 1846, he issued the order to Gen. Taylor that precipitated the Mexican War. He was U. S. Minister to Austria, 1829-49, and to Berlin, 1867-74. His most celebrated work is the monumental history of the American colonies (1834-74). His revised edition (1883-85) is inferior in scholarship to the original. —U.K. (L. J. K.)

Banderole (Fr., little banner), small flag or streamer; in heraldry, a streamer from the crook of a bishop's crosier; in architecture, band used in decorative sculpture.

Bañez, bâ'nëth, Domingo (1529-1604), theologian, b. Medina del Campo, Spain; d. there. He joined the Dominicans, 1546, and became eminent as an exponent and defender of Thomistic doctrine. His life was devoted to teaching in the universities of Avila, Alcalá, Salamanca, and the Dominican college at Valladolid. For many years he was St. Teresa's spiritual director. He wrote commentaries on the "Summa" of St. Thomas, and on several of Aristotle's works, but his name is better known in connection with the controversy originating, 1558, in the publication of the Jesuit Molina's treatise on free will and grace. To appease the resulting dissension, appeal was made to the Inquisition and finally to the Holy See, which resulted in permission for those on both sides to continue to teach their own views.—C.E.

Bangor, ancient diocese, Carnarvonshire, North Wales, probably founded in the 6th century, either by St. Daniel (d. 854) or by St. David. Its history before the Conquest is obscure. The cathedral, the smallest in England or Wales, destroyed by the Normans in 1071, rebuilt by them, burned 1402, and again rebuilt in the 16th century, has served since the Reformation, as both an Anglican cathedral and parish church. The diocese consisted of Anglesea, Carnarvonshire, the greater part of Merionethshire, and some parishes in the counties of Denbigh and Flintshire, and if either. Included in the episcopal list are Anian (1267-1303), who baptized Edward II, and Thomas Skevington, or Pace (1509-33), who completed the cathedral. The last Catholic bishop was William Glynn (1533-58).

Bangor, Use of, ancient rite according to the Church of Bangor, Wales; form of the Roman Liturgy, substantially agreeing with the ancient Sarum Missal, used in the diocese of Bangor and other parts of Wales prior to the Reformation. A Bangor Pontifical is preserved in the cathedral library of Bangor.

Bangor Abbey, name of two monastic establishments. (1) Abbey, founded in County Down, Ireland, by St. Comgall, 559, famous for its learning and austere rule. Destroyed by the Danes, 824, it was restored by St. Malachy in the 12th century, given to the Franciscans, 1409, to the Augustinians a century later, and finally dissolved under James I. (2) Abbey, Flintshire, Wales, the greatest monastic establishment in Wales, flourishing in the 6th and 7th centuries.—C.E.

Bangor Antiphonary, ancient Latin manuscript codex supposed to have been originally written at Bangor, Ireland.

Bangweolo, bang-wé-o'lo, Vicariate Apostolic of, Northern Rhodesia, founded 1913, formerly the northern part of the Vicariate Apostolic of Nyassa; entrusted to the White Fathers. Vicar Apostolic, Etienne Larue; residence is at Kasama, Chiluba. Churches and stations, 961; priests, 30; religious women, 11; seminary, 1; schools, 478; Catholics, 23,000.

Banim, Michael (1796-1874), novelist, b. Kilkenny, Ireland; d. Bootstown. He was an active worker in educational and economic movements, and wrote "The Croppy," "Father Connell," and, in collaboration with his brother, John, "The Tales of the O'Hara Family."

—John (1798-1842), novelist, brother of preceding, b. Kilkenny; d. there. His works include the well-known poem, "Saggartagh Aroon," "Damon and Pythias," a tragedy, several romances, and about half of the O'Hara tales. The Banim's rank as the leading Irish national novelists. Their purpose was to do for Ireland what Walter Scott did for Scotland.—C.E.

Banner, a symbol of victory, belonging to military and Fernando Soares, b. near Pibrour, Switzerland; d. Mt. Hope, Md. Sent to the Indian Mission in Maine, he was later pastor to the scattered Catholics in Eastport, Bangor, and Ellsworth. While at Ellsworth, during the Know-Nothing movement, he was tarred, feathered, and expelled from the vicinity by order of the town council. He built the first church in Bangor, 1858, became rector of the church of the Holy Ghost, and then superior of the Jesuit mission of New York and Canada.—C.E.

Baptism (Gr., baptismo, wash or immerse), the act of immersing or washing. In Holy Scripture it also signifies, figuratively, great suffering, e.g., Christ's Passion (Luke, 12). It is the "first" sacrament, in the order of its administration, and is the "door of the Church." Defined theologically, it is a sacrament, instituted by Christ, in which by the invocation of the Holy Trinity and external ablation with water one becomes spiritually regenerated and a disciple of Christ. St. Thomas says it is the "external ablation of the body performed with the prescribed form of words" (III, Q. lxvi, a. 1). The Sacrament of Baptism is absolutely necessary for salvation, because all are subject to original sin: wherefore Christ's words to Nicodemus, "Unless a man be born again of water and the Holy Ghost, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (John, 3). The chief effects of this sacrament are: (a) the impression of a character or seal by which we are incorporated with Christ (Gal., 3; I Cor., 6); Baptism, CEREMONIES OF. They are ancient and attached to the person to be baptized: "Dost thou renounce Satan? And all his works? And all his vows?" To each of these the person or his sponsor replies "I do renounce." The practice of renewing the baptismal vows is more or less widespread, particularly at the closing of a mission, or after receiving First Communion or the Sacrament of Confirmation.

Baptistery, a separate building or portion of the church set apart for the administration of Baptism, usually dedicated to St. John the Baptist and placed in the atrium or forecourt to signify that without Baptism man cannot enter the Church.
Attached at first only to cathedrals they multiplied rapidly, and by the 11th century were erected in almost every parish. Buildings were mainly octagonal or circular with a central chamber containing a pool, surrounded by an ambulatory for ministers and witnesses, and an ante-room; later chapels for Communion and Confirmation were introduced.
They are found throughout the Orient and in Italy especially after the 11th-century revival in architecture. The finest are those of Parma, Florence, and Pisa; there is one at Cranbrook, Kent, England.—C.E.

Baptistines. (1) Congregation of the Hermits of
St. John the Baptist, of France, founded, c. 1630, by Brother Michel de Saint-Sabine, to reform and unite hermits of various dioceses. (2) Congregation of Missionary Priests of St. John the Baptist,
(b) regeneration and remission of original sin
(and actual if necessary), as well as punishment due to sin, and infusion of sanctifying grace (with gifts). Baptism is administered by pouring water on the head of the candidate, saying at the same time, "I baptize thee, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," with the intention of Christ or His Church. The water must flow over the skin. These essentials are apart from the beautiful requirements of the Church for solemn Baptism. Infusion (pouring), immersion, and aspersion (sprinkling) are equally valid. The present ritual of the Latin Church allows for the first two, favoring infusion by the law of custom. Baptism of desire (sacraminum) and of blood (sanguinis) are called such analogically, in that they supply the remission of sin and the regenerative grace, but not the character; the former presupposes perfect charity or love of God (therefore implicitly the desire for the sacrament), while the latter is simply martyrdom for the sake of Christ or His Church. Without the Sacrament of Baptism or martyrdom it is commonly taught that infants cannot attain to the enjoyment of the Beatific Vision.—C.E.; U.K.; Pourrat, Theology of the Sacraments, St. L., 1914; Martindale, The Sacramen­tal System, N. Y., 1928; Ayrinhard, Legislation on Sacraments in the New Code, N. Y., 1918. (F. T. B.)

Baptismal Grace, sanctifying grace conferred in Baptism, inasmuch as it gives the recipient a right to special help from God to enable him to observe the commandments and so follow Christ worthily. Baptismal innocence is the state of the soul as the result of Baptism, a state which many saints are believed to have preserved until death.

Baptismal Name (Christian Name). From the earliest times names were given at Baptism. "A name is given, which should be taken from some person, whose eminent sanctity has given him a place in the catalogue of Saints. This similarity of name will stimulate to the imitation of his virtues and the attainment of his holiness" (Catechism of Trent).—C.E., X, 673; Yonge, History of Christian Names, Lond., 1894. (F. T. B.)

Baptismal Vows are those renunciations required of an adult candidate for Baptism just before the sacrament is conferred; in the case of an infant, they are made in his name by the sponsors. According to the Roman Ritual, three questions are addressed to the person to be baptized: "Dost thou renounce Satan? And all his works? And all his vows?" To each of these the person or his sponsor replies "I do renounce." The practice of renewing the baptismal promises is more or less widespread, particularly at the closing of a mission, or after receiving First Communion or the Sacrament of Confirmation.

Baptistines. (1) Congregation of the Hermits of
St. John the Baptist, of France, founded, c. 1630, by Brother Michel de Saint-Sabine, to reform and
unite hermits of various dioceses. (2) Congregation of Missionary Priests of St. John the Baptist, founded in Genoa by Domenico Olivieri, c. 1755, to hold missions in Rome and Italy. Some members were sent to Bulgaria, Macedonia, and China. The society disappeared in the Italian troubles of the 18th century. (3) Hermit Sisters of St. John the Baptist, founded in Genoa by Giovanna Solimani, 1730, cloistered and very rigorous in discipline, now maintaining several convents in Italy.—C.E.

Baptists (Gr., baptizo, dip in water), a Protestant religious denomination which originated, c. 1000, in England. It holds that immersion is necessary for valid baptism and that the Scriptures are the sole rule of faith and conduct. There were two main bodies among the English Baptists, those who accepted the theology of Arminius, maintaining redemption for all, and those who followed Calvin, admitting redemption for the elect alone. The General or Arminian Baptists were founded, c. 1606, when a congregation of separatists established themselves in Holland under the leadership of John Smyth. Later there were many divisions of this group. The Calvinistic or Particular Baptists, a branch of the separatists, were founded in London in 1633, and also had many subdivisions. The Baptists became prominent under Cromwell, flourishing especially in Wales. The Baptist Home Missionary Society was founded, 1779, and work among the heathen was begun by the Baptist Missionary Society under William Carey (1761-1854). The first Baptist church in the United States was independently established in Providence by Roger Williams, c. 1635. Organized mission work began c. 1755, and in 1814 the General Missionary Convention was formed. In 1845 it split into the American Baptist Missionary Union for the North, and the Southern Baptist Convention. In that year the slavery question divided Baptists into Northern, Southern, and Colored. In 1911 the Baptists joined the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and in 1925 were organized into fourteen national groups. In Canada the first church was founded, 1763, at Horton, Nova Scotia, by Rev. Ebenezer Moulton of New England, and membership increased with immigration. In 1889 was formed the Baptist Union, associations of Baptist churches in London in 1689, and adopted with additions by the Philadelphia Association in 1742; and the New Hampshire Confession adopted by the New Hampshire State Convention, 1852. The former is intensely Calvinistic, and the latter moderately so. However, these confessions are not binding, as the Word of God is considered the final court of appeal. The polity of the Baptist Church is congregational, each church being independent of control regarding discipline and worship, appointment of pastor, and election of deacons and other officers. In 1926 the Baptists numbered 10,276,179: America, 8,554,776; Europe, 1,626,188; Asia, 312,260; Africa, 50,888; Australasia, 32,065. In 1928 the Baptists were the third largest denomination in the United States with 9,008,449 members. The following are the more important Baptist sects: Baptist Union (q.v.), Colored Free Will Baptists, Duck River and Kindred Associations of Baptists, Free Will Baptists (q.v.), Free Will Baptists (Bullockites), General or Arminian Baptists, National Baptist Convention (q.v.), Northern Baptist Convention (q.v.), Primitive Baptists (q.v.), Primitive Colored Baptists, Regular Baptists (q.v.), Separate Baptists, Seventh-day Baptists, Seventh-day Baptists (German), Six-Principle Baptists, Southern Baptist Convention (q.v.), Strict and Particular Baptists, Two-Seed-in-the-Spirit Predominating Baptists, and United Baptists.—C.E.

Baptist Union, associations of Baptist churches in the British Isles organized in 1813. In 1927 there were: 2192 ministers; 4203 churches; and 415,083 members.

Barabbas (Aramaic, Bar-abba, son of the father), a notable robber and murderer who was released instead of Jesus by Pilate at the desire of the people (John, 18).

Baraga, bir'ga-ray', Frederic (1797-1868), Indian missionary, first Bp. of Marquette, b. Malavas, Carniola, Austria; d. Marquette, Mich. He was ordained, 1823; came to America, 1839; and labored for many years among the Indians of Michigan and Wisconsin. In 1853 the district was erected into a vicariate, and in 1856, into a diocease, under his charge, with the see first at Sault Ste. Marie and later at Marquette. He ranks among the foremost writers in American Indian literature, and is the author of the first Chippewa grammar and dictionary, an Ottawa prayer-book and Life of Christ, and other devotional works in Chippewa.—C.E.

Barbara, SAINT, virgin, martyr (235 or 238). According to her legendary acts she was the daughter of a rich heathen, Dioscorus. When she professed Christianity, she was cruelly tortured, condemned to death, and was beheaded by her father. Juliana was her companion in martyrdom. The place of her death is uncertain. Hierapolis in Egypt, Nicomedia, Antioch, Rome, and Hierapolis in Syria having been named. She has been popular in the East and West since the 7th century. G. K. Chesterton celebrates her in the poem, "The Ballad of St. Barbara." Patroness of artillerymen, architects, prisoners, founders, stone-masons, grave-diggers, fortifications; invoked against thunderstorms, fire, lightning, impotency, and sudden death; venerated as one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers (q.v.). Emblems: a tower, palm, chalice, and cannon. Relics at Burano, Italy, and Kief, Russia. Feast, R. Cal., 4 Dec.—C.E.; U.K.

Barber Family, remarkable early converts in the United States. Virgil Barber (1782-1847), an Episcopal minister, son of Daniel Barber (1756-1834), likewise a minister, became a Catholic in 1817, together with his wife and five children. They were followed into the Church by Mrs. Daniel Barber (Chloe Case Sims), her husband, and seven children. Virgil Barber and his wife entered religion, he becoming a Jesuit and she a Visitation nun, their profession taking place on the same day in Georgetown convent. All their children became religious.—C.E.

Barbour, JOHN (c. 1320-95), Scottish ecclesiatie and author of the historical poem, "The Bruce." He was Archdeacon of Aberdeen (1357), an auditor of the exchequer (1373), and one of the commissioners for the ransom of David II in 1357. "The Bruce," which is written in early Scottish dialect and for which he received several pensions, contains 8000 octosyllabic couplets, and is dedicated to freedom and to the exploits of Bruce and Douglas. It is a history, some of which was made use of by Scott. Among the principal editions is that of Professor Skeat for the "Early English Text Society." —C.E.

Barclay, WILLIAM (1546-1608), Scottish jurist, d. Angers, France. He was a professor of civil law in the University of Pont-à-Mousson, when his work on the royal power, in which, contrary to the usual Catholic view, he advocated the divine right of kings, brought him from James I of England the offer of a lucrative post, conditional on his apostasy. This he refused. He was also the author of a work on the Pandects, and a treatise on the papal power, which caused considerable controversy when published by his son John in 1609.—C.E.

Bardic Schools in Ireland (Gael., bard, minstrel or poet), schools for poets. There were seven grades of poets, distinguished from bards, who were relatively only rhymesters, and of which there were eight grades. These schools, which were attached rather to individual teachers than to localities, were the direct offshoots of the ancient pagan Druidic foundations, and taught by a comprehensive and specialized system or curriculum which included metrical text-books, fragments of which may be found in the Book of Leinster (c. 1150). These books prescribe a knowledge of magic, including numerous and varied incantations. The bardic poetry was remarkably metrical, although unrhymed; it was written in as many as 400 different meters, none of which, however, by the end of the 18th century, is found in use.

Bardey, island in Cardigan Bay, Carnarvonshire, North Wales; area, about 370 acres. The surface is hilly. The inhabitants are fishermen and farmers. In ancient times it was famous as the burial place of St. Dubricius. There are the graves of about 20,000 monks whose bodies were brought to the holy island for burial.

Bar-Hebraeus (Son of the Hebrew) or ABU-FARAJ (1226-96), philosopher, theologian, and historian, b. Malatia, Armenia; d. Maragha, Persia. He was the son of a Jewish convert to the Jacobite Rite. In 1246 he was consecrated bishop and in 1264 he became Maphrian or Primate of the East. The variety and profundity of his writings are almost beyond comprehension. His principal works are: "The Storehouse of Secrets," a doctrinal and critical commentary on the entire Bible; "The Cream of Science," an encyclopedia of human learning; "Chronicon," a universal history; compendiums of logic, dialectics, physics, and metaphysics; treatises on theology, canon law, ethics, rhetoric, mathematics, medicine, and other sciences; and an autobiography.—C.E.

Barjesus (Son of Jesus) or ELYMAS (wise, magician), a false prophet, struck temporarily blind for opposing Paul at Paphos in the conversion of Proconsul Sergius Paulus (Acts. 13).

Barlaam and Josaphat, principal characters of a Christianized version of a legend of Buddha. Josaphat, son of a 4th-century king in India, who persecuted the Christians, was kept in seclusion to prevent his conversion, which had been foretold. Barlaam, a hermit, succeeded in converting him.
His father later became a Christian and surrendered his throne. After ruling for a while, Josaphat resigned the crown and joined Barlaam, in the desert. The legend is widely diffused. Barlaam and Josaphat are mentioned in the Roman Martyrology, 27 Nov.; in the Greek calendar, 29 Aug.—C.E.

Barnabas, Saint, Apostle (c. 1-60), b. Island of Cyprus; d. probably there. Of Jewish parents he was converted to Christianity shortly after Pentecost, 29. Although not of the chosen Twelve Apostles, Barnabas is mentioned frequently in the Acts, and is included among the prophets and doctors at Antioch, where he received the name Barnabas, signifying “son of consolation” (Acts 4; 19). He became associated with St. Paul, with whom he worked for the conversion of the Gentiles, and whom he accompanied to Cyprus and the cities of Asia. He later made another visit to Cyprus with John Mark. Tradition states that he was martyred.

Barnabo da Terni (d. c. 1474), Franciscan missionary, founder of the first of the celebrated monti di pietà, at Perugia, 1462 (see Montes Piaeanum).—C.E.

Barocco Style, a picturesque, exalted, architectural style which prevailed in ecclesiastical architecture for nearly two centuries, and which is associated mainly with Michelangelo, its creator, and with the architects Bernini and Borromini. It is an interpretation of joy, the characteristic of which is imagination, picturesqueness, immensity, and harmony between building and environment, with a suggestion of movement, symbolism, and color. It employs curves, towers, and characteristic cupolas, often accompanied by two subordinate towers. Copper caps, sometimes turnip-shaped, are also used, together with stairways symbolic of penitential progress, just as the interiors are flooded, symbolically, with light. Barocco has been often misrepresented by fanciers of other architectural styles. For illustration see Architecture.—U.K.; Squirrel, Baroque Art, in Dublin Review, Jan., 1927.

Barocyclonometer, an instrument which unites features of a cyclometer and an aneroid barometer, and which is used to detect the approach of typhoons. José Algué, S.J., director of the Philippine Island Weather Bureau, invented it. It is employed on vessels navigating the East Indian and Pacific Oceans, and the U. S. government has fitted out U. S. battleships with such instruments, specially adapted for sailing on the Atlantic Ocean. —U.K.

Barometer (Gr., baros, pressure; metron, measure), an instrument to measure atmospheric pressure, invented by Evangelista Torricelli, consisting essentially of a hollow vertical glass tube, containing mercury; the upper end is sealed and the lower end is immersed in an open container of mercury. The varying weight of the atmosphere due to weather conditions acts upon the mercury in the container and is indicated by the variation of the height of the mercury in the tube. A special barometer known as the Faua barometer designed to foretell the approach of typhoons was invented by Fr. Frederic Faura, S.J., founder of the Manila Observatory.

Baron, Bonaventura (1610-96), Franciscan theologian and historiographer; b. Clonmel, Ireland; d. Rome. He wrote theological works to defend the Scotist system, then generally attacked. In 1676 he was appointed historiographer by Cosimo de' Medici. His last work was a history of the Trinitarian Order from 1198 to 1297.—C.E.

Baronius, Cesare (1538-1607), cardinal, father of modern church history, b. Sora, Naples; d. Rome. He studied in Rome, became a follower of Philip Neri, and was ordained, 1564. Upon the foundation of the Oratory, 1575, he moved to Santa Maria in Vallicella, and in 1584 was entrusted with the revision of the Roman Martyrology. His great work, “Annales Ecclesiastici,” conceived by Philip as a reply to the attempt to Protestantize history in the “Centuries of Magdeburg,” was published in 12 volumes, 1588-1607. After the appearance of the 11th volume, containing a treatise on the Sicilian insurrection of 1601, the papacy’s claim to the suzerainty of Naples and Sicily as prior to that of Spain, the whole work was condemned by the Spanish Inquisition. Baronius became superior of the Oratory, 1595, cardinal, 1596, and was named librarian of the Vatican and charged with the Vatican Press, 1597. He received strong support as a candidate for the papacy in the conclaves of 1605. The “Annales” largely a chronological table from the birth of Christ to 1198, is marked by diligent research and accuracy, but Baronius’s limited knowledge of Latin and Greek, and his use of documents since proved apocryphal, led him occasionally into error. The work, however, is a rich source from which historians have constantly drawn. It was a complete reply to the Centuriators. The history of later periods has been added by other historians. G. Mansi edited the most convenient complete edition, Lucca, 1738-59; the latest edition (Bar-le-Duc, 1864-75; continued, Paris, 1876-83) is incomplete. —C.E.; U.K.; Kerr, Life of Cesare Card. Baronius, Lond., 1898.

Barron, Edward (1801-54), missionary, b. Waterford, Ireland; d. Savannah, Ga. He was appointed titular Bp. of Constantia and Vicar Apostolic of the Two Guineas; became pastor of St. Mary’s, Philadelphia, and president of St. Charles Borromeo’s Theological Seminary; and spent five years caring for the Negro Catholics of Liberia.
Barry, John (1745-1803), captain, when that was the highest grade in the United States Navy, b. Taceumshane, Wexford, Ireland; d. Philadelphia. After being given command of the first warship, the Lexington, 1775, he was successful in capturing many British vessels during the American Revolution. When by Act of Congress, 27 March, 1794, the United States Navy was permanently organized, Washington, with the consent of the Senate, appointed six captains, of whom Barry ranked first. —C.E.; Griffin, Commodore John Barry, Phila., 1902.

Bartholomew, Saint, Apostle, listed among the twelve Apostles (Matt., 10; Mark, 3; Luke, 6). Mention of him occurs infrequently in the Gospels, probably because Bartholomew was his patronymic rather than his proper name, and meant “son of Talmai or Tholmai”; some commentators identify him with Nathanael (John, 1), although this theory is nowhere conclusively proved. Bartholomew was introduced to Christ by his friend, St. Philip; his missionary labors brought him to India, Mesopotamia, Parthia, and Lycaonia. He is said to have died in Alhanopolis, Armenia, but the stories of his death differ; according to one he was beheaded; others state that he was flayed alive and crucified. For this reason he is usually represented in art as flayed and holding his skin in his own hand. Emblems: knife, cross. Feast, R. Cal., 24 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Bartholomew or Bartholomaeus Parvus (d. 1333), apostle of Armenia, b. Bologna, Italy. Having entered the Dominican Order, he became noted as a capable theologian and zealous preacher. At the head of a band of Dominican missionaries, he was sent by John XXII to Armenia to keep the Catholic Armenians united at Rome, and to convert schismatics, and met with great success, particularly in the conversion of the superior monks of the monastery at Kherna. He translated the Psalter, and some works of St. Augustine and St. Thomas Aquinas, into Armenian.—C.E.; Gigot, Outlines of Jewish History, N. Y., 1897.

Baruch, Book or, in the Catholic Bible, an inspired writing containing, in five chapters, the prophecy with which Baruch consoled the Jewish exiles on the River Sedi and which they sent, with some rescued silver vessels, back to Jerusalem. A sixth chapter is made of the Epistle of Jeremias, which seems rather to be of the authorship of Jeremias than of Baruch.—C.E.; Seisenburger, tr. Buchanan, Practical Handbook for the Study of the Bible, N. Y., 1911.

Basel, Council of, convoked by Pope Martin V in 1431, closed at Lausanne in 1449. Its principal aims were the reformation of the Church in its “head and members;” the settlement of the Hussite wars, the establishment of peace in Europe, and the end of the Great Schism. Card. Cesarini was named president of the assembly by Martin V. The objections to the council were numerous but the real breach occurred when it proposed to reform the Roman chancery without consulting the pope, who therefore transferred the council to Ferrara, despite the continuous sittings of the recalcitrants under Card. Louis Aleman at Basel. Exasperated, they subjected the authority of the pope to general councils, pretended to depose the ruling Pope Eugenius IV, and elected as antipope, Felix V. After lingering some years in obscurity, the Council of Basel closed at Lausanne. Except for the publication of the Hussites, the council spent its time wrangling with the popes; it shook men’s faith in the spiritual power of the pope, and led through the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges to the establishment of Gallicanism.—C.E.

Basilian Rule (Rule of St. Basil) comprises instructions dealing with the guiding principles of monastic life, rather than specific regulations concerning its organization and administration; such details it leaves to individual superior, treating rather of the spirit which should inform monastic foundations. A variety of observances in the East traditionally followed this Rule which, enriched by the decisions of councils, formed a bond of unity between the numerous monasteries (see Basilians). The Rule, drawn up in the catechetical manner, the questions presenting virtues to be practised or vices to be avoided, the replies generally containing a Scriptural reference, is divided into two parts: the “Greater” and the “Lesser.” Translated into Latin by Rufinus as a single Rule, it was followed as such by some Western monasteries.—C.E.

Basilians, popular name for the priests of the Community of St. Basil, founded in Cappadocia in the 4th century by St. Basil, under his Rule. This Rule spread gradually to all the monasteries of the East and at an early date acquired supremacy in the religious communities of the Greek world. In Italy and Sicily the monasteries of Basilians were always in communion with the Holy See. The monastery of Rossano founded by St. Nilus the Younger, and those of San Salvatore of Otranto, San Salvatore of Messina, and Grottaferrata deserve mention. Recently the monasteries established by Greek monks in these countries have been united into congregations: the Melchite Congregation of St. Saviour, dating from 1715, has 10 monasteries, 170 priests, 15 brothers, and 30 sisters; the Ruthenian Congregation of St. Saviour, dating from 1595 and reorganized by St. Josaphat, has 21 monasteries, 460 religious of whom 113 are priests, and 117 lay brothers; the Congregation of Aleppo, separated in 1829 from the Congregation of Chueir, has 7 monasteries, 47 priests, 18 brothers, and 26 sisters; the Baladite Congregation has 4 monasteries and 3 hospices. In Lithuania reformed Basilians work in the Apostolate in connection with the Uniat clergy. A reform of Italian Basilians, dating from 1573, showed an inclination towards the use of the Latin Liturgy, which some monasteries adopted altogether. The Spanish Basilian monasteries, dating from the 18th century, also followed the Latin Liturgy; they were suppressed together with other orders in 1833. There is a teaching order of Basilians, founded by Mgr. d’Aviau, Abp. of Vienne, France, during the French Revolution; established at Annecy, 1802; approved, 1863; banished from France, 1905; and now established in England and America, with four colleges and parishes in Canada (at Montreal, Toronto, London, Winnipeg, and Edmonton) and in the United States (particularly in Detroit, Houston, Omaha, Rochester, and Aurora).—C.E.; U.K.

Basilica (Gr. basilikos, royal), an oblong building with an apse at one end and lighted from above. It was usually rectangular with a width not greater than one-half nor less than one-third its length, divided by rows of columns into a central nave and a surrounding lower, narrower aisle or ambulatory. The upper part of the nave (crypt) was lighted by a row of arched windows over the roofs of the aisles, and similar windows lighted the aisles. Basilicas were the first pagan edifices to be converted into Christian churches, being best adapted for Christian worship. The altar was placed within or before the apse, and arches from nave, aisles, and apse opened into the transept, a cross hall of the same height as the nave interposed between nave and apse for practical purposes and for the symbolism of the cross. At the entrance end opposite the apse was the narthex, a portico beyond which neophytes were not at first admitted. As the priest was supposed always to face the east, basilicas were built with the entrance façade toward the east when he faced the congregation and toward the west when it became customary for him to turn his back to them. The title of basilica is now given by the pope to privileged churches remarkable for antiquity or historical associations. They are either major (patriarchal) or minor, privileged with the right of precedence as churches, special insignia, and a college of clergy entitled to the rochet and cappa. Among the most notable are those of St. Peter, St.
BASILICA

Basilides, Saint. Martyrs of this name are mentioned in the old martyrologies on 10, 12, and 28 June; the list for 10 and 12 June, concerning a Basilides martyred at Rome, on the Via Aurelia, is very involved; apparently the same martyr is referred to on both days, although the names of his companions differ on each day. The best-known saint by this name, however, was an officer of the court at Alexandria, who was commissioned to lead St. Potamiana to her death. Feeling compassion for her, he counselled her to be converted, and for this, as well as for the gift of his faith, he was rewarded with her baptism, and then, on her death, his body was beheaded. Feast, 30 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Basilisk (Gr., basiliskos, little king), a fabulous monster formerly believed to exist in Africa and sometimes identified with the cockatrice. Its breath was a curse; its look was reputed fatal, it being successfully combated only by the weasel or by means of a mirror. It is described as about a foot long, black and red in color, with a white, crown-like spot on the head, whence its name. It is referred to in the Bible, under the names of adder, asp, cobra, flying serpent, and viper (Is., 59).

Basil the Great (Gr., basileios, kingly), St., confessor, Doctor of the Church (329-379), Bp. of Caesarea, B., Cappadocia; d. there. His father was St. Basil the Elder, his grandmother St. Macrina. He studied at Caesarea, Constantinople, and Athens, where he became acquainted with Julian the Apostate, 335, and St. Gregory of Nazianzus. He introduced the cenobitic form of religious life into the East, and for this reason is known as the “Father of Oriental monasticism.” In 364 he was ordained priest, and in 370 he succeeded to the See of Caesarea. His episcopacy was distinguished by the many reforms he effected among the clergy and laity, and for his fearlessness in defending the Church. He is represented carrying a church in his hand, and giving food to the poor. Feast, R. Cal., 14 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Basin, Ecclesiastical Use of. Basins, often of ornamental metal, are prescribed for ablations, especially at the Lavabo of the Mass, and in preparation of ablutions of bishops' hands.

Bassein, town, India, 29 m. N. of Bombay, on the island of the same name. It was founded in 1536 and became the most important Portuguese settlement in northern India and a center of missionary activity. St. Francis Xavier visited it in 1544 and again in 1548 when he founded the College of the Holy Name of God. It was the birthplace in 1564 of St. Gonçalo Garcia, the Indian martyr. The Franciscan Fr. Antonio do Porto, known as the apostle of Bassein, founded an orphanage in the northern Bassein district in 1555 and it was there that the first Indian martyrs suffered in 1549. The town was taken from the Portuguese by the Maharrattas in 1739 and from the latter by the English in 1802. It is still an important center of Catholicism and a place of pilgrimage. Catholics, 1590.—C.E.

Bassett, Joshua (c. 1641-1720), convert and controversialist, b. Lynn Regis, England; d. London. Elected Master of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, England, under James II, he declared himself a Catholic, had Mass celebrated in his rooms at the college, and altered the college statutes unfavorable to Catholics.—C.E.

Basutoland, Vicariate Apostolic of, comprises Basutoland, South Africa, founded as a pre­fecture Apostolic, 1894, raised to a vicariate, 1909. The Basutos, a branch of the Bechuana family of Bantu Negroes, are an agricultural people, moral, intelligent, and industrious; many have been converted to Christianity. Catholic missions are under the Oblates of Mary Immaculate, to whom the vicariate is entrusted. Mgr. Cenez was appointed vicar Apostolic, 1909; residence at Roma. Churches and chapels, 116; missions, 19; priests, 28; religious vows, 118; seminary, 1; schools, 118; Catholics, 50,114.

Bath Abbey, Bath, England, founded, 676, by King Osric for a community of nuns. It subsequently passed to the Benedictines, and was re­formed by St. Dunstan. King Edgar was crowned in the abbey-church, 973. St. Elphège was abbot for a time. In 1088 William Rufus (q.v.) granted the abbey several benefices, and lands to John of Villula, Bp. of Wells, who later restored the lands to the abbey. Destroyed by fire, 1137, it was later rebuilt. In the 13th century a dispute arose between the monks and the canons of Wells as to their respective rights in electing the bishop. By a decree of Innocent IV the election was held alternately in either city, the bishop had a throne in both churches, and was thenceforth styled Bp. of Bath and Wells. The monastery was suppressed, 1539, and the present church occupies only the nave of the Norman structure begun, 1500, to replace John of Villula’s church. It was re­stored, 1574.—C.E.

Bath and Wells, ancient see, coextensive with Somersetshire, England, instituted 909, with Ethel­stan, convert and ruler of Wessex. It comprised the bishopric at Wells, founded in 888, and the bishopric at Wells alone. William Barlow (1549), a Jesuit, was succeeded by Gilbert Baines (1554-59), the last Catholic bishop (d. 1569).

Bathilde, Saint, queen (630-680), b. England; d. Chelles, France. A slave in the household of Erchinoald, mayor of the palace of Neustria, Clovis II, attracted by her beauty and prudence, married her in 649. As regent for her son, Clothaire III, she abolished trade in Christian slaves, suppressed simony, and established hospitals and numerous monasteries. Her last 15 years were spent in the Abbey of Chelles which she had founded near Paris. Relics at Chelles. Feast, 20 Jan.; Paris, 30 Jan.—C.E.; Butler, 30 Jan.

Bathurst, Diocese of, Australia, comprises certain territory in New South Wales immediately
west of the Dividing Range; established, 1865; suffragan of Sydney. Bishops: Matthew Quinn (1865-85), Joseph Byrne (1885-1901), John Dunne (1901-19), Michael O'Farrell (1929-28), and John Norton (1928). Churches, 98; priests, secular, 46; priests, regular, 8; religious women, 317; colleges, 4; high schools, 23; primary schools, 38; institutions, 4; Catholics, 34,067.

Batiffol, bá-ti-fol, PIERRE (1861-1929), prelate and historian, b. Paris; d. there. He was first chaplain at the College Ste. Barbe, 1889-98, during which period he published his "History of the Roman Breviary." In 1898 he became rector of the Catholic University of Toulouse, which position he resigned after nine years. During his rectory he published "Etudes d'histoire et de théologie positive," "L'Enseignement de Jésus," and "L'Eucharistie," which were based on the researches he had made. In 1913 he took up the "History of the Church of Rome," which was approved after corrections. He spent the remainder of his life in Paris, where he wrote a series of scholarly essays on early church history: "L'Eglise naissante et le Catholicisme," translated under the title "Primitive Catholicism," "La Paix Constantinienne," "Le Catholicisme de St. Augustin," "Le Saint pontificiel," and a biography of John Gregory the Great. Their apologetic value cannot be exaggerated. He also took an important part in the Mechlin Conversations (q.v.), publishing afterwards a book of essays, called "Catholicisme et Papauté" (Catholicism and Papacy). (F. P. D.)

Battandier, ALBERT (1850-1921), scholar, b. St. Félicien, Ardèche, France; d. there. Educated at the Jesuit college of Mornax in 1879, he came an elector of the Holy Roman Empire, Bavaria, a prominent ally of the counter-Reformation and the Catholic League. It remained a wholly Catholic country until 1799 when, with the accession of Maximilian IV, Catholics were oppressed and Lutheranism tolerated. Under Louis I (1825-48) and Maximilian I (1850-61), who became a prelate and historian, b. Paris; d. there. He was first chaplain at the College Ste. Barbe, 1889-98, during which period he published his "History of the Roman Breviary." In 1898 he became rector of the Catholic University of Toulouse, which position he resigned after nine years. During his rectory he published "Etudes d'histoire et de théologie positive," "L'Enseignement de Jésus," and "L'Eucharistie," which were based on the researches he had made. In 1913 he took up the "History of the Church of Rome," which was approved after corrections. Their apologetic value cannot be exaggerated. He also took an important part in the Mechlin Conversations (q.v.), publishing afterwards a book of essays, called "Catholicisme et Papauté" (Catholicism and Papacy). (F. P. D.)

Bavaria, now a free state of the German Republic; area, 29,334 sq. m., pop., 7,379,584, including 5,163,117 Catholics, 2,111,993 Protestants, and 49,145 Jews. Christianity was probably introduced to the country by the Roman general Tiberius Clemens, in 50 A.D., and spread rapidly. The first Christian bishop was named Urcidius. After the barbarian invasions in the 5th century that the evangelization of the country progressed. For an account of the missionary efforts in this region see Germany. Bavaria was settled by the Boii in the 1st century B.C. for special occasions, and accounts of his travels.

Bayard, bá-yär', CHEVALIER DE (PIERRE DU TERRAIL; 1475-1524), French knight and national hero, renowned for his bravery. He became the outstanding type of chivalry and is known as the knight "sans peur et sans reproche" (without fear and without reproach).

Bayer, ADÈLE (1814-92), philanthropist, b. Belgium; d. Brooklyn, N. Y. She was the daughter of Andrew Parmentier, horticulturist and landscape gardener, and wife of Edward Bayer, a German Catholic merchant. Assisted by her mother, she devoted her fortune and life to aiding the Indian missions, the Little Sisters of the Poor, and especially seamen and the United States Marines at Brooklyn Navy Yard. —C. E.
Bayma, bā-'mā, Joseph (1810-92), mathematician and scientist, b. Piedmont, Italy; d. Santa Clara, Cal. He entered the Society of Jesus, 1832. Exiled from Italy in 1860, he took refuge at Stonyhurst, England, where he wrote his “Realis Philosophia.” He is best known for his “Molecular Mechanics,” a metaphysical mathematical work dealing with the constitution of matter. In 1868 Bayma left England for California, where he taught mathematics for many years at Santa Clara and published several scientific text-books.—C.E.

BB. = beati (blessed).

B.C. = before Christ.

B.C.L. = Baccalaureus Civilis Legis (Bachelor of Civil Law); or Baccalaureus Canonice Legis (Bachelor of Canon Law).

Beadle, bedel, or Bedell (A.-S., beodel, a messenger), an inferior officer of the Anglican Church whose prototype, in the Catholic Church, was the mansionarius (of or belonging to a dwelling or lodging), and possibly an officer known as the pammansionarius (watcher or warden), by some, however, interpreted as bailiff. Under Gregory the Great the beadle was called also custos ecclesie (guardian of the church), whose duty it was to light the lamps or candles therein, a survival of which is seen in the French suisse (of or belonging to a dwelling or lodging), the declaration by the pope as head of the Church that one of its members deserves for saintly life as confessor or heroic death as martyr, to be entitled blessed, that is, regarded as dwelling in the happiness of heaven. The declaration is preceded by a double process, the first consisting of an examination into the life, virtues, writings, and reputation for holiness of the candidate of the Church, the second, by the Holy See in case of a martyr, and of the servant of God in question, conducted ordinarily by the bishop of the place in which he or she died or lived a long time. In the case of a martyr no miracles are required in this first process, but they are required for others. The second process, known as the Apostolic process, is instituted by the Holy See in case of a martyr. The first inquiry shows that there is a likelihood of proving that the Servant of God practised virtue to an heroic degree, or died by the heroic death of martyrdom. To go further and obtain canonization, miracles are required for both martyrs and confessors. See CANONIZATION.—C.E.; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1917.

Bear, emblem in art associated with Sts. Averinus and Columbanus because of incidents connected with bears.

Beard, the hair that grows on a man’s chin and cheek. Among the Jews and other Orientals the beard was cherished as a symbol of virility. It has been customary from early days for the clergy of the Latin Church to cut off or shave their beards. In the 16th and 17th centuries the contrary practice prevailed, and beards are now worn by the priests of the Eastern churches, both Uniat and Schismatic, by foreign missionaries, by certain religious like the Capuchins, and by individual priests for reasons of health.—C.E.; U.K.

Beardsley, Aubrey Vincent (1872-95), illustrator, b. Brighton, England; d. Mentone, France. Self-taught except for a brief course at Westminster Art School, he achieved fame by his illustrations for the “Morte d’Arthur,” “The Yellow Book,” and “The Savoy.” Many critics rank him with Dürer as a draughtsman. His last work was the illustration of an edition of Ben Jonson’s “Volpone.” He became a Catholic in 1885.—C.E.

Beata Nobis Gaudia, or ROUND ROLL THE WEEKS OUR HEARTS TO GREET, hymn for Lauds on 18 Jan., feast of St. Peter’s Chair at Rome; on 22 Feb., feast of St. Peter’s Chair at Antioch; and on 29 June, feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, when the hymns “Beata Pastor Petre, clemens accipe” and “Egregie Doctor Paule, mores instrue” are combined into one hymn. It is attributed to Elpis, Boethius’s wife, who died about 493. The English title given is from the translation by T. Ball.—Britt.

Beate Pastor Petre, clemens accipe, or O PETER, SHEPHERD GOOD, OUR VOICES SING OF THEE, hymn for Lauds on 18 Jan., feast of St. Peter’s Chair at Rome; on 22 Feb., feast of St. Peter’s Chair at Antioch; and on 29 June, feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, when the hymns “Beata Pastor Petre, clemens accipe” and “Egregie Doctor Paule, mores instrue” are combined into one hymn. It is attributed to Elpis, Boethius’s wife, who died about 493. The English title given is from the translation by T. Ball.—Britt.

Beatification (Lat., beatus, blessed; facere, to make), the declaration by the pope as head of the Church that one of its members deserves for saintly life as confessor or heroic death as martyr, to be entitled blessed, that is, regarded as dwelling in the happiness of heaven. The declaration is preceded by a double process, the first consisting of an examination into the life, virtues, writings, and reputation for holiness of the candidate of the Church, the second, by the Holy See in case of a martyr, and of the servant of God in question, conducted ordinarily by the bishop of the place in which he or she died or lived a long time. In the case of a martyr no miracles are required in this first process, but they are required for others. The second process, known as the Apostolic process, is instituted by the Holy See in case of a martyr. The first inquiry shows that there is a likelihood of proving that the Servant of God practised virtue to an heroic degree, or died by the heroic death of martyrdom. To go further and obtain canonization, miracles are required for both martyrs and confessors. See CANONIZATION.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Beatitude, the immediate knowledge the blessed in heaven have of God. Their earthly knowledge of Him, caught in the reflection of created things, has been changed to direct vision. Constituting man’s perfect happiness, it is called beatific.—C.E.; Nicholas of Cusa, tr. Salter, Vision of God, Lond., 1928.

Beatitude (Lat., beatitudo, blessing, happiness), title sometimes applied to the pope and frequently to patriarchs, signifying that their office is a source of blessing and happiness to men. (ed.)

Beatitude of Heaven is of two kinds, essential and accidental. Essentially it consists in the Beatific Vision. The accidental beatitude of heaven arises from the possession of those created goods which God gives the blessed, e.g., glorified body after the general resurrection, society of the blessed. The degree of beatitude will not be the same for all, but will be in proportion to merit.—Pohle-Preuss, Eschatology, St. L., 1924. (A. L. F.)

Beatiudes, the blessings pronounced in the opening words of the Sermon on the Mount: eight in St. Matthew, on the poor in spirit, the meek, mourners, justice-seekers, the merciful, peacemakers, clean of heart, persecuted; and four in St. Luke, the poor in spirit, justice-seekers, mourners, victims of persecution.—C.E. (ed.)

Beaton, David (c. 1494-1546), cardinal, Abp. of St. Andrews, and statesman; d. St. Andrews, Scotland. He negotiated the renewal of the French alliance, and the marriage of James V, and for his services received the Bishopric of Mirepoix, 1537, and the cardinal’s hat. In 1539 he succeeded to the See of St. Andrews. As regent for James’s daughter, Mary, he opposed the schemes of Henry VIII to detach Scotland from its allegiance to the Holy See and bring it into subjection to himself. He was therefore assassinated by Henry’s agents. —C.E.

—JAMES (c. 1473-1539), brother of preceding, Abp. of St. Andrews, Chancellor of Scotland, and one of the Council of Regents for the infant James V; d. St. Andrews, Scotland. He used his powerful influence against the intrigues of Henry VIII to dominate Scotland. On his translation from the See of Glasgow (1509-22) to St. Andrews he established there a new college, St. Mary’s, in connection with the university. Under orders of the pope and the king he displayed great severity towards the propagation of heresy. —C.E.

—JAMES (1509-22) to St. Andrews he established there a new college, St. Mary’s, in connection with the university. Under orders of the pope and the king he displayed great severity towards the propagation of heresy. —C.E.

Beaufort, hä́f’tər or bṓ-fər, HENRY PLANTAGENET (c. 1377-1447), cardinal, bp. of Winchester, b. Beaufort Castle, Anjou, France; d. Winchester, England. He was thrice appointed chancellor of England; assisted the pope in the Hussite war; and crowned the King of France in Paris (1431). He completed Winchester Cathedral, where he is buried. —C.E., XII, 148.

Beaufort, LADY MARGARET (1441-1509), Countess of Richmond and Derby daughter of John Beaufort, first Duke of Somerset, and mother of Henry VII. She was noted for piety and charity. A patroness of learning, she provided for readerships in divinity at Oxford and Cambridge, and re-founded Christ’s College and St. John’s College, Cambridge. She translated the fourth book of the Imitation of Christ into English. —C.E.

Beautifull Gate, the, or ST. JOHN’S PRIORY, of the Valliscaulian Order, founded, 1230, at Beautifull, Scotland, by John Bisset of the Aird. It was transferred to the chapel at Lungern in Obwalden. Feast, 15 May. —C.E., XII, 148.

Beaumont College, an institution modeled on the English public school, founded by the Jesuits, 1611, on the property of Beaumont Lodge, Old Windsor; prepares students for the universities. Connected with it is St. John’s Preparatory School, with buildings in Tudor style and a Perpendicular chapel designed by John Francis Bentley. Priests, 23; students (1925), 262.

Beaupré, SAINT ANNE DE. See SAINT ANNE DE BEAUPRÉ.

Beautiful Gate, the, one of the gates of Herod’s Temple. As it is mentioned only in Acts, 3, its exact location is not perfectly clear. Scholars, however, are fairly agreed that it is the same as the Corinthian Gate of Josephus, so called because it was covered with Corinthian brass. This gate was situated on the east side of the inner enclosure at the top of a flight of 15 steps, and led from the outer court, or Court of the Gentiles, to the Women’s Court, a most likely place for the scene narrated in Acts, 3, as beggars were not allowed within the sacred precincts, and as all men and women entering the Temple on that side had to go through that gate. —C.L. S.

Beauty, variously conceived and defined. One extreme regards beauty as an independent quality inherent in things; the other extreme, as entirely of the perceiving mind. The middle course includes both objective and subjective elements and a mutual correspondence. The beautiful is that which gives pleasure by its mere perception, involving an activity of sense, imagination, and intellect aroused by objective qualities variously assigned. “Order” is the conceded fundamental quality implying others proposed. Requisites of beauty are: integrity, harmony, and a clarity impressing without effort of the beholder. There is a spiritual beauty as well as that which is perceived in material objects. One form of it consists in the ideals which these latter suggest. Its principal form is found in the lives of good people, whose characters shine forth in their features, manner, and carriage. The beauty of the ceremonies of the Catholic Church are attuned to the noblest aspirations of the soul, elevating it to the contemplation and love of God.—U.K.; Rother, Beauty, Phila., 1924; Dubray, Introductory Philosophy, N. Y., 1923.

Beccus, John (c. 1220-98), Prefecture, of Constantinople, b. Constantinople. He was one of the few Greek prelates who labored for reunion with Rome, accepting the papal primacy and their doctrine concerning the Holy Ghost. After the death of Emperor Michael Paleologus, 1282, the enemies of reunion forced his resignation as patriarch, and exiled him to Prusa, Bithynia.—C.E.

Beck, Antoine César (1788-1878), physicist, b. Châtillon-sur-Loing, France; d. Paris. He devoted himself to the study of electricity, inventing a constant cell, a differential galvanometer, and an electric thermometer. He wrote several important works and contributed articles to scientific reviews.—C.E.; U.K.

—Antoine Henri (1852-1908), physicist, son of preceding, b. Paris. He discovered "Beck's Rays," i.e., the invisible radiations from uranium, and made important researches concerning optics. He is the founder of radio-activity, and in 1903 shared the Nobel prize for physics for his valuable work on that subject.—U.K.

Bede, Old English word for prayer; hence, the name beaded given to little perforated globes of bone, amber, glass, etc., threaded on a string, by which prayers are counted.—C.E.

Bede, The Venerable, Doctor of the Church (672-735), historian, b. Jarrow, England; d. there. A disciple of St. Benedict Bishop, he was ordained, 702, and reigned the ceremonies of the Church and writing. He gained the reputation of being the most learned man of his day; his influence upon English and foreign scholarship was great. The title Venerable was given to him within two generations after his death. His works comprise all branches of knowledge, history, rhetoric, mathematics, music, astronomy, poetry, grammar, philosophy, hagiography, et cetera, and encomiastics on Holy Writ. Feast, R. Cal., 27 May.—C.E.; Sandys, History of Classical Scholarship, Camb., 1903.

Bede College, Rome, founded, 1852, by Pius IX for converted Anglican clergymen who wished to prepare for the priesthood. It was united to the English College, 1898, during the reign of Leo XIII, but separated in 1917.—C.E., XIII, 134.

Bedeman or Beadsman (O.E., bede, prayer), one who had the duty of praying for others, a chaplain of a guild; hence, a recipient of any bounty, as a poor man in an almshouse. Bede House, at first a place of prayer, oratory, then almshouse. Bede-roll, a list of persons to be prayed for; a catalog; a rosary. (B.D.)

Bedford, Gunning Samuel (1806-70), physician, b. Baltimore, Md.; d. New York. Graduated in medicine from Rutgers College, New York, he taught at Charleston, Albany, and New York where he founded the University Medical College, and established the first free obstetrical clinic for the poor in the country. Two of his obstetrical works were adopted as text-books in America, and were translated into German and French.—C.E.

Bedingfield, Sir Henry (1509-83), supporter of Mary Tudor and instrumental in placing her on the English throne. As lieutenant of the Tower of London, he had charge of Princess Elizabeth, who was suspected of duplicity in Wyatt's rebellion. Later, under the Protestant régime, he suffered through the enforcement of the penal laws against Catholics.—C.E.

Bedini, Cajetan (1806-64), cardinal and diplomat, b. Sinigaglia, Italy; d. Viterbo. From 1849 to 1852 he acted as papal comissary extraordinary at Bologna, and in 1853 was legate nuncio to Brazil, and instructed to first make a visit to the United States. His arrival in New York was the signal for an anti-Catholic outbreak caused by the Know-nothing element and the immigrant Italian revolutionaries, and a plot to assassinate him was defeated. After his return from America, 1854, he was appointed to the See of Viterbo and Toscandella.—C.E.

Bedlam (contraction of Bethlehem), famous asylum, London, originally on the site of the present Liverpool Street railway station; founded, 1247, by Simon FitzMary, sheriff of London, for the Order of St. Mary of Bethlehem, as a general hospital for the poor, with the special duty of entertaining the bishops and canons of St. Mary of Bethlehem, as often as they might come to England. About 1405 it began to be used as an insane asylum; in 1674 it was moved to Finsbury Circus, to a site still called Old Bedlam; the present building in St. George's Fields, Southwark, was erected in 1815. Formerly managed by religious who made every effort to cure their patients, Bedlam later became a center of cruel abuses; in the 18th century, raving maniacs were exhibited to visitors at a charge of one penny for admission. Bedlam is now famous for successful treatment of the insane.—C.E.

Beehphegor, name given to the god Baal of Mt. Phegor in Moab, worshiped with immoral rites at Settim. Many Israelites were punished by death for taking part in this worship (Num., 25).—C.E.

Beezzebub, be-él'zè-bùb (Heb., baal, lord; ze- buz, a fly), a divinity worshiped by the Philistines at Accaron, as the god of flies, identified with the "demon" in the Gospels. In Luke, 11, he is called "chief of the demons." The Greek version of the N.T. has Beelzebul (prince of fifth), perhaps an interpretation of the original word.—C.E.

Bees, emblems in art associated with representations of Sts. Ambrose and Dominic. St. Ambrose is patron of bees. The reference to St. Dominic is obscure.

Beethoven, bě'tō-věn, Ludwig Van (1770-1827), composer, b. Bonn, Germany; d. Vienna. His earliest published compositions, three piano sonatas, appeared in 1783. His teachers from 1779-81 were Pfeiffer, a tenor singer, and Van den Eedcn and Neefe, organists to the Court Chapel. While deputy-organist under Neefe, then accompanist at Leipzig rehearsals, and second organist, 1784, he found time to compose, and in 1787 astonished Mozart at Vienna by his performance. As second viola player in the Elector Maxmillian's orchestra, his talents were highly esteemed and in 1792 he was sent to Vienna for lessons with Haydn in counterpoint. From 1795, with the publication of "Three Trios," he composed continuously, producing from 1800-15 six symphonies, the "Coriolanus" and "Egmont" overtures, and the opera "Fidelio." The "Ninth Symphony" and "Mass in D" belong to this third period. His deafness became acute in 1802. A lawsuit, 1810-20, and the care of his unworthy nephew, contributed to his decline and final illness. He had contemplated a "Tenth Symphony."—C.E., XV, 565; U.K.; Thayer, Life of Beethoven, N. Y., 1921.

Befana, bě-fá'nə, a good fair held in Rome during the season of Epiphany. A popular practise survived of selling earthenware images, and whistles. Beghards (probably Flemish, beghen, to pray), communities of laymen founded in the Netherlands in the 12th century. Each community had a common purse, there was no private property, and all members dwelt under one roof. The members were of humble origin, usually weavers, dyers, fullers, etc., connected with the craft-guilds, through which they influenced the religious opinions of the middle-class Netherlanders for over two centuries. With the spread of the organization, abuses crept in and the Beghards took up the heresies of the Fraticelli, Apostolici, and Brethren of the Free Spirit. Censured by pope, bishops and Inquisition, they remained obstinate. Many, however, were staunch and well-meaning and brought about a reform. Pope John XXII in 1321 allowed them to resume their former manner of living. With the diminution of the cloth trade they decreased and during the French Revolution they disappeared.—C.E.

Begin, bě-zhā', Louis Nazaire (1840-1925), Abp. of Quebec and cardinal, b. Sarazina, Canada; d. Quebec. Ordained in Rome, 1865, he continued his studies in Innsbruck and the Holy Land, and returned to Canada in 1867. Teaching for a time at Laval and at the Lower Seminary in Quebec, he was made principal of the Laval Normal School in 1884. He was consecrated in 1888 and named bp. of Chicoutimi, becoming coadjutor to Card. Taschereau, Abp. of Quebec, in 1891. Named archbishop in 1898, he was made a cardinal by Pius X in 1914. In addition to the zealous administration of his archdiocese he wrote on doctrinal subjects and took an active part as an arbitrator in labor disputes.

Beguines, be-gūīn, communities of women founded in the Netherlands in the 12th century. Establishing houses on the outskirts of towns, they lived semi-monastic lives, and devoted themselves to the care of the poor and the infirm. They took no vows, did not relinquish their property, and were free to return to the world and wed if they chose. When it was necessary, they supported themselves by manual labor or by teaching. Bound together only by kindred pursuits and community of worship, they had no mother-house, nor common rule, nor superior-general; each community was complete in itself and made its own regulation, although later some adopted the rule of the Third Order of St. Francis. They established foundations in Germany, France, and Italy and by the end of the 13th century practically every town had at least one beguinage. Centers of mysticism, they greatly influenced the religious life of the people, but many communities participated in the heresies of the age and were condemned by the Council of Vienne. Restored by Pope John XXII, most of their houses were suppressed during the religious conflicts of the 16th century and the French Revolution. There are several at the present time, however, in Holland and Belgium, which care for the sick and the poor and make lace.—C.E.; U.K.

Behaim, bě-hīm, Martin (1459-1507), cartographer and navigator, b. Nuremberg, Germany; d. Lisbon. He was appointed by the King of Portugal member of a commission for determining latitude. He later accompanied Cao on his expedition along the west coast of Africa, and in 1492 made his geographical globe, the oldest existing, with the aid of the Nuremberg humanist, Schedel.—C.E.

Behaviorism, the doctrine which limits psychology to the study of human behavior. It discards consciousness and mental processes accessible only to personal experience; rejects introspection, and admits the method of observation and experimentation only. Its aim is to forecast what will be the response of any human being to a given stimulus of action, and to improve human conduct and conditions. Its chief concern is the study of inherited instincts and acquired habits. Behaviorism consistently rejects consciousness, yet employs conscious observation, whereas consciousness is an essential part of true psychology; declaring that mental and organic processes are identical, it becomes the philosophy of materialism.—U.K.

lar animal, probably mythical, in description similar to the hippopotamus and corresponding to the mythical Egyptian water-ox, behe-mu, probably adapted into Hebrew as behemah, plural behemoth; hence, monstrous beast.—U.K.

Being, that which is capable of existence; its synonyms are thing, something. There are two uses of the term: the participial use (see existence), and the substantival, the definition of which is the one here given. The term being in the substantival sense is applicable to anything that either actually exists or can exist, for being is either actual, i.e., existent, or merely possible. It is contrasted with absolute nothingness, such as the impossible, e.g., a square circle, rather than with the merely non-existent. This term stands for the merely non-existent. This term stands for the impossible, e.g., a square circle, rather than with the simplest of all our concepts, viz., the mere capacity for existence, and is the widest in application since it represents substances, accidents, modes of existence, God, and creature. Briefly whatever is not absolutely nothing is something or being.—Rother, Being, Phila., 1924; Glenn, History of Philosophy, St. L., 1929.

Belasyse, John Baynes (c. 1614-89), English statesman leader. During the Commonwealth he was a royalist agent in England, and after the Restoration was appointed to important posts, from which he resigned on the enactment of the Test Act (1673). Impeached in connection with the Titus Oates plot, he was imprisoned without trial in the Tower of London. On the accession of James II, he was restored to favor.—C.E.

Belfry (L.L., belfrEodus, watch-tower), the upper section of a church steeple containing bells, or a bell-tower independent of other buildings. The term is also applied to the frame supporting the bells and the room from which they are rung. They originated in movable towers of wood used anciently in attacking fortified places. Later, stationary towers were used as lookout towers and as watch-towers on public buildings, being equipped with bells in the 12th and 13th centuries, to warn of danger, assemble meetings, etc. Towns rivaled each other in the splendor of their belfries, which were considered symbols of power. That of Bruges is considered the finest in Europe, while those of Ghent and Pisa are notable. Tournai has probably the oldest belfry in existence.—C.E.; U.K.

Belgian College, Rome, founded, 1844, through the efforts of Mgr. Aerts, Mgr. Peci, and the Belgian bishops; the last named support the students and nominate the president. The distinguishing mark of students is the black sash with two red stripes at the ends.—C.E., XIII, 135.

Belgian Congo, dependency of Belgium in Central Africa; area, 918,000 sq. m.; est. Bantu pop., 8,500,000; Europeans, 18,169. Formerly the Congo Free State founded by Leopold II, King of the Belgians, the colony was annexed by Belgium in 1908. The natives practise a low form of fetishism, but missionary work is widespread, being conducted by 1076 Catholic and 16 Protestant missionaries. Belgian Congo comprises the following ecclesiastical divisions:

- Buta, V.A. 1926 10 17 12,000
- Upper Congo, V.A. 1930 82 22 12,000
- Upper Kassai, V.A. 1917 69 16 1611,277
- Leopoldville, V.A. 1919 13 47 63 62,955
- Niangara, V.A. 1924 11 54 4,011
- Stanley Falls, V.A. 1908 11 39 13 26,000
- Urundi, V.A. 1922 18 14 10,584
- Basankusu, P.A. 1926 18 14 9,011
- Bondo, P.A. 1926 18 14 7,000
- Cocolibatville, P.A. 1922 18 14 12 4,000
- Northern Kasaeng, P.A. 1903 18 14 17 18,870
- Kwango, P.A. 1903 18 14 17 18,870
- Lake Albert, P.A. 1922 18 14 17 18,870
- Upper Luapula, P.A. 1925 18 14 17 18,870
- Loua and Central Kasaeng, P.A. 1925 18 14 17 18,870
- Matadi, P.A. 1911 18 14 17 18,870
- Belgian Ubangi, P.A. 1911 18 14 17 18,870

Belgium, independent monarchy of western Europe, between France and Holland; area 11,755 sq. m.; est. pop., 7,811,876, of whom the great majority are Catholic, with about 30,000 Protestants and 13,000 Jews. Christianity was introduced in the 1st century but was lost through pagan invasion, and the work of conversion was not completed until the 8th century. From the 6th to the 8th century it was led by bishops, as St. Eloi, St. Lambert, and St. Hubert, and numerous missionaries, notably St. Amand (d. 675), Bp. of Maastricht and founder of many monasteries to which the Belgians owe much of their attachment to the Catholic Faith. After passing through the hands of Lorraine, Burgundy, Austria, Spain, Austria again, France, and, after the fall of Napoleon, Holland, the Belgian provinces revolted in 1830, proclaimed their independence, and were recognized as a constitutional monarchy in 1831. The constitution proclaimed freedom of worship, of the press, and of education, and the civil marriage ceremony became obligatory. The state contributes part of the income of the clergy of all denominations and aids in the erection and repair of religious buildings. The Catholic Church is thus administered:

Belleville, DIOCESE OF, Illinois, embraces that part of the state south of the northern limits of the counties of St. Clair, Clinton, Marion, Clay, Richland, and Lawrence; area, 11,078 sq. mi.; erected, 1887; suffragan of Chicago. Bishops: John Janssen (1888-1913); Henry Althoff (1914). Churches, 139; priests, secular, 135; priests, regular, 13; religious women, 662; academies, 2; high schools, 9; primary schools, 80; pupils in parish schools, 11,999; institutions, 11; Catholics, 72,313.

Bellini, GENTILE, (c. 1427-1507), painter, b. Padua, Italy; d. Venice. He and his younger brother, who were the founders of the Venetian school. Together they perfected the art of oil-painting, inaugurated by Flemish artists. Bellini completed the work of his father in a series on “The Miracle of the Cross.” He was sent to Constantinople as one of the greatest Venetian masters, and his portrait of Mohamed II and his “Adoration of the Magi” are of this period.—C.E.; U.K.

Bellini, Elizabeth RAYNER PARKES (1829-1925), English writer and philanthropist. Great-granddaughter of Joseph Priestly, the discoverer of oxygen, and mother of Hilaire Belloc and Mrs. Belloc Lowndes, she became a Catholic in 1864. Her works include “La Belle France,” “Historic Nuns,” and “The Flowing Tide.”

Bells, sacramentals of the Church, blessed with religious rites, and used to remind men of religion and of God, thereby increasing His grace in their souls. It is said that bells were introduced into Christian churches about the year 400 by Paulinus, Bp. of Nola, Italy. The ringing of bells or gongs in the sanctuary is tolerated by the Church, but these are usually not blessed. The ringing of the Belmont Abbey (Abbey of St. Michael and all Angels). Hereford, England, founded, 1859, by the Benedictines as a central novitiate and house of studies for the English Congregation; erected into an abbey, 1920; priests, 14.

Belomancy (Gr., belos, dart; manteia, divination), divination practiced by means of arrows (Ezek., 21).

Bema (Gr., step), originally any raised platform, then the platform in Roman basilicas containing the judges' seats; in the Greek Orthodox Church the space surrounding the Holy Table behind the iconostasis or image screen.

Benedicamus Domino, bá-ná-dé-ca't'múš dó'mé-nó (Lat.; Let us bless the Lord), invocation said at the end of Mass when the "Gloria in Excelsis Deo" is omitted, and usually answered with "Deo Gracias" (Thanks be to God); sometimes used as a salutation and as a signal for rising in religious communities and seminaries. (C. J. D.)

Benedict I, bá-né'déckt-t, the, or Canticle of the Three Children, canticle uttered by Sidrach, Misach, and Abdenego when they remained unharmed upon being cast into the fiery furnace by Nabochoodonosor for refusing to adore a golden statue he had set up (Dan., 3). It begins Benedicte, omnia opera Domini, Domina (O all ye works of the Lord, bless ye the Lord), and is included in the Roman Breviary for Lauds on Sundays throughout the year.

Benedict II, Saint, Pope (684-685), b. Rome; d. there. To shorten the time of vacancy after the death of a pope he obtained from the Emperor Constantine IV a decree abolishing the imperial confirmation of the pope-elect before consecration. He reinstated St. Wilfrid in the See of York, of which he had been unjustly deprived. Feast, 7 May. —C.E.; Grisar.

Benedict III, Pope (855-858), b. Rome; d. there. To stop the time of vacancy after the death of a pope he obtained from the Emperor Lothair died, leaving the Frankish kingdom divided among five relatives. The Slavs, Normans, and Saracens redoubled their attacks upon the Franks, and to defray the expenses of the war the Frankish nobles seized Church property and sold it. The clergy were powerless, but Benedict was instrumental in removing many of the abuses. He repaired Rome after the Saracen raid, 846, and received a visit and gifts from the Saxon King Ethelwulf and his son, the future King Alfred the Great. —C.E.; Mann.

Benedict IV, Pope (903), b. Rome; d. there. He was a Roman citizen; he succeeded Leo IV. On the day of the papal coronation Emperor Lothair died, leaving the Frankish kingdom divided among five relatives. The Slavs, Normans, and Saracens redoubled their attacks upon the Franks, and to defray the expenses of the war the Frankish nobles seized Church property and sold it. The clergy were powerless, but Benedict was instrumental in removing many of the abuses. He repaired Rome after the Saracen raid, 846, and received a visit and gifts from the Saxon King Ethelwulf and his son, the future King Alfred the Great. —C.E.; Mann.

Benedict V (Grammaticus), Pope (964-965), b. Rome; d. Hamburg, Germany. A cardinal-deacon, he was elected pope in opposition to Emperor Otto's candidate, the antipope Leo. Otto immediately marched to Rome and carried Benedict off to Germany where he died. His remains were later translated to Rome. —C.E.; Mann.

Benedict VI, Pope (972-974), b. Rome; d. there. Shortly after he was elected pope he was imprisoned and strangled by a faction of the Italian nobility under the antipope, Boniface Franco. —C.E.; Mann.

Bell, tower-bell at the elevation of the Host and the Chalice at the principal Mass on Sunday is a practise dating from the 13th century, a signal, to those not present at the Mass, to kneel and adore. Bells are not rung from the Gloria of the Mass on Holy Thursday to the Gloria of Holy Saturday, to denote the Church's sorrow because of the sufferings and death of Christ. An acolyte, ringing a bell, precedes a priest carrying the Blessed Sacrament from one altar to another in a church or to the sick in a convent or in a Catholic hospital. —C.E.; U.K.; Coleman, Bells, Their History, Legend, Making and Uses, N. Y., 1928.

Bells, Blessing of, a solemn benediction of church bells, in which each bell receives a name, hence incorrectly termed the "baptism of bells." The long and solemn ceremony, which may be performed only by a bishop, or a priest especially designated, consists of washing the bell with holy water, anointing it with the oil of the infirm without, and chrism within, and offering prayers that these sacramentals of the Church may, at the sound of the bell, put the demon to flight, protect from storms, and call the faithful to prayer. The fuming censer is then placed under the bell, that the smoke fill the cavity, and the ceremony is concluded with the reading of the Gospel concerning Martha and Mary. The identical ritual is found in use in Carolingian times and probably dates from about the 750. Simplified blessings are used for other bells. —C.E.; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1917.

Belmont, Abbey Nullius of, North Carolina, comprises Catawba, Cleveland, Burke, Gaston, Lincoln, McDowell, Polk, and Rutherford counties; area, 3626 sq. m.; suffragan of Santa Fe. Belmont, nullius (Gr., darto, divination practised by means of arrows (Ezech., 21).
Benedict VII, Pope (974-983), b. Rome; d. there. He was Bp. of Sutri, and when elected pope his authority was disputed by the antipope, Boniface Franco, and his followers. He was upheld, however, by the emperor, Otto II. He attempted to check simony, promoted monasticism, and appointed the first Abp. of Carthage.—C.E.; Mann.

Benedict VIII, Pope (1012-24), b. Rome; d. there. Count of Tusculum, and brother of John XIX. He was Bp. of Sutri, and when elected pope his authority was disputed by the antipope, Boniface, and the emperor, Otto II. He attempted to check simony, promoted monasticism, and appointed the first Abp. of Carthage.—C.E.; Mann.

Benedict IX, Pope (1032-44; 1045-47), d. probably Grottaferrata, Italy. Count of Tusculum and nephew of the two preceding popes, he was placed on the papal throne by his father, Alberic, when a youth of twenty. He was driven from office in 1044 by a Roman faction, as unfit to rule. Returning he expelled the antipope, John of Sabina, and reinstated himself, but resigned in favor of Gregory VI. Regrettng this action he attempted to regain the chair but was deposed. Upon Clement's death Benedict seized the throne again but was forced out by Clement's successor, Damasus II.—C.E.; Mann.

Benedict X, antipope. See MINCIUS, JOHN, Bp. of Velletri.

Benedict XI (Niccolo Boccasini), Blessed, Pope (1303-04), b. Treviso, Italy, 1240; d. Perugia. When Master General of the Dominican Order he arranged an armistice between Philip IV of France and Edward I of England. Later he was made Card-Bp. of Ostia, and defended Boniface VIII against William of Nogaret and the Colonna faction. As pope he removed the papal censure from Philip and France, and absolved the cardinals favoring the Colonna. His death is believed to have occurred from poisoning by the agents of William of Nogaret. Feast, 7 July, at Rome and in the Dominican Order.—C.E.; Butler.

Benedict XII (Jacques Fournier), Pope (1334-42), b. Saverdun, France; d. Rome. A Cistercian, Bp. of Paniers, and cardinal, he became the third of the Avignon popes. He sought to free the papacy from French influence and to restore the See to Rome, curbed nepotism, granted benefices with discrimination, condemned "pluralities," and strengthened the Faith in outlying districts.—C.E.; Pastor.

Benedict XIII (Pietro Francesco Orsini), Pope (1724-30), b. Gravina, Naples, 1649; d. Rome. He became a Dominican, was made a cardinal in 1672, and was appointed successively Bp. of Manfredonia, Cesena, and Benevento. As pope he was a disciplinarian, instituting numerous reforms and requiring absolute acceptance of the Bull "Unigenitus" against Jansenism. In diplomatic affairs he lacked firmness, settling the controversy between the Kings of Naples, Savoy, and Portugal in an indecisive manner. His reputation suffered through his misplaced trust in Card. Coscia.—C.E.

Benedict XIII, antipope. See LUNA, PEDRO DE.

Benedict XIV (Prospero Lorenzo Lamberti), Pope (1740-58), b. Bologna, Italy, 1675; d. Rome. After filling many important offices he became a cardinal, and later Abp. of Bologna. As pope he adopted a liberal policy in dealing with foreign powers, abolished usury, encouraged commerce, improved agricultural methods, reformed the nobility, and decreased taxation. He influenced the papacy from French influence and established the Coptic College at Rome, enlarged the Roman Martyrology. As a scholar he founded academies of history, law, liturgy, and established new chairs in the universities. He wrote a useful work on canon law. Macaulay calls him "The best and wisest of men." (Essay on Frederick the Great.)—C.E.

Benedict XIV, antipope (c. 1425-30). Little historically certain is known about this antipope. When the antipope Pedro de Luna, died, three of his cardinals elected the antipope Muñoz; a fourth cardinal, Jean Carrel, on his own authority elected the antipope Benedict XIV who was recognized by the Count of Armagnac, and who disappeared from history almost immediately.—Pastor.

Benedict XV (Giacomo della Chiesa), Pope (1914-22), b. Pegli, Italy, 1854; d. Rome. Nuncio to Spain, privy chamberlain, Abp. of Bologna, and cardinal, he was elected directly after the outbreak of the World War, and maintained a position of neutrality throughout. He sent a representative to each country to work for peace, and in 1917 delivered the Plea for Peace, which demanded a cessation of hostilities, a reduction of armaments, a guaranteed freedom of the seas, and international arbitration. President Wilson was the only ruler who answered him, declaring peace impossible, though he afterwards adopted most of Benedict's proposals for establishing peace. At the close of the war France and Spain resumed diplomatic relations with the Vatican, and Great Britain retained permanently the embassy she had established during the war. Benedict promulgated the new Code of Canon Law, established the Coptic College at Rome, enlarged the foreign mission field, and in his first Encyclical condemned errors in modern philosophical systems. He denounced the violations of Belgium, and gave freely to the victims of the war, widows, orphans, and wounded, and established a bureau of communi-
Benedict Biscop, Saint, abbot (c. 628-690), d. Wearmouth, England. He was educated at the court of Oswy, King of Northumbria, and received the Benedictine habit at Lérins, 606, becoming Abbot of St. Peter's, Canterbury. He introduced into England the Roman Rite in place of the Celtic usages, the art of making glass windows, and the building of stone churches. Patron of English Benedictines. Feast, 12 Feb.—C.E.

Benedictine Order. See ORDER OF ST. BENEDICT.

Benediction (Lat., benedictio, a blessing), in the Divine Office a brief blessing pronounced by the officiant upon the reader before the latter begins the lessons of Matins. The blessing is preceded by the petition “Jube Domine benedicere” (Deign, Sir, a blessing). The early use of such blessings in the Office is attested in the 4th century and in the Benedictine Office of the 6th century. See BLESSING; BENEDICTION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT; BENEDICTION WITH CIBORIUM.

Benedictional, a book containing benedictions or blessings used in the Church.—C.E.

Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, a popular Eucharistic devotion in the Catholic Church of the Latin Rite. In the more solemn form of this ceremony the officiating priest is vested in surplice, stole, and cope. The consecrated Host, enclosed in the ostensorium (q.v.), is placed on the altar or in a niche above, and is incensed by the officiant upon the reader before the latter begins the lessons of Matins. The blessing is preceded by the petition “Jube Domine benedicere” (Deign, Sir, a blessing). The early use of such blessings in the Office is attested in the 4th century and in the Benedictine Office of the 6th century. See BLESSING; BENEDICTION OF THE BLESSED SACRAMENT; BENEDICTION WITH CIBORIUM.

Benedict of Nursia, Saint, confessor (c. 480-543), founder of western monasticism, b. Nursia, Italy; d. Monte Cassino. A brother of St. Scholastica, when only 17 he renounced the world, and established 12 monasteries for his followers, over which he ruled as abbot. Driven by persecu-Benefice to one canonically fit by competent ecclesiastical authority, with due respect to an acquired right of presentation, election, etc. The pope and the bishop enjoy the same right within their own diocese, but their vicar general does not. While the see is vacant, he who rules the diocese can confer those benefices for which one has been presented or elected, but not those which are of free collation.

Benefit of Clergy, exemption from the jurisdiction of civil courts granted to the clergy in England from the time of William the Conqueror, and lasting with occasional restrictions down to 1827 when it was abolished. In the early days it was even extended to all who could read, since as a rule only clerics had that accomplishment. The exemption was recognized in the American colonies until denied by Act of Congress, 1790.—C.E.; Desmond, The Church and the Law, Chi., 1898. (w. g.)

Benemerenti Medals, pontifical decorations instituted by Gregory XVI, 1832, and awarded as a recognition of distinguished military and civil services. The military medal bears on one side the image of Gregory XVI and on the other an angel bearing a scroll with the word Benemerenti beneath the papal emblems. The civil medal has Benemerenti surrounded by a crown of oak leaves engraved on its face surface. They are worn on the breast, suspended by ribbons of the papal colors.

Benevento (Lat., bene ventum, fair wind), town and former papal principality of Campania, Italy. It occupies the site of the ancient Maleventum, founded by the Samnites and conquered by the Romans, 275 B.C., who changed its name; destroyed by the Goths A.D. 542. An independent Lombard duchy from 571, it was ceded by Emperor Henry III to Pope Leo IX, 1053, who led an expedition against the Norman invaders of Benevento and finally succeeded in making them his devoted subjects. From 1053 till 1860, when it was annexed to the Kingdom of Italy, this principality, surrounded by the Kingdom of Naples, was governed by a delegate of the Holy See, but was often occupied by the Neapolitans. The seat of an archdiocese since 939, it was the scene of eleven councils from 1059 to 1545. Its Byzantine cathedral dates from the 9th century; the church of St. Sophia, from the Lombard period (c. 760).—C.E.

Benevolence (Lat., bene, well; volens, wishing), the disposition to promote the welfare and happiness of others. In theology, love of benevolence means charity, which seeks what is good for the sake of one who is loved, in contrast to the love of concupiscence, by which good is sought for the sake of the one who loves. Friendship consists in mutual love of benevolence.

Bengy, bān-zhē, ANATOLO DE (1824-71), Jesuit martyr, b. Bourges, France; d. Paris. He was chaplain to the French soldiers in the Crimean and Franco-Prussian wars, and was martyred by the French Communists. See COMMUNE, MARTYRS OF THE.

Benignus (Lat., kind), SAINt, confessor (d. c. 467), Abp. of Armagh. The son of Sesenen, an Irish chieftain, he was converted and baptized by St. Patrick, to whom he later served as coadjutor in the See of Armagh, being known as St. Patrick's favorite disciple and right-hand man. He was renowned for his musical talent; and assisted in compiling the "Senchus Mor," or old Irish code of law. He resigned his see some time before his death. Another Irish saint named Benignus was superior... of the monasteries of Kilbannon and Drumlease. Feast, 9 Nov.—C.E.

Benincasa, Ursula, Venerable (1547-1618), foundress of the Order of Theatine Nuns, and of the Theatine Hermittesses, b. Naples; d. near Castel St. Elmo, Italy. Rumors of her visions and ecstasies excited comment and she was called to Rome and questioned by Gregory XIII, who placed her under the direction of St. Philip Neri. He was much impressed by her piety. In 1583 she established near Castel St. Elmo the Oblate Sisters of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary, called Theatine Nuns, their habit resembling that of the Theatine clergies. Their rule included simple vows, active life, and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. In 1617 she founded the contemplative Hermittesses. The rules of both were approved by Gregory XV in 1623. She introduced the wearing of the blue scapular of the Immaculate Conception. Commemorated, 20 Oct.

Benin Coast, Vicariate Apostolic of, West Africa, established as a mission, 1860, and as a vicariate Apostolic, 1870, comprises a large Negro territory; area, 96,250 sq. m.; entrusted to the Society for African Missions of Lyons. Vicar Apostolic, Ferdinand Terrien, appointed, 1912; residence at Lagos. Stations, 184; schools, 100; institutions, 16; Catholics, 17,743. (F. J. L.)

Benjamin, tribe of, one of the 12 tribes of Israel, founded by Benjamin. Moses pronounced a special blessing upon this tribe (Deut., 33), which at the division of the territory of Chanaan under Josue, obtained its share between the frontiers of Ephraim, Dan, and Juda (Jos., 18). In the time of the Judges, it was involved in a war with the other tribes (Judges, 19). Later, the first King of Israel, Saul, was chosen from the tribe of Benjamin (1 Kings, 9). At the death of Solomon, the 10 tribes separated from Roboam; but the tribe of Benjamin, with that of Juda, remained faithful (3 Kings, 12). These two formed the Kingdom of Juda, and they became, after the Babylonian captivity, the germ of a reestablished nation (1 Esdras, 4 and 10). (V. J. L.)

Benno, Saint, confessor (1010-1106). Bp. of Meissen, b. Hildesheim, Prussia; d. Meissen, Saxony. He became a monk and Abbot of St. Michael's, Hildesheim, and was later made master of the canons of Goslar. In 1068 he was consecrated Bp. of Meissen. He joined the Saxon revolt against the emperor Henry IV, but was captured and imprisoned for a year. Deposed by the Synod of Mainz, 1085, for championing Pope Gregory VII, he was reinstated in 1088, when he recognized the antipope Clement III; however, he was later loyal to Urban II, the legitimate pontiff. He labored to convert the Slavs, established numerous religious edifices, and is said to have founded the cathedral of Meissen. Patron of Munich. Emblems: a fish, and a key. Canonized, 1523. Relics in the cathedral at Munich. Feast, 16 June.—C.E.

Benoit, bè-nwà, Michel (1715-74), Jesuit scientist, b. Autun, France; d. Peking, China. After completing his astronomical studies at Paris, he was sent to the Chinese mission, and appointed by the emperor to design and execute a system of decorative fountains in the royal gardens. He made a large map of the world, and a general chart of the empire, and translated the “Imitation of Christ” into Chinese.—C.E.

Benthamism, the utilitarian theory of Jeremy Bentham, an English jurist (1748-1832), who taught that happiness (pleasure) is the object of life and that the highest morality consists in securing the greatest happiness of the greatest number, a formula taken from Priestley. According to this test he found wanting the Established Churches, the New Testament, and religion generally. Though not a practical man, his theories frequently influenced legislation in England and in the United States, and, strange to say, helped to bring about Catholic Emancipation in 1829.—C.E.

Bentley, John Francis (1839-1902), architect, b. Doncaster, England; d. London. He upheld the architectural principles and methods of the Middle Ages and promoted the Gothic revival in England. Commissioned in 1894 to build the cathedral of Westminster, he chose the Byzantine style to avoid comparison with Westminster Abbey, designed everything to the last detail, and produced the most remarkable church erected in England since the Reformation.—C.E.

Benziger, Joseph Charles (1782-1841), founder of the Catholic publishing house which bears his name, b. Einsiedeln, Switzerland; d. there. The business, established in 1800, took the name of "Benziger Brothers" when he was succeeded in 1833 by his sons, Charles (1799-1873) and Nicholas (1808-64). It still exists at Einsiedeln, under their descendants. The New York branch, now independent of the European house, and managed by the fifth generation of the family, is three sons of Nicholas C. Benziger (1859-1925), was founded in 1853. The business includes the sale of church goods of all kinds. Branches were established in Cincinnati, 1860, and Chicago, 1887. The studios are in Brooklyn, N. Y., Bridgeport, Conn., and Pietrasanta, Italy.—C.E.

Beracl, Saint, Abbot (d. 505), d. Gortnathra, Connaught, Ireland. He was the nephew of St. Froech, brother to St. Midabaria, and a disciple of St. Kevin. He built a church at Cluain Coirpthe, since known as Termonbarry or Kilbarry. Patron of Kilbarry, Roscommon, Ireland. His crozier is in the Dublin Museum. Feast, 15 Feb. —C.E.

Berard of Carbio (Beraldus!), Saint, martyr (1220), b. Calvi, Italy; d. Morocco. He joined the Franciscans, 1213. Proficient in Arabic, and an eloquent preacher, he was sent by St. Francis with four companions to preach Christianity in Morocco, 1219. They were imprisoned and martyred for the Faith, their heads being split open. Emblem: a sword. Canonized, 1481. Relics in the monastery at Coimbra. Feast, 16 Jan.—C.E.

Berengarius of Tours (999-1088), theologian, b. Tours, France; d. isle of St. Cosme. Educated at Chartres under Fulbert, he became director in 1029 of the school of St. Martin of Tours, and in 1039 Archdeacon of Angers. His teaching concerning the Holy Eucharist was attacked by Hugh of Langres, but he appealed to the authority of Eriugena. Lanfranc, Abbot of Le Bec, declared Eriugena's teaching heretical, and obtained the condemnation of Berengarius, who was cited before a Roman Council, but was unable to attend as King Henry I imprisoned him. He finally submitted after 1080, and retired into solitude on the island of St. Cosme near Tours, and died reconciled to the Church.—C.E.; U.K.

Bergerac, Peace of, truce formed between Catholics and Huguenots in France confirmed by the Edict of Poitiers, 1577. Huguenot worship was restricted to suburbs of one town in each bailiwick and to places where it had been hitherto practised. Freedom of worship had been granted by the Edict of Beaulieu (1576) but this toleration had met with great opposition and had resulted in renewal of civil war.

Berlin, capital, Republic of Germany. It grew out of two settlements in the Mark of Brandenburg-Köln, first mentioned, 1237; and Berlin, dating from 1244. A first attempt at union was made, 1307; Berlin-Köln joined the Hanseatic league, 1340, and by the 15th century had gained great importance. The spread of Christianity and the development of civilization throughout the Mark may be attributed largely to the Teutonic Knights and the Cistercian monks. At the time of the Reformation the city numbered about 18 churches, but in 1539 the new faith was formally accepted by the nobility, and a few months later the Lord's Supper, according to the Lutheran Rite, was celebrated for the first time, in the Dominican church, later transformed into the Protestant cathedral. The monasteries were suppressed, the last Catholic priest died, 1571, and for about 150 years public Catholic service was forbidden, and Mass could be celebrated only in the private chapels of Catholic embassies. Although the Thirty Years War, accompanied by plague, depleted the population to 4000, the city regained its importance, but suffered again during the Seven Years War when it was twice plundered. At the close of the war, however, Frederick the Great inaugurated a strenuous campaign of reconstruction, and, since the conquest of Silesia had greatly increased the Catholic population, he encouraged religious toleration and built the Catholic church of St. Hedwig. The partition of Poland, followed by secularization, added further to the number of Catholics in Berlin, but it was not until 1848 that comparative freedom was obtained. Since then the number of Catholics has grown consistently with the development of the city, and now forms 11 per cent of the total population of 4,024,165. The city is in the Diocese of Breslau. Among the medieval buildings are the 13th-century Marienkirche and Klosterkirche.—C.E.; U.K.

Bermontsey (A.-S., Bermont's isle), a former Benedictine abbey in Southwark, London. It was founded, 1082, by Alwyn Childe, a citizen of London, who established there a community of monks subject to Cluny; it became an abbey, 1399. A hospital and relief house of St. Thomas in Southwark, founded by the prior, 1213, was attached to the monastery for over 200 years. The abbey was suppressed by Henry VIII, being at that time the only Cluniac abbey in England.

Bermudas, group of islands in the west Atlantic Ocean, and a colony of the British Empire, with a representative government; area, 19.3 sq. m.; pop., 30,113. During the 17th century the Bermudas experienced the same religious troubles which beset England. In 1615 a law excluded Catholics from the colony. Secessions from the Established Church took place and the various sects persecuted one another. The Quakers were the principal sufferers because of their attempts to educate the Negroes. Gradually religious toleration was introduced and by a law of 1867, persons taxed in other churches were exempted from supporting the Church of England, and that Church no longer receives government grants. Ecclesiastically Bermuda is under the jurisdiction of the Abp. of Halifax, N. S., and has a priest, a church, and a school at Hamilton, and mission stations at St. George and Ireland Island.—U.K.; C.E. Suppl.

Bernadette Soubirous, Blessed, Virgin (1844-79), b. Lourdes, France; d. Nevers. When only 14 years of age she witnessed 18 apparitions of Our Lady at Lourdes, instructing her to make known to the world the miraculous healing powers which the Blessed Virgin would give to the waters there by her presence. In 1868 Bernadette joined the Sisters of Charity at Nevers and in 1878 took her perpetual vows. Beatified, 1925. Feast, in the dioceses of Nevers, Tarbes, and Lourdes, and in the chapels of the Sisters of Charity, 12 May.

Bernard, Claude (1588-1641), ecclesiastic, sur- named "the poor priest," b. Dijon, France; d. Paris. After studying under the Jesuits at Dole, he went to Paris, became a priest, and devoted his immense fortune to the poor, the sick, and the imprisoned. He founded the seminary of the Trente-Trois for Bernard, Claude (1813-78), physiologist, b. near Villefranche, France; d. Paris. In 1839 he became interme to Magendie, professor of medicine at the Collège de France, where he was destined to succeed in 1855. Engaging in research work in physiology, he studied the pancreas and discovered the glycogenic function of the liver and the vaso-motor system. He wrote many articles on physiology. He was honored with a state funeral from Notre Dame cathedral.—C.E.

Bernard of Clairvaux, Saint, confessor, abbot (1090-1153), Doctor of the Church, b. Castle Fontaines, near Dijon, France; d. Clairvaux. Particular care was taken with his education, because his great destiny had been predicted before his birth; he showed remarkable interest and talent in literature. With his father and brother and 30 noblemen, Bernard entered the Benedictine monastery at Citeaux, in 1113. He was sent, 1115, at the head of a band of monks to found the house at Clairvaux and was consecrated abbot. He practised such austerities that his health was seriously impaired. The perfection of the monastic life there became the model for the 163 monasteries of the Cistercian reform founded by Bernard. The fame of his learning spread and he became the defender of the Church against the erroneous teaching of Abelard, Arnold of Brescia, and the heretics of the Waldenses. Pope Innocent II, causing him to be recognized as supreme pontiff in France, England, Ireland, and Germany, and preached the second Crusade, 1133-37. His writings breathe the most tender devotion to Our Lord and His Blessed Mother. Many miracles are ascribed to him. Patron of bees and wax chambers. Emblems: Holy Communion, pen, bees, and instruments of the Passion. Canonized, 1174. Relics at Clairvaux; skull in the cathedral of Troyes. Feast, R. Cal., 20 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Bernard of Menthon, Saint, confessor (923-1008), b. near Annecy, Savoy (France); d. Novara (Italy). Having become archdeacon of Aosta, 966, he spent 42 years laboring among the ignorant and idolatrous people of the Alps, making many conversions and performing miracles. He is best known as the founder (c. 962) of the Augustinian hospices at the Great and Little St. Bernard passes in the Alps. Represented in art chaining a demon to the mountains. Relics in the monastery at Novara; head in the monastery of Mont-joie, Aosta. Canonized, 1681. Feast, 15 June.—C.E.

Bernini, Giovanni Lorenzo (1598-1680), architect and sculptor, b. Naples; d. Rome. Skilled in painting, poetry, and sculpture, he won fame through his architectural work in Rome, notably the baldachinum and colonnade of St. Peter's and the Scala Regia. Emblem: a green hill of three mounds, with a cross on each. Relics at Pavia. Feast, O. F. M., 28 Sept.—C.E.

Beresabeæ, bér-sābē-ē, or BEERSHEBA (Heb., well of seven, or well of swearing), ancient town at the southern extremity of Palestine, 28 m. sw. of Hebron. The expression "Dan to Bersabee" was used to denote the entire length of Palestine (Judges, 20). This locality is the cradle of the Hebrew race, connected with memories of Agar, Ismael, and Abraham (Gen., 21), of Isaac (Gen., 26), Jacob who was born there, and his sons (Gen., 28 and 46).

Bertha (Teut., bright, famous), Queen of Kent (d. c. 612). She was the Christian wife of the pagan King Ethelbert, and welcomed St. Augustine on his mission to England, 597. Though sometimes called saint, no evidence of her cult exists.—C.E.

Berthold (d. 1198), bishop and apostle of the Liouvians, killed near Riga in a crusade against the pagans who threatened the destruction of the recently established Christian community. He had previously been Cistercian Abbot of Lockum, Hanover, and about 1196 had succeeded Meinhard, first Bp. of Livonia, laboring ten years on the Livonian mission.—C.E.

Bérulle, bâr-ûl, Pierre de (1575-1629), cardinal, founder of the French Congregation of the Oratory, b. Cérrilly, Champagne, France. After his ordination he labored for the conversion of Protestants in union with St. Francis de Sales. With Max. Acanie he introduced the reformed Carmelites nuns into France, and in 1611 established the Oratory on the model of St. Philip Neri's at Rome; it is due the 17th-century reform of the French clergy. He wrote several devotional works, notably a life of Jesus.—C.E.

Bessarion, Johannes (c. 1403-72), cardinal, classical scholar, b. Trebizond, Asia Minor; d. Ravenna, Italy. In 1436 he was made Bp. of Nicea, and accompanied John VII Palaeologus to Ferrara, where he contributed much to bring about the reunion of the Churches, 1439; later he was made cardinal and embraced the Latin Rite. In 1443 he became Bp. of Sabina and in 1449 of Frascati. From 1450-55, as governor of Bologna, he calmed internal factionism, restored the university, and promoted classical studies. After the fall of Constantinople, he labored unceasingly to save the Oriental Christians, and was rewarded for his efforts with the commendatory abbacy of the Greek Basilianas at Grottaferrata; subsequently he was named Patriarch of Constantinople. In 1463 he succeeded in allying Venice and Matthias Corvinus against the Turks. He established the first Roman academy to revive interest in the ancient classics and was very successful, but his hopes of permanent Church reunion and of Turkish expulsion were unfulfilled. He bequeathed his Greek codices to Venice, where they formed the nucleus of the Library of St. Mark.—C.E.

Bessec, Jean Marie Léon, monastic historian (1851-1920), b. St. Angel, Corrèze, France; d. Chevetogne, Namur, Belgium. A Benedictine monk, he was sent as master of novices to restore the ancient Abbey of St. Wandrille de Fontenelle. In 1895 he was appointed professor of history and director of the Apostolic school at the monastery in Silos, Spain. During the World War he directed the weekly publication of the newspaper, "L'Univers." His royalist sympathies inspired him to write "The Church and the Monarchy." He was founder of the "Bulletin de Saint Martin," "Revue Mabillon," and "La vie et les arts liturgiques." His literary works include: "The Monks of Ancient France," crowned by the French Academy, "The Benedictine Monk," "The Monks of the Orient," "The African Monarchy," "Ecclesiastical Studies after the Method of Mabillon," and "Saint Wandrille."—C.E. Suppl.

Bestiaries (Lat., bestia, wild beast), books in prose or verse, containing descriptions and illustrations of animals, fabled and real. Widely popular in the Middle Ages, they were important rather for their zoological interest than for their negligible symbolical content. Every quality of human nature was typified by some animal and bestiaries are thus a sort of key to the grotesques which are inseparable from Romanesque and Gothic sculptural ornamentation. The lamb or sheep represented the soul or the believer; the phoenix, Christ or immortality; the devil, the lion, either the devil or Christ. The prototype of the bestiaries was the "Physiologus," written probably by an Alexandrian Greek in the 2nd century A.D., and translated into Latin, Syriac, Arabic, and other languages, whence it became popular as a literary source from the 7th to the 13th centuries. A first Anglo-Saxon version appeared in the 8th century, and German and French translations in the 11th and 12th.—C.E.; U.K.

Bethany, beth'an-e, or Bethania (Heb., house of mercy). (1) Ancient village of Palestine, 1½ m. E. of Jerusalem, at the base of the Mount of Olives. It was prominent as the home of Mary, Martha, and Lazarus, and the scene of the raising of Lazarus to life (John, 11). St. Matthew Our Lord sent two of His disciples to find the ass that was to bear Him on His triumphant entry into Jerusalem.

ever, the latter instigated another conspiracy and his accession pardoned Adonias; soon after, he was put to death. Two genealogies of Our Lord include two sons of Bethsabee, Solomon (Matt., 1) and Nathan (Luke, 3).

Bethel (Heb., house of God). (1) Ancient Chananite town formerly called Luz, situated 12 m. N. of Jerusalem. Nearby Abraham twice offered sacrifice (Gen., 12 and 13). It was the scene of the vision of Jacob's Ladder and a sacred place under the Judges where the Israelites "consulted God" (Judges, 21), and where the Ark of the Covenant was probably kept for a time. (2) The name for any dissenting chapel in England, and sometimes used as the name of a Methodist or a Baptist church.—C.E.

Bethlehem (Heb., house of bread). (1) Bethlehem of Zabulon (Jos., 19), a small town 7 m. N.W. of Nazareth. (2) Bethlehem of Judas, less correctly known as Bethlehem of Juda (Judges, 17; 19; 1 Kings, 17), originally known as Ephrata (Micah, 5), city, Palestine, 5 m. S. of Jerusalem, closely connected with patriarchal history as the place of death of Rachel, Jacob's wife (Gen., 35), the site of the romance of Ruth and Booz, and the birthplace of David. It became sacred to Christians as the birthplace of Our Lord, and the church of the Nativity now occupies the traditional site.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss.

Bethlehemites. (1) Military order dedicated to Our Lady of Bethlehem, wearing a habit like the Dominicans and a red star. They came from Palestine to Bohemia, 1217, and now devote themselves to care of the sick and education. (2) Order of knights dedicated to Our Lady of Bethlehem, founded by Pius II, 1458, for the defense of the island of Lemnos, but soon suppressed owing to papal interference. Founded by Ven. Pedro de Betancourt, 1673; extended to Peru, 1672. They had 33 houses of monks and one of nuns, in Central and South America to the time of their suppression by the government, 1820.—C.B.; Butler.

Bethphage, beth-fa'je (Heb., house of unripe figs), village on Mount Olivet, near the road from Jerusalem to Jericho (Luke, 19), from which began Our Lord's triumphant entry into Jerusalem (Matt., 21).

Bethsabee, beth-sä'bë-ë, wife of Urias the Hethite, and afterwards wife of David and mother of Solomon (2 Kings, 11). At the height of his glory David committed adultery with Bethsabee; had her husband placed in the thick of battle so that he might be killed; and then married her. In David's old age she prevailed upon him to have her son Solomon crowned king in place of his older brother Adonias (3 Kings, 1), who had proclaimed himself king without the knowledge of David. Solomon on his accession pardoned Adonias; soon after, however, the latter instigated another conspiracy and was put to death. Two genealogies of Our Lord include two sons of Bethsabee, Solomon (Matt., 1) and Nathan (Luke, 3). (F. J. L.)

Bethsaida, beth-säl'da (Heb., house of fishing). (1) City, E. of the Jordan, on Lake Gennesareth, Palestine. Nearby occurred the miracles of the loaves and fishes (Luke, 9) and the restoration of sight to the blind man (Mark, 8). (2) City, home of Peter, Andrew, and Philip (John, 1; 12), possibly w. of the Jordan or else identical with (1). (3) Place in Jerusalem (John, 5), where Our Lord cured a man "eight and thirty years under his infirmity."—C.E.

Betrothal (A.S., treowth, truth), an agreement to marry, made by mutual promises. As a matrimonial impediment it was practically done away with by the legislation of Pius X, who ruled that such a compact, to have any effect on a proposed marriage to another, must have been made in a written and dated document, signed by both parties and by the pastor or bishop of the place, or at least by two witnesses; and even this formal pledge does not oblige one party to marry the other.—C.E.; U.K.; Ayrinthe, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919.

Betting, the backing of an affirmation or forecast by offering to forfeit, in case of an adverse issue, a sum of money or some article to one who, by accepting, maintains the opposite with a corresponding stipulation. Though a bet be and often is, null and void in the eyes of the law, yet it may be a valid contract binding in conscience if the object is honest and if it fulfills the following conditions: (a) the parties must have the free disposal of what they stake and both must bind themselves to pay if they lose; (b) both must understand the matter of the bet in the same sense; (c) neither must have absolutely certain evidence of the truth of his contention which he does not reveal to the other.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss.

Beuno, SAINT, confessor (d. 660), Abbot of Clymnog Fawr, b. Powis-lland, Wales; d. Carnarvonshire. He studied in the monastery of Bangor, and afterwards became active in missionary work. Cadvan, King of Gwynedd, was his benefactor. In 616 he founded the Abbey of Clymnog Fawr in Carnarvonshire. According to tradition he restored his niece St. Winefride to life at Holywell where many miracles have since then taken place. Eleven churches and a Jesuit house, formerly of theological studies, now of novices and tertiaries, in the Diocese of St. Asaph are named for him. Feast, 21 April.—C.E.; Butler.

Beuron, noted Benedictine abbey and art school, Sigmaringen, Hohenzollern, Germany, founded, 1777. It was destroyed in the 10th century; reestablished as an Augustinian monastery, 1077; and suppressed, 1802. The Benedectine Order was reestablished by Maurus and Placidus Wolter, 1863; erected into an abbey by Pius IX, 1868. Dispersed by Bismarck, 1875, the monks returned in 1887 and founded a flourishing school of varied art whose decorative work is especially celebrated. The present abbey houses over 160 religious.

Bewcastle Cross, a headless stone cross 14½ ft. high, bearing an English runic inscription, found in the village of Bewcastle, Cumberland. One of the two famous ancient Northumbrian crosses which scholars designate as principal churchyard crosses, excellent examples of Anglo-Saxon sculptural art of the 7th and 8th centuries.

Bhutan, bu-tān’, independent monarchy in the southeastern Himalayas, bounded n. and e. by Tibet, s. by British India, w. by Sikkim and the Tibetan district of Kham; est. pop., 250,000. Polygamy and polyandry are practised, and the modified form of Buddhism professed by the majority of the people consists principally in propitiating evil spirits and reciting passages from the Tibetan scriptures. From the 10th century the country was ruled jointly by a Dharma Rajah and a Deb Rajah, representing respectively the ecclesiastical and civil powers, which in 1907 were combined and entrusted to one ruler, a hereditary maharajah. Policy in foreign relations is guided by the advice of the British government. Bhutan is included with Assam and Manipur in the Prefecture Apostolic of Assam in charge of the Salesian Fathers, established in 1899.—U.K.

Biard, Pierre (1567-1622), Jesuit missionary, b. Grenoble, France; d. Avignon. After laboring unsuccessfully at the Jesuit mission of Port Royal, Acadia, he was transferred with his co-worker, Edmond Masse, to Saint Sauveur (now Bar Harbor, Me.) in 1613, but the Virginian marauder, Argall, destroyed the colony and carried off Biard and Masse. Argall’s boat was forced across the ocean by stress of weather to Wales where the missionaries were released and sent to France. —C.E.

Bibiana, Saint, virgin, martyr (363), d. Rome. Her legend which is connected with the martyrs Sts. John and Paul, and has no historical basis, relates that she was the daughter of the prefect Flavianus, and Dafrosa, and was persecuted with them under Julian. She was tortured and died from her sufferings. Her body, which was left exposed by her persecutors, was buried, by a holy priest led John near the palace of Licinius; there Pope Simplicius built a basilica in her honor, 405. Feast, R. Cal., 2 Dec.—C.E.; Butler.

Bible, Names of. The Bible contains the revelation of God to man, and is therefore named from the Greek, biblion, “The Book,” book of all books. (Osee, Joel, Amos, Abdias or Obadiah, Jonas, Micheas or Micah, Nahum, Habaue, Sophonias or Zechariah, Ageus or Haggai, Zacharias, Malachias). The difference between the Jewish and Catholic counting is due to the fact that the Catholics accept also the so-called deuterocanonical books. There are 27 books of the N.T.: the 4 Gospels (Matthew, Mark, Luke, John); the Acts of the Apostles; 14 Epistles of St. Paul (Romans, 1 and 2 Corinthians, Galatians, Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, 1 and 2 Timothy, Titus, Philemon, Hebrews); 7 Catholic Epistles (James, 1 and 2 Peter, 1, 2, and 3 John, Jude); and the Apocrypha, the only prophetic book of the N.T. Each book of the Bible is treated under its own title. (ED.)

Bible, Editions of the. Since the Bible was written (the O.T. in Hebrew, the N.T. in Greek) many centuries before the invention of printing, the only way to multiply copies was by hand. The autograph originals and the earliest copies have all been lost, the oldest manuscripts of the whole Bible having been written in the 4th century. Handwritten copies, even if made by pains-taking scribes, inevitably contain variations from the original, and the number of such variants were greatly increased by the hands of careless or ignorant copyists. Therefore, by the middle of the 15th century, when printing was invented, there existed a vast number of manuscript copies of the original Bible text, differing from one another in thousands of passages. It has been the task of Scripture scholars, by the comparison and appraisal of these manuscripts, to reconstruct the original as exactly as possible. The Latin Vulgate is the basis for all modern texts, the most notable English translation being the Douay Version (see DOUVY BIBLE. Any printed reproduction of the Bible i.e., of the original text), in whole or in part, is an edition. Various editions of the Hebrew O.T. have been published by eminent scholars, both Jewish and Christian. Among the best-known editions of the Greek N.T. are those by Tischendorf, Tregelles, Westcott and Hort, and Nestle.—C.E., V. 286; Gramann; Schumacher. (N. T.)

Bible, Study of the, chief occupation of the authorities of the Catholic Church, of its early Fathers and Doctors, of scriptural specialists, and theologians. Due to their devout as well as scientific labors we have what is called an Introduction to the Bible, treating the inspiration of the Sacred Books, their Canon, their meaning (exegesis) and the rules which guide students in determining this (hermeneutics), as well as the late studies necessitated by the criticism, higher as it is called, of the sacred Books. See INTRODUCTION, BIBLICAL; CANON OF HOLY SCRIPTURES; EXEGESIS; HERMENEUTICS; CRITICISM, BIBLICAL. (ed.)

Bible, Use of the. In the Catholic Church it is threefold, doctrinal, liturgical, and pietistic. Its doctrinal use grows out of the official teaching of the Church as incorporated in the decrees of the Council of Trent and the Vatican Council, which states that the Sacred Scriptures, together with the Apostolic tradition, constitute the twofold fount of Divine revelation. Thus it is that Catholic theologians and preachers have ever considered the inscripted treasure house which guarantees for proof and sanction of the Church's teaching in doctrinal and moral matters. Indeed, it is no exaggeration to say that the roots of dogmatic, moral, and ascetical theology are deeply grounded in the Sacred Scriptures. In liturgy the Catholic Church, like the Jewish Church before it (Deut., 31; 2 Par., 9; Luke, 4), has given Sacred Scripture, in both its Old and New Testament portions, a most prominent place. The earliest accounts of the Eucharist or Mass describe the reading of selections from both Testaments; and the official public prayers of the Catholic Church today, found in the Roman Missal and Breviary, are composed largely of biblical passages. Its use pietistically is a complement to its doctrinal and liturgical functions. From time immemorial the Catholic Church has always directed her preachers, in their devotional sermons and the direction of souls, to draw heavily on the Sacred Scriptures, and the prayers which the Church has approved for the piety and sanctification of the faithful, are composed largely of scriptural passages. Also, the Church supplements these uses of the Bible by recommending that it be read in private as a means of personal sanctification. It was with this in mind that Pope Leo XIII, on 13 Dec., 1898, granted an indulgence of 300 days to those reading the Gospel for 15 minutes a day and a plenary indulgence to those reading it every day for a month, with the usual conditions of confession, communion, and prayer for the pope.—Granman. (J.A.C.)

Bible and the Popes, The. The popes, both in their own persons, and through the various particular and ecumenical councils, have always manifested a profound interest in, and exercised a close and prudent guardianship over, the Bible. The first popes whose connection with the Bible is noteworthy are those of the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries. Of these the first is Pope St. Damasus, who lived in the latter half of the 4th century. In the year 382 he convoked a synod in Rome to settle the question of the canonicity of the so-called Deutero-Canonical Books. This synod formulated and published the Damascan catalog of the Sacred Scriptures, a complete and perfect canon, which has ever since been received in the Church. In the following year, 383, he commissioned St. Jerome to revise the text of the Old Latin version, then much in need of emendation, and it was, no doubt, this commission which later inspired St. Jerome to give to the world his famous Latin Vulgate. During the two centuries following several Roman pontiffs, as witnessed by the letter of Innocent I to St. Eusuphianus (405), the Canons of Gelasius (496), and Hormisdas (523), republished the Canon of Damasus, lest the faithful be erroneously led into repudiating any of the Sacred Books. Nor did the popes of this period confine their interests in the Bible to the canonization of its various books, and to keeping pure its text, for several of them, notably St. Leo the Great (461) and St. Gregory the Great (604), have left numerous homilies which proved them profound students and splendid exegetes of Holy Writ. The invention of printing in the 15th century brought about not only a multiplicity of versions but also a great number of unmetrical editions of St. Jerome's Vulgate and the Greek Septuagint. But, through the tireless efforts of several popes of this time, namely, Popes Julius III (1555), Pius IV (1565), Gregory XIII (1585), Sixtus V (1590), and Clement VIII (1604), the celebrated revisions of the Vulgate and the Septuagint, which are still in common use, were begun and successfully completed.

Recent popes have vied with their distinguished predecessors as defenders and teachers of the Bible. Popes Leo XIII, Pius X, Benedict XV, and Pius XI have all issued scholarly and weighty pronounce­ments on the Bible and biblical studies. Of these the decrees and encyclical letters of Leo XIII and Pius X are especially worthy of mention. The encyclical letter, "Providentissimus Deus," of Leo XIII, dated 18 Nov., 1893, has been justly styled the "Magna Carta" of Bible students. Therein the sovereign pontiff not only vindicates the inspired character and authority of the Bible against the nationalists and modernists of his day, but also sounds a warning note against the insidious attacks of nationalistic and modernist scholars. As a final safeguard against any future attacks or abuses, he created the Pontifical Biblical Commission to which he confided the supervision and direction of the work of Catholic scholars in connection with their study of the Bible. Pius X continued the work of his distinguished predecessor through the issuance of several letters, chief of which are the Apostolic letter of 18 Nov., 1907, in which he gives instructions regarding the methods to be employed in the teaching of Sacred Scriptures in the seminaries; a letter written 3 Dec., 1907, addressed to Abbot Gasquet, authorizing him to begin the revision of the Vulgate with a view to reproducing as far as was possible the original text of St. Jerome; and the Apostolic letter, "Vinea Electa," 7 May, 1909, through which medium he officially established the Pontifical Biblical Institute at Rome. (J.A.C.)

impose the reading of the Bible to the pupils as a daily or frequent exercise. It is considered inconsistent with the non-sectarian policy of the schools. It is opposed by non-Catholic parents as proselytism for the Christian religion; by Jews, as only Christian versions are used; and by Catholics because the version used is in nearly every instance the Protestant version and the principle involved is that the Bible is the sole rule of faith. Very commonly also since the passages selected are sectarian, the intrusion of this practise is considered out of place. In several states either the courts or the school superintendents or commissions have forbidden this reading as tending to sectarianism. The latest decision is that of the court at Lead, S. D.

Bible Reading by Laity. In the history of the Church there never has been a general prohibition against the reading of the Bible by the laity. While the Church does not consider Bible reading necessary for salvation, she has always approved such reading under proper conditions. In consequence, we find that any restrictions which the Church has placed on the reading of the Bible were aimed at the use of heretical or corrupt versions, or versions without proper notes or authorization, and not against the reading of the Bible itself. The Albigenses and Waldenses who appeared to unauthorized and, at times, corrupt versions in their disputes with Catholics, gave occasion for the first restrictive decrees. These decrees, edited by the Synods of Toulouse (1229), Tarragona (1234), and Oxford (1408), aimed to restrict the reading of the Bible in the vernacular. The adoption of printing in the 16th century created conditions which made further restrictions imperative. The Protestant reformers, who were keenly alive to the advantages of the printing-press, used it to multiply their heretical versions, while Catholics produced numerous translations in the vernacular. This multiplication of versions by men who lacked qualifications essential for the work, and who acknowledged no proper supervision, made for the corruption of the Sacred Text, so that the Council of Trent (1546-63) was compelled to take action. The Council strictly prohibited the reading of all heretical Latin versions, unless grave reasons necessitated their use. The Council itself did not forbid the reading of the new Catholic translations, although even these later fell under the ban of the Index Commission which Trent set up for the supervision of future legislation regarding the Bible. In 1559 the Commission forbade the use of certain Latin editions, as well as German, French, Spanish, Italian, and English vernacular versions. Two centuries later, however, it modified the severity of this legislation by granting permission for the use of all versions translated by learned Catholic men, provided they contained annotations derived from the Fathers, and had the approval of the Holy See.

Our present discipline grows out of the decree, "Officiorum ac Munerum," of Leo XIII. This decree states that all vernacular versions, even those prepared by Catholic authors, are prohibited if they are not, on the one hand, approved by the Apostolic See, or, on the other hand, supplied with proper annotations and accompanied by episcopal approbation. However, it contains a provision whereby for grave reasons, biblical and theological students may use non-Catholic editions as long as these do not attack Catholic dogma.—U.K.; P.C. Augustine. (J. A. C.)

Bibles, Picture, manuscript books in which copious illustrations with short accompanying texts, or commentaries, made up an almost complete Bible. Among the earliest, the "Bible Moralisee" (in allusion to the moral lessons frequently interspersed), or "Bible Historiee," a work of the 13th century, is preserved in sections in the Bodleian Library (Oxford), the British Museum, and the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris. The whole consisted of 850 pages, illuminated on one side only, and comprising about 5000 illustrations. Each page contained two columns of four pictures each, alternating with two columns of appropriate text. Many offered a comparative study of Old and New Testament incidents. The numerous existing copies of such Bibles show how widely they were distributed in the ages before the invention of printing made reading a common accomplishment.—C.E.

Bible Societies were first formed for the dissemination of the Sacred Scriptures, but in time extended their scope so as to embrace the twofold work of translating and editing. The first real Bible Society was the Von Canstein Bible Institute of Saxony, founded in 1710, and still thriving in Halle, Germany. As Protestantism developed, these societies were multiplied. England, Wales, Ireland, the Scandinavian countries, and France each had their own foundations, though many of these were supported by the British and Foreign Bible Society, an organization established in 1804. In the United States the years 1805 and 1809 saw the institution of these societies in New York, Boston, Hartford, Princeton, and Philadelphia. In 1816 Elias Boudinot, president of the New Jersey Bible Society, succeeded in uniting some 128 local societies into the American Bible Society, which still functions at Astor Place, New York City. The Catholic Church has steadfastly refused to endorse these societies or their activities, because as the Divinely authorized custodian and interpreter of the Sacred Scriptures, she has deemed inadvisable the dissemination of the bare text, which needs emendation and explanation in so many places; and because these societies have repeatedly shown hostility to the Church by their many attempts to impose unauthorized and mutilated Protestant versions of the Bible on Catholic peoples; and also because of their lack of good faith, for they have never offered to spread among Catholics a Catholic version with imprimatur and approved notes.—C.E.; U.K. (J. A. C.)
Biblia Pauperum (Bible of the Poor), books popular especially in the 15th century, consisting of about 40 pages of pictures illustrating the New Testament, with appropriate prophetic scenes from the Old on either side of each page and explanatory texts in the corners. Their invention is ascribed to St. Anschar, Bp. of Bremen. With the introduction of the xylographic or block-book process they were published much more cheaply than the earlier picture bibles, and were thus more accessible to the poor. They were used by the mendicant orders, in instructing the people. When the printing of the whole Bible with illustrations became practicable they were gradually given up. Five copies are preserved in the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris.—C.E.

Biblical Commission, established by Leo XIII, 30 Oct., 1902, for the maintenance and development of all that pertains to biblical science. It is composed of a few cardinals and a large corps of eminent biblical scholars of various nationalities. On 18 Nov., 1907, Pius X declared that all Catholics are bound in conscience to accept the decisions published by this commission. On questions affecting the general historicity of the Bible, the commission has decided that "tacit quotations" in historical statements are not to be admitted, except where, subject to the mind and decision of the Church, there are solid reasons for admitting such quotations and for proving that the sacred writer does not himself approve what he quotes nor make it his own. This was aimed at those who, to escape certain historical difficulties in the text, supposed that in such statements the writer was quoting from some uninspired document. It was further decided that the historical narratives must be accepted as genuinely historical and not merely having the appearance of history for the purpose of setting forth some religious idea; an exception was granted under proper restrictions where it could be solidly proved that the writer meant to give only a parable or anthropomorphical sense, and natural phenomena might be described in popular, rather than in strictly scientific, expressions. While David need not be considered the sole author of the entire Psalter, a large number of the Psalms must be attributed to him, especially those which in other parts of Scripture are expressly cited as his; the antiquity of the titles prefixed to the Psalms is to be upheld, and their testimony is not to be set aside without solid reason; some of the Psalms may have been divided or joined into one or slightly modified for liturgical or other purposes; there is no probability in the opinion that not a few Psalms were composed after the time of Esdras and Nehemias or even as late as the Machabean times; many of the Psalms are to be recognized as foretelling the coming of the Messias and describing His kingdom. The true character of the prophetic writings must be acknowledged; they really foretold distantly future events, especially regarding the Messias. The arguments used by critics to show that Isaias could not have written the whole of his book are declared to be unconvincing. Decisions were issued defending the traditional position on the authorship of the four Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, the Pastoral Epistles, and the Epistle to the Hebrews, though the present form of the latter Epistle may be attributed to some disciple of St. Paul. The Gospels and the Acts are historically reliable; the first three Gospels were written in the following order: Aramaic St. Matthew (the Greek translation being substantially the same as the original), St. Mark, St. Luke; this arrangement excludes the "Two Document Theory" advocated by most non-Catholic critics as a solution of the Synoptic problems; under these restrictions the Synoptic problem is left open to discussion. The writings of the Apostles are not to be construed in such a way as to support the opinion that they looked upon the Second Coming of Christ as imminent.—C.E.; Rome and the Study of Scripture, St. Meinrad Abbey, Ind., 1919. (W. A. D.)

Biblical Institute at Rome, Tres, a Pontifical Institute in charge of the Jesuit Fathers, but under the direct and immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See, formally established by Pius X, 7 May, 1909, through the publication of the Apostolic Constitution, "Vinea electa." The purpose of its institution was to found a post-graduate school for the training of teachers and writers who would be properly qualified to defend the truths of Sacred Scripture. The professors of the Institute are chosen from among the Jesuit Fathers, and are all specialists in their respective branches. The subjects taught embrace the special questions of biblical introduction, archaeology, history, geography, philology, and interpretation. Applicants for admission to the Institute must be graduates of philosophy and theology as established for ecclesiastical seminaries or religious clergy, and, if they aspire to degrees in Sacred Scripture, they are further required to have previously taken a doctorate in Sacred Theology. A library, archæological museum, and special publications complete the facilities of the school. By virtue of a Motu Proprio issued 30 Sept., 1928, by His Holiness Pope Pius XI, the Biblical Institute was incorporated into the Gregorian University, though, nevertheless, it is to remain under the exclusive jurisdiction and obedience of the Roman pontiff. (J. A. C.)

Biblical Institute of Jerusalem, Tres, founded by the Dominicans, 1891, under the direction of Fr. M. J. Lagrange, and approved by Leo XIII, 1892. The purpose of its institution was to form a progressive center of Catholic biblical study, which would aid in offsetting current rationalistic-modernistic attacks upon the Holy Bible. The school is particularly interested in oriental languages, and biblical geography and topography. Among its important contributions to biblical science is the discovery of the famous mosaic map of Madaba, a map which has shed considerable light on the history and geography of that part of ancient Palestine which lay between Samaria and the Nile delta. It also publishes the well known "Revue Biblique." The Biblical Institute of Jerusalem still remains an active and progressive school of thoroughly sound scientific biblical research. (J. A. C.)

Bibliomancy (Gr., biblion, book; mantein, divination), a form of divination, practised by taking at random a passage from the Bible or other book and deriving therefrom portents of the future.

Bickerstafte-Drew, FRANCIS (pseudonym, JOHN AYSCOUGH; 1858-1928), writer, b. Headingly, Leeds, England; d. Salisbury. He was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford; became a Catholic, 26 Oct., 1878; and was ordained, 1884. In 1891 he was appointed private chamberlain to Leo XIII; in 1903, private chamberlain to Pius X; in 1904, domestic prelate; in 1909, Knight of the Holy Sepulcher and Count. He served as military chaplain at Plymouth, 1892-99, at Malta, 1899-1905, and at Salisbury Plain, 1905-09. During the World War he served with distinction. In 1918 he became assistant principal chaplain royal, and in 1919, Commander of the British Empire. Under the name of John Ayscough he published several novels, including "Marota," "Dromina," "San Celestino," "Hurdcott," "Jacqueline," and "Abbotscourt"; short stories, among them those in a "Roman Tragedy" and "Prodigals and Sons"; and essays, notably "Saints and Places," "Levia Pondera," and "French Windows."
many years he held the offices of prior and provincial in his order.—C.E.

Bilocation (Lat., bis, twice; locatio, place), the actual presence of the same finite being in two totally different places at the same time. A physical body is said to be in place circumspectively, every exterior part juxtaposed with its corresponding part of the environing surfaces. A spiritual being is said to be in place definitely, entire in every part of space occupied. A mixed mode of location is that of a being circumspectively in one place and definitely elsewhere, as is Christ in heaven and in the Sacred Host. This latter mode of bilocation is pertinent to the Catholic doctrine of the Holy Eucharist. All the physical laws of matter known to natural science contradict the bilocation of a material body as physically possible. As an absolute or metaphysical impossibility involving an intrinsic, essential contradiction, Catholic philosophers maintain that there is no intrinsic repugnance to a mixed mode of location. Since local extension is not an essential note of material substance, but merely a relation, bilocation does not involve the multiplication of a body’s substance but only the multiplication of its local relations to other bodies.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, III, 181, St. L., 1922.

Bination, the offering of Mass twice on the same day by the same celebrant; permitted on days when the faithful are obliged to assist at Mass and there are not enough priests for the number of Masses needed by the congregations.—C.E.

Binding and Loosing, the power promised by Christ to the rulers of His Church when He said to the Apostles: “Whosoever you shall bind upon earth, shall be bound also in heaven; and whatsoever you shall loose upon earth, shall be loosed also in heaven” (Matt., 18; cf. 16). Whatever be the primary signification of this metaphor in the Aramaic language, these words as used by Christ, as is evident from the context and from Christian tradition, meant that He was to confer upon the rulers of His Church the power to bind the faithful to the observance of laws and to loose them from impediments to eternal happiness, especially from sin and its consequent debt of punishment.—Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, III, 9-11, St. L., 1924. (F. J. C.)

Binet, Jacques Philippe Marie (1856-1856), mathematician, b. Rennes, France; d. there. In 1800 he obtained the chair of mathematical physics in the Collège de France, and subsequently was engaged in the standardization of the length of the meter. He discovered the laws of rotary polarization by crystalline bodies, and advocated the corpuscular theory of light.—C.E.

Birds (in Symbolism). In the O.T. and the N.T. symbolic references to birds occur, and these were multiplied in medieval literature and art. The dove was an early type of purity, as in Canticle of Canticles, 5 and 6; of peace, as in the story of the Deluge; of simplicity and innocence, as in Matthew, 10. In early Christian art it typified the Holy Ghost; and later, as the soul, it is sometimes seen flying from the mouth of the dead. The eagle, reputed to have the power of looking directly at the sun, is a symbol of Christ gazing undaunted on the brightness of God the Father, and of St. John absorbed in contemplating the highest truth. The eagle was also a type of Baptism, from the legend that a dying eagle could renew its youth by plunging three times into a spring of pure water (Ps., 102). The pelican, feeding her young with the blood of her breast, symbolizes Christ the Redeemer, “nostro pelicano” as Dante calls Him. The phoenix, said to rise rejuvenated from its own ashes, is the type of reanimation and eternity. The peacock, believed incorruptible, represents immortality, and in later art, pride. The cock is the emblem of St. Peter, and sometimes of vigilance. The vulture represents greed; the raven may symbolize the Jews, or occasionally confession and penance. As emblems of the saints, birds are associated in art with St. Francis of Assisi and with Ven. Joseph Ancheta, S.J., because of miraculous instances in connection therewith.—C.E.

Biretta, stiff, square cap with three or four ridges on its upper surface, worn by clerics, whose rank is distinguished by its color, when entering sanctuary for Mass and at other functions.—C.E.;

Birinus, Saint, confessor (d. 650), apostle of at Rome, he was consecrated at Genoa by Abp.
Asterius of Milan and sent by Pope Honorius to spread the gospel in England. He arrived in Wes-sex, 634, and converted King Cyneigils. He established his see at Dorrec, now Dorchester. Relics at Winchester, where numerous miracles have taken place. Feast, 3 Dec.—C.E.

Birmingham, city, England. Tracing its history from Saxon times, and mentioned in Domesday Book, from the 14th century until the Reformation Birmingham was governed by the Guild of the Holy Cross. During the anti-Catholic riots which followed the changed order, a church and convent were destroyed, 1688, and in 1791 the “Church and King” riots which occurred here culminated in the exile of Dr. Priestley. Previous to the erection of the city into a diocese, 1850, it formed part of the Midland, and later the Central Vicariate, of which the last vicar Apostolic was William B. Ullathorne.
The city was raised to an archiepiscopal see, 1911.
The oldest parish church, St. Martin’s, now Anglicans, dates from the 13th century, but the original building has been replaced. The Cathedral of St.
Chad, designed by Pugin, was built 1840, and by him the St. Chad’s High School. It is relics of its patron, preserved at Lichfield until the Reformation, now repose over the high altar.
Through the generosity of John Hardman, patron of ecclesiastical art, the cathedral choir has become one of the foremost in the country. Newman came to Birmingham after his ordination and founded the Oratory, at Edgbaston, making it his home for forty years.

Birmingham, Archdiocese of, England, comprises Warwickshire, Oxfordshire, Staffordshire, and Worcestershire; diocese, 1850; archdiocese, 1911; suffragan sees: Clifton, Plymouth, and Shrewsbury. Bps. and Abps.: William Ullathorne,
O.S.B. (1850-88), Edward Ilsley (1888-1921), John
McIntyre (1921-29), and Thomas L. Williams
(1929). Churches and chapels, 229; priests, secular, 224; priests, regular, 152; seminary, 1; elementary schools, 126; other schools, 47; institutions, 25; Catholics, 129,626.

Birt, Dom Henry Norbert (1861-1919), ecclesiastical historian, b. Valparaiso, Chile; d. London.
He entered the Benedictine Order at Downside Abbev, England, 1880, was ordained, 1889, and after a period of teaching and parochial work at Coventry, became assistant and secretary to Abbot Francis Gasquet, army chaplain during the South African war, and to the home forces during the World War. He served prominently on the Committee of the Catholic Truth Society and was on the Council of the Catholic Record Society. His works include: “Elizabethan Religious Settlement”; “History of Downside School”; “Lingard’s History Abridged”; “Benedictine Pioneers in Australia”; “Oblate Book of the English Benedictines”; and articles for the Catholic Encyclopedia and for various Catholic periodicals.—C.E.; Suppl.

Birth, defect of, a canonical impediment caused by illegitimacy of birth, that is birth out of lawful wedlock, whereby one is impeded from receiving orders licitly, and is inhibited from exercising the orders he may have received illicitly; it also renders one ineligible to be a higher superior in a religious order, or to be admitted into an ecclesiastical seminary. The defect may be cured by the subsequent marriage of the parents, or by a papal rescript, or by religious profession, or by a dispenation; but such legitimatization does not remove the impediment against receiving the cardinalate, or consecration as a bishop, abbot, or prelate nullius.—C.E.

Birth Control, the voluntary prevention of conception through arrested coition or the use of contraceptives, for the purpose of limiting the number of offspring. As commonly used the term means the absolute prevention of pregnancy. While the Catholic Church does not urge married persons to beget the largest possible number of children, and does not sanction the intemperate use of marriage, she does condemn each deliberate act of birth control as intrinsically evil (S.O.F., 21 May, 1851; 19 April, 1853; S.Pean., 13 Nov., 1901). In cases of ill health or poverty she insists on marital abstinence. The Catholic doctrine that birth control is essentially wrong, is not a mere disciplinary measure, like the law of clerical celibacy, which can be, and is, modified. Church Canon Law postains a definition of the law of God, which no power, not even the Church itself, can abrogate or contravene. In the Divine plan the primary purpose of the marital act is the procreation of offspring, and its secondary purposes are the cementing of conjugal love and the allaying of concupiscence.
As birth control defeats the primary purpose of the marriage relation, it is opposed to the Divine Will, which the Church must sustain. This teaching is reinforced by other weighty considerations, e.g., birth control undermines the respect of husband for wife, and vice versa, and thereby increases unhappiness among married people and the consequent number of divorces. The essential evil of birth control, however, consists in frustrating the primary purpose of marriage, the propagation of the species.—U.K.; Bruehl, Birth Control and Eugenics, N. Y., 1928.

Bishop (Gr., episkopos, overseer), Divinely instituted member of the ecclesiastical hierarchy (Trent, Sess. XXXIII, ch. 4, can. 6), and successor of the Apostles. The Sacrament of Orders, i.e., consecration, confers on bishops spiritual power in the Church, and imprints on their souls an indelible spiritual character. In the hierarchy of orders they are superior to priests; in the hierarchy of jurisdiction by Christ’s will, they rule a diocese, in due dependence and submission to the Roman pontiff.
—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Bishop, Methodist, prelate in the American Methodist Episcopal Church elected by the General Conference. They are not bishops in the sense in which this name is used in the Catholic Church and Anglican, or Episcopalian, Church, but superintendent, sharing in common their jurisdiction without being confined to any diocese or district. For practical reasons the General Conference at its session every four years designates episcopal residences.
BLACK LETTER

Their duties being entirely executive, the bishops do much traveling to various churches, promoting temporal and spiritual interests. Between the bishops and other ministers there is no distinction of order.

Bishop, Titular, one who has been appointed by the Holy See to a diocese which, in former times, had been canonically established and possessed cathedral church, clergy, and laity, but on account of pagan occupation of the diocesan territory has now neither clergy nor people. See Titular Sees.

Bishop, William (c. 1553-1624), first episcopal superior in England after the extinction of the hierarchy, b. Brailes, Warwickshire, England. About 1574 he joined Dr. Allen at Douai, and subsequently completed his studies at Rome, returning to the English mission. In 1598 he went to Rome on behalf of the secular clergy in connection with the “archpriest controversy”; his views were unfavorably received and for some time he was forbidden to return to England. When the injunction was withdrawn he returned, and soon after he drew up the famous “Protestation of Allegiance” to Elizabeth, which was violently denounced by his opponents. In 1603 he was named titular Bp. of Chalcedon and Vicar Apostolic of England. He organized a system of church government throughout the country, establishing a chapter of 24 canons to assume jurisdiction during any vacancy of the vicaraste.—C.E.

Bishop of Rome, the pope who, besides being head of the universal Church, occupies its central and principal see, Rome, in succession to its first bishop, Peter.

Bishops and Regulars, Congregation of. This congregation originated in 1601 from the union of the congregations for the Consultations of Bishops and for the Consultations of Regulars, Presided over by a cardinal prefect, it had an adequate number of cardinals and the usual officials. Its competency was wide; only questions of doctrine, the formal interpretation of the Tridentine Decrees, marriage processes, and rites and ceremonies were excluded. Thus it was competent in all business concerning bishops and the proper administration of dioceses. It received appeals against bishops, and replied to doubts about diocesan administration. It also treated all affairs about religious; settled controversies between orders, or within an order; considered the establishment and suppression of religious houses; gave permission for religious to transfer to another order; and took cognizance of those who left their order. Pius X, 8 Sept., 1908, suppressed it, giving its competency over affairs of bishops to the Congregation of the Council, and that over the affairs of religious to the newly founded Congregation for the Affairs of Religious.—C.E., XIII, 142.

Bismarck, Diocese of, comprises the western half of North Dakota; area, 35,998 sq. m.; established, 1910; suffragan of St. Paul. Bishop: Vincent Wehrle (1910). Churches, 154; priests, secular, 46; priests, regular, 25; religious women, 238; high schools, 6; primary schools, 17; pupils in parochial schools, 2530; institutions, 5; Catholics, 48,607.

Bismarck, Otto Eduard Leopold von (1815-98), prince, statesman, b. Schönhausen, Germany; d. Friedrichsruh. He entered the University of Göttingen, 1832, then studied law in Berlin. About 1846 he became a member of the provincial diet of Saxony; in 1847, deputy from Brandenburg in the Prussian Diet; and in 1850, Prussian delegate at Frankfurt. He quickly gained the confidence of Frederick William IV. Bismarck worked for the removal of Austria from the Germanic Confederation. In 1867 he was appointed ambassador to Russia, and in 1861, to Paris. In 1862 he became minister of foreign affairs and head of the cabinet. He created a large army which, 3 July, 1866, crushed Austria at Sadowa, terminating the Seven Weeks War. This victory assured Prussian supremacy. Bismarck now turned to the consolidation of the North German states. He headed the German Liberal Nationals and granted a new constitution with universal suffrage. In 1870 the Franco-Prussian War tested the strength of the German union. Germany emerged victorious, and the states of North and South Germany united under William I, crowned first German Emperor in the Palace of Versailles, 18 Jan., 1871. Bismarck became the chancellor with the title of prince. He next concentrated on the nationalization of the empire. In his effort to crush all possible enemies he inaugurated the Kulturkampf (struggle for civilization) against Catholics whom he feared because of their allegiance to the pope. With the election of Pope Leo XIII a reconciliation was effected, and by 1884 diplomatic relations had been resumed with Rome. In 1882 he had formed the Triple Alliance of Austria, Germany, and Italy. The last years of his chancellorship were devoted to a vigorous campaign against socialism, but with the accession of William II, 1888, his long domination came to an end. His resignation was requested, 1890, and he withdrew to his estate of Lauenburg.—U.K.; Weber, General History of the Christian Era, II, 465-486, Wash., 1928. (c. v.)

Black, liturgical color symbolizing mourning. Black vestments are used on Good Friday, to express grief at the death of the Saviour, and unless the rank of the celebration require otherwise, on funerals and offices for the dead to show sorrow and sympathy. However, at these times the tabernacle veil is purple, as it is never allowed to hang a black veil before the Blessed Sacrament. (J. C. T.)

Black Fast, a form of fasting with abstinence from flesh meat, eggs, butter, cheese, and milk enjoined.—C.E.

Black Friars. (1) Name popularly applied in Great Britain to the members of the Dominican Order, because of the black mantle which they wore over their white habits. (2) Well-known districts in London and in Glasgow, so called because of the former location of Dominican monasteries in these places.

Black Letter, name given to form of type used by early printers in distinction from “Roman” type. It is also called “Gothic.” It is still used in Germany. In England its use is confined to fancy printing.
Blackwell, George (c. 1545-1613), archpriest, b. Middlesex, England; d. London. Ordained at Douai, 1575, he served in England for nearly 20 years. When Card. Allen died, 1594, he was named archpriest by Clement VIII, 1597-98. On the procligation of the Oath of Allegiance of James I, 1606, he was confused by its ingenious wording into thinking it acceptable to conscientious Catholics, and in spite of its condemnation by Paul V, 1606 and 1607, he signed it and urged the clergy to do so. On defending his conduct, he was deposed from the office of archpriest by the pope and replaced by George Birkhead, or Birket, 1608.—U.K.

Blairs College (St. Mary’s College), Blairs, Aberdeen, Scotland, ecclesiastical college founded 1829, comprising the two “little seminaries” of Aquhories and Lismore. The first important Catholic collegiate foundation in Scotland after the Reformation, it has educated many priests for the Reformation, it has educated many priests for the Blaise, Saint, martyr (c. 316), Bp. of Sebaste, d. Sebaste, Armenia. According to legend he was a physician at Sebaste, where he later became bishop. He was cast into prison by the pagans in the persecution of Licinius. He performed a wonderful cure on the throat of a child, who was choking from a fishbone he had swallowed, and, consequently, is invoked against throat troubles. He is honored as one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers (q.v.). In many places on his feast day the faithful receive the blessing of St. Blaise, given by holding two candles against the throat in the form of St. Andrew’s cross. Emblems: a wax taper, and iron comb. Feast, 3 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Blanche of Castile (1186-1252), mother of St. Louis of France. Entrusted with the regency during the minority of her son, she had to contend with the hostility of the feudal barons. She was an energetic woman and had excellent counsellors in Friar Guerin, Chancellor Barthelmy of Roye, and the papal legate, Frangipani. When Louis IX reached his majority, he found his kingdom enlarged and his authority strengthened. Blanche was again regent during the king’s absence on the Crusade.—U.K. (F. P. B.)

Blanchet, blăn-sha, François Norbert (1795-1883), first Abp. of Oregon City, b. St. Pierre, Quebec, Canada; d. Portland, Ore. Educated at the Seminary of Quebec; he was ordained, 1819, and went west as vicar-general and first missionary to the Oregon country, 1838. He was made vicar apostolique and consecrated in Montreal, 1845, being named Abp. of Oregon City, 1846. After 42 years of heroic labor in the Northwest, he resigned, 1880. —Augustin Magloire (1797-1887), brother of preceding, 1st Bp. of Walla Walla, Wash. (present see, Seattle), b. St. Pierre; d. Fort Vancouver, Wash. He was ordained, 1821, consecrated at Montreal, 1846, and reached Walla Walla, 1847, by wagon overland through the United States. When the Diocese of Walla Walla was suppressed and the Diocese of Nesqually erected, 1880, he officiated at first in a log cathedral at Fort Vancouver. He resigned, 1879.—C.E.

Blandina, Saint, virgin, martyr (c. 177), d. Lyons. She was a Christian slave, who, with the other martyrs of Lyons, suffered at the hands of the fanatic heathen populace. After being exposed to the wild beasts in the arena and remaining unscathed, she was scourged, placed on a red-hot grate, thrown before a wild steer, and slain with a dagger. Relics in the church of St. Leu, Amiens. Feast, 2 June.—C.E.

Blane (Blane), Saint, bishop and confessor (d. 500), b. and d. island of Buté, Scotland. Educated in Ireland under Sts. Comgall and Kenneth, he became a monk, and went to Scotland as bishop among the Picts. He founded a monastery at Dunblane, on the site of which the cathedral of Dunblane now stands. His church was at Kingarth, Butë. His works include sacred hymns, instructions to catechumens, and pious writings. Buried at Kingarth, where many miracles are attributed to him. Feast, 10 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Blasphemy (Gr., blapo, injure; phemi, speak), any word of malediction, reproach, or contumeliously pronounced against God.—C.E.

Blathmac, Saint, martyr (750-855), b. Ireland; d. Iona, Scotland. According to the biography of the Holy Ghost. —C.E.

Blathmac, Saint, martyr (c. 580-855), b. Ireland; d. Iona, Scotland. According to the biography of the Holy Ghost. —C.E.

Blessed Bread. When the primitive custom of the faithful’s supplying the bread for consecration was discontinued, the usage arose of bringing common bread usually presented at the Offertory of the BLESSED SACRAMENT, DEVOTION TO THE. Among the various devotions to the Blessed Sacrament may be mentioned: ADORATION, PERPETUAL; BENEDICTION; EXPOSITION; FORTY HOURS; and VISITS TO THE BLESSED SACRAMENT, each of which is treated under its own article. Amongst the most beautiful and inspiring of devotions to the Blessed Sacrament are processions in which the Blessed Sacrament is borne along the line of march by the priest. These processions are time-old and not at all unusual. The cross-bearer leads, flanked by acoelytes bearing lighted torches, followed by a line of servers in casocks and surplices and by troops of boys and girls in white, some of them strewing flowers in the path of the celebrant bearing the Sacred Host, as he follows at the end of the line. The usual route of these processions is around the church beginning at the high altar, following down the middle aisle, up the aisle on the Gospel side and around by the Epistle side, up again through the middle aisle back to the altar. Benediction is given at the conclusion of the services. Corpus Christi processions are usually in the open grounds or fields (see CORPUS CHRISTI). The hymn chanted during the procession, the "Pange Lingua," has special reference to the Blessed Sacrament.

Blessing (A.-S., bloedstan, redden with blood, from the custom of sprinkling the altar with blood in sacrifice), as used in the Scriptures, has several meanings: praise; expression of desire that good fortune go with a person or thing; dedication of a person or thing to a sacred purpose; and a gift. In a strictly liturgical sense a blessing is a rite of ceremonies and prayers by which an authorized minister sanctifies persons or things to Divine service or invokes Divine favor upon them. The prayer usually mentions the object of the blessing and is accompanied by the sign of the Cross. In the Appendix of the Roman Ritual there are over 200 such blessings of everything imaginable: of the sick, fields, flocks, archives, libraries, food, cheese, beer, carriages, railroads, homes, airplanes, electrical machines, fire-engines, elevators, lfts, women pregnant and after delivery, organs, pilgrims, wells, schools, seismographs, horses, printing presses, vineyards, etc. In the Divine Office the blessing pronounced by the officiant upon the reader is known as the benediction (q.v.). For the papal blessing, see BLESSING, APOSTOLIC.—C.E.; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1917.

Blessing, Apostolic, the benediction given by the pope at the end of liturgical functions at which he presides, and sometimes after audiences; also the solemn benediction "Urbi et Orbi" (to the city and world) pronounced by the pope immediately after his election, from the balcony of St. Peter's, as well as on Maundy Thursday, Easter, Ascension Day, and the Assumption. The power to bestow the papal blessing has been delegated to all bishops, who may give it in their own dioceses, on Easter Sunday and on one other solemn feast. Abbot or prelates suillitus, vicars Apostolic and prefects Apostolic, even when not bishops, can give it in their territories on only one of the more solemn feasts each year. Regulars who are privileged to bestow the blessing, may do so only in the town churches or in those of nuns or tertiaries lawfully aggregated to their own order, and in the prescribed formula. All priests who are assisting the sick should grant them the Apostolic blessing or "last blessing" with a plenary indulgence for the moment of death, according to the formula and under the usual conditions.—C.E.

Blind, Catholic Work for the. Although there was no education for the blind until the 18th century, mainly due to the error as to their mental capacities, the Church provided for their corporeal needs from the earliest ages. Special care was given to them, and hospices for the blind were founded by St. Basil at Cassarea (4th century), St. Bertrand in France (7th century), William the Conqueror, and St. Louis, King of France, who established at Paris, c. 1226, the Hospice des Quinze-Vingts, surviving to this day. In the 16th century special processes for their education, attempted by Cardano and the Jesuit, Francesco Lana-Terzi, met with little success. The modern movement for education of the blind was originated by Valentin Haüy (1745-1822), who provided a system of tactual printing which resulted in a permanent literature, and founded the first school for the blind, 1784. Various inventors made improvements on Haüy's device, and in 1829 Louis Braille perfected his dot system which was soon adopted in most countries and is the basis of other simpler methods. To supply Catholic literature gratuitously for the blind the United States, Joseph Stadelman founded, in 1900, a society called "The Xavier Free Publication Society for the Blind of the City of New York," which prints and circulates thousands of volumes. —C.E.

Blood, Blood is the price of Heaven, hymn written by Rev. F. W. Faber in the 19th century.

Blosius, François Louis (1506-66), Benedictine abbot and spiritual writer, b. Donstienne, near Liège, Belgium; d. Liessies. He joined the order at the age of 14, studied at the University of Louvain, and became Abbot of Liessies, holding this office until his death. As abbot he inaugurated a reform confirmed by Pope Paul III. His many writings on spiritual subjects enjoy a well-deserved reputation. Three have been translated into English: "Mirror for Monks," "A Book of Spiritual Instruction," and "Comfort for the Faint-hearted."—C.E. R. J. M.

Blue, a liturgical color, not in use throughout the Church according to Roman Ritual, but used in some places at certain times. It is the color specially associated with Our Lady and indicates constancy, fidelity, genuineness, and aspiration, being significant, in the Levitical system, of the air. In pre-Reformation England there was a general rule as to colors but blue was often used. The Exeter ordinal for 1327 prescribes blue for certain double feasts of saints. According to an inventory of Meaux Abbey, Yorkshire, 1396, feasts of virgins not martyrs were kept in sky blue. Blue was one of the colors for confessors. In the 14th century at Wells blue was used in Advent and on Ash Wednesday. Inventories of 18 of the prebendal churches of St. Paul's taken in 1458 show that out of these churches 10 had blue vestments, and out of 83 suits of saints. An inventory of St. Dunstan's, Canterbury, 1500, includes a "best" vestment of blue. According to a decree of the Congregation of Rites, 12 Feb., 1884, by special indulgence, in certain churches of Spain the use of blue vestments instead of white on the feast of the Immaculate Conception, during its octave, and during the year whenever the Mass of the Immaculate Conception is said. Mexico has the same privilege and also Lourdes, France. In Columbia blue vestments were used by special privilege on the occasion of the Coronation of Our Lady of Chiquinquira at Bogotá, to which city the statue was brought for the ceremony.—Hope and Archley, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1925.

Blue Laws, stringent legal measures dealing with private morals and conduct, especially the puritanical laws of the early American colonies. The term "blue" originated in England where it was associated with strict adherents of Puritanism, since to be constant, faithful, or "true blue" was considered Puritanic. The more liberal inhabitants of the New York colony are believed to have stigmatized their stricter neighbors in New Haven as "blue" and the term is sometimes traced to the covers of blue paper which bound the session laws of Connecticut. Among those actually enacted were prohibitions against unnecessary Sunday travel, mixed dancing, gambling, regulations regarding wearing apparel, the obligation of belonging to an approved church imposed upon all freemen, voters, and military officers, and laws against Catholic priests and Quakers.—U.K.

BMT., in catacomb inscriptions = bene merenti (to the well deserving).

Boat, emblem in art associated with St. Peter as fisherman.

Boat, Incense (so called from its shape), vessel that holds the incense before it is put into the censer.

Bobbio Missal, a MS. of the 7th century found by Mabillon, at Bobbio, North Italy, now in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris (Lat. 13,246). While the MS. is also called Gallican and attributed to the Province of Besancon, it is now considered to be Irish in a much Romanized form. The Missal contains a "Missa Romensia cottidiana," other Masses for various days and intentions, the Order of Baptism, and the "Benedictio Cerer." (D. B.)

Boccadiperecora, Teobaldo (Celestine II), antipope (1124). He was elected but the Roman nobility demanded Cardinal Lambert as pope. To prevent a schism he resigned and Lambert was elected as Honorius II.—Mann.

Body, Relation of Soul and. The body and the soul of a living material being are incomplete substances so mutually complete and perfect one another, that there arises from their union one complete substance. In the case of a rational soul, if we except the soul of Christ, the result of this substantial union is a human person. In Christ the human nature consisting of soul and body exists in the Divine Personality of the Word, the Second Person of the Holy Trinity. Pius IX (1867) declared it to be Catholic doctrine that in man "the rational soul is the true, per se; and immediate form the body "per se" indicates, naturally and essentially destined for this union; and "immediate" signifies, with nothing intervening between body and soul. The whole human soul is in the whole body and the whole human soul is in each part of the body. According to its faculties, however, it is in definite parts; e.g., as to seeing, it is only in the eye, and as to hearing, it is only in the ear. At the general resurrection the body will be reunited to the soul (see Body, Resurrection of).—Maher, Psychology, N. Y., 1909. (J. F. G.)

Body, Resurrection of (Lat., res; again; surgere, to rise), a substantial conversion whereby the human body resolved into its component parts by death is restored to its former condition. The resurrection is styled a conversion to distinguish it from creation by which an entirely new being comes into existence. In ancient times the resurrection was denied especially by the Sadducees, the Gnostics, the Manicheans, and the medieval Albignenses and Waldenses, and is still violently attacked by atheists, materialists, and rationalists. The doctrine is well founded in Holy Writ being contained in both the Old and New Testaments. The classic text of the O.T. is the following from Job (19): "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and in the last day I shall rise out of the earth. And I shall be clothed again with my skin; and in my flesh I shall see my God." Another passage of Scripture is that describing the vision of Ezechiel (Ezech., 7). The prophet saw how the dry bones on the field of the dead began to stir, took on sinews and flesh, and were covered with skin. When they stood upright and breathed and lived, the Lord said to the prophet: "Son of man: all these bones are the house of Israel. Behold, I will open your graves, and will bring you out of your sepulchres, O my people, and will bring you into the land of Israel." Though this vision symbolizes the restoration of Israel, it would have been unintelligible to the Jews had they not been familiar with belief in a resurrection of the dead. In the N.T. we have the distinct assurance of Christ and the Apostles that the dead will rise again. Our Lord accussed the Sadducees of ignorance because they denied the resurrection of the dead. "You err, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God" (Matt., 22). He also predicted that He Himself would raise the dead to life: "The hour cometh, wherein all that are in the graves shall hear the voice of the Son of God. And they that have done good things shall come forth unto the resurrection of life: but they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of judgment." (John, 5). The Apostles testified to the resurrection, St. Paul especially placing the resurrection of the dead on the same level, as regards certainty, with the resurrection of our Lord; "Now if Christ be preached, that he rose again from the dead, how do some among you say that there is no resurrection of the dead? But if there be no resurrection of the dead, then Christ is not risen again. And if Christ be not risen again, then is our preaching vain: and your faith is also vain" (1 Cor., 15). Tradition of the early Church establishes the dogma of the resurrection, the Fathers not only referring to it, but even writing entire treatises appealing both to Scripture and reason.—C.E., XII, 789; Pohle-Preuß, Eschatology, St. L., 1924. (C. v. )

Body and the Eagles (Matt., 24; Luke, 17), parable following a description given by Jesus of His second coming. When and where that is to happen He refuses to tell His disciples, but He assures them, that when it does happen it will be so evident that they will realize it of themselves, just as the eagles find by instinct and with their senses a carcass without further indication. Hence, there is no need to fear deception by false prophets, announcing the second coming of Christ; the very fact that this so-called Christ needs announcing is proof that he is not the true Christ. Let them therefore live in peaceful preparation until they actually find themselves before their Lord and Master.—Foneck, tr. Leahy, Parables of the Gospel, Cin., 1915. (N. e.)

Boehme (BHEMEN), JAKOB (1575-1624), mystic and theologian, b. Altszeidenberg, Germany; d. Görlitz. He had little education, but having studied the Bible and several mystics, as a devout Lutheran, he preached and wrote on religious and philosophical subjects. His first book, published without his knowledge, 1612, aroused bitter opposition. The Elector of Saxony protected him against persecution as a heretic, 1624. He taught a sort of dualism in the nature of God as an explanation of good and evil, one of his basic theories being the apprehension of a principle by its opposite. His followers, called Böhists or Behmists, were numerous in Germany, Holland, and England. His complete works were translated and published in England, 1644-62. His theories were studied by several philosophers, including Isaac Newton, William Blake, Georg Wilhelm Hegel, and Friedrich Schelling.—U.K.

Bogotá or SANTA FE DE BOGOTA (Chibcha, bo-catá, end of the farm-lands), capital of the Republic of Colombia, founded in 1538 by Gonzalo Jiménez de Quesada, a Spanish conqueror. The Plaza de Bolivar, the principal square, contains the cathedral in Corinthian style with a jeweled statue of the Blessed Virgin. There are 30 churches, some possessing paintings of Murillo, Il Spagnoletto, and Gregorio Vázquez. Many old conventual buildings have been used for secular purposes since 1861, the national library and museum being housed in the former Jesuit college. Bogotá is the seat of an archdiocese. The college of Saint Bartholomew founded by the Jesuits, 1665, is the oldest "college" in America still in existence and directed by its founders. Among other institutions of learning are the secular College of Our Lady of the Rosary and the Dominican College of St. Thomas. The National Observatory of St. Bartholomew is directed by the Jesuits. Est. pop., 166,148.

Bohemia. See Czechoslovakia.

Bohemian Brethren. See Moravians.

Bohemian College, Rome, established, 1884, partly with the revenues of the ancient Bohemian hospice founded by Emperor Charles IV, and with contributions from Leo XIII and the Bohemian bishops. The distinguishing mark of the students, who attend the Propaganda, is a black sash with two yellow stripes at the ends.—C.E., XIII, 135.

Boileau-Despréaux, bo-wá-draw-prá-ó, NICOLAS (1636-1711), satirist and critic, b. Paris; d. there. After studying law and theology, Boileau devoted himself to poetry and wrote satires, attacking the mediocre poets and pedantic authors of his day. Louis XIV forced his election to the French Academy, 1684, in spite of bitter opposition due to the fact that many of the Academicians were among the victims of Boileau's satirical humor. His principal works are: "Satires" and "Epitres," treating chiefly moral and literary subjects; "Art Poétique," a literary code in which he sets forth his poetical theories; and "Le Lutrin," a mock-heroic poem. He was called the "Lawgiver of Parnassus," and greatly contributed to the formation of the French classic ideals in literature.—C.E. (v. p. d.)

Boise, DIOCESE OF, comprises the State of Idaho; area, 84,290 sq. m.; erected, 1893; suffragan of Oregon. Bishops: Alphonse Glorieux (1893-1917); Daniel Gorman (1918-27). Churches, 122; priests, secular, 70; priests, regular, 18; religious women, 387; academies, 6; primary schools, 18; pupils in parochial schools, 2025; institutions, 12; Catholic population, 21,000.

Boisgelin, JEAN DE DIEU RAYMOND DE CÚCÉ DE (1732-1804), cardinal, b. Rennes, France. He became Bp. of Lavaur in 1765, and in 1769 was transferred to Aix. In 1789 he represented the clergy of his province at the States-General, where he defended the rights of the Church, advocated the claim of every citizen to have a voice in the government, and spoke in favor of abolishing the trances of feudalism. When the majority adopted its anti-religious legislation, he wrote the famous protest against the civil constitution of the clergy. Subsequently he proposed that his fellow-bishops place their resignations in the hands of the pope. When exiled he went to England, and after religious peace was restored under Napoleon, returned to France, where he was promoted to the Archbishopric of Tours and made... a cardinal. He possessed remarkable literary and oratorical gifts, and was chosen a member of the French Academy, 1776.—C.E.

Boisil, Saint; confessor (d. 664). Abbot of Morez, Scotland. He was the teacher of St. Cuthbert, and was renowned in his day for his spiritual gifts. He died of the yellow plague. Relic at Durham. Feast, 23 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Bokenham, Osbern (1393-1447), Augustinian friar and poet, b. Old Bokenham, Norfolk, England. His writings are mainly religious. The "Lytys of Seyntys" does not merit serious consideration from modern hagiologists, but is of decided historical value as showing the evolution of English literature; it is written in the Suffolk dialect.—C.E.

Bolivia, independent inland republic in western central South America; approximate area, 560,000 sq. m.; est. pop., 2,990,220, mainly Catholic. Christianity was introduced by the Jesuit missionaries in the 16th century, and after the expulsion of the order, 1767, the work was continued by the Franesicans. Catholicism is the official religion, endowed by the state, but other forms of worship are tolerated, and since 1912 the civil marriage service is obligatory. In 1925 the country was dedicated to the Sacred Heart. Bolivia is represented at the Holy See by an envoy extraordinary and a minister plenipotentiary; an internoce residing at La Paz. Church administration is thus divided:

Bollandists, group of Belgian Jesuits who compiled the "Acta Sanctorum," named for John van Bolland, editor of the first volume. The Acta is a hagiographical work comprising the Acts of all saints venerated throughout the Christian world and containing a vast amount of material on church history in all countries and centuries, with numerous details of chronology, geography, law, government, literature, fine arts, and industry. The saints are arranged according to the days of the year, each of which is treated as a separate unit. The work was planned by Herbert Rosweyde (d. 1629), a Belgian Jesuit who collected a vast amount of material from the libraries of Belgium. His successor Bolland extended Rosweyde's plan to include all information from whatever source on each saint and his cult, prefacing each text with a study to determine the author and historical value. It met with the encouragement of churchmen and scholars, and in 1660 at the invitation of Alexander VII two colleagues, Henschen and Papelbroch, made a journey from Antwerp to Rome and gathered material which long remained one of the most valuable resources of the work. By 1709 it was carried to Volume V of June, the 24th of the collection, and was continued in Antwerp mainly by Belgian Jesuits assisted by historians throughout the world until 1773, when the suppression of the Jesuits caused their removal to Brussels. Joseph II compelled them to sell their effects, and in spite of the attempts of Napoleon I to restore the Bollandists, work was not resumed until 1837 when a new group was organized, receiving aid from most of the European governments and societies of learned men. In 1869 the subsidy of the Bollandists was removed from the governmental budget, and another disastrous setback was caused by the World War, after which the work was reorganized by Fr. Henschen and Papelbroch, and another disastrous setback was caused by the World War, after which the work was reorganized by Fr. Henschen and Papelbroch; the 65th volume in 1926 (to November). The new Bollandists are also treating extensively of saints of the eastern countries, thanks to the recent greater accessibility of oriental texts. They also publish the "Analecta Bollandiana," informing scholars of newly-discovered material, as well as collections of hagiographical manuscripts in various languages, and catalogs containing detailed descriptions of the Greek, Latin, and oriental hagiographical manuscripts in various libraries.—C.E.; U.K.; Delehaye, The Work of the Bollandists, Princeton, 1922.

Bologna, bô-lö'nyä, city of Italy. Christianity and the episcopal see back to the early part of the 2nd century. Sts. Vitalis and Agrippa were martyred there during the Diocletian persecution. In the 6th century it became a patrimony of the Holy See but in the 9th century was wrested from the popes. Charlemagne made it a free city. Weakened by internal struggles between Guelphs and Ghibelines, it lost its independence, regained it, and finally became a papal possession, 1506. In 1860, by an unanimous vote, it became part of the Kingdom of Italy. The churches of Bologna are noted for their architectural beauty and art treasures, particularly the Cathedral of St. Peter, 910, the church of Corpus Christi, erected by St. Catherine of Bologna, and the shrine of the Madonna of St. Luke. Bologna is also famed for its watch-towers, built by medieval nobles. In the center of the city are two leaning towers, erected in the 12th century, the Asinella, 274 ft. high, and the Garisenda, 137 ft. high.

Bologna, University of, Italy, developed from the "Schools of Liberal Arts" which flourished at Bologna in the 11th century. It was a "jurist" university in origin, owing to the organization by Irnerius of a school of law, distinct from the arts school in the early 12th century and the adoption of the "Decretum Gratiani" of the Camaldolese (or Benedictine) monk, Gratian, as the recognized text-book of canon law (c. 1140). The work was continued by such eminent jurists as Odoforus (d. 1300), Joannes Andrea (1270-1348), St. Raymond of Pennafort (1175-1275), and Ricardus Anglicus (c. 1250). At the beginning of the 13th BOLSHEVISM seeks "the complete liberation of the laboring classes from spoliation and oppression." Their way to this aim is the overthrow of capitalism and the substitution of communism under the dictatorship of the proletariat. With the supremacy of bolshevism in Russia, land and natural resources were nationalized, industries turned over to the workers, the employment of labor disallowed, and trade restricted by prohibitory taxation. More recently, however, concessions have been made in favor of the employment of labor and the taxes on trade have been lightened. Nominally under the new constitution religion is free; actually it has been persecuted, a very active propaganda carried on against it. Education is controlled in the interests of communism. The Bolsheviki, numbering something over 1,000,000, exercise the dictatorship of the proletariat over the many millions who make up the population of the United Soviet Republics.—U.K.; Makeev and O'Hara, Russia, N. Y., 1925.

Bolzano, BERNHARD (1781-1848), mathematician and philosopher, b. Prague, Bohemia; d. there. Ordained, 1805, he was appointed to the chair of the philosophy of religion in Prague University. Owing to the rationalizing tendencies of his lectures, he was dismissed, 1820, and retired into private life, engaging in mathematical studies. His theory of parallel lines (1804) anticipated Legendre. He developed the theory of functions of one real variable, and made notable additions to the theory of differentiation, the Binomial theorem, and the concept of infinity.—C.E.

Bombay, Archdiocese of, India, comprises the Island of Bombay, several outlying churches in the Island of Salsette, a large portion of the Bombay Residency north of the river Nerbudda to Quetta, including the districts of Gujerat (Broach, Baroda, Ahmedabad), Kathiawar, Cutch, Sind, and a part of Beluchistan; erected into archdiocese, 1886; suffragan sees, Calicut, Mangalore, Poona, Trichinopoly, and Tuticorin. Formerly a vicariate Apostolic, its bishops were Carmelites from 1708-1850; a Capuchin, Anastasius Hartmann, governed, 1850-58; and since then the Jesuits have held the episcopal succession. George Porter (1886-89) was first archbishop, succeeded by Theodore Dalhoff (1891-1906), Hermann Jurgens (1907-16), Alban Goodier (1919-28), and Joachim Lima (1928). Churches and chapels, 47; priests, secular, 31; priests, regular, 42; religious women, 115; colleges and high schools, 15; primary schools, 92; institutions, 21; Catholics, 35,610.

Bona, Giovanni (1609-74), cardinal, liturgist, b. Moncevi, Italy; d. Rome. Having entered the Cistercian monastery at Fignerola, and labored at Turin, Asti, etc., he was called to Rome in 1651 to preside over the whole Cistercian congregation. Pope Alexander VII, his intimate friend, appointed him consular to the Congregation of the Index and to the Holy Office, and in 1669 he was created cardinal. Besides writing many ascetical works of which the most popular is "A Guide to Eternity" (1659; Eng. tr., 1900), he is famous as the author of "De Morte" (1671). He was the author of a veritable liturgical encyclopedia, treating all subjects concerning the Mass such as rites, churches, vestments.—C.E.

Bona Mors Confraternity, The (Happy Death), founded, 1648, in the church of the Gesù, Rome, by Rev. Vincent Caraffa, seventh General of the Society of Jesus. It was raised to an archconfraternity by Benedict XIII who authorized the erection of such confraternities in all Jesuit churches; this privilege was extended to other churches in 1827. Its object is the preparation of members for a happy death by a well regulated life, and particularly through devotion to the Passion of Christ and the sorrows of Mary. The practises of the association, and the indulgences granted may be found in the manual of the confraternity (New York, 1896).—C.E.

Bonaparte, Charles Luches Jules Laurent, Prince of Canino and Musignano (1803-57), ornithologist, b. Paris; d. there. The son of Lucien Bonaparte, he went to the United States, where he devoted himself to natural science and completed Wilson's "American Ornithology." Returning to France, he published this "Iconography of American Fauna," 1834-41.—C.E.

Bonaventure, Saint, Doctor of the Church (1221-74), Card.-Bp. of Albano, b. Bagnorega, Italy; d. Lyons, France. Cured of an illness in his youth by St. Francis, he entered the Order of Friars Minor, c. 1243. He lectured at the University of Paris, 1249-55. Elected Minister General of the Order, he governed until 1273, when he was made Card.-Bp. of Albano. In this capacity he instituted needed reforms, settled the dispute between the Spirituals and Religiosi (contending groups of Friars Minor), revised the constitution of the order, and wrote a life of St. Francis which was approved as authoritative at the chapter of Pisa, 1263. He was commissioned by Pope Gregory X to prepare the questions for discussion at the Fourteenth Ecumenical Council at Lyons, 1274, but he died while the council was still in session. Emblems: communion, ciborium, cardinal's hat, tongue of St. Anthony of Padua. Canonized, 1482. Relics at Bagnorega. Feast, R. Cal., 14 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Boniface, Saint, martyr (306), d. Tarsus, Cilicia. He was steward to the Roman faction and reigned only 15 days. The opposition brought about the unification of the Church in Germany. Patron of Germany. Emblems: oak, axe, book, fox, scourge, fountain, sword. Buried in the cathedral at Fulda. Feast, R. Cal., 5 June.—C.E.; Mann.

Boniface I, Pope (418-22), b. probably Rome; c. 350; d. there. The minor clergy disputed his election. Both were consecrated and the Emperor Honorius ended the resulting schism by recognizing Boniface. During his pontificate he supported St. Augustine against Pelagianism and was famous as a disciplinarian and organizer. Feast, R. Cal., 25 Oct.—C.E.; Grisar.

Boniface II, Pope (530-32), b. probably Rome. He was of Germanic ancestry. While archdeacon, he was nominated as next pope by Felix IV, who feared a schism. After Felix died, the Roman clergy elected Dioscorus. Both were consecrated but the schism ended in 22 days with the latter's death. During his pontificate the Semipelagian controversy was ended by the Second Council of Orange.

Boniface III, Pope (607), b. probably Rome, c. 550; d. there. He was sent as legate to Constantinople by Gregory the Great. As pope he obtained from Emperor Phocas a confirmation that Rome was the head of all churches, and its bishop was "Universal Bishop."—C.E.; Mann.

Boniface IV, Saint, Pope (608-15), b. Province of Valeria, Italy, c. 550; d. Rome. Few particulars are known of his pontificate which is marked by the expansion of the Church in England. Mellitus, first Bp. of London, visited him, 610, and returned to England with decrees relative to the newly-established Church there. As pope, Boniface converted a Roman temple and the Pantheon into churches. Feast, R. Cal., 1 June.—C.E.; Mann.

Boniface V, Pope (619-25), b. probably Naples; d. Rome. As pope he was noted for his love of his clergy, whom he aided by decrees and subsidies. He encouraged the newly-established Church in England and constituted Canterbury the primatial see. —C.E.; Mann.

Boniface VI, Pope (896), b. probably Rome; d. there. He was elected through the efforts of a Roman faction and reigned only 15 days. The Council of Rome, 898, declared his election null.

Boniface VII, antipope (974; 984-85). See FRANCO, BONIFACE.
Boniface VIII (Benedetto Gaetani), Pope (1234-1303), b. Anagni, Italy, c. 1235; d. Rome. Prior to his election he was cardinal-priest, and legate to Sicily, France, and England. Having succeeded Celestine V when the latter abdicated he at once began his efforts to free the papacy from Neapolitan influence. He attempted to end wars between Venice and Genoa, Charles II of Naples and James II of Aragon, and the Geluphs and Ghibelines; secured the release of Jens Grand, Abp. of Lund, imprisoned by Eric VIII of Denmark; recognized the election of Albert, Duke of Austria, as King of Germany; and commenced and communicated the warlike leaders of the Colonna faction in Rome for their tyranny and treason. To combat Philip the Fair of France who was taxing his dependents unjustly, he promulgated his famous Bull "Unam Sanctam," which defined the relations of the powers of Church and State. Philip, unwilling to correct his misuse of power, resolved to summon a general council against the pope. By means of generous subsidies he levied an army of mercenaries headed by Nogaret and Sciarr Colonna, to force the pope to attend the council. The troops broke into the papal stronghold at Anagni, and the two leaders seized Boniface and imprisoned him in the palace for three days without food or drink. He was then taken to Rome and kept under the close surveillance of the Orsini. Worn out from the indignities he had sustained, the pope died one month later. He was noted as a canonist of great ability and a man of learning. During his pontificate he founded the university of Rome, encouraged the painter Giotto, and enlarged the Vatican Library. His memory has suffered from the unjust condemnation of the Jesuits, who, in their "”administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church after the use of the Church of England." It was adopted by the realm of England as the standard service book by the first Act of Uniformity passed, 21 Jan., 1549, ostensibly to make for uniformity by having it in English but actually to abolish the use of the Catholic service books, e.g., those of Bangor, Hereford, Lincoln, Salisbury, and York, and to eliminate those tenets and practices condemned by the Reformers. Among these were the Real Presence, seven sacraments, auricular confession, the Mass, prayers for the dead, and the invocation of the Blessed Virgin and saints. In 1552 a second Book of Common Prayer was published to meet the criticism of the imprisoned Catholic Bp. Gardiner and the "”Censura"” of Bucer. The restoration of Catholic services upon the accession of Mary I prevented the wide use of this 1552 edition, but a third and revised edition was published in 1558, after Elizabeth ascended the throne. The use of the Book of Common Prayer was forbidden by Parliament, 1645, under penalty of fine and imprisonment and in its place was substituted the Presbyterian "”Directory for the Public Worship of God in the Three Kingdoms."" Under Charles II the Book of Common Prayer was revised, 1662, to comply with Presbyterian demands. By order of a Royal Commission, 1906, the edition of 1662 underwent a further revision and as approved by the National Assembly of the Church of England, 1927, was submitted to Parliament. The House of Lords accepted it but it was rejected by the House of Commons on the grounds that an alternative order for the administration of Holy Communion with proposed reservation of the Eucharist to make it available for administration to the sick, favored the doctrine of the Real Presence. This objection was met by amendments specifically repudiating any manifestation of belief in the Real Presence. Ancient Catholic Missals, Breviaries, Rituals, and Pontificals, of use prior to the reign of Edward VI, had comprised the sources for the original book. These were purged of things pronouncedly Catholic and numerous ancient feasts and saints' days were deleted from the Calendar. Several saints were added, some omitted, in the revised edition of 1922. It contains daily morning and evening prayers, Collects, Epistles and Gospels for the year, order for Holy Communion, Baptism, Confirmation, Matrimony, visitation of the sick, burial of the dead, churching of women, the Psalter, ordination of priests and deacons, consecration of bishops and the Thirty-nine Articles of religion. In April, 1928, the Assembly of the Church of England finally approved the revised prayer-book measure, which was however rejected by the House of Commons, 14 June. Recently (1929) the Anglican bishops have incurred much censure by ordering the use of the rejected Book of Common Prayer in Anglican churches.—C.E.; U.K.; Gasquet, Edward VI and the Book of Common Prayer, London, 1890.

Book of Hours, name of a liturgical book, used during the Middle Ages, containing prayers, psalms, antiphons, responsories, hymns, lessons, versicles, and little chapters to be recited at the canonical hours. In the Armenian and Ruthenian Churches such books are still in use, but in the Latin Church they have been incorporated in the Divine Office by Breviary. The "Très Riches Heures," a 15th-century manuscript in the Musée Condé, Chantilly, executed under the direction of the Duke of Berry and reputed to have been illuminated by the Limbourg brothers, is one of several beautiful Books of Hours still extant. It contains a calendar embodying a collection of verse, the Hours of Commons, the first attempt at modern landscape art. The "Grandes Heures" and the "Très Belles Heures" (Brussels) of the Duke of Berry, the Book of Hours of Étienne Chevalier (Chantilly), and the Hours of Anne of Brittany (Paris) are similar.

Book of Life, figurative expression in Holy Writ (Apoc., 21) for predestination, which signifies God's foreknowledge of the elect. It is plain that God by virtue of His omniscience must infallibly know the number of the elect and the lost, which, however, does not imply that the fate of either the elect or the damned is sealed by God without prevision of each individual's merit. Damnation is in no way forewilled, but merely foreknown by God. See Predestination.

Book of Martyrs, Foxe's, history of the persecution of the Reformers in England, by John Foxe (1516-87), an extreme Reformer. His work, entitled "Acts and Monuments" but popularly known as the "Book of Martyrs," was first published, 1563, and had numerous editions. It contains three volumes: the first deals with early Christian persecutions and contains a sketch of medieval history and an account of the Wyclifite movement in England and on the Continent; the second treats of the reigns of Henry VIII and Edward VI; and the third gives that of Mary I. It includes a number of documents and is illustrated throughout by woodcuts, most of them luridly depicting the sufferings of the martyrs. A convocation of the Anglican Church, 1571, ordered that copies of the work be kept for public inspection in all cathedrals and in houses of church dignitaries. It enjoyed great popularity among Puritans and members of the Low Church until the 19th century, and contributed greatly towards anti-Catholic prejudice in England.—C.E.

Book of the Dead, celebrated work of the ancient Egyptians, comprising a collection of prayers and incantations for use of the dead. The authorship was ascribed to the god Thoth. Earlier forms were written in hieroglyphics; under the 21st and 22nd dynasties cursive character was used. Papyri were written in hieratic, and on the belief that the souls had to pass through a difficult region called Tust and that prayers and amulets were necessary. After religion had become more spiritual an ethical element was introduced. Chapter CXXV which belongs to 18th dynasty depicts the soul brought before Osiris for judgment and is remarkable for its lofty moral standard. The cult of Osiris was connected with the Egyptian belief in immortality.

Bordone, bôr-dô'na, PARIS (1500-70), painter of the Venetian school, b. Treviso, Italy; d. Venice. Strongly influenced by Giorgione and by Titian, he successfully imitated the latter whom he closely approaches as a portrait painter. His finest painting is in the Academy of Venice, "The Fisherman Presenting the Ring of St. Mark to the Doge."—C.E.

Borie, PIERRE ROSE URSULE DUMOULIN, BLESSED, martyr (1808-38), Vicar Apostolic of Western Tonkin, b. Beynat, France. He sailed for the Chinese missions in 1830, and in 1832 was transferred to Vietnam, where he was beheaded (24 Nov.). His remains were transferred to Paris, 1843. Beatified, 1900.—C.E.

Borromeo, Federico (1564-1631), cardinal, Abp. of Milan, b. Milan; d. there. He was a cousin of St. Charles Borromeo, possessed extraordinary erudition, and was a model of episcopal zeal, an indefatigable preacher, a reformer of abuses, and an apostle of religious education. During the famine and pest at Milan, 1627-28, he fed 2000 poor daily, and inspired his clergy with a devotion immortalized in Manzoni's "Betrothed." He founded the Ambrosian Library, and wrote numerous works on various ecclesiastical sciences.—C.E.

Borrus, CHRISTOPHER (1585-1632), mathematician and astronomer, b. Milan; d. Rome. He was one of the first Jesuit missionaries to Cochinchina, and later taught mathematics at Coimbra, and in 1632 became a Cistercian. His history of the Cochin-China mission is one of the best sources of information concerning that country. He drew up the first chart of the Atlantic and Indian oceans showing the spots where the magnetic needle makes the same angle with the meridian, thus anticipating Halley, and suggested a new method of determining longitude at sea. —C.E.

Boscowich, Ruggiero Giuseppe (1711-87), natural philosopher, b. Ragusa, Italy; d. Milan. Educated at the Jesuit college at Ragusa, he joined the order and was appointed professor of mathematics at the Roman College, 1740. Besides publishing astronomical dissertations on sunspots, transit of Mercury, etc., he showed his ability as a practical engineer by repairing the cracked dome of St. Peter's, measuring an arc of a meridian between Rome and Rimini, and making a complete survey and map of the States of the Church. He invented a micrometer, still used, which requires no artificial illumination of the field of the telescope. In his work on the molecular theory of matter he holds that all matter consists of innumerable point-like structures which repel each other when they are very close; as their distance increases the repulsion becomes attraction. He headed a political embassy which resulted in his being elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of London. —C.E.

Boso (d. 970), apostle of the Wends, first bp. of Merseburg. He was a Benedictine who was sent by the Emperor of Germany to convert the conquered Wends. His labors were so successful that in 968, three sees, Merseburg, Zeitz, and Meissen, were erected in his mission. —C.E.

Bosco (b. 1552), JACQUES Bénigne BOSSUET (1627-1704), bishop and pulpit orator, b. Dijon, France; d. Paris. He was educated at the Jesuit college in Dijon and in Paris, where he was ordained, 1652, after a retreat made under the direction of St. Vincent de Paul. After holding the post of archdeacon in Metz for seven years, he returned to Paris where he devoted all his attention to preaching. Appointed bp. of Condun, 1669, he resigned, 1670, upon being chosen as preceptor of the Dauphin. When his duties ended, 1681, he became bp. of Meaux. He took a prominent part in the Assembly of the French Clergy, 1682, and averted a schism. Bossuet is known chiefly for his sermons and funeral orations, but he also ranks high as an historian, a controversialist, and an ascetic writer. His best-known historical works are: "Discours sur l'Histoire Universelle," a philosophy of history, and "History of the Variation of the Protestant Churches." In his controversy with Fénelon on quietism, he shows himself unnecessarily harsh and bitter. He is ultra-conservative in his dispute with Richard Simon on the critical study of the Scriptures. His ascetical works comprise numerous letters of direction, "Élévations sur les Mystères," and "Méditations sur l'Evangile." The French consider him the greatest master of pulpit eloquence and have surnamed him "The Eagle of Meaux." The best complete edition of his works is that of Guillaume (Bar-le-Duc). The funeral orations were edited by A. Gasté (Paris, 1883), the sermons by Abbé Lebarq (Paris, 1890).—C.E.; U.K. (F. P. B.)

Boston, capital of Massachusetts. Few of the early Irish emigrants to Boston were Catholics, as they were unwilling to settle in a Puritan colony. Traces of the Catholic Church are found as early as Sept., 1646, when a ship was in port having two priests on board, who were the guests of the governor. Fr. Drulilletes visited Boston, 1640, to discuss with Gen. Gibbons details of a trading pact and alliance with the Canadians and Indians. After the French and Indian War, 100 French Catholics were arrested in Boston "to prevent any danger the town may be in," but the sheriff refused to hold them. The Boston "Town Records" admitted that toleration in religion was desirable, but excluded "Roman Catholics" because their belief was "subversive of society." A favorite New England diversion was a procession on 5 Nov. of the pope and the devil, in celebration of the "Gunpowder Plot," usually attended by riot. In 1775 Washington expressed his dismay that his soldiers should insult the religion of a country with which they were seeking to form an alliance. The French Huguenot church, now 18 School Street, was taken over by the Catholics and opened on All Saints Day, 1788, under the patronage of the Holy Cross; this was the first Catholic church in New England. After 1848 many German Catholics settled in Boston; they were followed by Italians, Portuguese, Poles, Lithuanians, and others. After the Civil War Catholics were active and powerful in political, business, and professional life; though they formed one-quarter of the population of Boston in 1844, no Catholic had ever held an elective or appointive public office. Until 1860 there were only three Catholic teachers in the public schools. The first Catholic member of the Common Council was elected 1857; the first alderman, 1870; the first member of Congress, 1892. For the past 50 years nearly one-half of the mayors of Boston have been Catholic. Public memorials have been erected in honor of Col. Thomas Cass, soldier; John Boyle O'Reilly, poet-journalist; and Patrick Andrew Collins, statesman. The school founded in 1820 by Bp. Cheverus and taught by the Ursuline nuns, was the only Catholic school in New England until 1826, when Bp. Fenwick established a second one for boys and girls. In 1829 a classical school was started for the education of young men studying for the Church. Up to 1845 boys in the public schools were forcibly compelled to take part in Protestant prayers and read the Protestant Bible. Catholics established a parochial school about this date. A few years later Boston College (q.v.) was founded. For higher education today there is also Emmanuel College, for girls, established by the Sisters of Notre Dame. The Young Men’s Catholic Association has evening classes. Many prominent Catholic writers have aided Boston’s literary fame, e.g., John Boyle O’Reilly, James Jeffrey Roche, and Katherine E. Conway, editors of “The Pilot”; also Louise Imogen Guiney poet and essayist; and Pearl Mary Craigie (John Oliver Hobbes), novelist and dramatist. Botany (Gr., botane, plant), the branch of biology which systematically investigates every aspect of plants. Its principal divisions include: cytology, which treats of the cell; ecology, which is concerned with the influence of environment; economic botany; morphology, the science of the external forms of plants; paleobotany, which deals with fossil plants; pythopathology, which treats of diseases of plants; and taxonomy, which has plant classification as its subject matter. Distinguished in the science are the following:

Borrus, bôr'as, RUGGIERO GIUSEPPE (1711-87), natural philosopher, b. Ragusa, Italy; d. Milan. Educated at the Jesuit college at Ragusa, he joined the order and was appointed professor of mathematics at the Roman College, 1740. Besides publishing astronomical dissertations on sunspots, transit of Mercury, etc., he showed his ability as a practical engineer by repairing the cracked dome of St. Peter's, measuring an arc of a meridian between Rome and Rimini, and making a complete survey and map of the States of the Church. He invented a micrometer, still used, which requires no artificial illumination of the field of the telescope. In his work on the molecular theory of matter he holds that all matter consists of innumerable point-like structures which repel each other when they are very close; as their distance increases the repulsion becomes attraction. He headed a political embassy which resulted in his being elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of London. —C.E.

Catholics.—Francesco Castracane degli Autelminelli (1817-90), a priest was one of the pioneers in combining microscopy and photography, renowned for his diatom researches, and founder of 3 new genera, 225 new species, and 30 varieties. Patrick Barry (1816-90), horticulturist, established one of the largest nurseries in the United States at Rochester in conjunction with George Ellwanger, and wrote extensively on horticulture. Andrea Cesalpinio (1519-1603) inaugurated the systematization of plant classification and laid the basis of plant physiology and morphology; the plant species Cesalpinia is named in his honor. Stephen Ladislaus Endlicher (1804-49) founded a new botanical system and classification, established the first Austrian periodical devoted to the natural sciences, and was the author of standard botanical works. Bernard de Jussieu (1699-1777) was a pioneer in the natural classification of plants and author of several standard botanical treatises; a genus of tree belonging to the Onagraceae family was named Jussienia by Linnaeus in his honor. Antoine Laurent de Jussieu (1748-1836), nephew of the preceding, made important expositions and practical applications of the above-mentioned natural classification. Adrien Henri de Jussieu (1797-1853), son of the preceding, one time president of the French Academy of Sciences, was the author of the first comprehensive work on botany and did important investigation on the plant family Malpighiaceae. Gregor Johann Mendel (1822-84) was renowned for his researches on hybridization, and author of the law of heredity designated by his name, Filippo Parlatore (1816-77), author of the valuable "Flora Italiania" and of several treatises on organography, paleontology, and taxonomy, founded the "Giornale botanico Italiano" and was instrumental in founding the general herbarium at Florence. Charles Plumier (1646-1704), renowned botanist and explorer, discovered several new species of, and wrote the first treatise on, American ferns, and made distinguished researches on the plants of Antilles and Central America. James Edward Smith (1804-78) was a pioneer in the field of mycology, the science of fungi, particularly for his researches on parasite fungi; certain genera of fungi have been named in his honor. Franz Paula von Schrank, S.J. (1747-1835), directed the Munich Botanical Garden and made valuable descriptions and classification of flora.

Other Christian Botanists.—Karl A dolf Agardh (1785-1859) inaugurated the study of seaweeds. John Bartram (1699-1777) founded the first botanical garden in America, was ranked by Linnaeus as the greatest natural botanist in the world, and was instrumental in introducing several American plants into Europe. George Bentham (1800-84), master in systematic botany of the 19th century, did important work on plant nomenclature. Adolph de Jussieu (1810-88) was the author of the first comprehensive work on the flora of China. Alexander Braun (1805-77) made several contributions to the science of morphology, and directed the famous Berlin Botanical Garden. Augustin Pyrame de Candolle (1778-1841) was the author of the first natural system of botanical classification. Augustin Pyrame de Candolle (1778-1841) was the author of the first natural system of botanical classification. Augustin Pyrame de Candolle (1778-1841) was the author of the first natural system of botanical classification. Augustin Pyrame de Candolle (1778-1841) was the author of the first natural system of botanical classification.

Relics at Thorney, Westminister, and Ely. Feast, 17 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Botolph (Botolph), Saint, abbot (d. c. 680). He was educated on the Continent and returning to England founded a monastery at Ieanhoo, at times identified with Boston (Botolph's town), in Lincolnshire (hence Boston, Mass.). His name also survived in Bosall, Yorkshire; Botesdale, Suffolk; and Botolph, Huntingdon and Sussex. Patron of over 50 ancient Catholic (now Protestant) churches, in England, mostly in Norfolk and Suffolk; three are in the City of London. Relics at Thorney, Westminister, and Ely. Feast, 17 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Botuldus (Botulphus or Botuidus), Saint, martyr (d. 1137). A Cluniac monk, he was made Abp. of Braga, Portugal, 1111, but was suspended by Paschal II, 1114. In 1117 he crowned the papal enemy, Emperor Henry V; for this he was excommunicated. After Paschal's death Henry had him proclaimed pope, 1118. Later, he was forced to flee to Sutri, where Callistus II captured him and imprisoned him in a monastery.—C.E., VI, 795.

Bourgeois, Marguerite, Venerable (1620-1759), antipope (1118), b. probably Limoges, France; d. Salerno, Italy, c. 1137. Bourjou (Bourjoux), Guillaume Adolphe (1825-1905), painter, b. La Rochelle, France; d. Paris. The winner of the Grand Prize de Rome, 1850, he studied four years in Rome, painting there the canvas now in the Luxembourg, "The Body of St. Cecilia borne to the Catacombs." His religious pictures are admired for their sentiment and harmonious color. One of the best known is the "Vierge Consolatrice" of the Louvre.—U.K.

Bounty, Bountifulness (Lat., bonus, good), attribute of God, the abundance of His goodness or benevolence, springing from a gratuitous love promoting our happiness out of sheer kindness. To God we are indebted for our every good. Extending to all creatures of His creation, and it is only of late that Fr. Griselle has rediscovered the true Bourdaloue.—C.E.; Griselle, Histoire critique de la prédication de Bourdaloue, Paris, 1901; Œuvres Complètes, in course of publication, 1919. (F. P. D.)

Bourdais, Maurice (Gregory VIII, antipope (1118), b. probably Limoges, France; d. Salerno, Italy, c. 1137. A Cluniac monk, he was made Abp. of Braga, Portugal, 1111, but was suspended by Paschal II, 1114. In 1117 he crowned the papal enemy, Emperor Henry V; for this he was excommunicated. ing in China, 1688, he was appointed mathematician to Emperor Khang-hi, and from 1708-15 made a survey of the empire, and prepared maps of the provinces. He shared all the labors of his fellow-missionaries who were aided by his indelible writing on the emperor, and compiled a Tatar treatise on mathematics and a Chinese dictionary.—C.E.

Bowden, Henry Sebastian (1836-1920), Oratorian and writer, b. London; d. there. He became a Catholic, 1862. Having served in the Scots Fusilier Guards, 1855-67, he resigned as captain, and joined the Oratorian Fathers in London. Ordained, 1876, he became Prefect of the Brothers of the Little Oratory, and was three times superior of the Oratorians. He was celebrated for his work among converts and in the Oratory Middle School for boys. His writings include "The Religion of Shakespeare," "Dante," and "Miniature Lives of the Saints."—C.E. Suppl.

Bowing, a symbol of reverence and worship. Catholics bow their heads especially at the Holy Name of Jesus, and also at the prayer "Gloria Patri!" (Glory be to the Father, etc.). During the Mass, when the creed is said, they genuflect, but do not bow, at the words "et incarnatus est" (and he was incarnate). For church ceremonies three classes of bows are specified: profound, moderate, and slight.—Forbesene, Ceremonies of the Roman Rite, Lond., 1920.

Bower, Sir George (1811-83), Baronet, writer on jurisprudence, b. Berkshire, England; d. London. He became a Catholic, 1850, and was henceforth the foremost lay defender of the Church in England. In Parliament he denounced the Italian revolution, blaming Palmerston, Russell, and Gladstone for officially abetting it. His writings include commentaries on the constitutional and civil laws of England and a treatise on universal public law. —C.E.

Boy Bishop, a boy chosen from the monastery school or cathedral choir to preside as bishop between St. Nicholas's Day, 6 Dec., and the feast of Holy Innocents, 28 Dec. The custom dates from early times and was in vogue in most Catholic countries, but chiefly in England.—C.E.

Boycce, John, known as Paul Peppergrass (1810-64), priest and author, b. Donegal, Ireland; d. Worcester, Mass. He spent 19 years on the American mission, where he wrote several novels, including "Shandy Maguire, or Tricks upon Travellers," "The Spawife, or the Queen's Secret," and "Mary Lee, or the Yankee in Ireland."—C.E.

Boycott, an organized severing of business and social relations with an individual or a firm in order to punish or coerce. The practise, named from its first victim, originated in measures devised by Charles Stewart Parnell, as head of the Irish Land League, 1880, against Capt. Boycott, the notoriously harsh land-agent of Lord Erne in the district of Connemara, Ireland. It has become a common coercive measure against employers in trade disputes, or in strikes, both in England and the United States. The morality of such a measure, if adopted through a just grievance and if unaccompanied by violence, is unquestioned, although in several states practise is held to be illegal and is prohibited by statute. A secondary boycott, or the attempt by the same measures to force another to join in a primary boycott, is generally condemned as an infringement of one's right to free intercourse with others. In 1905 a secondary boycott brought before the Supreme Court, that of the Buck's Stove Co. against the American Federation of Labor (1907), and that against the Danbury Hatters' Union (1908), the court declared the boycott illegal as being "in restraint of trade."—Boyle Abbey, Cistercian monastery near Elphin, Rosemonson, Ireland, founded by Maurice O'Duffy, 1161. The church was consecrated, 1218. In 1235 the English forces under Fitzgerald and MacWilliam occupied the abbey and seized all its possessions, even stripping the monks of their habits. Under Elizabeth it was suppressed and its extensive lands confiscated, 1568. Among its famous abbots was Donagh mor O'Daly.—C.E.

Boy Scouts, a non-sectarian organization of a military type, whose purpose is the development of character and good citizenship in boys; founded in England in 1908 by Gen. Sir Robert Baden-Powell, it soon became international in its development. At present there are nearly 650,000 registered scouts in the United States, divided among over 25,000 troops. The boys range from 12 to 18 years of age, and are in the charge of over 175,000 scout officials, a position considered so important that courses for scout leaders are now included in the curriculum of many colleges. A monthly magazine, "Boys' Life," and a semi-monthly bulletin, "Scouting," for scout officials, are among their publications. The 1927 statistics of the Catholic committee on scouting show an enrollment of nearly 30,000 Catholic boys in troops attached to Catholic churches and Catholic institutions. Benedict XV manifested his approval of the Boy Scouts by bestowing the Apostolic blessing "on all who further the Catholic extension of the Scout movement under the auspices of the ecclesiastical authorities," 1919.—U.S.; Annual Report of the Boy Scouts of America.

Bracton (Bratton), Henry de (d. 1268), jurist and author, b. probably Bratton-Clovelly, or Bratton-Fleming, Devonshire, England. He is thought to have been a student at Oxford, and is known to have been an itinerant judge in 1245. It is uncertain where he was at this time, although he often pleaded before Henry III. He held several ecclesiastical preferments, as was usual for judges, among them the Barnstaple archdeaconry and the chancellorship of Exeter, also a canonry and prebend in the church of Bosham in Sussex, and in Exeter cathedral where he lies buried. His chief work, "On the Laws and Customs of England," written sometime before 1250, is the greatest medieval treatise on English law and was often quoted by Coke. It was first printed in 1569. A translated and revised edition was published by Sir Travers Twiss, 1878-83.—C.E.

Brady, William Maziere (1825-94), ecclesiastical writer, b. Dublin; d. Rome. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, and became an Anglican clergyman. While Vicar of Clonfert, Co. Cork, 1863, he published "The Clerical and Parochial Records of Cork, Cloyne, and Ross." He wrote also in favor of the disestablishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland, and on the passage of the act went to Rome for research in church history. He became a Catholic there in 1873, and served afterwards as correspondent for the London "Tablet." Among his published works are "Episcopal Succession in England, Scotland, and Ireland, a.d. 1400 to 1873," "Annals of the Catholic Hierarchy in England and Scotland, a.d. 1585-1876, with a Dissertation on Anglican Orders," and "Anglo-Roman Papers."—C.E.

Brahma, name used in two senses in Hindu mythology. The Sanskrit noun stem brahman in its neuter form means the power resulting from prayer or prayer in the abstract, and in its masculine form means the one who possesses this power, hence also the priestly caste. Brahma is the nominative of brahman. It refers (neuter) to Atman, creator and world spirit, and also (masculine) to the personal aspect of that divinity, the creative activity, forming with Vishnu and Shiva the Hindu Trimurti or trinity. The god is represented as bearded with four heads, each crowned with a pointed tiara, and with a scepter. His temple is at Pushkar, Rajasthan. See BRAHMANISM.—U.K.

Brahmanism, religious and social system of India, teaching as a religion the divine inspiration of the Vedas, the worship of certain gods, and that the final end of man is freedom from reincarnations and absorption in the impersonal essence of Brahma (q.v.). As a social system it teaches the preeminence of the Brahman caste, and the duties and positions of the other castes. Its sacred literature includes: the four Vedas (1500-800 B.C.), regarded as inspired, with appended Brahmanas, dogmatic treatises for priests; the Upanishads (800-500 B.C.), pantheistic speculations and metaphysical speculations; the Sutras (900-400 B.C.), ceremonial guides; the Dharmashastras, law books, including the Laws of Manu (5th century B.C.), formulating the Brahman social system; the epic poems, Ramayana and Mahabharata. Early Brahmanism consisted chiefly in the worship of deified nature, and in sacrifices to the gods and to dead ancestors. The intricate and exacting ritual of the Brahmanas gave rise to priestly preeminence; and from the Upanishads evolved a pantheistic or Vedantic conception of the universe. Brahma became the impersonal, eternal principle from which all things, including the personal Brahma and all other gods, emanate as manifestations. The ultimate goal of man is reabsorption and identification with Brahma effected by a series of rebirths on an ascending scale, until by meditation and self-effacement the believer, convinced of his identity with the impersonal Brahma, awaits death and absorption forever. This pantheistic scheme constitutes the present-day orthodox Brahman doctrine. The popular desire for a personal deity gave rebirth to the traditional gods. One was Rudra, or Shiva, destroyer and producer; another was Vishnu, fructifier. All other deities and heroes were manifestations of these gods. From this worship sprang two rival sects: the Vishnuites, and the Shivaites. To preserve Brahmanism, the priests associated Vishnu and Shiva with Brahma in a Trimurti or trinity, each as an aspect of the impersonal Brahma. Intimately bound up with the religious teaching of Brahmanism is the division of society into rigidly defined castes. Four such castes are recognized: the Brahmins or priests; the Kshatriyas or warriors; the Vaishyas or common people; the Sudris or servile class. The Brahman caste is revered and any offense rigorously punished. Of the 200,000,000 adherents of Hinduism today only a few hundred thousand are orthodox Brahmins. Shivaism and Vishnuism with their minor schismatic divisions prevail. For later outgrowth see BUDDHISM; HINDUISM; JAINISM.—C.E.; U.K.; Monier-Williams, Brahmanism and Hinduism, Lond., 1891.

Braille, bern (1809-52), educator of the blind, b. Coupvray, France; d. Paris. Blind from the age of three, he was educated at the Institute for the Blind in Paris, became a teacher in the institute, 1828, and in 1829 invented a system of point writing for the blind, based on the sound system of Charles Barbier, but representing alphabetical letters, signs of punctuation, and of music. This system, famous under the name of Braille, soon spread throughout Europe and the United States and in a somewhat revised form is in general use today.—C.E.

Bramante, brá-mán'tá, DONATO (1444-1514), architect and painter, b. Monte Asdrualdo, Italy; d. Rome. Milan and Rome were the centers of his artistic activities, his style at Milan being decorative and picturesque, at Rome classically simple, finely proportioned, grandiose, and powerful. About 1499 he designed in the classic spirit the little circular temple in the court of S. Pietro in Montorio, Rome, and became a leader of the High Renaissance. His chief work was the plan for St. Peter's, which he did not live to execute. It was somewhat modified by his successors, but Michelangelo returned to his fundamental ideas and completed the work.—C.E.

Branch Theory, true, theory, or fiction, of some Anglo-Catholics that the one true Church of Christ is made up of certain separated churches, the Anglican, Catholic, and Orthodox, because they assume, episcopal and priestly orders validly transmitted are fundamental, and that the ultimate goal of man is reabsorption and identification with Brahma effected by a series of rebirths on an ascending scale, until by meditation and self-effacement the believer, convinced of his identity with the impersonal Brahma, awaits death and absorption forever. This pantheistic scheme constitutes the present-day orthodox Brahman doctrine. The popular desire for a personal deity gave rebirth to the traditional gods. cover of the coherer, which first made wireless telegraphy possible.—C.E.

Brasses, Memorial or Monumental, deeply incised sheets of a hard alloy of brass, called latten, used on account of their durability, as memorial slabs over graves in churches, or let into the wall of churches as memorials, from about the 13th to the 18th century, in England and on the Continent. They were usually engraved with a life-sized effigy of the person commemorated and the accurate representation of the costumes and the armorial bearings, together with the border inscription, makes a valuable record for antiquarians. The lines were often filled in with a black substance, or in some cases with a black or red enamel; more rarely bright, varicolored enamels were used. Iconoclasts after the Reformation, vandalism, and neglect, have contributed to the disappearance of most of the brasses in Germany, France, and in Flanders where some think the art originated and where existing specimens are unusually fine. Even in England, where they were especially numerous in the eastern counties, there are only about 4000 left. Bread of Life, the Eucharist, the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Our Lord Jesus Christ, contained really and substantially under the appearances of bread and wine. It is called bread from the matter from which it is consecrated as bread, i.e., food in general, keeps the life in the body, so the Holy Eucharist increases the spiritual life of the soul (John, 6).

Breaking of Bread (FRACTIO PANIS), the name given to a fresco in the catacomb of St. Prisella (2nd century). It is found on an arch over an altar tomb. Seven persons, six men and a woman, are at a table; one of the men sits apart and is breaking a loaf; in front is a two-handled cup, and on the table, two plates, one containing two fishes, the other five loaves. All the accessories bear out the Eucharistic signification. The breaking of bread was the climax of the ritual in early liturgies. Its scriptural basis is Luke, 24; the Apostles at Emmaus recognized Our Lord when He blessed and broke the bread.—C.E., VI, 165.

Breast, STRIKING OF THE, a symbol of sorrow for sin. During the Mass the priest strikes his breast moderately with his right hand at times when the prayers express consciousness of sin, for instance, at the confession and at the thrice-repeated words “Lord, I am not worthy.” Catholics ordinarily do this also at Mass.—C.E. (J. C. T.)

Bréchun, bré'g'n, ancient diocese, Scotland; comprised the territory between the South Esk and the River Dee, bounded w. by Angus, e. by Mearns; founded before 1150 by King David. The first bishop was Samson (1158), and the last pre-Reformation bishop, John Sinclair (1565-66). The Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, now a Presbyterian Church, dates from the 13th century; it is in the Pointed style and is famous for its stained glass windows; all that remains of the original structure is the western gable with a great Gothic door and square tower; adjoining it is one of the three round towers of Scotland, which is 86 1/2 ft. high. Brechin is at present a diocese in the Scottish Episcopal Church.

Bremen, free state, Germany, formerly seat of an archdiocese. It was made a bishopric with Willehad as first bishop, 787. In 848 it united with Hamburg, and two centuries later the archiepiscopal see was transferred to Bremen. The work of converting the northern tribes was carried on from the city. It was burned by the Hungarians, 918. The temporal power of the archbishops, beginning with Adalbert (1045-72), included all the countships in the diocese, but declined during the 14th century. Bremen was a center of the Reformation, and joined the Smalkaldic League; by the 16th century the cathedral chapter had become Protestant. The revival of Catholicism in 1625 was temporary, for the archdiocese was captured by the Swedes, who secularized it, 1648, and suppressed the cathedral chapter. In 1712 it belonged to Denmark, and in 1715 it was purchased by Prince George of Hanover. In 1731 it was recognized as a free city; it joined the German Confederation, 1815, the North German Confederation, 1866, and the German Empire, 1871. A greater part of it was ceded to Hanover. Ecclesiastically the state is divided among several dioceses; the city and vicinity is subject to the Vicar Apostolic of Northern Missions, and the remaining territory to Hildesheim, Osnabrück, and Münster.—C.E.

Brenach, SAINT, Irish missionary in Wales, contemporary of St. Patrick. He was responsible for the conversion of a great part of Wales, erected oratories, and converted Brecon, the ruler of South Wales, who founded many churches. Feast, 7 April.—C.E.

Brendan, SAINT, abbot (484-577), called THE VOYAGER, and sometimes THE ELDER, to distinguish him from Brendan the Younger (490-573), b. near Tralee, Ireland, d. on Magdalen. He was ordained in 512, and erected monastic cells at Ardfern and Shanakeel, near Brandon Hill, whence he set out on his famous voyage. He established the See of Ardfern, erected a monastery at Inis-da-drinu (now Coney Island, County Clare), 550, and made a missionary tour of three years through Britain, visiting Wales and Ireland. In 557 he founded a monastic school at Clonfert. According to what some consider legend and others fact, he is related to have sailed west from Kerry in quest of a land of promise and to have reached a distant beautiful region adorned with luxuriant vegetation; after a journey of seven years he returned to Ireland. The tradition which certainly dates from the 9th century is found in a 10th- or 11th-century MS., and was a little later current in the west of Europe. It probably had its foundation in a real sea-voyage, the destination of which is not known, possibly some part of the American Continent. Patron of sailors. Buried at Clonfert. Feast, 16 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Brentwood, Diocese of, England, comprises the county of Essex; established, 1917; suffragan of Westminster. Bishops: Bernard Ward (1917-20); Arthur Doubleday (1920). Churches and chapels, 105; priests, secular, 79; priests, regular, 32; elementary schools, 32; other schools, 23; institutions, 12; Catholics (est.), 47,000.

Bressani, FRANCESCO GIUSEPPE (1612-72), Jesuit missionary, b. Rome; d. Florence. He labored for many years among the Canadian Algonquins and Hurons. In 1644 he was seized by the Iroquois and cruelly tortured, but was finally ransomed by the Dutch at Fort Orange. The narrative of his captivity is one of the classic documents of the Jesuit Relations.—C.E.

Brest, UNION OF. The Orthodox clergy of Russia, annexed to Poland in 1569, drew up at Brest, 24 June, 1590, a document by which they submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the pope on condition that their Eastern rites and liturgical customs were to be preserved. The union of the Ruthenian Church with the Church of Rome was solemnly proclaimed, Nov., 1596, after receiving the approbation of Clement VIII and King Sigismund of Poland.—C.E.

Brethren (German Baptist Dunkards), a religious sect, popularly known as Dunkards or Dunkers, composed of four bodies: Brethren Church (Progressive Dunkards); Church of Brethren (Dunkards); Church of God (New Dunkards); and Old Order German Baptist Brethren. In the United States in 1925 there were: 4624 ministers; 1314 churches; and 150,160 communicants.

Brethren of the Common Life, community founded by Geert de Groote (1340-84), a Dutch priest and mystic. After spending several years in solitude, he came forth and began to attack the evils of the clergy. A group of secular priests and lay persons attached themselves to De Groote and became known as the Brethren of the Common Life. They took no vows, but aimed at the interior life and devoted themselves to education and literature. They transcribed numerous manuscripts and founded free schools at Windesheim (1386), at Deventer, where there were 2000 students in 1500, and in many places in Germany and the Netherlands. Men like Thomas a Kempis, who wrote a life of De Groote, Pope Adrian VI, and Gabriel Biel, were trained in their schools, which were almost all swept away during the Reformation. —C.E., IV, 166.

Brethren of the Lord, certain relatives of Christ mentioned in several passages of the N.T. They are recognized as four in number. The most prominent member of the group is James the Less (Mark, 15), called "the brother of the Lord" (Gal., 1). He is to be distinguished from James, the brother of John, the son of Zebedee and Salome. His father was a certain Alphmus, equivalent to the Heb. Phama, and is so styled by the precursor (John, 3). He was assassinated by the Jews about A.D. 62.

Bribery, the payment or promise of anything valuable to induce another, while under obligation of acting without additional emolument, to act as the briber prescribes. It ordinarily refers to influence those bound by office to act for the common good. Bribery in any form, legislative, executive, or judicial, is immoral. Its tendency is to pervert justice at its source. The guilt rests upon both briber and bribed and all active agents, and varies with circumstances.—C.E.

Bridegroom (A.-S., bryd, bride; guma, man), term used figuratively in the Bible. Comparisons taken from marriage are popular in the Scriptures. Our Lord employs the term in His parables, e.g., Matt., 25. He calls Himself the Bridegroom (Matt., 3) and other apocrypha that they are St. Joseph's children by a wife deceased, or (as Helvidius and other heretics thought) by Mary after Jesus's birth. —C.E.; U.K.; Breen, Harmonized Exposition of the Four Gospels, Rochester, 1908. (J. M. MCD.)
This is a most beautiful and apt figure showing the relationship of Christ to His Church.—Fonck, tr., Parables of the Gospel, Cin., 1915. (R. K.)

Bridgegroom and the Wedding Guests, descriptive term for a short parable recorded by the three synoptic Gospels (Matt., 9; Mark, 2; Luke, 5). It was spoken probably on the occasion of the banquet given by St. Matthew to Christ and His disciples along with many sinners and publicans, after his call to the Apostleship. The parable was provoked by the question of the disciples of John the Baptist and some of the scribes and Pharisees asking “Why do we and the Pharisees fast often, but thy disciples do not fast?” Jesus replies in a similitude, asking if the companions of the bridal-chamber, whose special task it was to provide for the merrymaking at the feast, could be expected at the same time to mourn and fast. But, Christ adds, the days shall come when the Bridgegroom shall be taken away from these wedding guests and then they shall fast. The meaning of the parable was quite intelligible to His hearers. The disciples of the Baptist are reminded that their master had referred to Christ as the Bridgegroom, and all the questioners are taught that the time of the visible presence of Jesus among His disciples should be for them a time of rejoicing and not of mourning and fasting; but when His visible presence is withdrawn, then they shall lament and be made sorrowful and then fasting and mourning shall be consistently their portion. The Fathers of the Church interpret the image of the bridegroom and bride as referring to Christ and His Church. Some explain it tropologically: as long as the Spouse is with us we are not able to mourn; but when by sin He departs then is the time for tears and fasting. Yet others apply the words of Christ to the Holy Eucharist. The parable does not condemn the strictness of John nor does it condemn fasting. The disciples of Christ kept the fasts prescribed by the Law but they did ignore those imposed by the Pharisees. This parable does stand against the spirit of the Pharisees who esteemed too highly external works and it shows to all that a new time had come and another spirit reigned in the Kingdom. It is held up as a splendid lesson on how to argue and how to convince.—Fonck, tr., Leahy, Parables of the Gospel, Cin., 1915. (R. K.)

Bride or Spouse of Christ. (1) The Church, according to St. Paul (2 Cor., 11). (2) A woman who vows her chastity to God, foregoing marriage in order to be more united with Christ. (3) Mystical union of certain saints, Catherine of Alexandria, Catherine of Siena, and Teresa, with Our Lord.—Sponsa Regis (monthly), Collegeville, Minn.; O'Mahony, in Orate Fratres, 11 Aug., 1910. (Ed.)

Bridge-building Brotherhood, name given to several societies formed in southern France in the 12th and 13th centuries to erect bridges. They resembled guilds, or possibly even Third Orders, but did not constitute religious congregations, as frequently supposed. Knights, clergy, and artisans made up the membership, and some women were admitted. Hospices were conducted by the brothers, where travelers were received and alms obtained. The Fratres Pontifices or Frères Pontifes were a well-known association. They constructed, among others, the bridge at Bréviaire, Laugarderie, Marie-mort, and Mirabeau. St. Bénézet was their legendary founder. In northern Italy there were similar associations.—C.E.

Bridget of Sweden (Birgitta), Saint, widow (c. 1303-73), foundress of the Brigittines, b. near Upsala, Sweden; d. Rome. Her parents were among the wealthiest landholders in the country and were renowned for their piety; St. Ingrid was a near relative. In 1316 at the age of 13, she was married to Ulf Gudmarsson, by whom she had eight children, including St. Catherine of Sweden. About 1340 she made a pilgrimage to Santiago de Compostela in Spain. After her husband’s death, Bridget devoted herself entirely to religion and asceticism; the heavenly visions she had had from early childhood became more frequent. She founded a religious order of nuns, called Brigittines, 1346, at Vadstena, Sweden; approval of the order was granted, 1370. In 1349 she journeyed to Rome and remained there until her death, except while absent on pilgrimages, the most important of which was to the Holy Land. She established a hospice for Swedish students and pilgrims at Rome, and played an important part in influencing Urban V to return to Rome from Avignon (1367). Patroness of Sweden. She is represented praying before a crucifix, holding an image of the Blessed Virgin. Canonized, 1391. Relics in the monastery at Vadstena. Feast, R. Cal., 8 Oct.—C.R.; Butler.

Bridgewater, John (c. 1532-c. 1596), priest, historian, b. Yorkshire, England; d. Trier, Germany. He resigned the rectorship of Lincoln College, Oxford, for conscience’s sake, and went into permanent exile on the Continent. He is best known as the martyrologist of the Catholic confessors under Elizabeth, his voluminous records appearing at Trier, 1588.—C.E.

Brief (Lat., breve, short), a compendious papal letter lacking some of the solemnity and formality of a Bull (q.v.), bearing the device or seal of the fisherman’s ring.—C.E., III, 52.

Brieuc (Bricius, Bric, or Bru), Saint, confessor and bishop (410-502), b. probably Cardiganshire; d. Saint-Brieuc-des-Vaux, France. Of pagan parents, he was converted in 430. He preached in Cardigan and on the coast of Alba, and founded a monastery at Landebaron in Armorica, and another Brigid (Bridget), Saint, virgin (451-525), popularly known as Mary of the Gael, b. Faughart, County Louth, Ireland; d. Kildare. Having received the veil from St. Macaille, she was professed by St. Mel of Ardagh from whom she received abbatial powers, 468. Her famous convent of Cell-Durra (church of the oak) at Drum Criadh became a center of religion and learning which developed later into the cathedral city of Kildare. She established a second monastery there for men, under Bp. St. Conleth, and also a school of art, needlework, and illumination. She became a friend of St. Patrick. Patroness of Ireland, and of scholars. Represented in art on her knees, holding a vase, with a cow nearby. Relics in the grave of St. Patrick and St. Columba near Down-Patrick; head in the Jesuit Church at Lisbon. Feast, 1 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Broad Church Party, members of the Church of England who interpret its doctrines in a broad and liberal sense and hold that the Church should be comprehensive and tolerant. -AUGUSTE THEODORE PAUL (1834-95), brother of countries of Europe, and even into distant colonies.

Brotherhood. The Christian concept rates all men, of every race and nation and type, as possessed of the same human nature and essential worth and dignity. God creates the soul of each man and infuses it into a body; this implies a special divine choice and a special value in the beginning of natural life. Further, God has called every man to a supernatural destiny, dependent on the probationary period of life on earth, which consists in the perfect union of mind and will with the Divine Essence for all eternity, which is Heaven.

As the necessary means to secure this salvation of men, God became incarnate, suffered, and died, and instituted His Church and His sacramental system.

These divine acts, of infinite value, are directly related to each individual man, and give to each individual man an eternal value and worth. Since each man is so constituted, it follows that each man must live and act with due reference to these facts, both in his purely individual acts and in acts which involve others. Social life reveals differences of race, culture, nationality, and temperament, which lead to divisions and separations; but these are accidental and superficial as compared with the basic equality of all in the divine plan. To emphasize these differences to such an extent as to lose sight of the essential human dignity of any individual, race, or class, is an offense against human nature, and against the pope and clergy at the Council of Paris, 1811, he was imprisoned, exiled, and deported. His resignation of his see, signed under compulsion, was not accepted by the pope. After Napoleon's downfall, he defended Catholic principles against King William of Holland, a Protestant, who imposed on Belgium a constitution that deprived the Catholics of all their civil rights. Nationalism, race, and special culture. (E. F. MacK.)

land, Holland, America, and Ireland. The novitiate for the American province is at the S. Benoît Asylum, Longue-Pointe, near Montreal, Canada, and the Brothers conduct an orphanage and industrial institute at Boston, Mass. Statistics: 50 houses, of which 17 are lunatic asylums, in Belgium, England, Canada, the United States, and Belgian Congo.

Brothers of Christ, a title of the faithful.

Brothers of Christian Instruction of Ploërmel, congregation founded 1817 at Saint-Brieuc, Côtes-du-Nord, France, by Jean Marie de la Menais, for the instruction of youth. The first novices were trained by the Christian Brothers, whose rule was largely adopted. Primarily intended to furnish religious teachers to the schools of Brittany, this community soon sent missionaries and founded houses in England, Africa, Asia, America, and Oceania. Owing to the French Law of Associations of 1861, the mother-house was transferred from Ploërmel, France, to Taunton, England. Statistics: 262 houses, 1403 professed religious, 151 novices, 970 postulants.—C.E., III, 711.

Brothers of Christian Instruction of Saint Gabriel, Congregation of the, or Brothers of Saint Gabriel, founded at Saint-Laurent-sur-Sèvre, France, 1705, by the missionary priest, Louis Grignon de Montfort, as the Brothers of the Holy Ghost. Their work consists in the instruction of the young, the blind, the deaf, the dumb, the care of orphans, and the administering of the temporalities of the Fathers of the Company of Mary. The Revolution interrupted the progress of the order, but under Gabriel Deshayes, named superior in 1821, it revived and spread rapidly. In 1835 the members devoted to work in schools were separated and established in the House of St. Gabriel and in 1842 they became autonomous, adopting the title of Brothers of St. Gabriel in 1853. The society was introduced into Canada, 1888, and the provincial house for North America is located at Sault-au-Récollet, near Montreal. Statistics: 1100 members and 379 foundations in Canada, France, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Netherlands, Spain, Venezuela, and the United States; and missions in the Congo, Abyssinia, Madagascar, India, and Siam.—C.E., VI, 330.

Brothers of Our Lady of the Fields, congregation founded at St. Damien de Buckland in the Diocese of Quebec, 1902, by Rev. J. O. Brownson, to train orphans in industrial and agricultural pursuits, and the arts of colonization. In 1924 the mother-house was transferred to Squatteck in the Diocese of Rimouski. The novitiate is located at Rimouski.—C.E., XI, 361.

Brothers of the Christian Schools of Ireland, an institute founded in 1802 at Waterford, by Edmund Ignatius Rice, to provide for the education of boys after the enactment of the penal laws; constituted a religious institute, 1820. There are, besides the teaching Brothers, those who perform domestic and farm duties. The society conducts primary, secondary, and industrial schools, colleges, orphanages, and institutions for the deaf and dumb. The Superior-General resides at Dublin. Statistics: 200 houses in Ireland, England, Australia, and India; also established in Rome and China; 9 houses and 90 Brothers in the United States; foundations in Canada and Newfoundland form part of the American province.—U.K.

Brothers of the Cross of Jesus, a congregation founded in 1830 at Lyons, France, by Rev. C. M. Bochard, Vicar-General of Lyons, for the Christian education of the young. The growth of the congregation in France and Switzerland ceased with the persecution of 1903, but the institution, incorporated in Canada in 1905, now conducts a number of Canadian houses.—C.E., IV, 539.

Brothers of the Holy Infancy and Youth of Jesus, society founded in 1861 at Renteria, Spain, by Rev. J. O. Brousseau, Bp. of Buffalo, for the care of poor and wayward boys. They maintain a working boys’ home in Buffalo and a protectory and trade school at Lackawanna, where the mother-house and novitiate are also located. The protectory cares for about 300 boys who receive instruction in various arts and industries.—C.E., VII, 418.

Brothers of the Sacred Heart, a religious educational institute founded at Lyons, France, 1821, by Rev. André Coindre. Its constitutions modeled upon those of St. Ignatius based on the Rule of St. Augustine, bind the members to the teaching of boys in asylums, parochial and select schools, and commercial colleges. The superior-general, chosen from among the Brothers, resides at Renteria, Spain. Statistics: about 1620 members and 137 colleges and schools in France, Belgium, Spain, the United States, and Canada.—C.E., XIII, 305; C.E. Suppl., 648.

Brown, C. A. B., philosopher, essayist, and reviewer, b. Stockbridge, Vt.; d. Detroit, Mich. He was ordained a Universalist minister, but later denying all Divine revelation, left the ministry and adopted Robert Dale Owen's communistic theories of property and marriage. In 1831 sympathy for the working classes led him to preach as an independent minister. For the next 12 years he was associated with the Unitarians. Through the “Boston Quarterly Review” (eventually “Brownson’s Quarterly Review”) his political theories excited much attention. In 1844 he became a Catholic, thereafter devoting his pen to the defense of his Faith. He is the author of numerous works, several of them in the form of novels. He disclaimed having originated any form of philosophy, and acknowledged freely what he borrowed. from others. Principal works: "New Views of Christianity, Society and the Church"; "Charles Elwood"; "The Mediatorial Life of Jesus"; "The Spirit Rapper"; "The Convert, or Leaves from my Experience"; "The American Republic, its Constitution, Tendencies and Destiny." His works were edited and his biography written by his son Henry F. Brownson (1835-1914).—C.E.

Brunelleschi, brùn-nél'les-ké (Brunellesco), FILIPPO (1377-1446), architect and sculptor, b. Florence; d. there. Several examples of his sculptural work are extant, and his model for the reliefs of the second bronze door of the baptistery at Florence was awarded second prize. He revived the classical style of architecture in Italy, and was the first to apply perpendiculary formulated rules. His masterpiece was the dome erected according to his designs to complete the cathedral church of Florence, Santa Maria del Fiore. Other examples of his work are the polygonal dome of St. Lorenzo, the Pazzi chapel, and the church of Santo Spirito, Florence. —C.E.

Brunetièrè, brùn-tyär', FERDINAND (1849-1906), critic and professor, b. Toulon, France; d. Paris. His critical ability, wide learning and trenchant style won early recognition and he became editor-in-chief of the "Revue des Deux Mondes." For several years he held the position of professor of French literature and language at the Ecole Normale, being dropped from the list of professors, owing to his conversion to Catholicism, when the school was reorganized in 1905. He lectured in the United States in 1897. The greatest French critic of the last twenty years of the 19th century, his earlier method was dogmatic, literary works being judged according to certain principles he and laid down as criteria. About 1880 he changed his method and applied to literature the theory of development. His conversion to Catholicism was the result of long and thorough study of Bossuet, and for 10 years he defended his faith against the attacks of free-thinkers. —C.E.

Brunforte, UGOLINO, also called UGOLINO of MONTE GIORGIO (c. 1262-c. 1348), Italian Friar Minor and chronicler. He spent most of his life at the convent of Santa Maria in Monte Giorgio. In 1225 he was chosen Bp. of Abruzzi under Celestine V, but Boniface VIII, who succeeded before his consecration, annulled the appointment. Recent research has led most scholars to agree in regarding Ugolino as the author of the "Fioretti" or "Little Flowers of St. Francis."—C.E.

Bruno, SAINT (925-965), Abp. of Cologne, d. Reims. He was the youngest son of Emperor Henry I and St. Mathilda. Educated at Utrecht and at the court of his brother Otto I, he was appointed archchancellor to Otto in 951. For his loyalty during the revolt of Otto's eldest son, Ludolf, and Conrad, Duke of Saxony, to his brother, the emperor caused him to be elected Abp. of Cologne and entrusted to him the administration of the Duchy of Lorraine. Through his mediation the disturbances were quelled. A great bishop and zealous pastor, he ruled by personal piety and holiness of life. He lavished his resources on monastic and ecclesiastical institutions. He founded the monastery of St. Pantaleon at Cologne, where he is buried. Feast, 11 Oct. —C.E.

Bruno, SAINT, confessor and abbot (c. 1030-1101), founder of the Carthusian Order, b. Cologne, Germany; d. Torre, Calabria, Italy. Educated at Reims, he was ordained, c. 1055. He presided over the cathedral school at Reims, 1057-75, and was made chancellor of the church of Reims. He opposed Manasses, Abp. of Reims, because of his laxity and mismanagement. In 1084 he withdrew to Chartreuse, and, with his little band of followers, founded the Carthusian Order. There he lived for some time in solitude and prayer until he was summoned to Rome, 1090, by Urban II, a former pupil. He resided in the papal palace, sat in the councils, and seconded the pope's efforts for the reform of the clergy. Retiring from public life, he and his companions built a hermitage at Torre, where, 1095, the monastery of St. Stephen was built. Bruno combined in the religious life the eremitical and the cenobitic; his living is apparent from his scrip­tural commentaries. Patron of those possessed. Emblems: a chalice, cross in hand, branch, star, death's head. Equipollent canonization, 1023. Buried in church of St. Stephen at Torre. Feast, R. Cal., 6 Oct. —C.E.; Butler.

Bruno, GIORDANO (1548-1600), heretic, b. Nola, Italy; d. Rome. He became a Dominican in 1593, and a priest, 1572. Accused of heresy, 1576, he left his order and began attacking the Church, and was excommunicated by the Calvinist Council of Geneva. A restless wanderer, he was favored by Elizabeth, and when in England, dedicated to Sir Philip Sidney his book: "The Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast," viz. the Church, and vilely abused the Oxford professors when he returned to Rome in 1600. He died there. Excommunicated by the Lutherans at Helm-
Bruno of Querfurt (Brun or Boniface), Saint, martyr (c. 970-1009), Abp. of the Slavs, and second Apostle of the Prussians. In 996 he accompanied Emperor Otto III to Rome, where he became acquainted with St. Adalbert and St. Romuald who directed him in the ascetic life. He was consecrated archbishop of the heathen Slavs in 1004; preached to the Hungarian, Pechenegs, and pagan Prussians by whom he was killed. He is the author of the life of St. Adalbert, and also of the lives of the martyred monks known as the five Polish brothers. Represented in art, crossing a red-hot furnace, and blessing the Chalice of the Mass with his hands cut off. Relics in Poland. Feast, 15 Oct.—C.E.

Brussia (Ger., Bruch, marsh; Lat., selce, seat), capital of Belgium. Its foundation is traditionally attributed to St. Gery, Bp. of Cambrai, in the 6th century. In the 8th century it was the residence of the Frankish kings, and from the 10th century belonged to the Dukes of Lower Lorraine and Brabant. Duke Charles of Lower Lorraine brought to Bruges the relics of St. Gudule (979) who has since then been the patroness of the city. In 1386 it became the capital of Brabant; under Charles V the capital of the Low Countries; and under Philip II the center of opposition to the Spanish rule. It was ceded to Austria in 1714, taken by the French, 1794, given to Austria, 1814, and to France, 1830; the scene of a revolutionary outbreak which resulted in the establishment of the Kingdom of Belgium. During the World War it was occupied by the Germans. Among the buildings of Catholic interest are the churches of St. Gudule, Notre Dame du Sablon, Notre Dame de la Chapelle, and St. Jacques sur Caudenberg. The Jesuit College of Saint Michiel is the seat of the publication of the "Acta Sanctorum" by the Bollandists, and there is kept the library and archives of the enterprise. A statue of St. Michael, also a patron of Brussels, surmounts the Hotel de Ville. It is included in the Archdiocese of Mechlin.—C.E.; Gilliat-Smith. The Story of Brussels, N. Y., 1906.

Bruté, Simon Gabriel (1779-1839), first Bp. of Vincennes (present see, Indianapolis), b. Rennes, France; d. Vincennes. After studying medicine from 1796-1803, he entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice and was ordained, 1808. In 1810 he sailed with Bp.-elect Flaget, of Bardstown, for America. He taught philosophy two years at St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, removing in 1812 to St. Mary's, Emmitsburg. For several years he directed Mother Elizabeth Seton, foundress of the Sisters of Charity in the United States. He was consecrated Bp. of Vincennes in 1834, his diocese comprising Indiana and northern Illinois. In 1836, with funds collected in Europe, he established a seminary in which he taught, an orphan asylum, and a free school. At his death there were 23 churches in his diocese.

Buckfast Abbey, near Ashburton, England, founded probably about the middle of the 10th century; incorporated into the Benedictine Congregation of Savigny (later part of the Cistercian Order) in the 12th century; and suppressed, 1538. It was reestablished by the Benedictines, and legally conveyed to them, 1882. The community, numbering 29 priests, is occupied in parochial work at Buckfastleigh and Totnes.

Buckler, emblem in art associated with St. George of England as soldier.

Buckley, Sir Patrick Aloysius (1841-96), soldier, lawyer, and statesman, b. near Castletownsend, County Cork, Ireland; d. Lower Hutt, New Zealand. In 1860 he served under General Lamormier in the papal army, was decorated for services, and taken prisoner. After the war he emigrated first to Queensland, then to New Zealand, where he filled posts of distinction in the legal profession, finally becoming judge of the Supreme Court.—C.E.

Budapest (Buda, brother of Attila; Old Slavic, pecti, oven), capital of Hungary, comprising Buda on the right bank of the Danube and Pest on the left, united, 1872. Old Buda, originally a Roman colony, Aquincum, was captured by the Magyars in the 10th century. The Turks held it, 1541-1866, during which time Pest was almost destroyed. The city made great progress in the 19th century. Among buildings of Catholic interest are the Coronation or Matthias church, begun in the 13th century and finished in the 15th, and the St. Stephen's Basilica. The predominant religion is Catholic, of which there has been a remarkable revival since the World War. Budapest is included in the Archdiocese of Gran.—U.K.

Buddha (Skt., buddh, to know, the enlightened one), a prince named Siddhartha (c. 560-480 B.C.), called also by his family names of Gautama or Sakyu-Muni, the son of a local ruler in modern Nepal. Of ascetic tendencies and Brahmanic education he cast aside luxuries to seek perfection, and spent years as an austere hermit. Finding peace... elusive he turned to meditation and the formulation of his religious system. Enthusiastically he set out to spread his doctrine, and won numerous disciples with whom he went about preaching, and whom he finally formed into a brotherhood of monks. After forty years of zealous labor he died in his eightieth year. After cremation his remains were preserved in mounds called topes, stupas, or dagobas. Tradition depicts him as the most exalted character of pagan antiquity. A great and good man of magnetic personality, he was absorbed with the idea of liberating men from misery. Buddha left no writings. Soon after his death followers codified his teachings comprising the three classes of the Tripitaka (triple basket) forming the canon of Southern Buddhists. Extra-canonical books include the “Commentaries of Buddhagosa,” “Questions of King Milinda,” and a history of Buddhism to the 4th century A.D. The Tripitaka of Northern Buddhists includes the “Lotus of the True Laws,” “Book of Exploits,” and two legendary lives of Buddha.

Buddhism is the religious and monastic system founded about 500 B.C. by Buddha, on the basis of pantheistic Brahmanism. Its end is liberation from misery by freeing from attachment to conscious existence. In communion with Brahmanism it holds belief in Karma, that the acts of a previous existence determine the character of this present life; belief in a constant series of rebirths for all set on preserving individual existence; belief that the ultimate end consists in a state of eternal, unconscious repose. It differs in the rejection of the Vedas and of Vedic rites. It ignores the all-god Brahma. The gods are realities but dependence on them is denied, hence prayer and offering are useless. It differs in its conception of the final state and of the method of attainment. All desire must be extinguished; whence follows cessation of misery, a final state called Nirvana (a blowing out), one of eternal, unconscious repose. For the imperfect the various Buddhist heavens of positive delight were retained. Buddha formed his disciples into communities of monks leading a contemplative life of poverty, celibacy, and self-denial. Destruction of all forms of life was forbidden. Communities of nuns were also formed. Buddhism did not advocate social reform, but his religion ignores caste; virtue constitutes superiority. Buddha was venerated after his death, but being in Nirvana and insensible to honors, for the popular need of a conscious personality to whom to pray Buddhist monks produced Metteyya (Maitreya), the living one, a divine bodhisattva destined to incarnation and leadership, and honored as future saviour. Such is the Southern Buddhism of southern India, Ceylon, Burma, and Siam, the closest in orthodoxy to original Buddhism.

About A.D. 100 Northern Buddhism was modified to include worship of an eternal, supreme deity, Adi-Buddha, of whom Buddha was regarded as an incarnation. Around this supreme deity were countless bodhisattvas destined to become future incarnate Buddhas; to rank among these became the ideal end. In place of Nirvana, Sukhavati, the heaven of sensuous delight where reigned Amitabha, an emanation of the eternal Buddha, became the goal of longing. To attain to this end virtue plus an extravagant worship of relics and statues, pilgrimages, and recitation of sacred names and of magic formulas were practised, together with other forms of superstition. This innovation subverted Buddhism's teaching known as Mahayana or Great Vehicle, supplanted the older system of the south contemptuously styled Hinayana or Little Vehicle.

Buddhism soon became a formidable rival of Brahmanism. About 250 B.C. missionaries were sent to evangelize. In A.D. 67 they penetrated China where conversions multiplied. With the supplanting of Southern Buddhism in the north in the 2nd century A.D. a corresponding change took place in China. Two bodhisattvas of Mahayana became favorite subjects of worship. Amitabha and Avalokitesvara or Fousa Kwanyn, preserver from evil. Confined mostly to the masses, Buddhism is regarded as an accretion to professed Confucianism. Excessive devotion to statues and relics, magic arts, and many superstitions of Taoism are practised. Chinese Buddhism was introduced into Korea 4th century A.D., and into Japan 6th century A.D., and spread over central and eastern Asia with local additions and changes. This northern Buddhism is associated only with the Southern Buddhists numbering at most 50,000,000. Widespread Northern Buddhism with its local accretions and variations is a confusion of beliefs and practises. The spread of Buddhism was accomplished only by subversion, and accommodation to local superstitions.—C.E.; Barth, The Religions of India, Lond., 1891; Oldenburg, Buddha, Lond., 1892; Herald, Life of Buddha, N. Y., 1928.

Budkiewicz, bud-kya'-vitsh, CONSTANTINE (1867-1923), ecclesiastic and political martyr, b. Lithuania, Russia; d. Moscow. Vicar of St. Catherine's church in St. Petersburg (Leningrad), he headed every religious and political movement of the Catholic Poles. In opposition to socialistic anti-religious teachings, he founded the Christian Democratic movement. During the World War, he was president of the Polish Relief Commission. In 1918 he was created monsignor, and made dean of the Catholic universities of northern Russia. He was created monsignor, and made dean of the Catholic churches of northern Russia. In 1919 he was created monsignor, and made dean of the Catholic churches of northern Russia. In 1923. At a farcical trial in Moscow, he was charged with counter-revolutionary activities for having resisted Soviet decrees which forbade religious instruction, ordered the signing over of the churches to the government, and the surrender of sacred vessels. He was condemned to death, and in spite of protests sent by practically every civilized nation he was executed.—U.K.

church, and when the city was transferred from the jurisdiction of Paraguay and made an episcopal see, 1620, this church was dedicated as the cathedral, 1622. Upon the site stands the new cathedral, built 1791, and modeled upon the Madeleine of Paris. The Franciscans were already established in the country before the foundation of the city, and there is evidence that the church and convent of Mercy in charge of the Fathers of Mercy until 1821, were standing when Garay founded the hospital of St. Martin, in the neighborhood. The present church of the Franciscans dates from 1731; their library of 7000 volumes is open to the public. The Jesuits, pioneers in educational work in Buenos Aires, brought architects from Europe to erect the church of St. Ignatius, 1722, and resided here until their expulsion, 1767; returning later, they built the church of the Saviour, 1872, and now conduct a college in connection with it. Other notable buildings are the Dominican church and the chapels of Mount Carmel and of the Passionists. In 1856 the city was raised to an archiepiscopal see. The Catholic Universalist was founded in 1910, and in 1915 the seminary was authorized to confer degrees in philosophy and theology. A national Eucharistic Congress was held here, 1916.

Buffalo, city, New York. A few Recollect and Jesuit missionaries and their interpreters, early in the 17th century, are thought to have been the first white men who saw this region. As their routes are not known in detail, it is uncertain whether they visited the exact site of Buffalo, as did La Salle and his companions in the winter of 1678-79. Early in the 19th century the small number of white settlers here included a few Catholics, especially Alsatians. Though without a priest they assembled for prayer at the home of Louis Le Couteux, at the corner of Main and Exchange streets. In 1821 Fr. Patrick Kelly of New York came to the village and conducted a public service. It is recorded also that Fr. Stephen Badin (q.v.) said Mass in the court-house and at the Le Couteux home. When Bp. DuBois of New York visited Buffalo in 1829 he found between 700 and 800 Catholics but no church. For this purpose the land at the corner of Main and Edward streets was donated by Le Couteux, and after singing a solemn high Mass in the court-house the bishop went in procession to the site and blessed it. The same year the Jesuits opened a school in connection with it. Other notable buildings are the Dominican church and the chapels of Mount Carmel and of the Passionists. In 1872 the city was raised to an archiepiscopal see. The Catholic Universalist was founded in 1910, and in 1915 the seminary was authorized to confer degrees in philosophy and theology. A national Eucharistic Congress was held here, 1916.

Buenos Aires. A few Jesuit missionaries and their interpreters, early in the 17th century, are thought to have been the first white men who saw this region. As their routes are not known in detail, it is uncertain whether they visited the exact site of Buenos Aires. In 1618 Fr. Juan de Garay founded the hospital of St. Martin, in the neighborhood. The present church and convent of St. Martin were completed in 1678-79. Early in the 19th century the small number of white settlers here included a few Catholics, especially Alsatians. Though without a priest they assembled for prayer at the home of Louis Le Couteux, at the corner of Main and Exchange streets.

Buquba. Vicariate Apostolic of, province of East Africa; by a decree of 1929, two new vicariates (Mwanza and Bukoba) were formed from old Victoria Nyanza; entrusted to the White Fathers.

Bulgaria, independent monarchy in the eastern part of the Balkan Peninsula; area, 39,814 sq. m.; pop., 5,483,125. The region was inhabited in Roman times by Thraco-Ilyrians, later by Slavs, and towards the end of the 7th century was overrun by Bulgars, a people akin to the Huns and Tatars, who adopted the language of the conquered Slavs. Christianity was introduced by disciples of Sts. Cyril and Methodius who are considered the national apostles. In 864 the Khan Boris became a Christian for political reasons and favored the pope in the dispute between Rome and the Eastern Church, but turned to the Greek Church upon the pope's refusal to make the Bulgarian Church an independent patriarchate. In 1870 the Bulgarian Church, which resembles the Orthodox in doctrine and worship, was declared independent. The clergy of all denominations are paid by the state. The Catholic Church is represented by:

Bull, emblem in art associated with Sts. Blan- dina, Saturninus, and Eustachius. With St. Blan- dina it was the means of martyrdom. It symbolizes the martyrdom of St. Eustachius and his family in a brazen bull. With reference to St. Saturninus the meaning is obscure.

Bull (Lat., bulla, seal), Papal, at the present time the document used by the pope in appointing a bishop; the name is derived from the disk-like leaden seals attached. Formerly all important papal letters including canonization decrees were called Bulls. Even the Code makes Bull synonymous with major papal letter, but the “Acta Apostolica Sedis” gives these other letters diverse names.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (J. B.)

Bull-fight, the national sport of Spain. It is thought to have originated in a custom of the Arabo-Spanish horsemen, who in times of peace fought with wild bulls. These contests reached their height under John II of Castile (1405-54). After the Spanish reconquest the bull-fight became a popular amusement. Professional participants date back to the band of bull-fighters organized by Juan Romero in the 18th century. In the present bull-fight, after the strength of the bull has been weakened by the capeadores, picadores, and banderilleros (men who enrage the bull in various ways), he is slain by the matador. On account of the dexterity of the performers casualties are not of frequent occurrence. Bull-fighting has often been condemned by ecclesiastical authorities and the clergy are forbidden to attend.—C.E.; U.K.; Moore, In the Heart of Spain, N. Y., 1927.

Bullion, ANGELIQUE, benefactress, b. Paris, at commencement of 17th century. The wife of Claude de Bullion, keeper of seals and superintendent of finances under Louis XIII, after his death she gave large sums to what is now the city of Montreal, Canada, and founded and endowed the hospital of that city, known as the Hôtel-Dieu. Her identity as benefactress was revealed only after her death.—C.E.

Burck, Thomas Nicholas (1830-82), Dominican orator, b. Galway, Ireland; d. Tallaght. After his ordination he founded the novitiate of the Irish Dominican province at Tallaght. His first notable sermon was on “Church Music,” preached in 1859, and thereafter his preaching attracted throngs. He met with very great success while preaching and lecturing in the United States, 1871. Returning to Ireland he preached continually, despite his impaired health, until death.—C.E.

Burlington, Diocese of, Vermont, comprises the State of Vermont; area, 9,353 sq. m.; established, 1853; suffragan of Boston. Bishops: Louis...
De Goesbriand (1853-99), John S. Michaud (1899-2008), Joseph J. Rice (1910). Churches, 97; priests, secular, 83; priests, regular, 14; religious women, 480; seminary, 1; colleges, 2; academies, 9; primary schools, 20; pupils in parochial schools, 1636; institutions, 7; Catholics, 89,568.

Burnand, Sir Francis Cowley (1836-1917), editor and humorist, b. London; d. Ramsgate, England. After graduating from Cambridge and studying for the Anglican ministry, he became converted to Catholicity. The success of his play, "Dido," encouraged him to continue writing, and in all he wrote about 120 farces, burlesque librettos of opera, and adaptations from the French. He was editor of "Punch," 1880-1906. His editing of the valuable English "Catholic Who's Who" contributed largely to its success. He was knighted in 1902.—U.K.

Burnett, Peter Hardeman (1807-95), first governor of California after its admission to the Union, b. Nashville, Tenn.; d. San Francisco. He was admitted to the bar in 1839. He lost faith in Alexander Campbell, whose church he had joined, on reading Campbell's published debate with Abp. Purcell. Having taken a prominent part in the formation of the territory of Oregon, he later removed to California (1848), where he held a succession of important public positions, being elected governor in 1849. He became a Catholic in 1856, his most famous work being "The Path which Led a Protestant Lawyer to the Catholic Church."—C.E.

Burning Bush, a miraculous feature in the scene, described in Exodus, 3, where Jehovah appears to Moses at the foot of Mount Horeb in a bush which is "on fire" and yet is "not burnt." The omission, given to Moses on this occasion, marks the beginning of the formation of the national life of the Chosen People. The kind of bush is not identified; tradition regards it as the hobble or blackberry bush. (J. A. N.)

Burse or Bursary (L.L., bursa, purse or pouch). (1) A part of the set of vestments for the Mass and Benediction, being placed upon the chalice at the beginning and end of the Holy Sacrifice, and on the altar at Benediction. It contains the corporal, which is spread on the altar beneath the chalice or the ostensorium. In medieval England it was called the "corporas case." (2) A leather case containing the pyx, in which the Holy Eucharist is brought to the sick. (3) The name for a foundation or endowment fund, especially for scholarships for candidates for the priesthood. (4) An Oratory. (J. L. P. R.)

Bursfeld, Abbey of, near Gottingen, Germany, founded, 1093, by Duke Henry of Nordheim and his wife Gertrude. The first abbot, Almericus, came from the monastery of Corvey, and founded one of the most famous schools in Germany. In 1331 a period of decline set in, but in the 15th century the Benedictine, John Dederoth, Abbot of Chus, encouraged by success in his own abbey, undertook the reform of Bursfeld. Unexpectedly satisfying results led him on to Reinhausen, and these three monasteries formed the nucleus of the Bursfeld Union. The foundation of the union, however, is attributed to John of Hagen, who restored the Divine Office to the original form of the Benedictine Breviary, and introduced liturgical and disciplinary uniformity in the monasteries, according to the reform followed at Bursfeld. When approved by the Council of Basel, 1446, the Abbot of Bursfeld was ex officio one of the three presidents of the congregation, which became a powerful force of reform among the monasteries of Germany, numbering 36 monasteries at the death of its founder, and at its height, over 135. The last Abbot of Bursfeld was evicted, 1579, and replaced by a Lutheran, but the union continued until the secularization of the monasteries in the 18th century.—C.E.

Bury St. Edmunds, Abbey, Suffolks, England, founded c. 637 by Sigebert, King of the East Angles. Relics of the martyred King Edmund were enshrined there in 903. Early in the 18th century the secular canons were replaced by Benedictines, who built a magnificent church and extensive monastery buildings. Only a few ruins remain, including Norman and Decorated gateways. Abbot Samson (d. 1211) founded a hospital and free school and aided the townspeople in obtaining a charter. Two 13th-century monks of this congregation were the bibliographer John Boston and John Lydgate, a poet. —C.E.

Bussembaum, Hermann (1600-68), moral theologian, b. Notteln, Westphalia; d. Münster. He entered the Society of Jesus, c. 1619. As confessor to Bp. von Galen of Münster, he was instrumental in furthering the growth of spiritual activity of the diocese. His work on moral theology is a classic, and has been used by the leading moralists, among them St. Alphonsus Liguori, as the basis of their treatises.—C.E.

Bushmen or Bosjesmans (Dutch, Bosjesmanen), a people found in Great Namaqualand, South Africa, kindred to the Hottentots. They are of diminutive stature with yellow skin and slanting eyes. There is no tribal organization. Their religion is animistic. A native aesthetic sense is indicated by a curious folklore. The missionaries of the Orange River Prefecture Apostolic have brought some of them under Christian influence.

Buskins, ceremonial stockings of silk, sometimes ornamented, worn by the celebrant of a Pontifical Mass.—C.E.

Butcher's Knife, emblem in art associated with St. Bartholomew, representing the instrument by which he was martyred.

Bute, John Patrick Chichester-Stuart, 3rd Marquess of (1847-1900), b. Mountstuart, Bute, Scotland; d. Attrieres House, Fife. In 1868, when he was received into the Church, and after settling on his estates in Scotland, lived thenceforth as a devout Catholic, munificent in his benefactions to poor missions and a generous patron of learning. As a scholar, he is best known for his translation of the Roman Breviary into English, in collaboration with the Rev. James McSwiney, S.J.—C.E.

Buteux, Jacques (1600-52), Jesuit missionary, b. Abbeville, France; d. Canada. His career as a missionary was distinguished by an ardent desire for suffering, and his converts were recognized by an unusual spirit of faith. He was martyred by the Iroquois. His writings include an account of the captivity and tortures of B. Isaac Jogues.—C.E.
Butler, Alban (1710-63), historian, b. Appleby, Northamptonshire, England; d. St. Omer, France. After ordination he taught at the English College at Douai, and devoted himself to compiling "The Lives of the Fathers, Martyrs and Other Principal Saints," the work by which he is best known. He was appointed to the presidency of the English college at St. Omer, 1766, and was also called upon to devote himself to active diocesan work. —C.E.

—Charles (1750-1832), lawyer, writer, and Catholic leader, nephew of preceding, b. London; d. there. He was educated at the English College, Douai, studied law in England, and as his religious affiliations constituted ineligibility for the bar, became a conveyancer. He joined the agitation for repeal of the Penal Laws, was made secretary to the committee to promote the repeal, and in 1791 on the passing of the bill for partial relief he was called to the bar. He was a conspicuous figure in the controversies among the Catholic laymen and clergy in connection with the Catholic Committee and was the leading opponent of Bp. Milner. His works include "Reminiscences," "Herculean," "Hargrave's Coke on Littleton," "On Impressing Seamen," "Historical Memoir of English, Scotch, and Irish Catholics," "Life of Erasmus," and a "Continuation of Alban Butler's Saints' Lives."—C.E.

Buttress, a pile of masonry built at right angles to a wall to strengthen it at certain points to resist the thrust of vaulting. Its extensive use on the exterior of ecclesiastical buildings became necessary when the medieval builders substituted vaulting for wooden trabeated roofs, and variations ranged from massive supports embedded in the wall to graceful counter-thrusts touching it only at points. The flying buttress, which became the most distinctive characteristic of Gothic architecture, originated in France in the 12th century when ribbed vaulting was extended to the nave. It consists of a straight band of stone covered by a half-arch which transmits the thrust of a vault across an open space to a pier independent of the main structure. In five-aisled churches it sometimes crosses both aisles in a single span (Notre Dame, Paris) and sometimes in two spans (Reims; Amiens).—C.E.

B.V. = Beata Virgo (Blessed Virgin).
B.V.M. = Beata Virgo Maria (Blessed Virgin Mary).

Byrd, William (c. 1543-1623), composer and organist, b. probably Lincoln, England; d. London. He became, in 1575, organist of the Chapel Royal, being an orthodox polyphonist. He excelled in liturgical compositions although he also founded the English Madrigal School and was a prolific composer for the virginals. "Psalms, Sonnets and Songs," several masses, "Graduals," and "Sacred Songs," have survived.—C.E.

Byrne, William (1780-1833), missionary and educator, b. County Wicklow, Ireland; d. Bardstown, Ky. He emigrated to the United States, where he studied in Sulpician institutions, and after ordination became a missionary priest. In 1821 he opened St. Mary's College, Bardstown, which exerted a wide influence in spreading education throughout Kentucky. After 12 years he turned the college over to the Society of Jesus.—C.E.

Byzantine Architecture, bī-zān'tin, Christian architecture of the East which supplanted the early forms held in common by East and West, characterized by exclusive use of vaulted roofs and rejection of wood in construction, balancing of thrusts by counter-thrusts instead of dead weight, and classic Roman structural elements modified by oriental ideas, of which the most important is the dome supported on pendentives. Oriental love of splendor found expression in the decoration of floor and walls with richly colored marbles and mosaics, but sculpture was devoid of high relief and the exterior was usually of plain brick. The dome was carried either on a circular or octagonal sub-structure or on four piers and arches by means of pendentives, over the square central area of a rectangular or cruciform church. At the eastern end was a projecting apse for the chancel and altar separated from the nave by the iconostasis or screen; later a minor apse was placed at the eastern end of each aisle, and a narthex extended across the western front. The use of pendentives could be extended indefinitely to any number of domes, which also became characteristic of Byzantine churches. The style, which reached its height in the church of St. Sophia in Constantinople (early 6th century), also appeared in the architecture of the West where the most magnificent example is the Cathedral of the Most Precious Blood, Westminster, England (consecrated, 1890). After the fall of Constantinople in 1453 the style continued in countries of the Greek Rite, becoming identified with the national church of Russia.—C.E.; U.K.; Jackson, Byzantine and Romanesque Architecture, Camb., 1913.

Byzantine Art, the art developed in Constantinople (Byzantium) after it had become Constantine's capital (A.D. 328) and the center of European and Eastern culture. Combining the elements of Greek and early Christian art with oriental love of color and lavish decoration, imported from Syria and Persia, it was characterized by formal rigidity in the angular figures, elaborate costume, and rich backgrounds of gold or blue. Devoted at first to expressing religious truths it followed laws strictly laid down by the Church. At the same time it was protected by the Church from the deadening influence of the Iconoclasts of the 8th and 9th centuries, and lived to inspire the art of Italy through such centers as Ravenna, Plermo, and Venice, and to influence all European art after the Crusades had made its treasures known. The forms of Byzantine art embraced painting on wood and plaster, miniatures, mosaic work which has never been surpassed, and a multitude of lesser arts such as the illumination of missals, metal-work, jewelry, ivory-carving, and the production of beautiful vestments. In sculpture, through the revulsion of feeling against the pagan glorification of the human form, it was limited to the carving of flat surfaces and intricate openwork capitals.—C.E.; Dalton, Byzantine Art and Archaeology, Oxford, 1911.
Byzantine Empire, name given to the Roman Empire of the East, which flourished 395-1453, being founded upon the death of Theodosius by division of the Roman Empire between his two sons. In the 5th century the Nestorian heresy began to prevail in the East, and the empire was forced to pay tribute to Attila to escape invasion. Religious matters were of special importance in Byzantine history because of the politico-ecclesiastical powers of the rulers and the interest of all classes in questions of doctrine and usage. Political and ecclesiastical dissension caused by the introduction of the Monophysite heresy was increased by rivalry between the patriarchs of Alexandria and Constantinople, until in 1215 the latter was declared second to Rome in honor by Pope Innocent III. The most brilliant period of the empire began under Justinian I (527-565), famous for his code of laws. His general, Belisarius, defeated the Persians and made conquests in Africa and Italy, and in 538 St. Sophia was erected. In 610 Heraclius overthrew the usurper Phocas and in 622 crushed the Persians, and during the 7th century Greek became the language of the empire. Under Constantine IV (668-685) the Saracens were forced to raise their siege of Constantinople, Bulgaria became a separate kingdom (680), and orthodoxy was reestablished. Under Leo the Isaurian (717-741) the last attack of the Saracens was repelled, army and finances were reorganized, and a campaign inaugurated for the destruction of sacred images which caused internal strife for a century. His successor Constantine V continued his policy of iconoclasm and persecution of monks, and though image-worship was restored by Irene (797-802), the Iconoclasts finally prevailed. With restoration of image-worship by Theodora (842-856) ecclesiastical authority became entirely subject to the throne. Theodora’s brother Bardas deposed Ignatius from the Patriarchate of Constantinople and appointed the layman Photius whose defiance of Pope Nicholas I (867) brought about the Great Eastern Schism. Basil I: the Macedonian (867-886) established a new dynasty, with a revival of literature, art, and commerce, had Justinian’s code revised, and issued new law books, notably the Prochiron and the Basilica. Basil II (976-1025) defeated the Bulgarians and Saracens, issued a “Novel” (supplementary decree) against great land proprietors, regulations concerning church property and against public officials seizing crown lands, increased commerce, and brought the empire to the summit of power. Under Constantine IX (1042-55) Michael Cerularius, Patriarch of Constantinople, attempted to create a patriarchate equal to Rome, and was condemned by Leo IX. With the burning of the Bull of condemnation in St. Sophia, Constantinople separated from Rome. Upon the expiration of the Macedonian dynasty in 1057 the throne was seized by Isaac Comnenus who renounced claim to spiritual jurisdiction while Cerularius encroached on temporal power. His successor, Constantine X, diminished the military forces, causing the loss of Italy, Croatia, Dalmatia, and Asia Minor. With the coming of the Crusaders and establishment of a Latin empire in the 13th century, commercial prosperity declined, and under a succession of incompetent rulers Byzantium looked to the West for aid against the threatened invasions of the Turks. Reunion of the Eastern and Western Churches attempted in the Council of Lyons (1274) and the Council of Florence (1439) was rejected by the Greek people, and in 1453 Constantinople was subjugated by Mohammed II who brought the empire to an end.—C.E.; U.K.; Oman, The Byzantine Empire, Lond., 1892.

Byzantine Rite, that used in the Church of Constantinople. It is the one most widely used after the Roman and has three forms. The oldest is the Liturgy of St. James modified by St. basil the Great (d. 379) and named after him, St. John Chrysostom (d. 407) modified St. Basil’s Liturgy. This, with later modifications, became the common Eucharistic service of Constantinople. It did not entirely displace St. Basil’s, but limited its use to a few days each year. The third form is the Liturgy of the Presanctified, the essence of which is the distribution of the Blessed Sacrament consecrated the preceding Sunday.—C.E., IV, 312; Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914. (M. E. D.)

Cadoc, Cistercian abbey, Diocese of Perigueux, France, founded, 1115, and famous for its possession of a relic said to be the Holy Shroud of Christ, brought from the East after the First Crusade. The abbey-church, erected to receive the relic, was consecrated, 1154. The cloister is an excellent example of Flamboyant Gothic mingled with Early Renaissance.

Cadmon or CEDMON (d. c. 670), English poet. According to St. Bede, he was attached as a laborer to the double monastery of Whitby founded by St. Hilda, 657, and was commanded in a vision to glorify God in hymns. He was thereupon urged by Hilda to take the Columban habit and entered the monastery as a lay brother. He put the history of the Old and New Testament into alliterative verses. Only one short Northumbrian hymn is now extant.

Caelestis Agni nuptias, or To be the Lamb's Celestial Bride, hymn for Vespers and Matins on 19 June, feast of St. Juliana Falconieri. It was written by Francesco M. Lorenzini (1680-1745). There are five translations. The English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Caelestis aule nuntius, or The Messenger from God's High Throne, hymn for Vespers on 7 Oct., feast of the Most Holy Rosary. It was written in the 18th century by Augustine Ricchini. There are five translations. The English title given is by A. McDougall.—Britt.

Caelestis urbs Jerusalem, or Thou Heavenly Jerusalem, hymn for Vespers and Matins on the feast of the dedication of a church. It is not known who the author was, but it was written in the 6th or 7th century. There are about 30 translations. The one given in Britt is by W. Irons; the fourth verse reads:

By many a salutary stroke,
By many a weary blow that broke,
Or polished with a workman's skill,
The stones that form that glorious pile,
They all are fitly framed to lie
In their appointed place on high.

Caeli Deus Sanctissime, or 0 God, Whose Hand Hath Spread the Sky, hymn for Vespers on Wednesday. This hymn was probably written by Pope St. Gregory the Great (540-604). There are 13 translations. The English title given is by J. Neale.—Britt.

Calicium Joseph decus, atque nostrae, or Joseph, the Praise and Glory of the Heavens, hymn for Matins on 19 March, feast of St. Joseph. It is also used in the Office of the Solemnity of St. Joseph, observed on the Wednesday preceding the third Sunday after Easter. It was written in the 17th century by an unknown author. There are six translations. The English title given is by A. McDougall.—Britt.

Ceremoniale Episcoporum, a book containing the rites and ceremonies to be observed at Mass and other functions by bishops and prelates of lower rank, treating also of the manner of precedence among ecclesiastics and official lay persons. It is obligatory in metropolitan, cathedral, and collegiate churches.—C.E.

Caerleon (Celtic, caer, fortress; Lat., legionum, of the legions: from its being the headquarters for over 200 years of the Roman Second Legion), town, Monmouthshire, England, on Usk River, associated with the legends of King Arthur. It was the seat of a bishopric, afterwards transferred to St. Davids. In 973 King Edgar was roved by eight kings at Caerleon. The remains of a Roman amphitheater are to be found here. Pop., 2000.

Cæsar, the name of all the Roman emperors from the time of Julius Cæsar to the fall of the Roman empire. It was the family name of Caius Julius Caesar. The Cæsar of Luke, 2, is Augustus; of Matthew, 22, Tiberius; of Acts, 25, Nero. (E. F. D.)

Cæsarea, se'cə-re-a, town on the east shore of the Mediterranean, about 70 m. from Jerusalem, ancient capital of Judea. St. Paul was imprisoned here for two years (Acts, 24), and from here began his journey to Rome (Acts, 27).

Cæsarius of Arles, Saint (470-543), Abp. of Arles, b. Châlons, Burgundy; d. Arles. He became Bp. of Arles in 502 and for 40 years was the foremost bishop of Gaul. Twice accused of treason by the barbarian conquerors of his episcopal city, he was finally exculpated by the Ostrogothic King Theodoric. He visited Pope Symmachus at Rome, received from him the pallium and the use of the dalmatic for the deacons of his diocese, and was made Apostolic Vicar of Gaul and Spain. He convoked an important series of councils. Prior to this he published the famous adaptation of the Roman law known as the "Breviary of Alaric," which eventually became the civil code of Gaul. He was a popular preacher, many of his sermons having come down to us. They are brief, clear, and simply expressed. He composed two religious rules, one for men which was subsequently superseded by that of St. Benedict, the other for women, which was the first of its kind. It was adopted outright by numerous monasteries of women. He added several hymns to the Divine Office. Feast, 27 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Cæsaropapism, a term used to designate the policy of kingly or civil supremacy in church affairs. In the pagan Roman Empire, the emperors were not only the civil heads of the state but also the religious heads, holding the office of Pontifex Maximus. Some Christian emperors and kings, as well as states, have endeavored to meddle in the purely ecclesiastical affairs of the Church, thus unconsciously emulating the pagan priest-emperors. Any such endeavor to encroach upon the powers of the Church, especially the executive and doctrinal powers, has come to be designated as Cæsaropapism. (C.E. XXII, 498.)

Cain, the first-born of Adam and Eve. He became a husbandman while his brother Abel tended flocks. Each offered a sacrifice to God, who accepted that of Abel and rejected that of Cain. Either Cain offered to God imperfect gifts, or in offering a part of his goods he withheld his heart. Angered by the Divine rejection Cain slew his brother; to avenge his blood God pronounced a curse against Cain, banished him to the land of Nod, and marked him with a sign as a promise of special protection in his banishment. Cain founded a city named Enoch after one of his sons.—C.E.

Cainites, a name used for the descendants of Cain, of whom nine in the direct line are mentioned in the Bible: Henoch, Irad, Mayael, Mathusael, Lamech, and Lamech's four children, Jabel and Jubal by his wife Ada, Tubal Cain and his sister Noemi by his second wife Selah.—C.E.

Caiphas (CAIAPHAS), Joseph, Jewish high priest (A.D. 18-36). As official head of the Sanhedrin, he was responsible for the travesty of a trial to which Christ was submitted by the Jewish authorities before they handed Him over to Pilate. After the Crucifixion Caiphas persecuted Christ's followers. He was deposed by the Roman authorities.—C.E.

Caithness, ancient diocese, Scotland, comprised the territory now included in the counties of Caithness and Sutherland; founded by Malcolm III, 1066; first bishop, Andrew (1150-84). Bp. Gilbert de Moray (1235-45), who built its cathedral at Dornoch in Sutherland, is regarded as a saint in the Scottish church; feast, 1 April. Andrew Stewart II (1518-42) was its last pre-Reformation bishop. Cathedral now in ruins.

Caius, 3rd-century Christian author. He held a disputation at Rome with Proclus, a Montanist leader, in the course of which he gives valuable evidence of the death of Sts. Peter and Paul at Rome and the public veneration of their remains.—C.E.

Caius (Kay or Key), John (1510-73), physician and scholar, b. Norwich, England; d. London. He lectured on anatomy, wrote medical treatises and translations and a history of Cambridge University, and was president of the College of Physicians. He re founded Gonville College, renamed Gonville and Caius College (1558). Under Edward VI he became royal physician, but was dismissed under Elizabeth because he was a Catholic.—C.E.

Cajetan (GAETANO), Saint, confessor (1480-1547), founder of the Theatines, b. Vicenza, Italy; d. Naples. He was made prothonotary Apostolic at the court of Pope Julius II in 1506 and was instrumental in effecting a reconciliation between the Holy See and the Republic of Venice. Retiring from court life in 1513 he founded a society of priests and prelates called the Oratory of Divine Love, and was himself ordained priest, 1516. On his return to his native city he founded a hospital for incurables. In 1528 he went to Rome where he established the Congregation of Clerks Regular, known as Theatines, combining the spirit of monasticism with active ministry. At Venice he became associated with St. Jerome Emiliani, whom he aided in founding another order of clerks regular, the Sons of the Virgin. Canonized, 1671. Relics in church of St. Paul, Naples. Feast, R. Cal., 7 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.
Cajetan, Tommaso De Vio Gaetani (1469-1534), cardinal, philosopher, theologian, and exegete, b. Gaeta, Italy; d. Rome. He was of noble birth, and from his youth was devout and studious, entering the Dominican Order before the age of 16. He soon attracted attention by his writings and discourses. Courageously he faced the trying issues of his day, and by tact, education and tolerance, he endeavored to appease the antagonistic, to reform the sinners, to check the spread of heresy, and to avert schism. He is one of the greatest defenders of the Thomistic School. Leo XIII ordered his commentaries to be incorporated with the text of the "Summa" in the official Leonine edition of the complete works of St. Thomas.—C.E. (R. J. M.)

Calamus (Lat., reed). (1) Fistula, or Siphon, a pipe or reed used in ancient days for the Communion of the clergy and people, a custom which survived among the Cistercians until the Reformation. Now at solemn papal high Mass, the chalice is brought from the altar to the throne of the pope where he absorbs its contents through a golden pipe. (2) In the Old Testament, a scented reed yielding perfume, used in the composition of spices burned in sacrifices (Ex., 30; Jer., 6), and in the oil of anointing (Ex. 30).

Calatrava, Military Order of, a branch of the Cistercians founded in Castile in the 12th century. The name is derived from that of a castle recovered from the Moslems by King Alfonso of Castile in 1147. At first it was composed of lay brothers of the monastery of Fitero and subject to Morimond, in Burgundy. The order was defeated by the Almohades at Alarcon in 1159 and then took the name of the new stronghold of Salvatierra which was lost to the Moslems in 1209; by the aid of foreign Crusaders Calatrava was reconquered in 1212. In the same year the order took part in the great victory of Las Navas de Tolosa, which broke the Moslem power. The name of Calatrava was resumed by the order and Calatrava la Nueva made its headquarters. Two new orders, Alcantara in Leon, and Aviz in Portugal, were founded. The last independent grand master was Lopez de Padilla (1482-1534) who fought with distinction in the last Moorish war. In 1487 Ferdinand of Aragon by a papal Bull obtained administrative authority. The canonical bond with Morimond was then relaxed and the order became secularized by release from vows of poverty and chastity. Their property was confiscated by Charles III in 1775, and general secularization was finally accomplished in 1838.—C.E.

Calbayog, Diocese of, Philippine Islands, comprises the islands of Samar, Leyte, Biliran, and Capul; area, 35,958 sq. m.; established, 1910; suffragan of Manila. Bishops: Pablo Singzon de la Annunciacion (1910-20), and Sofronio Hacbang (1923). Parishes, 87; missions, 197; priests, secular, 79; priests, regular, 25; seminary, 1; educational institutions, 6; Catholics, 1,117,308.

Calcutta, Archdiocese of, India, extends along the Bay of Bengal from the Kabadak to the Mahanadi rivers; established, 1888; suffragan sees, Dacca, Chittagong, Dinajpur, Krishnagar, Patna, and the Prefecture Apostolic of Assam; entrusted to the Society of Jesus and diocesan clergy. The Jesuits visited the region in the 16th century, towards the close of which the territory was placed under the care of the Augustinians. Archbishops: Paul Goethals (1886-1901), Brice Meulman (1902-24), and Ferdinand Perier (1924). Churches and chapels, 797; priests, secular, 25; priests, regular, 168; colleges, 2; high schools for boys, 4; schools for girls, 15; numerous mission schools; institutions, 7; Catholics, 265,940.

Caldani, Leopoldo Marco Antonio (1725-1813), anatomist and physiologist, b. Bologna; d. Padua. He is noted for his experimental studies on the function of the spinal cord and for the introduction of electricity in the physiology of the nerves. His most celebrated work is his anatomical atlas made in collaboration with his nephew.—C.E.

Calderon de la Barca, Pedro (1600-81), dramatist, b. Madrid; d. there. He attended the University of Salamanca, and after participating in the Spanish campaigns in Italy and the Netherlands, was given charge of the Buen Retiro theater in Madrid. In 1631 he was ordained priest, and became superior of the Congregation of St. Peter, 1666. His dramatic labors mark the second half of the golden age of Spanish literature and are typical of the sentiments and ideas of 17th-century Spain. His autos sacramentales (sacred allegorical dramas on the Eucharist) are unsurpassed, and his religious fervor is exemplified in his comedias de votas (sacred non-allegorical dramas) of which the most noteworthy is "The Purgatory of St. Patrick." His secular works are notable only by virtue of his lyricism; his extant publications embrace about 120 dramas and 70-80 autos.—C.E.

Caldron, emblem in art associated with St. John the Evangelist, because of the legend that, under Domitian, he was thrown into a caldron of boiling oil, but miraculously preserved.

Calefactory (Lat., colefacere, to warm). (1) The heated room in an English monastery where the monks retired occasionally to warm themselves, especially after Matins. (2) A hollow globe of precious metal containing hot water, to warm the priest's fingers when administering Holy Communion in cold weather; a silver one, gilded and carved with leaves, and weighing 931⁄2 ounces, was in use at Lincoln Cathedral in 1251.

Calendar, Christian, a liturgical cycle embracing the seasons, feasts, weeks, and days of the entire year in uninterrupted continuity. The variable and oldest part centers about Easter. The custom of celebrating Easter on the Sunday after the full moon following the vernal equinox finally prevailed. Upon the date of Easter depends the entire period from Septuagesima Sunday to Easter including Lent and Passiontide. The date of Easter also determines the whole festal period after Easter, including the Ascension and closing with Pentecost, and its octave. Furthermore it determines the following feasts that were introduced much later: Patronage of St. Joseph, Trinity Sunday, Corpus Christi, and the Sacred Heart. Like Easter, Christmas exercised an important influence upon the Christian calendar; Epiphany, 6 Jan., originally commemorated Christ's Nativity. When the commemoration was placed 25 Dec. (before 354), it determined the date of other feasts: Purification (2 Feb.); the Annunciation (25 March); and the Nativity of St. John the Baptist (24 June). The four Sundays before Christmas are counted in order as Sundays of Advent. To join Pentecost with Advent, it was determined eventually to count the Sundays of Advent period as Sundays after Pentecost. Regarding the feasts of saints fixed to almost every day of the year, those of martyrs were first added to the calendar, later also those of non-martyrs. Ancient documents containing lists of feast days are divided into calendars and martyrologies. One of the most important is the so-called Philocalian Calendar, compiled by Florus Dionysius Philocalus (354).—C. F.; Gueranger, tr. Shepherd, The Liturgical Year, Dub., 1883; Kellner, Heortology, St. L., 1908.

Calgary, Diocese of, Canada, comprises the southern part of the Province of Alberta, bounded n. by the line dividing the 30th and 31st townships, e. by the Province of Saskatchewan, s. by the U. S. border, and w. by the Province of British Columbia; established 1912; suffragan of Edmonton; Bishops: John Thomas McNally (1913-24); John Thomas Kidd (1925). Churches, 90; priests, secular, 54; priests, regular, 9; religious women, 199; college, 1; academies, 3; high school, 1; primary schools, 27; pupils in primary schools, 2930; Indian schools, 5; pupils in Indian schools, 37,900.

Calicut, Diocese of, India, comprises part of the District of Malabar; erected 1923; suffragan of Bombay; entrusted to the Jesuits; bishop, Paul Perini (1923). Churches and chapels, 17; priests, secular, 5; priests, regular, 17; religious women, 64; high schools, 6; elementary schools, 13; institutions, 9; Catholics, 8780.

California, the 2nd state of the United States in size, the 8th in population, and the 31st to be admitted to the Union, 9 Sept., 1850, which date is still a legal holiday in California, under the name of "Admission Day"; area, 186,297 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 3,429,861; Catholics (1927), 765,761. In Spanish colonial times California included also the southern part of Lower California; this never was a part of the United States, and now belongs to Mexico. As the earliest missionaries came by way of Mexico, they first evangelized Lower California, Fr. Juan Salvatierra, S.J., founding the mission of Loreto on San Dionisio Bay, 19 Oct., 1697, the first of a chain of 18 Jesuit missions in Lower California. The first mission within the limits of the present State of California was founded at San Diego, 16 July, 1769, by the Franciscan Fr. Junípero Serra, who also founded eight other missions. The Franciscans not only Christianized the Indians, but also civilized them and taught them useful trades; many non-Catholic writers, e.g., C. F. Lummis and A. Forbes, have praised the wisdom and humanity of the Franciscan system of treating the aborigines. Locations of the Missions (in the order of their foundation): San Diego, 1769, 6 m. from present city; San Carlos de Monterey (or Carmelo), 1770, near Carmel-by-the-Sea, Monterey County; San Antonio de Padua, 1771, 6 m. from Jolon, Monterey County; San Gabriel, 1771, 10 m. n. of Los Angeles; San Francisco (or Dolores), 1776, in present City of San Francisco, at Dolores and Sixteenth Streets; San Juan Capistrano, 1776, Orange County; Santa Clara, 1777, in present city; San Buenaventura, 1782, Ventura; Santa Barbara, 1786, now restored, in present city; Purisima Concepción, 1787, near Lompoc, Santa Barbara County; Santa Barbara, 1786, now restored, in present city; San José, 1791, 4 m. from present city; San Luis Obispo, 1792, now restored, in present city; San Miguel, 1797, in present city; San Fernando, 1797, Los Angeles County; San Luis Rey, 1797, now restored, in present city; San Buenaventura, 1798, now restored, in present city of Ventura, 1792, 6 m. from Sargent, San Benito County; San Miguel, 1797, in present city; San Fernando, 1797, Los Angeles County; San Luis Rey, 1797, in present city of San Diego County; Santa Inés, 1804, now restored, Santa Barbara County; San Antonio de Pala, 1816, now restored, Pala, San Diego County; San Rafael, 1817, in present city; San Francisco Solano (or Sonoma), 1823, in city of Sonoma.

The early Spanish missionaries left their mark on Californian place-names; the cities and towns existing today called after male saints (i.e., names preceded by the word "San") number over 40, e.g., San Andreas, Anselmo, Ardo, Benito, Bernardino, Bruno, Carlos, Clemente, Diego, Dimas, Fernando, Francisco, Gabriel, Geronimo, Gregorio, Jacinto, Joaquín, José, Juan Bautista, Juan Bautista, Juan Capistrano, Leandro, Lorenzo, Luces, Luis Obispo, Luis Rey, Mariano, Martin, Matías, Miguel, Onofre, Pablo, Pedro, Quintin, Rafael, Ramon, Simón, Ysidro. Names of female saints (i.e., preceded by the word "Santa") occur in about twenty places, e.g., Santa Ana, Aníta, Barbara, Clara, Margarita, María, Monica, Paula, Rosa, Susana, Ynez, Ysabel. There are also: Santa Cruz (Holy Cross), and Santa Fe (Holy Faith); the state capital is Sacramento; the largest city, Los Angeles (The Angels). Two of Our Lady's feasts are commemorated by Carmel and Concepción; other names with a religious significance are: Bethany, Camp Angelus, Cupertino, Guadalupe, Trinidad. Many of the above names, and several similar ones, occur also in California as names of counties, and of natural features such as islands, mountains, bays, rivers, etc. California is divided ecclesiastically into the Archdiocese of San Francisco (1853), and the dioceses of Los Angeles and San Diego (1850), Monterey-Fresno (1922), and Sacramento (1886). The U. S. Religious Census of 1910 gave the following statistics for church membership in California;

CALIFORNIA Missions. Missionary work in Upper California was entrusted to the Francisans, who had made several settlements in Lower California after the expulsion of the Jesuits (1767). Fr. Juniper Scra, under the direction of the Spanish inspector-general, founded, 10 July, 1760, San Diego. This noted priest labored among the natives for fifteen years, until his death in 1784, and founded eight other missions. These settlements increased rapidly and in 1823 there were 22, extending from Sonoma in the north to San Diego in the south. At each mission were established a church, a residence for the priests, a military guard, and shops and workrooms for the Indians, who were taught all kinds of useful trades. The missionaries managed the spiritual and temporal affairs, and endeavored to maintain themselves independently of the government. From 1769 till 1845, 146 Friars Minor, all priests, labored in California. The decline of these missions began in 1822, when California became part of Mexico. In 1834 the Mexican government turned them over to hired commissioners, who deprived the priests of their land, and enriched themselves with the possessions of the missions, which were utterly destroyed. Consequently the Indians, freed of the benevolent government of the friars, were scattered and many lapsed into barbarism. For enumeration and location of missions, see CALIFORNIA.—C.E.; Engelhardt, The Missions and Missionaries of California, 4 vols., San Francisco, 1908-15.

Callières, Louis Hector de (1646-1705), 13th Governor of New France, b. Cherbourg, France. Appointed governor of Montreal 1684, at the request of the Sulpicians, he aided Frontenac in saving New France from the Iroquois, and succeeded him as governor, 1698.

He is celebrated for the treaty with the Iroquois, drawn up at Montreal, 1701.—C.E.

Calligraphy (Gr., kalligraphia, beautiful handwriting), the art of fine handwriting, the greatest masters of which are found in the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. The most beautiful of these, with letters more perfect and regular than much of the machine-made type we have today, were mainly the work of monks.

Callistus I, Saint, Pope (218-223), martyr. Roman of the "gens Domitia"; d. Rome. He was an archdeacon. As pope he regulated marriage laws and granted communion to the adulterous after due penance had been undergone. Feast, R. Cal., 14 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

Callistus II (Guido, son of Count William of Burgundy), Pope (1119-24), b. Quin­gey, France; d. Rome. He was a Bene­dictine, Abp. of Vienne, and cardinal. As pope he disciplined the French clergy, decreed against investiture, simony, and concubinage of the clergy.

The question of investiture between him and Henry V was settled by the Concordat of Worms, 1122, and confirmed by the First Lateran Council, 1123. He regained a portion of the diminished Patrimony of St. Peter, and beautified Rome.—C.E.; Mann.

Callistus III (Alfonso de Borja or Borgia), Pope (1455-68); b. Xativa, Spain, 1378; d. Rome. He was bishop of Valencia, then cardinal. As pope he organized Christian E u r o p e against the Turks who were defeated at Belgrade, 1456. He revised the trial of St. Joan of Arc and had her innocence proclaimed.—C.E.; Pastor.

Callistus III, antipope. See John, Abbot of Struna.

Callmet, Dom Augustin (1672-1757), Benedictine exegete, b. near Com­mercy, France; d. Abbey of Senones, near Saint-Dié. Ordained 1898, he taught philosophy and theology and exegesis. In his "Commentary on all the Books of the Old and New Testament," he confines himself to the literal interpretation of the text. He also wrote a "History of the Old and New Testament and of the Jews, and compiled a biblical dictionary and a number of historical works. —C.E.

Calumny, (Lat., calumnia, to use artifice, deception), any deception of another, especially in judicial matters, commonly used to mean unjust damaging of another's character by imputing to him something of which he is not guilty. It is an act which varies in sinfulness according to the gravity of the fault or crime im
Calumny

Calumny, a system of religion, introduced by John Calvin, the French reformer, in opposition to Catholic teaching, the distinctive doctrines of which, in addition to his Presbyterian idea of the church, are as follows: Man, as a result of Adam's fall, has no freedom of will, but is an absolute slave of God; God as judge of his elect cannot be lost. Calvin's doctrines, which were based on the assumption that God, being Infinite, is alone a real agent, and creatures are solely His instruments, are set forth in his "Institutes." His followers split into two sects: the Supralapsarians (Lat., supra lapsum, before the fall) who agree with Calvin regarded God's decree of reprobation as absolute, and unconditioned by the Fall; the Infra lapsarians, or Sublapsarians (Lat., infra, or sub, after), regarded God's positive condemnation as consequent to and conditioned by the Fall.—C.E.

Camaldolese Order, hermits and cenobites living under a modified form of the Rule of St. Romuald by whom they were founded at Camaldoli, Italy, c. 1012. The object of the founder was to introduce into the West the eremitical life led by the Eastern monks and the Fathers of the Desert. For six centuries the order steadily increased as one community but in time it became divided into the five congregations of: the Holy Hermitage, San Michele di Murano, Monte Corona, the Congregation of Turin, and Notre Dame de Consolation (France). There are at the present date (1929) three congregations in the Camaldolese order: the Congregation of Cenobites, which possesses 3 abbeys, 2 priories, 4 parishes, and 60 religious; the Congregation of Hermits of Etruria, comprising 7 residences and 65 religious; and the Congregation of Hermits of Norfolk. Each of these communities consists of a small number of monks living in cells and occupying a house purchased for them by the Duke of Norfolk. St. Benet's or Peterhouse, with 10 houses, 1 novitiate, and 180 religious.—C.E.

Cournouille, Paul (1849-1929), Jesuit missionary and geologist, native of Pau, France. He served in the Franco-Prussian war, and was sent later to Madagascar to do missionary work. Here he made valuable investigations on the large Madagascar spiders and discovered the silk thread spun by them. He devised a portable contrivance on which to roll the webs of the spider, and the work of spinning and weaving was undertaken by the Ecole Professionelle at Tananarivo.

Cambrai, League of, name given to league formed in 1508 between Pope Julius II, Louis XII of France, Ferdinand of Aragon, and Emperor Maximilian I. Accused of Venice. Victory of Agnadello was gained by allies over Venetians in 1509.—Pastor.

Cambrai, Peace of, the so-called Ladies' Peace, negotiated in 1529 by Louise of Savoy, mother of Francis I of France, and Margaret of Austria, aunt of Emperor Charles V. According to the terms Francis renounced his claims upon Italy, Burgundy, and Artois and paid indemnity; Charles released the French princes and agreed not to press claims upon Burgundy at once.—Hayes, History of Modern Europe, N. Y., 1925.

Cambridge, University of, England. The actual date of its foundation is unknown, but in the 13th century religious orders began settling at Cambridge and attracted numerous students, the Benedictines establishing the first college, St. Peter's or Peterhouse, in 1284. The university was incorporated under Queen Elizabeth, 1571, and was an Anglican institution until 1881, when all religious tests were abolished except for degrees in divinity. Thirteen of the existing colleges, which are listed below, are of Catholic foundation.

Colleges. St. Catherine's, founded 1473 by Dr. Robert Woodlark (Wodelarke). Christ's, founded 1505 by Lady Margaret Beaufort, mother of Henry VII, incorporating God's House, established by William Bingham, 1439, and refounded by Henry VI, 1448. Clare, known as University Hall, founded 1326, endowed 1538 by Elizabeth de Burgh, Con- cess of Clare, and noted for a strong ecclesiastical tendency. Corpus Christi (called Corpus), founded 1352, by the guilds of Corpus Christi and of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and known in early times as St. Benet's from the church connected with the Corpus guild, which served as the college chapel for nearly three centuries. It has a famous collec-

Camel (KAMEL), GEORGE JOSEPH (1661-1706), botanist, b. Brünn, Moravia; d. Manila. He entered the Society of Jesus as a lay brother, 1682, and in 1688, was sent to the Philippines as a missionary.

He made valuable investigations of the plants and natural history of the islands which were published in the "Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society," and wrote an extensive work on "Medicinal Plants of the Philippines." A genus of evergreen shrubs is named in his honor Camellia.—C.E.

Camerlengo (It., chamberlain), title borne at Rome by three ecclesiastics: (1) The Camerlengo of the Holy Roman Church administers the property and revenue of the Holy See, verifies the death of the pope, directs the preparations for the conclave, and manages the same. (2) The Camerlengo of the Sacred College administers all fees and revenues belonging to the College of Cardinals, pontificates at the requiem Mass for a deceased cardinal, and is charged with the registry of the Consistorial Acts. (3) The Camerlengo of the Roman Clergy is elected by the canons and parish priests of Rome. He presides over the ecclesiastical conferences of the parochial clergy and acts as arbiter in all questions of precedence.—C.E.

Camerones, group of Scotch Covenanters under the leadership of Richard Cameron who separated from the Scotch Presbyterian Church. Cameronian Societies were organized c. 1681 to maintain the Presbyterian form of worship. Wishing to restore the ecclesiastical order which had existed between 1639 and 1649, they strictly upheld the National Covenant of 1650 and the Solemn League and Covenant of 1643, being dissatisfied with the moderate character of the religious settlement of 1690. Some of the congregations seceded in 1820. It first came into prominence as a criminal association under the Bourbons, c. 1830. A highly organized body, its membership embraced all ranks of society, and by 1848 it had assumed considerable proportions as a corrupt political organization. It controlled the municipal government of Naples until conditions became so notorious that the Italian government was compelled to make an investigation in 1860. As a result the Honest Government League, which was instrumental in overthrowing the Camorra as a political machine, was formed. The society then reverted to its former status and gained extraordinary power. It extended its field of activity to the United States, particularly to New York City, where the Calabrian Camorra operated widely in conjunction with the Black Hand Society. For the most part its crimes were confined to members of the Italian race who were too terrorized to complain to American authorities, but the notoriety attendant upon several kidnapping and murder cases in New York, 1911-12, brought about its suppression by the government. No trace of the Camisards could be found in the French Court, and although they fled to England they were soon wiped out. A band of Catholics known as the Cadets of the Cross or White Camisards, organized to check the black Camisards, eventually fell into law and order and were disowned by Montrevel.—C.E.

Camisard, kam-i'zard (probably from Fr., camise, a black blouse worn as a uniform), a sect of French Protestant fanatics influenced by the literature and preaching of the French Calvinists, who originated after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes (1685), and existed in the beginning of the 18th century. In defense of their civil and religious liberties they started an insurrection in the Camisard style and diction and is remarkable for his lyrics, but less noteworthy for his dramas.—C.E.

Camorra, a Neapolitan secret society with et­­torialism as its aim, founded originally as a fraternal organization among convicts, c. 1820. It first came into prominence as a criminal association under the Bourbons, c. 1830. A highly organized body, its membership embraced all ranks of society, and by 1848 it had assumed considerable proportions as a corrupt political organization. It controlled the municipal government of Naples until conditions became so notorious that the Italian government was compelled to make an investigation in 1860. As a result the Honest Government League, which was instrumental in overthrowing the Camorra as a political machine, was formed. The society then reverted to its former status and gained extraordinary power. It extended its field of activity to the United States, particularly to New York City, where the Calabrian Camorra operated widely in conjunction with the Black Hand Society. For the most part its crimes were confined to members of the Italian race who were too terrorized to complain to American authorities, but the notoriety attendant upon several kidnapping and murder cases in New York, 1911-12, brought about its suppression by the government. No trace of the historic Camorra remains, although the name still exists in Italian prisons where the older criminals exact fees known as camorra from the newcomers.—C.E.
Campanile, kām-pān'ī-lē (LL., campana, bell), the form of bell tower which was developed by Lombard architects and has prevailed in Italy; usually a tall slender tower, more or less detached from the church, without buttresses and crowned with a turret containing the belfry chamber. The town hall of Siena is an example of civic building with campanile. The same general proportions were preserved at the Renaissance. Celebrated campaniles are found in Cremona, Florence, Pisa, and Venice.—C.E., Vol. II, p. 394.

Campbell, James (1812-93), lawyer, b. Philadelphia; d. there. Nominated for judge of the supreme court, he was defeated by anti-Catholic prejudice, but became attorney-general of Pennsylvania, and postmaster-general in Pierce's cabinet, 1853. He was a member of the board of city trustees, Philadelphia, president of the board of trustees of Jefferson Medical School for 25 years, and for 45 years vice-president of St. Joseph's Orphan Asylum.—C.E., XVI, 16.

Campbell, Thomas (1848-1925), writer, b. New York; d. Monroe, N. Y. Educated at St. Francis Xavier's College, N. Y., he entered the Jesuit novitiate near Montreal, 1867, and after teaching at various colleges of the order, studied theology at Louvain, 1878-82, where he was ordained. He was provincial of the Maryland-New York Province, 1888-93, twice rector of Fordham University, 1885-88 and 1896-1901, associate editor of "The Messenger of the Sacred Heart," 1901-08, and editor of "America," 1910-14. He was the author of "Pioneer Priests of North America," "Names of God," a translation from Lusias, "Pioneer Laymen of North America," "Various Discourses," a collection of sermons, and the important historical work, "The Jesuits."

Campeggio, kām-pej'ō, LORENZO (c. 1472-1539), cardinal, canonist, ecclesiastical diplomat, and reformer, b. Bologna; d. Rome. After the death of his wife, 1509, he entered the ecclesiastical state and was appointed Bp. of Feltrè, 1512, and auditor of the Rota. He was nominated cardinal, 1517, while in Germany on a diplomatic mission to Maximilian I; the following year he was sent on a similar embassy to Henry VIII of England, sharing his legatine powers with Card. Wolsey. Under Pope Adrian VI he instigated the reform of the Curia. Clement VII appointed him to the See of Bologna and sent him as cardinal legate to Germany, but he was unsuccessful in checking the spread of Lutheranism. In 1528 he was sent to England to form jointly with Wolsey a court to try the divorce suit of Henry VIII. He endeavored to bring about the reconciliation of Henry and Catherine, and postponed a final decision, the case being reserved to the Holy See. He subsequently accompanied Charles V to the Diet of Augsburg as legate. He was appointed to the See of Prænesta by Paul III, and was sent to Viterbo for the opening of the Council of Trent.—C.E.

Canada, kā'nā, city of Galilee, Palestine, near Nazareth, the scene of Our Lord's first miracle (John, 2) and His cure of the ruler's son (John, 4) and the birthplace of Nathaniel or St. Bartholomew (John, 21). The miracle of the marriage feast of Cana which has made the city forever famous, when Christ turned water into wine, was performed before His public life had fully begun, and is one of the best-authenticated of Our Lord's miracles. His attendance at the marriage feast has always been taken as setting His seal on the sanctity of marriage.—C.E.

Canada, self-governing dominion of the British Empire in North America; area, 9,172,258 sq. m.; est. pop., 9,519,220. Missionary work in Canada was introduced by Franciscan Recollects in 1615 and continued by Jesuits and Sulpicians. When English rule was established in 1629 all the missionaries withdrew to France but returned in 1632 when Canada was restored to France. Missions were started at Trois Rivières (Three Rivers) andMiscou; the College of Quebec was opened in 1635, and Gaspé, Acadia, and Cape Breton were evangelized. Among the saints and martyrs of the country, the most famous are the five Jesuit missionaries whose heroic lives and stirring martyrdoms warranted their beatification in 1923. They are Blessed John de Brébeuf, Gabriel Lalemant, Anthony Daniel, Charles Garnier, and Noel Chabanel. The first Ursulines and a band of nursing sisters settled in Quebec about 1639, and in 1653 Marguerite Bourgeois founded the Congregation of Notre Dame at Montreal. In 1659 Mgr. de Laval was appointed Vicar Apostolic of New France and became first Bp. of Quebec in 1674. The Jesuit Fr. Allouez travelled as far as Lake Superior in 1664 and there organized two missions. At Sault Sainte Marie the cross was planted by Frs. Dablon and Marquette, the western shores of Lake Huron were evangelized by the Jesuits, and Fr. d'Albanel penetrated to Hudson Bay. The Iroquois missions south of Lake Ontario were reorganized by the Jesuits, who built the permanent mission of "La Prairie de la Madeleine," the home of Catherine Tekakwitha for many years. It was from Canada that Louis Joliet and Fr. Marquette set out on the trip which resulted in the discovery of the Mississippi River. By the Treaty of Paris, 1763, Canada was ceded to England. For a time under the new rulers, Catholic interests were menaced and ecclesiastical property was confiscated, but by the Quebec Act of 1774 and the Constitutional Act of 1791, the religious orders were confirmed in the possession of their estates, freedom of worship was granted to Catholics, and the collection of the customary tithes was permitted to the clergy. In 1819 Joseph Octave Plessis became the first Canadian archbishop. The union of Upper and Lower Canada was accomplished in 1840, marking a forward step in the growth of the Church. The shrine of St. Anne de Beaupré (q.v.) is a famous place of pilgrimage. Since 1899 Canada has had an Apostolic delegate who resides in Ottawa.

Canada included in 1829 the following ecclesiastical divisions: archdioceses of Edmonton, Halifax, Kingston, Montreal, Ottawa, Quebec, Regina,
When the faithful met before dawn or in the gloom, it is an emblem of God, the All-Pure, the Giver of life and enlightenment. It represents Our Saviour, "the Light of the World." Wax is spotless, and typifies Christ's spotless Body. The wick enclosed in the wax is an image of His Soul. The candle-flame is a figure of the Divine Nature united to the human in one Divine Person. Candles are blessed solemnly, 2 Feb., the feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin. In pagan times this was a festival-day, with processions and lights in honor of the gods. The Church chose it for the blessing of candles because on that day Mary made an offering in the Temple, and because the prophet Simeon foretold that her Son would be "a light to the revelation of the Gentiles." This day is often called Candelmas Day, i.e., the Mass of the Candles. The blessing may be imparted, when desired, on other days. Candles are used at the administration of all the sacraments that are given publicly; at Mass, in varying numbers; at other Church services; and on many other occasions.—C.E.; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N.Y., 1917.

Candlemas. See Purification.

Candlestick, a symbol of the Holy Eucharist; often depicted with a Host above it. Rubrical law prescribes that six great candlesticks be permanently stationed on the main altar, three on either side of the central crucifix. This custom dates from the 16th century, though there is evidence of candlesticks in use as early as the 9th century. An altar candlestick consists of five parts, the foot, stem, knob about the middle of the stem, bowl to receive the drippings of wax, and the pricket, i.e., the sharp point that terminates the stem on which the candle is fixed.—C.E. (J. P. S.)

Candlemas, name applied in early Christian times to a hanging chandelier for lamps, e.g., that presented by Constantine to the Lateran, Rome. Sometimes these chandeliers stood before the altar. In the Middle Ages, the term was used to denote seven-branched candlesticks, e.g., the Candelabrum of Reims and the "Virgin's Tree" of Milan, made in imitation of the candlestick of the Jewish Temple.

Candle, BLESSED, an important sacramental of the Church, used in all the services of her liturgy. It must be of yellow or unbleached beeswax, or more than 50 per cent thereof; bleached wax or other material is not permitted unless the proper kind is obtainable. The use of lights in worship is older than the Church. Among the furnishings of the tabernacle of Moses and the Jewish Temple there was a seven-branched candlestick; and among pagans the use of lights in services and processions was common. In the Christian Church they were first employed to dispel darkness when the faithful met before dawn or in the gloom of the catacombs; but their beautiful symbolic meaning was soon recognized, and the custom of blessing them for Church services and private use is traceable back to an early period. Light is pure, penetrates darkness, fosters life, moves with incredible velocity, and illumines all around it. Therefore it is an emblem of God, the All-Pure, the Giver of life and enlightenment. It represents Our Saviour, "the Light of the World." Wax is spotless, and typifies Christ's spotless Body. The wick enclosed in the wax is an image of His Soul. The candle-flame is a figure of the Divine Nature united to the human in one Divine Person. Candles are blessed solemnly, 2 Feb., the feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin. Candlestick, Apocalyptic. St. John is shown in the Apocalypse (Apoc., 1) seven golden candlesticks, and in the midst of them one like to the Son of man, holding in His right hand seven stars. The candlesticks are the seven churches of Asia; the stars, the angels of those churches.

Canice (KENNY), SAINT, confessor (c. 515-600), b. Glengiven, in the present County Kerry, Ireland; d. Aghaboe. He studied under St. Finian at Clonard, 548, and at Glassevin under St. Mobbii, 544. In 546 he was ordained priest in the Monastery of Llanearvan, Glamorganshire, and went to Rome for the papal blessing. In 550 he was again at Glengiven and in 565 went to Scotland where he built cells, an oratory and a monastery, and is known as St. Kenneth. His Irish foundations were Drumachose, Kilkenny West, and the great Abbey of Aghaboe. He wrote a commentary on the Gospel, known as Glas-Chainingh, Patron of Kilkenny. Feast, 11 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

Educated at Salamanca and the College of St. Gregory, Valladolid, he taught philosophy and theology, obtaining the first chair of theology at Alcalá, and succeeding his former master, Francis de Victoria, at Salamanca, 1546. He rendered important service in the deliberations and achievements of the Council of Trent. In 1552 Charles V presented him for the bishopric of the Canary Islands, but he resigned soon after. Cannon, (Gr., kanon, rule), a practical law or rule of guidance; a standard, or criterion; a catalog or list of such rules. In art, an established rule. In biblical usage, the official catalog of inspired writings known as the Old and New Testament (see Canon of the Holy Scriptures). In ecclesiastical usage, a short dogmatic definition, with an anathema attached, made by a general council; a rule of the Church (see Canon Law; Canon Law, New Code of); the fundamental part of the Mass, coming after the Offertory (see Canon of the Mass); the rules of religious orders and the books comprising these rules; the catalog of canonized saints; certain ecclesiastical persons (see Canons, Chapters of; Canon Penitentary; Canons and Canonesses Regular; Canons Regular of St. Augustine; Canons Regular of the Immaculate Conception; Canons Regular of the Lateran). In music, a composition consisting of the imitation or repetition of the same melody by one or more voices in turn, in such a manner as to produce harmony. In printing, a size of type almost equal to four-line pica; 48-point type; it is said to be so called because it was used for printing the Canon of the Mass and church books.

Canoness, the title first given in the 8th century to women of a community of women professing the common life yet not fully observing the Rule of St. Augustine. The term corresponds to that of canon, the origin and rules being common to both. Among the canonesses, differences in the observance of the rule gave rise to a distinction between regular and secular canonesses.—C.E.

Canonesses Regular of the Holy Sepulcher, an ancient order, connected by tradition with St. James the Less and the first establishment of holy women in Jerusalem. St. Helena is said to have been a member. The earliest date on record, however, is that of the foundation of the Saragossa monastery, 1276. Their first definite appearance dates from the establishment of Kinroy in Lower Germany, in 1460, followed by that of Liége, Belgium, in 1496. A great revival in the West, begun with the foundation at Charleville, France, in 1622, gave rise to the English community, in 1642. The Canonesses took possession of their present historic home, New Hall, at Chelmsford, England, in 1799, having been driven from France by the Revolution. The Order follows the Rule of St. Augustine and, although contemplative, admits of educational work and the conducting of retreats. The Order has, approximately, 20 houses, including schools, in England, Holland, Spain, Germany, Belgium, and Africa. There is no general mother-house of the order, each country having its own administration. The total number of religious probably exceeds 300.

Canonicals, the vestments or ecclesiastical garments ordered by church law to be worn by the clergy while officiating.

Canonist, an authority on ecclesiastical law.

Canonization (M.L., canonizare, to canonize), declaration of the Sovereign Pontiff that the faithful should venerate as a Saint one who had already been beatified. Beatification permits veneration of the Blessed one in certain places or communities; canonization commands it everywhere. The decree is issued only after the Congregation of Rites has accepted proof of two miracles through the intercession of the Blessed who had been formally beatified, occurring after the beatification and of three miracles for one whose beatification had taken place without the ordinary process. The Saint is now entitled to the full honors of the altar, though the Mass and Office may not be extended to the entire Church. The canonization is solemnly celebrated in St. Peter's and a solemn novena or triduum is made in another church of the city chosen for this purpose; this solemn service may be held elsewhere within a given time following the canonization.—C.E., II, 364.

Canon Law, the statutes and regulations enacted by the highest church authorities for the government (M.L., canonizare, to canonize), declaration of the Sovereign Pontiff that the faithful should venerate as a Saint one who had already been beatified. Beatification permits veneration of the Blessed one in certain places or communities; canonization commands it everywhere. The decree is issued only after the Congregation of Rites has accepted proof of two miracles through the intercession of the Blessed who had been formally beatified, occurring after the beatification and of three miracles for one whose beatification had taken place without the ordinary process. The Saint is now entitled to the full honors of the altar, though the Mass and Office may not be extended to the entire Church. The canonization is solemnly celebrated in St. Peter's and a solemn novena or triduum is made in another church of the city chosen for this purpose; this solemn service may be held elsewhere within a given time following the canonization.—C.E., II, 364.

Canon Law, the statutes and regulations enacted by the highest church authorities for the government of ecclesiastical affairs.—C.E., IX, 56.

Canon Law, New Code of, the authentic compilation of the discipline of the Catholic Church which was officially promulgated by Pope Benedict XV, 27 May, 1917, and became binding throughout the Western Church 19 May, 1918. The Church has from Christ the power to legislate. She has exercised this in the course of centuries according to the varying conditions of society. In the 15th century especially canon law became the object of scientific study and different compilations were made by the Roman pontiffs. The most important of these were the Five Books of the Decretals of Gregory IX and the Sixth of Boniface VIII. Legislation grew with time. Some of it became obsolete and contradictions crept in so that it became difficult in recent times to discover what was of obligation and where to find the law on a particular question. When the Vatican Council met in 1869 a number of bishops of different countries petitioned for a new compilation of church law that would be clear and easily studied. The council never finished its work and no attempt was made to bring the legislation up to date. Finally, Pope Pius X in his Letter, 19 March, 1904, announced his intention of revising the unwieldy mass of past legislation and appointed a commission of cardinals and learned consultants to undertake this difficult work. The Catholic universities of the world and the bishops of all countries were asked to cooperate. The scholars began the work and a copy of the first draft was sent to the bishops for suggestions. In 1916 the New Code was completed and on Pentecost Sunday, 1917, officially promulgated. In order however to grant sufficient time for the study of the New Code the pope allowed a respite of a year. On Pentecost Sunday, 19 May, 1918, it became operative.

The New Code is divided into five books. The first treats of general rules; the second of ecclesiastical persons; the third of sacred things such as sacraments, altars, etc.; the fourth of canonical trials; and the last of crimes and punishments. The whole Code contains 2414 canons. For the most part past legislation has been retained; in some cases the law modified, and in others entirely new. As the Code is not always easy of interpretation, Pope Benedict XV, in 1917, established a special commission with authority to interpret it. This body alone can give the authentic interpretation. The Code is universal in binding power in the Latin Church, and is authoritative and the only books of universal legislation. It clears up many disputed points and has in view order, peace, and sanctity of life.—C.E. Suppl.; P.C. Augustine; Woywood; ayrinac.

Canon of the Holy Scriptures, the official catalog of inspired writings, known as the Old and New Testament. Before the close of the 4th century there was much uncertainty concerning this list of Divinely-inspired books, due to conflicting Jewish and Christian traditions. For the O.T. the Jews distinguished the books contained in the Hebrew Bible (see PROTOCANSIONAL) from the additional writings (see DEUTEROANCANONICAL) preserved by the Jews of Alexandria in their venerated Greek version, the Septuagint. Early Christian writers bear witness to a widespread influence of this distinction within the Church, until official decrees established uniformity regarding the extent of the canon. The formation of the N.T. canon also shows a gradual development. The earliest collections of the Apostolic writings were made for the purpose of public reading in the churches (Col., 4). However, since other edifying books were also so used by the first Christians, the special Divine character of some of the inspired writings was lost sight of in the approved reading-lists. Thus the Muratorian Canon (c. A.D. 170) mentions all the N.T. books, except Hebrews, James, and probably 1 and 2 Peter, but also includes, with reservations, the apocryphal Apocalypse of Peter and the Shepherd of Hermas. Forgeries of heretics under the imputed authorship of one or the other of the Apostles, as well as erroneous interpolations into the sacred text, made the faithful suspicious and, as a result, doubt was for some time cast upon the following books and passages: Hebrews; James; Jude; 2 Peter; 2 and 3 John; Apocalypse; Mark, 16, 9-20; Luke, 22, 42-44; and John, 7, 53, to 8, 11. The oldest extant catalog which includes all the canonical books is that of St. Athanasius (39th Festival Letter in 307).

The first official decision concerning the canon of the Holy Scriptures was given at a Roman synod under the Damasus in 382; providing without distinction the entire list of our present canon. In the same manner the Synod of Hippo in 392 and the Third Council of Carthage in 397 accepted the complete canon. In a letter to Exuperius, Bp. of Toulouse, Pope Innocent I in 405 pronounced in favor of all the books. The question of a distinction was again discussed during the Council of Florence, whereupon Pope Eugene IV published a Bull, 1441, in which he attributed the inspiration of the same Holy Ghost to all the books received by the Church. With an appeal to these earlier voices, the Fathers of the Council of Trent in their famous decree of 8 April, 1546, definitely declared as "sacred and canonical" all the books of the Old and New Testament contained in the Vulgate, listing them as follows. Of the O.T.: the five books of Moses; Josue; Judges; Ruth; four books of Kings; two of Paralipomenon; two of Esdras; Tobias; Judith; Esther; Job; the Psalter; Proverbs; Ecclesiastes; Canticle of Canticles; Wisdom; Ecclesiasticus; Isaies; Jeremiah with Baruch; Ezechiel; Daniel and the Apocalypse of Machabees. Of the N.T.: the four Gospels; the Acts of the Apostles; 14 Epistles of the Apostle Paul; two Epistles of Peter the Apostle; three Epistles of John the Apostle; one of James the Apostle; one of Jude the Apostle; and the Apocalypse of John the Apostle. The Protestant reformers of the 16th century adhered to the nart of the Old Testament contained in the Vulgate, and in the N.T. rejected Hebrews, James, Jude, and the Apocalypse. Modern Protestant Bibles, however, usually contain all the N.T. books.

Canon of the Mass, the most solemn part of the Mass in which the Body and Blood of Christ is offered in the Consecration and change of the bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ. It begins with an oblation and prayer for all the faithful, followed by commemorations of the living, and of the saints, a renewal of the oblation, the Consecration, a further offering of the consecrated species, a commemoration of the departed, recommendation of the priest and clergy, the Last Rites, the Invocation to the Lamb of God, prayers before the Communion, and the consumption of the sacred species. In certain liturgies it is called the Action of the Mass, because during it the great Act of Sacrifice occurs. The essential part, the Consecration, has always been the same from the time of the Apostles. The present arrangement of the ceremonies and prayers dates with very slight change from the 6th century.—Guéranger, tr. Shepherd, The Holy Mass, N.Y.

Canon Penitentiary (Lat., penitentia, penance), a member of the chapter of cathedral or collegiate churches, who acts as a general confessor of the diocese. He has ordinary jurisdiction in the internal forum, which power, however, he may not delegate to others, and may absolve residents and strangers in the diocese and subjects of the diocese also outside of same. His power extends also to sins and censures reserved to the bishop. The office of general confessor is foreshadowed in the early history of penitential discipline. Distinct legislation concerning the office is found in the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), but especially in the Council of Trent (1545-63).—P.C. Augustine. (H. L. M.)

Canons, Apostolic, an ancient collection of ecclesiastical decrees concerning the government and discipline of the Church.—C.E.

Canons, Chapters or (Gr., kanon, rule), bodies of clerics instituted for the purpose of celebrating Divine worship with greater solemnity or to assist the bishop in ecclesiastical government. These clerics may be canons secular or regular, exempt or non-exempt, major (cathedral) or minor (collegiate church) according to the chapter to which they belong. They are governed by general and particular legislation. Their origin is found in the presbytery of the early centuries. The principal development of canon chapters received its impetus from the Carolingian period, Charlemagne demanding that clerics live either in monasteries or in chapters. Louis the Pious enacted legislation to a similar effect. The 13th century brought this institute to its juridical maturity.—C.E., III, 252.

Canons and Canonesses Regular. Canons regular are clerics who live in community, performing work relating to the Divine mysteries, and presided over by one of their own order. Most canons regular follow the rule which St. Augustine gave to his own clergy, hence their name Austin Canons. They date their institute from Apostolic times, claiming to have been founded by Christ Himself, though this seems to mean only that the various groups of canons established at different times adopted a mode of life like that of the Apostles. They include the Canons Regular of St. Augustine, the Canons Regular of the Immaculate Conception, and the Canons Regular of the Lateran. Canonesses regular are congregations of religious women similar to the canons regular, following the Rule of St. Augustine, sometimes modified according to local conditions. They include the Canonesses Regular of the Lateran, the Canonesses Regular of the Holy Sepulcher, and the Canonesses Regular of St. Augustine of the Congregation of Notre Dame. Engaged chiefly in educational work, they have convents in France, Spain, Italy, the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxemburg, Germany, Hungary, England, Africa, the United States, Brazil, and Canada. The Congregation of the Poor Sisters of the Schools of Notre Dame, founded, 1809, by Bishop Wittman in Bavaria, has spread throughout Europe and America.—C.E.

Canons Regular of St. Augustine are divided into two congregations: the Congregation of St. Augustine, St. Bernard, and St. Nicholas, and that of the Abbey Nullius of Agaunum. The former, established by St. Bernard of Menthon, c. 1004, is in charge of the hospice of Reat St. Bernard and Simplon. An agricultural school, a tuberculosis sanatorium, and parochial duties also engage the canons. Since the 12th century the Abbey Nullius of St. Maurice of Agaunum, the oldest monastery in the world, has been under the care of the canons regular, who engage in teaching and parochial duties. See CANONS AND CANONNOSES REGULAR.

Canons Regular of the Holy Cross (Crosiers), religious order founded, 1211, by Bl. Théodore de Celtes at Clair-Lieu, near Huy, Belgium. The members of this order follow the Rule of St. Augustine and have as their patroness St. Odilia. They give missions and retreats, assist the secular clergy, and educate young men for the priesthood. In a short time the society spread to France, the Netherlands, Germany, and England. During the 16th century the houses in England were destroyed; at the time of the Reformation all but two of the Dutch houses were despooled; and during the French Revolution the order was expelled from France and Belgium. The two remaining convents in Holland were forbidden by King William to admit any novices. His successor retracted this edict (1840) and from that time the order commenced to flourish again. A province was formed in Canada, three large branches were established in Belgium, the convent of Uden, Holland, was completely restored, and the mother-house at St. Agatha, Holland, was rebuilt. To these canons belongs the privilege granted to them by Leo X and confirmed by Leo XIII of blessing beads with an indulgence of 500 days, called the Crosier indulgence. To the members of the province of Canada is entrusted the Diocese of Chittagong. Statistics: 9 convents; 200 religious.—C.E.

Canons Regular of the Immaculate Conception, a congregation founded, 1866, at St.-Antoine, France, by the Abbé Dom Adrien Gréa, to combine the practises of ordinary religious life with the duties of the clerical state, and for the education of young clerics. St.-Antoine is the mother-house, but after the passage of the law banishing religious orders from France, the community was transferred to Andora Stazione, province of Genoa, Italy. The congregation has houses in France, Switzerland, Italy, Scotland, and Canada, and more than 100 religious.—C.E.

Canons Regular of the Lateran originated when the clergy of the Roman Basilica of St. John Lateran adopted the Augustinian discipline in 492 under Gelasius, disciple of St. Augustine. Known as the Congregation of the Holy Saviour, the canons served the Lateran until c. 1472 when they were replaced by secular canons, though they retained their title and certain privileges. In addition to canonical duties, they serve pilgrims, tend the sick, teach, and preach. The order spread to Italy, Poland, France, Belgium, Spain, and America. In 1910 they numbered 12 abbeys, 5 priories, and 250 religious subject to the Abbé General at Rome. An affiliated congregation founded in Austria, 1140, numbered, in 1917, 7 abbeys and 334 religious.

The Canons Regular of Reno were united to the Lateran Congregation in 1823.—C.E., III, 293.

Canopy (Gr., konops, guat: originally used as a protection against insects), an ornamental covering of cloth, stone, wood, or metal, used to crown an altar, throne, pulpit, statue, etc. In liturgical use: the structure covering an altar, called also baldachinum (q.v.); the covering suspended over the throne occupied by dignitaries of the Church or princes; the covering, always white, under which the Blessed Sacrament is sometimes borne in processions. For transporting the Blessed Sacrament from one altar to the other, or for taking the Holy Via­ tium to the sick, it is customary in some places to use a small canopy with a single staff. Relics excepting rarely those of the True Cross or some instrument of the Passion are not carried under a canopy in processions. A processional canopy is used for a bishop at his solemn reception into his cathedral city and when he makes his first pastoral visit to any town or parish within his jurisdiction.

Canossa, a castle of Matilda, Countess of Tuscany, 12 m. from Reggio, where Henry IV of Germany did penance in presence of Pope Gregory VII (Jan., 1077). Henry, who had been excommunicated and whose excesses had prompted his subjects to demand his deposition, took the initiative of meeting the pope, who, hearing of his coming, but not knowing his intentions, had taken refuge at Can­ ossa. After waiting three days in the garb of a penitent, Henry was received back into the Communion of the Church, but subsequent events proved he was not sincere. Canossa is now in ruins, the castle-well and “gate of penance” alone
remain.—C.E. (F. P. D.)

Canova, Antonio (1757-1822), sculptor, b. Possagno, Italy; d. Venice. A student in Venice and Rome, the latter city inspired his efforts to revive classic art after the decadent period of Bernini. Of his statuary three well-known examples are the “Thesuses” of the Vatican, the “Persuas” of the Belvo­ dere, and the “Cup and Psyche” of the Louvre. He designed the colossal tomb of Clement XIII in St. Peter’s, and that of Clement XIV in the church of the Santi Apostoli. A later work was the elaborate tomb of the Archduchess Maria Christina, in the Augustinian church in Vienna. His portrait busts included those of Pius VII and Napoleon.—C.E.

Cantata (It., story set to music), musical term originally used for a vocal composition in the 17th century when instrumental music was coming into use. At first it commuted an arrangement for one or two voices, later a group of arias joined by recitative. It is now applied almost exclusively to choral music in general. The church music of Giacomo Carissimi (1604-74) is an excellent example of the earlier type of cantata.

Canterbury, ancient diocese, the mother-church and primatial see of all England, from 597 to the death of Card. Pole, the sixty-eighth and last Catholic archbishop. The first bishop was St. Augustine (597-604), and the first English bishop was Deus­ dedit (655-664). At one time there were 22 suffragan sees, and the archbishop had the right of crowning and anointing the sovereign. The cathed­ dral, begun by St. Augustine, was burned in 1067, and the restoration completed in 1495. The list of prelates includes: St. Theodore (668-690); St.
Dunstan (960-988); Stigand (1052-70), last of the Saxons; Lanfranc (1070-89); St. Thomas of Canterbury, martyr (1162-70); Stephen Langton (1207-28); St. Edmund Rich (1234-40); Card. Pole
(d. on the day of Elizabeth’s accession, 1558).

Canthurus, a large two-handled drinking cup;
the upper basin of a fountain. In an early Christian basilica the canthurus or phiala was the fountain of ablutions. In the Liber Pontificalis, used for a chandelier fed with oil.

Canticle (Lat., canticum, song), in the Divine Office, a sacred chant or prayer from Scripture apart from the Psalms, to which it bears a resemblance, however, in structure and poetic form.
Scriptural canticles have found a place in the Office from the earliest times. The present Roman Brevisary contains 14 canticles from the Old Testament arranged for use at Lauds throughout the week, supplying the place of the fourth Psalm:

Audite cæli, quo loquor. Canticle of Moses, Dent, (II).

Audite verbum Domini, Genes. Canticle of the Three Children, Dan., 3, 52-57 and 56.

ticle of Habacuc, Hab., 3, 1-12.
The Breviary also contains three canticles from the New Testament, the Benedictus, Magnificat, and Nunc Dimittis, respectively recited each day at Lauds, Vespers, and Compline:

Benedictus Dominus, Deus Canticle of Zachary. Luke, Israel, 1, 68-79. At Lauds, daily Blessed be the Lord God of throughout the year.

Israel.

Magnificat anima mea Dom- Canticle of the Blessed Virgin, My soul doth magnify the pers throughout the year. Luke, 1, 46-55. At Vespers daily throughout the year.

inum. My soul doth magnify the Lord.

Dominum, 29-32. At Compline daily throughout the year. On 2 February, Feast of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin or Candlemas, at the blessing of the candles.

The Benedictus, Magnificat, and Nunc Dimittis are called the "evangelical canticles," since they are taken from the Gospel of St. Luke. In addition to these 17 canticles the Roman Breviary also includes under canticles the "Quicumque vult salvus esse" or Creed of St. Athanasius (Psalter, Sunday, at Prime). There are many canticles in Scripture besides the ones mentioned above. The "Te Deum," formerly included among the canticles in the Roman Breviary, is now placed among the hymns. The "Gloria in excelsis," the "Trisagion," and the "Gloria Patri" (the Lesser Doxology) have at times been added to these by different writers. The Greek Office uses 13 canticles differently arranged than those in the Roman Office. The term canticle is applied variously in Protestant churches.—C.E.

Canticle of Canticles, the 24th book of the O.T. as found in the Catholic Bible. It is an allegorical poem which expresses: basically, the predilection of the Lord for the Chosen People; prophetically, the betrothal of Christ with His Church; universally, the love of God for a devoted soul; accommodatively, in the liturgy of the Church, the delight of God in the soul of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Protestant versions call it Song of Solomon or Song of Songs. But Catholics name it "Canticle" rather than "Song" to distinguish it as a liturgical song, and Canticle of Canticles to describe it as the superlative song. It was adapted to choral recitation, and was read in the Jewish liturgy on the octave day of the Passover. The contents are as follows: The Spouse, languishing for her Lover (chapter 1), is suffused with the delight of Him (2), pursues Him and finds Him, and exults in His grandeur (3); He praises her incomparable beauty (4); the Lover comes, but, before the Spouse opens the bolt of the door, "He had turned aside and was gone"; she delights in the thought of His all-loveliness (5); the Lover dwells in the regal radiance of the Spouse (6); she is mighty and fruitful (7); the Spouse sings the greatness, joy, and abandon of union with her Lover (8). The Canticle of Canticles was composed by Solomon, in Jerusalem, under Divine inspiration. The earlier interpreters all agreed with the traditional view that Solomon wrote it; and the familiar acquaintance with matters of natural science and with the geographical features of Palestine accords well with the genius of Solomon. No other name could be suggested to replace his. Some philological difficulties raised by late critics are so few and so shadowy that they confirm the older position by their je­nuinence. They deride the idea of Solomon parading his amours in such fashion; but Solomon is not parading himself or his wives or his amours. He sings, in allegory, of Divine love and human souls. As to the inspiration of the book, it was not disputed by the Jews, as Rabbi Akiba (1st century) has observed in sweeping rabbinical phrase: "No one in Israel that does not adapt Canticles of Canticles "defiles the hands."

All Christian lists of the canonical Scriptures have it noted. Some critics interpret the book as an erotic poem, composed by some Palestinian to celebrate the pursuit by Solomon of a shy Shulamite shepherdess. The imagery thus becomes distorted and the thought grotesque.—C.E.; Seisenberger, tr. Buchanan, Practical Handbook for the Study of the Bible, N. Y., 1911; Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, ed. Lange, N. Y., 1871.

Canticle of the Sun, composed by St. Francis of Assisi (1225) in a little reed hut erected for him in the garden of St. Damian's where he was on his last visit to St. Clare during an attack of illness and blindness. In these eleven glorious lines of mystic praise, St. Francis reveals an aspect of faith ever manifest in his attitude toward nature: that the creature's dependence on God is a corollary of God's bounty, and since creatures are formed in God's image, they are holy to dispense, as well as re­ceive, His bounty.

Cantor or Precentor, chief singer of an ecclesiastical choir, who selects the music and leads the singing. In medieval times the cantor was commonly one of the dignitaries of the church whose office held a prebend of considerable value. His place on the right of the choir has caused the north section of a church to be called the cantoris. He is assisted by a succentor and in some places carries a staff as a mark of his office.—C.E.

Cantorial Staff (Lat., canter, chanter; A.-S., staef, stick), the staff sometimes carried as a mark of dignity by the cantor of an ecclesiastical choir in the exercise of his duties.

Cantù, CESARE (1807-95), historian and poet, b. Brivio, Italy; d. Milan. He taught Italian language and literature at Sondrio, 1823, Como, 1827, and Milan, 1832. He is the author of the first historical work by an Italian, "Storia universale," treating of the development of all civilized peoples up to the pontificate of Pius IX. He also wrote histories of Italy, popular works, and poetry.—C.E.

Canute IV, Saint, martyr (1086), King of Denmark, d. island of Fynen. Elected c. 1080, he ruled wisely, waged war on his barbarous enemies, brought Courland and Livonia to the Faith, and was remarkable for his piety and devotion to the Church. He was murdered by rebels in the church of St. Alban. Emblems: a lance, arrows. Canonized, 1171. Relics in Denmark. Feast, R. Cal., 19 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Cape of Good Hope, Central, Prefecture Apostolic of, Union of South Africa (British possession), including also the Island of St. Helena; established, 1874. Prefect Apostolic: Francis Henneman, P.S.M. (1922); residence at Oudtshoorn. Churches, 7; stations, 8; priests, 9; religious women, 48; schools, 5; Catholics, 1,056.

Cape of Good Hope, Eastern, Vicariate Apostolic of, Union of South Africa (British possession); formed, 1847, by division of the Vicariate of the Cape of Good Hope. Vicars Apostolic: Aidan Devereaux, Patrick Moran, J. Ricards, Peter Stubino, Hugh MacSherry (1896); residence at Port Elizabeth. Churches, chapels, and oratories, 50; priests, 52; schools, 48; Catholics, 13,500.

Cape of Good Hope, Western, Vicariate Apostolic of, Union of South Africa (British possession); established, 1837. Vicars Apostolic: Patrick Griffith (1837-02), Thomas Grimley (1862-71), John Leonard (1872-90), John Rooney (1890-1905), Bernard O’Riley (1926); residence at Cape Town. Churches and chapels, 35; priests, secular, 25; priests, regular, 9; schools, 31; Catholics, 16,500.

Capharnaum, kâ-far’nahm (Heb., Kaphar Nahum, village of Nahum); town, Galilee, closely associated with Our Lord, and frequently mentioned in the Gospels. When repelled by the Nazarenes, Jesus went there to live, and it was called "His city" (Matt., 9). In Capharnaum He chose His first disciples (Matt., 4) and performed many miracles; He cured the paralytic (Matt., 9), the centurion's servant (Matt., 8); cast out the unclean spirit (Mark, 1); and brought to life Jairus's daughter. He also delivered the discourse on the Eucharist (John, 6). There is some doubt as to the site of Capharnaum, although it is identified with Tell-Hum on the north bank of the Lake of Tiberias.—C.E.

Capital, topmost part of a column, indicating the architectural order to which it belongs. In Romanesque and Gothic capitals the classical orders were supplanting the original inspiration of each artist, resulting in endless variety of historical and legendary scenes, floral designs, and grotesque figures. Medieval architects also discovered the ability of the column to carry a load of much greater diameter than the shaft, by gradual enlargement of the capital toward the top.

Capital Vices (Lat., caput, head), sometimes called CAPITAL SINS, are inordinate inclinations or sinful habits, the result of sin. They are called capital, not because they are always grave sins, but because they give rise to various sins. They are: pride, avarice, lust, anger, envy, sloth, gluttony.—C.E., XIV, 5. (W. S. B.)

Capitulary, a collection of ordinances, especially those promulgated by the Frankish kings.—C.E.

Capitulation, an agreement by which those taking part in elections imposed certain conditions upon a candidate to be fulfilled by him after election; an agreement by which the Turkish government granted special immunities and privileges to aliens.—C.E.

Capnomancy (Gr., kapnos, smoke; manteia, divination), divination by the ascent or motion of smoke. This custom, started in early Greece, was considered a favorable omen if the smoke from burned incense or in connection with a sacrifice rose vertically.

Cappa Chorialis (Lat., choir cape) or Cappa Nigra (Lat., black cape), a long black mantle, commonly with a hood. It was worn in choir during the Divine Office by the clergy of cathedral churches and by many religious, and is still retained by the Dominicans during winter months.

Cappa Clausa (Lat., closed cape), a cope or mantle sewn up in front, formerly worn by monks for ordinary outdoor use.

Cappadocia, in ancient geography, inland district of Asia Minor, consisting of an elevated plateau traversed by the Anti-Taurus range. At one time it was the seat of Hittite power. In A.D. 17 it was reduced by Rome to a province and later, A.D. 70, was joined to Armenia Minor. As ecclesiastical province it was subject to Antioch, and the Byzantine Rite was first used here. Christianity was preached by St. Andrew, and, in the 4th century, by three Fathers of the Church, St. Basil the Great, St. Gregory of Nazianzus, and St. Gregory of Nyssa.

Cappadocian Tablets, cuneiform tablets, dating from 2300 B.C., recently discovered at Karan-Duruk near Cäsarea, recording a settled Semitic community, and early connection of Hebrews with Semites of Palestine. They corroborate Babylonian records of a Semitic conquest from Palestine, 2225 B.C., and show inhabitants of Palestine at Abraham's migration, 2100 B.C., to be an older branch of same Semitic stock.

Cappa Magna (Lat., great cape), a cope or robe worn by cardinals and bishops on occasions of ceremony, which may be described as a glorified cappa chorialis. Its color for cardinals is ordinarily red, and for bishops violet. It has a long train, requiring a train-bearer, and a large hood, of fur in winter and of silk in summer. Canons and specially privileged prelates also wear the cappa.
magna, but folded and curtailed to signify an inferior dignity. (J. C. T.)

Cappa Pia Vialia. See Cope.

Carranca, Domenico (1400-58), cardinal, theologian, canonist, and statesman, b. Carranca, Italy; d. Rome. A Doctor of Canon and Civil Law, 1421, he became secretary to Martin V and was made cardinal “in petto” by the pope, 1423 or 1426, the first known instance of the use of this reservation. He became Bp. of Fermo, but Paul III refused the red hat when Martin died, 1431. The Council of Basle upheld his claims and he was reconciled with Eugene IV, 1434. A reformer and diplomat, he carried out twelve responsible embassies for the Apostolic See, and founded the College Capranica for poor students, 1457.—C.E.

Captain (In the Bible). In the Douay Version, captain represents several different Hebrew and Latin words. It is used only for the highest civil officers as in the expressions “captain of my people” (4 Kings), and “let us appoint a captain” (Num., 14). Military officers of all grades, however, are thus designated, e.g.: generals; infantry officers; captains of cavalry (2 Par.); commanders of the bodyguard (Gen., 20); officers charged with the organization of newly-levied troops and the order of the camp, and some whose status was not clear but who were later aides-de-camp. In the N.T. “captain” occurs but once: “for out of thee shall come forth the captain [Our Lord] that shall rule my people Israel” (Matt., 2).—C.E.

Captivities of the Israelites. (1) The Assyrian Captivity, when the inhabitants of the Northern Kingdom were carried off to Assyria (4 Kings, 15; 17). (2) The Babylonian Captivity, when the subjects of the Kingdom of Juda were deported to Babylon (4 Kings, 24; 25). (3) The Roman Captivity, when Titus destroyed Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and scattered the Jews over all the provinces of the Roman Empire (Josephus, “Wars of the Jews,” VI, 9, 2).—C.E.

Captivity Epistles, letters written by St. Paul during his first imprisonment in Rome, to the Colossians, Ephesians, Philippians, and Philemon.—Prat, tr. Stoddard, The Theology of Saint Paul, London, has a senior and junior “cardinal,” the pope has the sole right to create cardinals freely, and is not bound by any ruling or interference. Cardinals residing in Rome are called Cardinals of the Court.

Cardinal (Lat., cardo, hinge), an ecclesiastical prince of the Catholic Church. Until the Middle Ages the title of cardinal was granted to the prominent clergy of important churches, e.g., Constantinople, Milan, Naples. Since the days of Pope St. Pius V (1566-72), there are in the Roman Church no more than 6 cardinal-bishops, 50 cardinal-priests, and 14 cardinal-deacons. At the present day the cardinals constitute the senate of the Roman pontiff, advising and assisting the pope in the government of the Church. The pope has the right to create cardinals freely, and is not bound by any ruling or interference. Cardinals residing in Rome are called Cardinals of the Court.

Cardinal College, old name of Christ Church College. See Oxford.

Cardinalitial Dioceses (Suburbicarian Dioceses), term applied to dioceses nearest Rome. They are Albano, Frascati, Ostia and Palestrina, Porto and Santa Rufina, and Velletri. Their bishops comprise the order of cardinal-bishops which is largely occupied in the business of the papal court; some have had auxiliary bishops for centuries, and by his constitution, “Apostolice Romanorum” (1910), Pius X ordained that there should be suffragan bishops for all the cardinalitial dioceses. These dioceses had a certain importance in the Church and their bishops exercised certain prerogatives; e.g., the bishops of Ostia in the 4th century consecrated the pope, the Bp. of Albano in the 6th century recited the second prayer in the consecration ceremony, the Bp. of Porto the third, and probably as early as the 11th century they had the right of participating in the election of the pope. In the 8th century there is reference (Vita Stephani, III) to the ancient custom by which seven of these bishops celebrated Mass in turn in place of the pope and were called episcopi cardinales as they were permanently attached to the cardo, or cathedral church of Rome. These bishops were variously known as episcopi hebdomadarii (12th century), cardinales Romanae Sedis, Vicarii, Cooperatores pape, and episcopi romanini, the last of which was applied to other bishops also. C.E., XIV, 324.

Cardinal Protector, a cardinal to whose special solicitude are entrusted the interests of a particular religious institute or pious association.—C.E.

Cardinal’s Plate (It., Piatto Cardinalizio), an allowance granted by the pope to cardinals residing in the Curia or otherwise employed in the service of the Church, to defray their expenses. This was called “the poor cardinal’s plate.” The reason for the allowance is because when a cardinal is created, by that very fact he renounces his benefice or ecclesiastical pension unless an exception be made in his particular case. The allowance made to cardinals today is very small.—C.E. (C. N.)

Cardinal Vaughan School, Kensington, London, founded by public subscription in 1914 as a memorial to Card. Herbert Vaughan. The aim of the school, which is “recognized” by the Board of Education and the London County Council, is to give Catholic boys a thorough public school education, and to prepare them for the universities, the professions, and commercial life. It is under the control of a governing body of which the Abp. of Westminster is president; masters, 13; students, 250. The school has attained a high standard in public examinations, has gained several scholarships for its students at the English universities, and now may be said to rank in educational importance with some of the famous pre-Reformation grammar schools of England, long since alienated from their original purpose. (E. V. W.)

Cardinal Vicar, the vicar-general of the pope as Bishop of Rome; also called the vicar of the City.—C.E.

Cardinal Virtues, the four principal virtues upon which the rest of the moral virtues turn, namely justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude.—C.E.

Carecloth, a canopy of silk or velvet of varying colors, held over the bride and bridgroom, if maid and bachelor, at weddings in the Middle Ages.—Hope and Atchley, English Liturgical Colors, Lond., 1918.

Carem (Heb., vine or vineyard), ancient town of the tribe of Juda, probably the modern ‘Ain Karim, 4 m. w. of Jerusalem. According to tradition it is the town where the Blessed Virgin visited her cousin Elizabeth (Luke, 1) and where John the Baptist was born.—C.E.

Carillon, kär’d-lön (Fr., kā-ré-yōn, chime, peal), a series of bells, sometimes numbering as high as 60 and producing a complete chromatic scale, so hung that they may be played upon either by hand or machinery. Among the best-known in Europe are those in the cathedrals of Antwerp, Ghent, Mechlin, Bruges, Worcester, and Dublin. The Riverside Baptist Church of New York, when completed, will have the heaviest carillon in the world, weighing 226,000 lbs. The term is also applied to a small instrument, composed of bells and a pianoforte keyboard by which they are played, and to a tune chimed upon bells. See CHIME.—Rice, Carillon Music and Singing Towers of the Old World and the New, Lond., 1926.

Carlisle, ancient diocese, England, including most of the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland; founded with Ethelwulf (1133-55) as first bishop. It was the only English see with an Augustinian cathedral chapter. The last Catholic bishop, Owen Oglethorpe (d. 1599), was the only one who could be persuaded to crown Elizabeth.—C.E.

Carlovingian Schools, a system of educational reform was inaugurated by Charlemagne under the advice of Alcuin who became his “prime minister of education.” In 782 Alcuin was placed at the head of the court school of military tactics and good manners, established under the Merovingian kings, and taught there grammar, arithmetic, astronomy, and music. Charlemagne and the royal household learned from Alcuin. In 787 Charlemagne issued the famous capitulary on education, which they are played, and to a tune chimed upon bells. See CHIME.—Rice, Carillon Music and Singing Towers of the Old World and the New, Lond., 1926.

Carlsruhe Fragments, two fragments of four pages each, commonly labelled A and B, preserved in the Library of Carlsruhe. Both are in an Irish hand. Fragment A dates from the late 8th or early 9th century and contains parts of three Masses, one of which is pro captivis (for captives). The arrangement resembles that of the Bobbio Missal. Fragment B contains fragments of Masses with a Memento for the living made up of a long list of intercessions for various classes of persons. (D. P.)

in the O.T., as fertile, blessed, beautiful. There was an altar on it long before the prophet Elias’s time, and he, and Eliseus after him, resided there. Probably it was there he caused fire to come down from heaven (4 Kings, 1), and there his sacrifice was consumed by fire from above, after the sacrifice of the prophets of the false god Baal had remained unconsumed, whereupon they were all put to death (3 Kings, 18). The Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel (q.v.) preserves the tradition that from the days of Elias and Eliseus there had always been a succession of hermits on Carmel, and that in the time of the Crusades they had organized themselves like the Western religious orders.—C.E.

Carmelite Order. See Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel.

Carnival (Lat., carmen locare, taking away of flesh), a time of feasting and revelry preceding the Lenten fast, chiefly observed in southern Europe; also, because in many places an occasion of immorality, a time of prayer and of practises of mortification and penance in order to repair the offenses against the Divine law.

Carols, originally a medieval dance, accompanied by singing; the name came to designate, especially in England, songs of a semi-sacred nature, used at festival times, particularly Christmas. The eucharist, the center of a dance, gave rise to the lullaby type, such as the German “Dormi fili” (Sleep, Son). Carols, strictly speaking, date from the 15th century, but they are found as “Noels,” in France, in the 11th century. The most famous is the 12th-century “Prose de l’ane” (Hymn of the Ass) sung annually at Beauvais on the feast of the Circumcision.

Caroline Books, a work in four books, which, though purporting to be Charlemagne’s composition, was only written at his request by another, possibly Alcuin or some Irish theologian at the Frankish court c. 790-792, as a protest to be sent to Pope Adrian I. It is a theological treatise in which both the Iconoclastic council of 754 and its opponent the Seventh General Council, of Nicaea, 787, are severely criticized, especially for their views on the use of images, and it had its origin in the fact that the decrees of the General Council had reached the Frankish bishops in a very faulty Latin version in which, among other errors, idolatry was approved.—C.E.

Carpenter’s Son, designation of Our Lord by Jews when scandalized by His wisdom and miracles (Matt., 13, 55).

Charles Carroll of Carrollton, state'sman, b. Annapolis, Md.; d. Doughoregan Manor, near Baltimore. After studying at Catholic colleges abroad, he returned to America in 1756 and was given the estate of Carrollton. He aggressively defended the rights of the colonies, was a member of the Maryland Convention of 1775, served on a delegation from the Continental Congress to Canada in 1784, and was a member of the Continental Congress and signer of the Declaration of Independence. He assisted in the drafting of the Constitution of Maryland and was a member of the Maryland Senate and the U. S. Senate.—C.E.

Carroll, John (1735-1815), first bishop of the hierarchy of the United States, first Bp. and Abp. of Baltimore, b. Upper Marlboro, Md.; d. Baltimore. His father, Daniel Carroll, a native of Ireland, was a successful merchant in Upper Marlboro; his mother, Eleanor Darnall, was closely related to the wife of Charles Carroll of Carrollton; his brother, Daniel Carroll (1735-1829), was a member of the Colonial Congress (1780-84) and of the new Congress (1789-90) and was one of the two Catholic signers of the Constitution in 1787. John Carroll was educated at the Jesuit school at Bohemia Manor in Maryland, and at the Jesuit College of St. Omer in French Flanders. In 1753 he entered the Society of Jesus, studied at Liége, and was ordained in 1769. Four years of teaching philosophy and theology at Liége and a winter spent traveling in Europe as tutor to Lord Stourton’s son, were followed by his return to Maryland in 1774 after the suppression of the Society. Volunteer missionary labors in Maryland and Virginia occupied his time. In 1776, at the request of the Continental Congress, he accompanied Charles Carroll, Benjamin Franklin, and Samuel Chase on a mission to Canada in a vain endeavor to secure the cooperation, or the neutrality, of that country in the Revolution. At the close of the war his patriotism and wisdom were largely instrumental in reorganizing the infant Church of the United States, free of the jurisdiction of the Vicar-General of London, under which the Colonial Church had been for a century, and independent of any foreign power. As the choice of his associates in 1784 he was appointed, by the pope, Superior of the Missions of the United States, which then included less than 30,000 Catholics. In 1788 his name was submitted to Rome, by permission of the Holy See, as an episcopal candidate selected by twenty-four out of twenty-six assembled priests, and he was named Bp. of Baltimore in 1789, his diocese reaching from Georgia to Maine and westward to the Mississippi. He was consecrated in the chapel of Thomas Weld at Lulworth Castle, England, 15 Aug., 1790, by the Rt. Rev. Charles Talbot, Vicar Apostolic of London. Among the difficulties with which he had to cope were the extravagant claims of lay trustees, the question of nationalism in parish churches, and the occasional intrusion of unworthy priests. In 1791 he called the first Synod of Baltimore, attended by 22 priests. The same year the opening of Georgetown College, founded on his plans, took place, and Sulpicians from France inaugurated the beginnings of St. Mary’s College and Seminary. Bp. Carroll conferred Holy Orders, for the first time within the territory of the thirteen States, on Rev. Stephen Badin in 1793. In 1800 he consecrated his coadjutor, Rt. Rev. Leonard Neale. In 1806 he laid the cornerstone of the Cathedral of the Assumption. which replaced St. Peter’s pro-Cathedral in 1824. The suffragan sees of New York, Philadelphia, Boston, and Bardstown (now Louisville) were erected in 1808, and the pallium conferred on Abp. Carroll. He lived to see the restoration of the Society of Jesus in 1814, having reorganized it in his diocese in 1805. Active always in civic affairs, he was president of the Female Humane Charity School of Baltimore, head of the Library Company, and one of the three trustees of St. John’s College at Annapolis. At his death clergy in the United States numbered about 85.—C.E.; Shea: Guilday, Life and Times of John Carroll, N. Y., 1892.

Carthage, ancient city and modern town, Africa. It was founded by Phenician merchants, c. 850 B.C., razed by Rome, 146 B.C., rebuilt by Augustus 29 B.C., and destroyed by Arabs, A.D. 698. From a very early date of the Christian era it was a flourishing seat of Christianity and the scene of several synods, c. 198-698. The bishops of the See of Carthage, founded, c. 202, from the time of St. Cyprian, ceded their though unofficial primacy in the African Church and among their privileges was the determination, a year in advance, of the date for the celebration of Easter. The number of persons martyred there was almost as great as that in Rome and among this number were Felicitas and Perpetua whose obituary now serves as a chapel. The old amphitheater is in the hands of the White Fathers and excavations begun, c. 1880, on the site of ancient Carthage and the vicinity, by Fr. Alphonse Delattre have disclosed what is ranked as the world’s greatest collection of Christian lamps, three Christian basilicas, chapels, cemeteries, inscriptions, and Roman and Punic buildings of various types. Carthage lays claim to the oldest remains of Christian edifices, as in Rome they have been destroyed or rebuilt. Subsequent to the restoration, after a lapse of eight centuries, of the Archdiocese of Carthage, 10 Nov., 1884, a beautiful cathedral was dedicated. He composed a rule for the monks, a metrical poem of 580 lines, which is one of the most interesting literary treasures of the early Irish Church. Expelled from Rahan, 635, with 800 of his community, he established a monastery which later became the famous school of Lismore. Buried in his own church at Lismore. Feast, 14 May. —O’Hanlon, Lives of the Irish Saints, Dublin, 1889.

Carthusian Order, religious order founded by St. Bruno, 1084, at La Grande Chartreuse, near Grenoble, France. The order was approved, 1176; constitutions corrected and published, 1581, and confirmed by Innocent XI, 1688. Desirous of a more complete solitude than his chancelorship in the Diocese of Reims afforded, St. Bruno with seven companions had retired to the Alps of Dauphiné in 1084. Called to Rome, 1088, as adviser to Pope Urban II, his former pupil at Reims, he obtained permission in 1090, to leave the papal court and retire to his retreat, but this time in Calabria. This foundation differed from that of Grenoble in that it resembled the Camaldolese, an order uniting the cenitical and cenobitic modes of monasticism. It lasted till 1191, being then absorbed into the Cistercian Order. That of Grenoble has survived to the present day. While resembling in some points of rule the Benedictine Order, the Carthusians are distinct in their constitutions and manner of life. They observe an almost perpetual silence and complete abstinence from meat, with a fast once a week on bread and water. Chanting the Divine Office, mental prayer, and manual labor occupy a large part of the day, and studies are not neglected, the order being traditionally distinguished for the richness of their libraries, maintaining also a modern printing-press at Tournay, Belgium. The rite peculiar to the Carthusian liturgy recalls the usage of the early Church. The Prior of La Grande Chartreuse is elected by the superior-general. A general chapter meets annually; the first was held in 1152, and its powers were confirmed by Alexander IV in 1258. There are now houses in Spain, Italy, England, Germany, Austria, and Switzerland. Statistics: 15 monasteries or charterhouses (chartreuses); 750 religious and novices (about 350 choir monks and 350 lay brothers). Carthusian Nuns, in a few convents in France, Belgium, and Italy, have been affiliated with the order since the 12th century, following a similar rule.—C.E.; The Carthusians (Rochdale, 1902).

Cartier, JACQUES (1491-1557), discoverer, b. St. Malo, France; d. there. He sailed from Saint-Malo, 1534, with two sixty-ton ships, and 120 men, and in 20 days made Cape Bonavista, Newfoundland. After exploring the coast of Labrador to Brest, and the west coast of Newfoundland to Cape St. John, he returned to France, the entire voyage lasting 137 days. In 1535, with three ships, he ascended the St. Lawrence to Hochelaga (Montreal) and wintered at Stadacona (Quebec); after planting a cross there, he returned to France. In 1541 Cartier wintered at the mouth of the Cap-Rouge River, naming the settlement Charlesbourg-Royal. His fourth voyage (1543) was undertaken to relieve the colonizer Roberval.—C.E.

Cartography, the art of drawing maps or charts, was carried on, in medieval times, in the monasteries; it has been greatly influenced by the work of Catholics. Domnus Nicolaus Germanus, a Benedictine monk (1466) was the first scholar to modernize Ptolemy and make him generally accessible. Card. Fillastre (1348-1428) had Ptolemy’s maps drawn from a Greek original. John Ruysch (1460-1533), a Benedictine, published a famous map of the world representing the new Spanish and Portuguese discoveries in America. Canon Martin Waldseemüller (1475-1522) was responsible for the naming of America, being the first to use this name on a wall map and a globe. Martin Behaim (1459-1507), a German Catholic, constructed the oldest globe, now at Nuremberg. The most celebrated monument of medieval cartography, a map of the world, in the Biblioteca Marciana, Venice, was the work of a Camaldolese monk, Fra Mauro (1459). Abraham Ortelius (1527-98), a Catholic of Antwerp, made the first modern atlas which combined the maps of the world and contained a catalog of maps with the names of 99 cartographers who lived before 1570. The Jesuit missionaries made maps of the territory they explored and a famous map of the Chinese Empire (1717) was due to their efforts.—C.E.

Cartouche, ornament with empty space in center to receive inscription, cipher, or emblem. Usually in shape of scroll with garland.

Casartelli, Louis Charles (1852-1925), Bp. of Salford, England, and orientalist, b. Manchester, England; d. there. He studied theology and eastern languages at Louvain University. In 1881 he became rector of St. Bede’s College in Manchester and in 1903, the year of his appointment as Bp. of Salford, he was appointed lecturer on Iranian languages at Manchester University. Shortly before his death he had accepted the Khatrak lectureship in Iranian subjects at Oxford. His articles on oriental, Catholic, scientific, and literary subjects appeared often in various magazines, but he left very few published books.

Case of conscience, a famous casuistic problem proposed in 1701 to know whether absolution might be given to a cleric who declared that he held on certain points the sentiments of Jansenists, especially that of respectful silence on the question of fact, i.e., to say as to whether or not the propositions condemned by Innocent XII as Jansenistic are actually contained in Jansenius’ work “Augustinus.” This case was decided affirmatively by 40 noted doctors of the Sorbonne, but as this was a denial of the power of the pope to decide whether a certain book does or does not contain errors against faith, the solution was condemned by Clement XI in his Brief, “Cum nuper” (1703), and by the faculties of theology of Louvain, Douai, and Paris.

Cases of conscience, problems in the application of the moral and canon law to the conduct of men and women in various circumstances. Thus, one has injured another, how far and in what way is he obliged to make reparation; one has taken what belongs to another, to what extent and in what manner is he obliged to make restitution; persons living as husband and wife begin to doubt about the validity of their marriage, what impediments may there have been that would render the marriage null and void. See also CASUISTRY.

Casgrain, Henri Raymond (1831-1904), author, b. Rivière Ouelle, Canada; d. Quebec. He was ordained priest, 1856. Due to ill health, he was obliged to abandon his clerical duties, and henceforth devoted himself to literary pursuits. As historian, poet, and literary critic, he exercised considerable influence upon intellectual movements in Canada. Some of his writings, among them “Pilgrimage to the Land of Evangeline,” have been honored by the French Academy. He was professor of history at Laval University, and president of the Royal Society of Canada (1889-90). His works include: “History of Mother Mary of the Incarnation,” “History of the Quebec Hospital,” “A Canadian Parish of the Seventeenth Century,” “The Sulpicians and Priests of the Foreign Missions of Acadia,” “Canadian Pioneers,” and “The Picture of the River Ouelle.” He also wrote biographies of Gaspé, Garneau, Crémazie, and Chauveau.—C.E.

Cashel, Archdiocese of, comprises the greater part of Tipperary and part of Limerick counties and has perpetual administration of the Diocese of Emly; see, or center, Cloyne, Cork, Kerry, Killaloe, Limerick, Ross, Waterford and Lismore. St. Patrick converted Aengus, King of Cashel, c. 450; St. Ailbe established his see at Emly, where Patrick converted Aengus, King of Cashel, 450; St. Ailbe established his see at Emly, where a great school flourished in the 5th century. In 1101 O’Dúin was made Abp. of Cashel by St. Celsus, and the Diocese of Emly was included in his jurisdiction. In 1152 Domnus O’Loner-gan was appointed to the see by the Synod of Kells. Bishops have included Donal O’Hullícan (1158-82), Edmund Butler (d. 1550), Bl. Roland (1553-61), Maurice Fitzgibbon (1567-78), Dermot O’Hurley (1581-83), James Butler (1774-91) who moved the diocesan seat to Thurles where it has remained, Abp. Bray (1793-1820), Patrick Leahy (1857-74), Thomas Croke (1874-1902), Thomas Fennelly (1902-13), and John Harty (1914). On the interesting limestone elevation known as the Rock of Cashel may be seen the ruins of the ancient cathedral, burnt in 1495. The round tower, Cormac’s chapel (1134), and an ancient cross are also of interest. Churches, 85; priests, secular, 117; religious women, 419; colleges, 2; high schools, 5; primary schools, 105; institutions, 6; Catholics, 106,000; others, 3655.—C.E.

Cassir (Slavic, show forth peace), SAINT (1458-84), Prince of Poland, d. Grodno, Russia. He was made grand-duc of Lithuania in 1471. Elected King of Hungary, he refused to exercise the power. He died of consumption. Patron of Poland; invoked against the plague, and Turks. Emblems: crown, lily. Buried in cathedral of Vilna. Canonized 1522. Feast, R. Cal., 4 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Caspar del Bufalo, BLESSED, confessor (1786-1837), founder of the Congregation of the Most Precious Blood, b. Rome; d. there. He studied at the Roman College and after ordination, 1808, obtained a canonry at St. Mark's. Banished and imprisoned, 1810-14, for refusing to swear allegiance to Napoleon, he returned to Rome and established, 1815, a congregation of secular priests to give missions and spread devotion to the Most Precious Blood. He devoted himself to suppressing brigandage in the mountains of Albano, and his labors throughout central Italy merited for him the titles of “Hammer of Freemasonry,” and “Apostle of Rome.” Beatified, 1904. Buried in S. Maria in Trivio. Feast, C.P.P.S., 29 Dec.

Cassian, SAINT, martyr (4th century), d. Imola, Italy. He was a schoolmaster at Imola, when a persecution broke out, probably that of Decius or Valerian. Refusing to sacrifice to the gods, he was condemned to the mercy of his pupils who tortured him to death with their iron styles or pens. Patron of Mexico City. Relics at Imola. Feast, R. Cal., 13 Aug.—Butler.

Casimir (Slavic, show forth peace), SAINT (1458-84), Prince of Poland, d. Grodno, Russia. He was made grand-duc of Lithuania in 1471. Elected King of Hungary, he refused to exercise the power. He died of consumption. Patron of Poland; invoked against the plague, and Turks. Emblems: crown, lily. Buried in cathedral of Vilna. Canonized 1522. Feast, R. Cal., 4 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Cassian, SAINT (c. 360-c. 435), monk and ascetic writer, b. probably Provence; d. probably near Marseilles. With his friend Germanus he visited the holy places in Palestine and they became monks at Bethlehem. After several years among the Egyptian solitaries, they came to Constantinople where Cassian became a favorite disciple of St. John Chrysostom, and in his behalf was sent to Rome, where he is believed to have been ordained. About 415 he was at Marseilles where he founded two monasteries, one for men and the other for women, introducing in the West the rules of Eastern monasticism. His two principal works, “Institutes” and “Conferences,” deal with the cenobitic life and the deadly sins. He wrote against the Nestorians, but died of consumption. He was qurestor, consul, and minister under Theodoric and prretorian prefect under Amalaswintha, at whose death he withdrew to his estate where he erected the monastery of Vivarium. His works dealing with political affairs include a chronicle, a history of the Goths, and letters. His ecclesiastical writings include a treatise on the soul, some scriptural commentaries, a hastily composed ecclesiastical history, and the “Institutiones divinarum et secularium literarum,” the object of which was to furnish the monks with outlines of study as the means of interpreting Holy Writ. His work on the liberal arts includes a treatise on music, particularly valuable for the study of the beginnings of church music.—C.E.; Rand, Founders of the Middle Ages, Camb., Mass., 1928.

Cassock (It., casacca, great-coat), a gown or soutane, usually black, the ordinary outer garb of clerics and priests, worn in Catholic countries on the street as well as indoors. It is worn also by boys assisting at ceremonies. Cardinals, bishops, and prelates wear at home a black cassock with red or purple trimmings. The purple cassock is worn in church by bishops and prelates, except on penitential days and a red cassock is worn by cardinals. The pope wears a white cassock.

Cassinese Congregation, name applied to two Benedictine Congregations. A Benedictine reform instituted at the monastery of St. Justinus, Padua, 1409, by Abbot Ludovico Barbo, received the title of “Cassinese Congregation” in 1504. This reform gradually spread to all the chief Benedictine monasteries in Italy, including Monte Cassino, Subiaco, St. Paul's in Rome, St. George's at Venice, La Cava, and Farfa. Characterized by a centralized form of government, its strength and prosperity continued until reduced by the Italian Revolution and later decrees of the Italian government. Statis-
Catholic missionaries permit the Hindu convert to retain the social distinctions of caste, a condition forbidden by Anglicans and other Protestants. The religious distinctions of caste form one of the principal obstacles to the spread of Christianity in India, being opposed to the principle that all souls are of equal value in the sight of God. Brahmins are the most difficult to convert, low castes and outcasts, the easiest.

Castell Gandolfò, a papal palace built by Urban VIII in the 17th century, the former summer residence of the popes, situated in the town of the same name, 14 m. SE of Rome. By the Law of Guarantees it has (prior to the ratification of the Lateran Treaty, 7 June, 1929), together with the Vatican and the Palace of the Lateran, always enjoyed the right of extraterritoriality, rendering it free from government visitation or inspection without papal authorization. The Villa Santa Caterina, at Castell Gandolfò, was purchased as a summer residence for the students of the North American College at Rome.

Castile, former kingdom in the central part of the Iberian peninsula, now forming the provinces of Burgos, Palencia, Valladolid, Segovia, Avila, Soria, Logroño, Santander, Madrid, Toledo, Ciudad Real, and Guadalajara. Recovery of the territory of Old Castile began in the time of the first three Alfonsoes of Leon. The counts appointed to rule over the new territory increased in power and revolted against the kings, one of the most famous being Fernan Gonzalez, who continued to foment discord even after the marriage of his daughter to the king's son. After his death the Moors again attempted to seize the conquered territory but were vanquished by his grandson Sancho Garcia in the victory of Caltanaazor (1002). By his grant of charters to many cities he won the title El de Los Fueros (He of the Rights). Sancho the Great of Navarre took possession of Castile on the death of Sancho Garcia's son, and his son Ferdinand I united Leon and Castile which were later separated and reunited under Alfonso VI whose daughter Urraca became first queen. Alfonso VII (1158-1214) definitely freed New Castile from the Moslem yoke in the battle of Las Navas de Tolosa (1212), commemorated annually by the Church in Spain on 16 July as "El Triunfo de la Santa Cruz" (The Triumph of the Holy Cross). Castile and Leon were united decisively under St. Ferdinand III (1219-52) who regained from the Moors all but the kingdom of Granada. In the reign of Alfonso XI (1310-50) the last of the Moors attempting reconquest of Spain were vanquished in the battle of Salado. Discords later disturbed the realm and the rulers were often cruel and incompetent. At the instigation of the nobles Henry IV the Impotent declared his daughter Joan illegitimate, and the kingdom passed to his sister Isabella the Catholic (1474) whose marriage with Ferdinand of Aragon united the kingdoms, forming the basis of the modern Kingdom of Spain.—C.E.

Casstrensis, Episcopus (Bishop of the Camp), Latin title given to a bishop in charge of a number of army chaplains (in Great Britain, also of the air force chaplains).

Castro Palao, Fernando (1581-1633), theologian, b. Leon, Spain; d. Medina. He entered the Society of Jesus, 1586, and later taught moral theology at Compostela, Scholastic theology at Salamanca, and finally became rector of the College of Medina. He is one of the greatest theologians. His chief work is "Opus Morale."—C.E.

Casuistry (Lat., casus, case), the method followed by moral theologians of explaining moral principles through the presentation and solution of concrete cases. The principles may be ever so clear and evident; still it is not always easy to arrive at the correct solution in a given case. For example, moral theology teaches that a person should be just in all his dealings. Now suppose that A enters into a contract to do some special work for B for which he is to receive a definite sum in fixed installments. Later A hears that the work or should be wait until the work is done, and then perhaps sue B? Again, sometimes there is a conflict of duties. For example, the law of the Church obliges us to hear Mass on Sundays; the natural law demands that we help our neighbor who is in need. Suppose then that a person is sick and requires care. Should one stay with the sick person and miss Mass, or leave the person alone and go to church? Another example may be taken from the administration of the sacraments. The minister of the sacrament in Baptism must use the proper water and pronounce the correct form. Suppose he should use some water, which is not exactly prescribed, but which belongs to the species of water; on suppose that he should substitute one or two words for those which are required by the ritual; will the Sacrament thereby be invalid? These examples illustrate the cases proposed and solved by moralists. Each individual case has its own proper features. Now it is Kingdom to give decisions in particular instances to know of analogous cases which have already been discussed and decided by moralists. He may then use such decisions as a basis for his own cases. Judges and attorneys follow the same procedure. The decisions rendered by the courts form precedents for the solution of similar cases. Though writers on moral subjects have from the beginning of the Christian era discussed practical questions, it is only within recent centuries that moral principles have been systematically discussed through the medium of concrete cases. St. Alphonson became the pioneer in the case method by adopting the "Medulla" of Herman Busembaum, which is largely casuistic, as the substratum of his own work in moral theology. Others have followed his example.
At present a book treating on moral questions will not be considered up to date unless it contains the discussion of particular cases. The case material, it is true, should not occupy the entire space. The principles should be stated first, and followed by their appropriate case illustrations. Special cases, of course, are not to be decided by sentiment or what is popularly called common sense, but according to the principles under which they happen to fall. Cases of conscience are one of the exercises at the conferences of priests meeting usually about the ember-days four times a year.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss. (F. s.)

Caswall, Edward (1814-78), Oratorian and poet, b. Yatley, Hampshire, England; d. Birmingham. He received Anglican Orders, 1839, but coming under the influence of Newman, he resigned his curacy, 1847, and was received into the Catholic Church. After the death of his wife he became an Oratorian. His works include manuals of devotion, "Lyra Catholic," and "The Masque of Mary and other Poems."—C.E.

Catacombs, Roman. The catacombs are of Christian origin, built at Rome in the middle stratum of tufa, from which no building material was quarried. They are reached by a stairway which leads below to a depth of from 33 to 49 feet. There is a labyrinth of narrow galleries, sometimes found in three or four stories. The burial chambers are hollowed out of the rock and there are tiers of graves along the gallery walls. The graves were marked by slabs. Crematorium, place of rest, was the early name. Ventilation was given by air shafts, or Luminaria. The catacombs originated in connection with the tombs which belonged to the early converts from paganism. They imitated the cemeteries which the Jews living at Rome had laid out above ground, but burial in the catacombs was not sacred. After Constantine cemeteries were laid out above ground, but burial in the catacombs was not discontinued until 410. Later the remains of the martyrs were transferred to the churches and from the 12th to the 16th century the catacombs were forgotten. The labors of Bosio and De Rossi inspired a new interest in Christian archaeology. The inscriptions of the catacombs have yielded more information than any other source concerning the first Christian centuries. The spaces between graves, the arched niches, and the walls of the chambers are adorned with paintings. The souls of the dead are represented as Orantes (praying) in the bliss of heaven. Episodes from the Bible are chosen which depict the belief in a future life. The Madonna with the Divine Child is found, and the Saviour enthroned in glory. Early sculpture is represented by the sarcophagi used by the converts from paganism. Towards the end of the 3rd century they were ornamented with the same biblical scenes but with greater variety of design, and the life of Christ is represented. Catacombs have also been discovered in Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, Malta, and northern Africa. Pius XI has had the Roman catacombs illuminated by electricity.—C.E.; Northcote and Brownlow, Roma Soterranea, Lond., 1879.

Catafalque (It., catafalco, scaffold), temporary stage or platform erected in a church to receive the coffin of a deceased person or more generally to take the place of the bier when the corpse is not present, at month's minds or anniversary Masses. It is placed immediately outside the sanctuary, covered with a black pall, and receives the same respect as would be accorded the corpse, being surrounded by lights, sprinkled with holy water, and incensed by the celebrant during the absolution. No flowers should be used in connection with it but the insignia of prelates or nobles may be mounted upon it.—C.E.

Catalá, Magín (1761-1830), missionary, b. Catalonia, Spain; d. Santa Clara, Cal. In 1777 he joined the Franciscan Order in Barcelona, and was ordained, 1785; he arrived in the City of Mexico, 1756, and entered the missionary college of San Fernando there. For thirty-six years he labored with Fr. José Viader at the Santa Clara Indian mission. He became renowned for his miracles and prophecies. The figure of a crucifix in the church of Santa Clara is said to have leaned forward to commend him when preaching. The cause of his beatification was introduced in 1884.—C.E., IX, 530.

Catapult or Cannon, emblem in art associated with St. Barbara, patroness of firearms, because of the lightning which struck her father dead.

Catechesis and Catechism (Gr., katechisin, to teach by word of mouth). In the New Testament the term "catechesis" denotes oral religious instruction (Acts, 18; Gal., 6). Among the early patristic writers it denotes both the act of instructing and the subject-matter of the instruction. With the organization of the catechumenate it took on a more precise and restricted meaning: the oral instruction preparatory to Baptism. With the decline of the catechumenate the term came to designate the religious instruction of children. Since Luther's time the term "catechism" has been used to designate a compendium of Christian doctrine for children, arranged in the form of questions and answers. Luther, however, did not originate the catechism either as to form or content. The first manual resembling our modern catechism was used by Alcuin (735-804); it is a Latin explanation, in questions and answers, of the Creed and the Lord's Prayer.

The Roman Catechism is also known as the Catechism of the Council of Trent, or the Catechism for Parish Priests, or the Catechism of Pius V. The preparation of such a work was ordered by the Council of Trent (1545-63) and brought out in the year 1566, under St. Pius V. The division of the subject-matter follows the four formulas: the Creed, the Sacraments, the Decalogue, the Lord's Prayer. St. Charles Borromeo deserves the largest share of credit for the composition of the work. The Catechism is not a school-book, but a manual for the catechist and teacher. It brought about a much-needed uniformity of Christian doctrine and dealt a staggering blow to Protestant claims.—McHugh-Callan, Catechism of the Council of Trent for Parish Priests, N. Y., 1923.

The Catechism of St. Peter Canisius (d. 1597) was published in three forms: major (1555), minor (1558), and minimus (1556). The division of the subject-matter is as follows: Faith (Apostles' Creed); Hope and Prayer (Lord's Prayer, Hail Mary); Charity and the Commandments of God and the Church; the Sacraments; Christian Justice, i.e., the shunning of evil and the doing of good. Through his catechisms St. Canisius became the "mallet of heretics"; they were translated into every language in Europe and reprinted in countless editions, so that the name Canisius became synonymous with catechism.

Cardinal Bellarmine's Catechism appeared in two forms: "Dottrina Cristiana breve da impararsi a mente" (Compendium of Christian Doctrine to be Learned by Heart), 1597; and "Dichiarazione più copiosa della dottrina Cristiana" (A More Thorough Explanation of Christian Doctrine), 1598. The first is for pupils, the second for teachers. In the first the teacher asks the question and the pupil replies, whereas in the second the process is reversed. The first was recommended at the Vatican Council to serve as a model for the projected universal catechism.

Butler's Catechism was drawn up in 1775 by Dr. James Butler, Abp. of Cashel, and used in various editions and with some slight changes throughout Ireland for a century. A modified edition of Butler's Catechism was published in 1882 and became known as the "Maynooth Catechism." A new revision was undertaken by a committee of priests, in 1892, under the direction of William Walsh, Abp. of Dublin, but the revised catechism was never published.

The Baltimore Catechism. The question of a uniform text-book of Christian doctrine was considered by the bishops not only at the First Provincial Council (1892), but also at the First (1852) and Second (1866) Plenary Councils of Baltimore. In the Third Plenary Council (1884) many bishops were in favor of a revised edition of Butler's Catechism. The matter was finally entrusted to a committee of six bishops, and in 1885 they issued the "Catechism of Christian Doctrine, Prepared and Enjoined by Order of the Third Council of Baltimore." Soon various editions with word-meanings, explanatory notes, and even with different arrangements, came forth, so that there is now considerable diversity in the books that go by the name of the Baltimore Catechism.—C.E., V, 75; Bandas, Catechetical Methods, N. Y., 1929. (k. 6. b.)

Catechism, Westminster, the Larger and the Shorter Catechisms prepared, 1647, by the Westminster Assembly, a synod of Calvinistic divines, London, 1645-52, which vainly tried to unite the churches of Great Britain on a Calvinistic basis. Both were approved by Parliament and by the Scottish Kirk, 1645. The Shorter, for public use, is extensively used by Protestants. The Larger, for ministers, is little used. Both contain an exposition of the Ten Commandments and of the Lord's Prayer. The Apostles' Creed is appended, also a statement of Calvinistic doctrine.

Catechumen (Gr., katekhoimenos, one instructed), a name applied to one undergoing instruction preparatory to the reception of Baptism and admission into the Church. Historically, there were three distinct classes of catechumens: audi­entes, or hearers; catechumens proper, sometimes called genuflectentes, or kneelers; and competentes, or those ready for Baptism.—C.E.

Categorical Imperative, a term coined by Immanuel Kant to characterize the moral law as thus enunciated: "Act so as to use humanity, in your own person or in others, always as an end, and never merely as a means." It is enacted by reason alone, is the sole motive of the will, an absolute imperative through mere respect for reason dictating its universality and necessity as based on humanity itself. It is a law unto itself, autonomous, and subject to no external lawgiver. Morality consists solely in obedience to this law of reason and in acting solely through respect for reason as a law. In criticism it is affirmed that man is not an end in himself but is subordinate to God as his ultimate end; nor is he autonomous, but is subject to God as his supreme Lord and Lawgiver. Reason does not enact the moral law but merely recognizes and proclaims it. It is of wider extension than the merely obligatory. The basis of morality is God as the ultimate end, highest good, and supreme lawgiver.—C.E.; Hill, Ethics, N. Y., 1920.

Cathari (Gr., katharos, pure), a name specifically applied to, or used by, several sects at various periods; the Novatians and the Manicheans (qq.v.) were frequently known as Cathari, but in its more usual sense Cathari was a general designation for the dualistic sects of the later Middle Ages. In spite of several radical differences, there is a tendency among recent historians to consider these Cathari as the lineal descendants of the Manicheans of the 3rd century, but conclusive proofs are lacking. The essential characteristic of the Catharist faith was dualism (q.v.), and as differences of opinion concerning this belief arose among the Cathari they became divided into various factions: the Bogomil in the East, and the Bagnolenses and Concorreenses in Italy, professors of a mitigated form of dualism, believing the evil principle inferior to the supreme beneficent principle; while the Albanenses in Italy, and almost all the non-Italian Cathari, among them the Albigenses, were rigid dualists, believing in the perfect equality of the good and evil principles. Besides directly assaulting the doctrines and hierarchy of the Catholic Church, the various tenets of the Cathari, as the denial of the value of oaths and of the right to punish, undermined the basis of the Christian State, while its abhorrence of generation and its commendation of suicide would have meant the extinction of the human race had the Catharist doctrine been triumphant; but by the 14th century it had practically disappeared from France, Germany, and England, while the 15th century saw the disappearance of the heresy in Italy and the Balkan States.—C.E.

Cathedra, kāth'e-drə, the throne or chair of a bishop in his cathedral church which he occupies during solemn ceremonies. In Latin the word is sometimes applied to denote an episcopal see. An ex-cathedra decision is an infallible pronouncement of the pope signifying that he speaks officially as Head of the Church.—C.E.

Cathedral, a bishop's official church where in his hierarchical capacity he presides, teaches, and conducts worship for the whole Christian community.—C.E.

Cathedral College (Saint Joseph's Seminary and College), New York, N. Y., founded, 1903; preparatory seminary under secular clergy. Professors, 24; students, 406.

Cathedral College of the Immaculate Conception, Brooklyn, N. Y.; founded, 1911; preparatory seminary under secular clergy. Professors, 21; students, 365.

Cathedral Schools, institutions under the management of a head schoolmaster, and open to lay pupils as well as those destined for the Church, developed in the 9th century from the episcopal schools founded a century or two earlier, by bishops who conducted them chiefly for clerics and were themselves the teachers. Chrodegang, Bp. of Metz (742-766), is the reputed founder of such schools. They flourished in France, Germany, England, and Spain, especially from the 11th or 12th century; and continued to be, with modifications, the public schools of western Europe down to the 18th century. In the medieval lower school, the trivium, including grammar, rhetoric, and dialectics, might be added the quadrivium, or arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music, with Scripture and theology. In cities and towns where there was no cathedral there were similar canonicate schools under the local canons. Well-known schools existed at York, Canterbury, and Chartres.—Marique, History of Christian Education, N. Y., 1924.

Cathedraticum (Lat., cathedra, episcopal seat or throne), a moderate tax paid yearly to a bishop by all the churches and benefices subject to his jurisdiction, in sign of their subjection and for his support. Exempt religious pay this tax if their churches are parish churches, or if a secular benefice is attached to them. The bishop's right to this tax is stated explicitly in canon 1504 of the Code. Custom determines the amount; otherwise it is decided in a provincial council, or meeting of the bishops of the province, and their decision has the force of law upon approval by the Holy See.—C.E. (c. N.)

Catherine de'Medici, dé ma'she-de'che (1519-89), Queen of Henry II of France. Her political career began with the accession of her son Francis II (1559), and continued during the reigns of her sons Charles IX and Henry III. The period was one of conflict between the Huguenots under the Prince de Condé and the Admiral de Coligny, and the Catholics led by the House of Guise. The culmination of the struggle was the Massacre of Saint Bartholomew's Day. Catherine lacked religion; she fluctuated between Catholics and Protestants; and her acting principle was the furtherance of her own political power.—C.E.

Catherine de' Ricci, de ret'che (ALEXANDRA LUCREZIA ROMOLA), SAINT (1522-90), Dominican nun of the Third Order, b. Florence; d. Prato, Italy. She entered the Dominican convent of San Vincenzo, Prato, 1535, of which she was prioress or sub-prioress until her death. She is famous for the "Ecstasy of the Passion" into which she was rapt every week for 12 years from Thursday noon until Friday at 4 p.m., during which she went through the stages of Our Lord's Passion showing all that the Blessed Mother suffered in witnessing it. Emblems: a ring, crown, crucifix. Canonized, 1746. Relics at convent of San Vincenzo, Prato. Feast, 13 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Catherine of Alexandria, SAINT, virgin, martyr (305), d. Alexandria. Of royal blood and great learning, she appeared at the age of 18 before the Emperor Maximinus, and endeavored to dissuade him from worship of false gods; her eloquence converted so many that she was condemned to die on the wheel but, at her touch, the instrument was miraculously destroyed. She was beheaded and her body carried by Mount Sinai where a church and monastery were dedicated to her. Her cult was very popular in the Middle Ages and she is numbered among the Fourteen Holy Helpers. Patroness of philosophers, the arts, wheelwrights, wagonmakers, teachers, students, and jurists. Emblems: a wheel, lamb, and sword. Her name occurs in the Ambrosian Canon of the Mass. Relics in monastery at the foot of Mt. Sinai. Feast, R. Cal., 25 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Catherine of Bologna, SAINT, virgin (1413-63), Poor Clare, mystical writer, b. Bologna; d. there. She entered at Ferrara a community of Dominican tertiaries whom she induced to adopt the Rule of St. Clare. Other monasteries were founded at Cremona and Bologna, of which last Catherine became abess. She wrote a “Treatise on the Seven Spiritual Weapons.” Patroness of the Academy of Art, Bologna. Canonized, 1712. Relics in chapel of her monastery, Bologna. Feast, O.F.M., 9 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Catherine of Genoa (Caterina Fieschi Angono), SAINT, widow (1447-1510), b. Genoa; d. there. Of an illustrious family, she was married at 16 to Giuliano Adorno, a young nobleman. After ten years of unhappiness and spiritual apathy, a divine light enabled her to appreciate the Love of God. Thenceforth her interior state was one of intense absorption in God. After the conversion and death of her husband, she cared for the sick in the hospital at Genoa. Her wonderful revelations she embodied in two works, “Dialogues of the Soul and Body” and “Treatise on Purgatory.” Canonized, 1737. Relics in church of her hospital, Genoa. Feast, 14 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Catherine of Siena, SAINT, virgin (1347-80), b. Siena, Italy; d. Rome. From her earliest childhood she began to see visions and practice extreme austerities; at 16 she joined the Dominican Tertiaries; and in 1366 she underwent the mystical experience known as the “spiritual espousals.” She then began her labor of caring for the sick, coming into close contact with those suffering from revolting diseases. She became the adviser of the rulers of the people be, even as where Jesus may be, there is the universal (catholic) Church.” The term continues to be found with ever-increasing frequency, in its technical sense, from this time forward; until by the 3rd century it was the commonly accepted formal title of the true Church, in contradistinction to all heretical or schismatic groups. The theological significance underlying the term “Catholic” was fully drawn out during the struggle with the Donatists. The Donatists had advanced a false conception of Church discipline and organization, and claimed to be the one true Church of Christ. St. Optatus and St. Augustine in refuting them evolved the theology on the marks of the true Church, insisting especially on the note of Catholicity as a definite mark. This note they pointed out was wholly inapplicable to the Donatist sect, which was confined to one section of Africa. The theological discussion of the note of Catholicity, as applied to the true Church of Christ, is ordinarily concentrated on the concept of widespread diffusion throughout the world with a conspicuously great number of members. It should be noted at once, however, that the true notion of Catholicity involves a twofold element: the material and the formal. Not only should there be a notable diffusion throughout the world which is the material element; but there should also be a definite unity in this diffusion. In other words, that which is diffused, viz., the Church, should be one and the same everywhere. Catholicity is a mode of unity; it is, as it were, the amplitude of unity. The Catholicity of the Church, therefore, must be formal as well as material. Many theologians of other communions, particularly of the Anglican Church, have taken the term “catholic” in the ordinary profane sense, as meaning unlimited comprehensiveness. By applying this sense to the Church of Christ, they have evolved a notion of the Church Catholic, which to them signifies a Church which is able and willing to include all opinions however contradictory. This sense of the term “catholic” is absolutely at variance with the sense intended by the Fathers of the Church, and by the theologians who have succeeded them during the centuries. They used the term in a technical sense, to distinguish sharply the True Church from all religious organizations which claimed to be of Christ but which did not hold perfectly to His teachings. It was used as a mark of opposition to every teaching which threatened unity and stability. To use it now as a cover for disunity and instability directly contravenes the primary intention of that note which has always distinguished the Catholic Church from all others, viz., widespread diffusion with perfect unity.—C.E.; Devivier-Mesamer, Christian Apologetics, N. Y., 1903.

Catholic Association, The, perpetuates in Great Britain the name of an organization instituted in Ireland by Daniel O'Connell at the time he was preparing the way for the Catholic Emancipation Act of 1829. It was founded in London with the approbation of Card. Manning, 1891, the prime movers were Edward Lucas (chairman) and Charles Munich (secretary), while the committee of management included among others Lord Archibald Douglas, Mgr. Nugent, Lord Godolphin Osborne, and James Britten. In those days the association had some political significance, and its main object was “to organize Catholics into a compact body for the protection and advancement of Catholic interests” with view to securing the return of Catholics as poor law guardians, members of the then existing vestries, school boards, and other non-party local-governing bodies. In the course of years the association’s work has been modified as some of the former official bodies have ceased to function, and by the advent of fresh Catholic societies which specialize more directly on its original main purpose. At the present time its principal object is to promote unity and good fellowship among Catholics by means of pilgrimages, social gatherings, and lectures. Lord Denbigh was elected president, 1894, and continues to hold this office (1929). During the Holy Year, 1900, the association organized what was at that date the largest pilgrimage which had ever left the shores of England for Rome, over 1000 pilgrims taking part in what was a great manifestation of Catholic faith in England. Since that time pilgrimages have increased numbers to Antwerp, Bruges, the Holy Land, Lourdes, Spain, Rome, and other places of special Catholic interest in Europe, as well as to many of the homeland shrines. During the Jubilee year, 1925, seven different pilgrimages were conducted to Rome, the numbers participating being about 2500. As many as 5000 pilgrims yearly have been taken to Lourdes since the World War. The Catholic Association is directed by an honorary board, and charges are kept as low as is consistent with efficiency. Any profits accruing from the activities of the association are distributed among Catholic charities. It publishes a monthly organ, “The Pilgrim’s Scrip.”

Catholic Benevolent Legion, a fraternal life insurance society with headquarters in Brooklyn, N. Y., organized in 1881. Its object is to unite fraternally for social, benevolent, and intellectual improvement, Catholic men between the ages of 18 and 55. Life insurance not to exceed $5000 was given in various amounts to members according to an optional classification, assessments for which were governed by the age of the member. The original figures of these have been increased to meet the requirements of sounder insurance.—C.E.

Catholic Boys’ Brigade of the United States, a semi-military organization founded in New York City, 1917, through the efforts of Rev. Thomas Lynch and Michael Lonergan, with the approval of Card. Farley. It aims to unite boys as they leave the public school, to keep them in touch with the Church, and to provide for their spiritual, physical, and social well-being. The organization became nation-wide with the approval of the Holy See, 1921, and led to the establishment of courses in boy leadership in many young men’s Catholic colleges, 1924. The result has become manifest in a decrease of Catholic boy delinquents in juvenile courts, and in the increase of boy helpers in parish work.—C.E. Suppl.

Catholic Central Verein of America, organization formed at Baltimore, Md., 1855, by the union of 17 benevolent societies whose members were Catholics of German birth or descent. Its aims are to promote a Christian philosophy of life, to apply its ideals to industrial, commercial, social, civic, and political problems, to defend religious liberty, to promote the restoration of society on a Christian basis, to foster brotherly love among its members, to advance civic virtues and the fulfillment of public duty, and to work for an increase of justice and charity in all human relations. It has exerted its influence in the field of Catholic education and has aided German immigrants by the founding of the Leo Home in New York, 1887. It maintains a Central Bureau in St. Louis, Mo., and state federations and societies have become affiliated with it, so that it now comprises 20 state leagues of which 1200 societies are members and has a total enrollment of 90,000. It publishes a monthly organ, the “Central Blatt and Social Justice.”

Catholic Church

As he is familiarly called, dwelling in Rome, assisted by the college of cardinals as his senate who help to administer the affairs of the Church as heads of various congregations or commissions, and exercising his jurisdiction through the hierarchy, the bishops of over 1200 dioceses, and over 320 vicars and prefects Apostolic, as Peter did through the Apostles. Catholic belief is formulated in the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian Creeds, by general councils, and by the pope when teaching ex cathedra (q.v.). It is founded not only on what the Apostles left in writing in the New Testament, but on all that comes down from them through tradition. Since the Bible is the word of God, it is not left to the private judgment of everyone to interpret, but is entrusted to the Head of the Church, who, when there is need of defining any article of belief, acts only after mature study and deliberation, aided by the advice of the bishops and theologians, whether in or out of councils, and with the special guidance of the Holy Ghost, protected from error in interpreting the revelation of God as the inspired writers were when recording it. Of great importance in the organization of the Church are: the training of the priests, their zeal in preaching and in the administration of the sacraments, and their devotion to their congregations; the religious communities of men and women, devoted to the work of foreign and parochial missions, education, and to all the works of mercy; the confraternities, sodalities, and benevolent societies of the laity who actively assist the priests and the religious communities of the various spheres.

The Catholic population of the world is estimated at 334,664,791, of which number 29,273,022 are in the United States or its dependencies, and 15,925,950 in the British Empire. There are in the United States: 17 archbishops (including 4 cardinals), 104 bishops, and 26,353 priests; in Great Britain: 6 archbishops (including 1 cardinal), 25 bishops, and 4958 priests; for Ireland, Australia, Philippines, and other dependencies, see their separate articles. Tables of the entire hierarchy (Latin Rite and Oriental Rites) are given below.

Catholic Church Extension Society, association founded in Chicago, 1905, to develop missionary spirit among Catholics and for the support of churches in poor localities of the United States. Among its activities are the building of churches in poor districts and the support of priests in such parishes, the education of students for missionary work, and the circulation of Catholic literature. An interesting feature of the society are the chapel cars, which enable missionaries to work at distant points along the railroad lines. "The Extension Magazine" is published monthly and has a circulation of 273,732. The women's auxiliary and the "Child Apostles" are affiliated associations. The Catholic Church Extension Society of Canada publishes the "Catholic Register" weekly.

Catholic Council for International Relations, The, founded in 1924 under the presidency of Cardinal Bourne and composed of representatives of 19 Catholic societies of England, Scotland, and Wales. Its aim is to assist the sovereign pontiff in his efforts to establish "the Peace of Christ in the Reign of Christ." It endeavors to give Catholics in Great Britain a greater and more sympathetic knowledge of their fellow Catholics in other countries; to create a Catholic public opinion, informed by the tradition of the Church, which shall be a real power for international justice and peace; to enable Catholics to understand, appreciate, and when necessary, criticize from the standpoint of religion, the international organizations and movements of the day. function of the Holy See, the League of Nations, and such international topics. It has held conferences at Reading, Oxford, Southend, London, and Birmingham, and arranged for British representation at Catholic international congresses on many subjects, in Europe. By means of pamphlets and the quarterly publication of "A Catholic Survey," it establishes Catholic principles of international morality and justice. It is affiliated to the "Union Catholique d'Etudes Internationales," and is in touch with Catholic peace-societies all over the world.

Catholic Daily Tribune, newspaper, the only Catholic daily in the English language; published at Dubuque, Ia.; founded, 1920; circulation, 18,022.

Catholic Educational Association, voluntary organization of Catholic educators and others interested in Catholic education in America, founded in St. Louis, Mo., 1904. Its purpose is to provide the opportunity for Catholic educators to meet for the discussion of their problems, and to safeguard the interests of Catholic education. The association comprises a seminary department, a department of Catholic colleges and secondary schools, and a parish school department. Its development is due largely to the zeal of Bp. Howard of Covington. Its headquarters are in Columbus, O., but meetings are held annually in various cities, reports of which are published. The Educational Association Bulletin is issued quarterly.—C.E., V, 305.

Catholic Education Council, an advisory body to the hierarchy of England and Wales on all matters relating to elementary schools, secondary schools, and training colleges. It is recognized by the Board of Education as the agent of Catholic managers and governors in any difficulties connected with Catholic schools arising in the administration of the Education Act, 1921. Its main source of income is an annual collection made in all churches by direction of the hierarchy from which it votes grants: to Catholic training colleges; towards the expenses of religious inspection of schools; towards private elementary schools not in receipt of assistance from public funds; and towards the traveling expenses of children in scattered country districts to enable them to attend the nearest Catholic school. The council also acts as a bureau of information and advice for Catholic managers and governors. In recent years it has organized an educational section at the triennial National Catholic Congress, and an annual conference of Catholic members of education committees and representatives of Catholic secondary schools.

Catholic Educational Review, monthly magazine published by the Catholic Educational Press at Washington, D. C., devoted to the interests of Catholic schools, and under the direction of the Department of Education, Catholic University of America; founded 1911; circulation, 1800.

Catholic Encyclopedia, T.X. The need of a Catholic Encyclopedia in English was manifest for many years, emphasized by the fact that subjects of interest to Catholics were either ignored or erroneously treated in other encyclopedias. For two years before the formation of a Board of Editors, those who were later to compose it met to confer with its publishers, and on the feast of the Immaculate Conception, 1905, they decided to publish an "international work of reference on the constitution, doctrine, discipline, and history of the Catholic Church." The editors were Charles G. Herbermann, A.M., D.D., K.S.C.; Edward A. Pace, D.D., Ph.D., Condé B.ullen, Ph.D., LL.D., Thomas J. Shahan, D.D., and John J. Wynne, S.J., S.T.D.; the publishers, the Robert Appleton Company (name changed in 1914 to the Encyclopedia Press). The former had long been engaged in editorial work; familiar with the educational field and the needs of Catholic au­ 182

Catholic Press Directory, organized, 1925, with headquarters in Chicago, gives a complete list of Catholic papers and periodicals published in the United States, with their addresses and a brief statement explaining the nature of each publication. Parish monthlies, college journals, school papers, etc., are not included.

Catholic Prisoners’ Aid Society, THE, deals with necessitous Catholics on their discharge from prison or police court, and, if necessary, with dependents of prisoners while the latter are in prison; its essential object is reclamation by means of religion. The society came into existence under the auspices of Card. Vaughan through the efforts of Canon John Cooney, at that time chaplain at Wandsworth prison. English prison regulations require prisoners on admission to state their religion, and to attend the appropriate prison services; thus a Catholic prisoner attends Mass and is seen, more or less frequently according to the length of his term, by the prison Catholic chaplain, and also by the prison Catholic visitor who takes particulars of the prisoner’s case, his prospects on release, and the circumstances of any dependents he may have. After investigation applications are laid before the society’s executive; before the prisoner’s release a course of action is decided. Material assistance varies according to the prisoner’s sex, age, and occupation. Discharged female prisoners may be provided with temporary maintenance in a special home managed by ladies, who find them employment and supply any clothing required; or they may be placed for longer periods in suitable convent homes. Cases frequently occur in which the magistrates, instead of sentencing an offender to imprisonment, discharge her on probation, but require her (under penalties) to remain for a time under the friendly supervision of a lady probation officer. Several of the society’s lady workers are probation officers. The corresponding duties in regard to male offenders discharged on probation in London are undertaken by the Society of St. Vincent de Paul. For men discharged after a term of imprisonment the society endeavors to find honest employment; meanwhile, if necessary, providing them with board and lodging, clothes, tools, etc. A considerable number who may have diaries of the English College at Douai; a volume of documentary evidence concerning the English martyrs; annals of the English community of Blue Nuns in Paris from 1658 to the dissolution in 1792; documents relating to the Ven. Philip Howard; and 16 volumes of “Miscellaneous” which have proved of great value to serious students of history and others. Subscribers of one guinea per annum are entitled to any of the society’s publications during the year. The affairs of the society are managed by a council, to which only Catholic members may belong.

Catholic Rural Life. The purpose of the Catholic rural life movement is the upbuilding of country parishes, recognizing in the rural community an important source of urban as well as of country population. The movement aims at the economic, social, hygienic, cultural, and religious rehabilitation of Catholic rural communities in the United States. The Rural Life Bureau is a division of the Social Action Department of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, established in 1921, with its office at Eugene, Lane Co., Ore., where it remained until Jan., 1929, when it was moved to the headquarters of the N.C.W.C. in Washington, D. C. The Catholic Rural Life Conference was organized at St. Louis, Mo., in 1923, at the call of the Catholic Rural Life Bureau. The conference is governed by a board of 18 directors chosen from as many different states. Since its organization it has held annually a national convention for the promotion of the Catholic rural life movement. Its official organ is “Catholic Rural Life,” a monthly established in 1921 as “St. Isidore’s Plow,” and first issued at Eugene, Ore.; the name was changed in 1924; circulation, 2582. Editor, Dr. Frank O’Hara, Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C. (E. V. W.)

Catholic Record Society, THE, an organization, founded, 1904, largely through the efforts of Joseph S. Hansom, to transcribe, print, index, and distribute to its members, the Catholic registers of baptism, marriages, and deaths, and other old records of the faith, chiefly personal and genealogical, since the Reformation in England and Wales. About 30 volumes have thus far been issued, including several diaries of the English College at Douai; a volume of documentary evidence concerning the English martyrs; annals of the English community of Blue Nuns in Paris from 1658 to the dissolution in 1792; documents relating to the Ven. Philip Howard; and 16 volumes of “Miscellaneous” which have proved of great value to serious students of history and others. Subscribers of one guinea per annum are entitled to any of the society’s publications during the year. The affairs of the society are managed by a council, to which only Catholic members may belong.

Catholic Social Guild, an organization in England to promote interest in social questions among Catholics, and to aid in the practical application of the Church’s principles to existing social conditions. It was established, 1909, as the result of a meeting held at the annual conference of the Catholic Truth Society, Manchester, 1909, and adopted Leo XIII’s Encyclical, “On the Condition of the Working Classes,” as its charter and program. It functions as a teaching service, publishes books and pamphlets on social problems, maintains meetings, conferences, study clubs, summer schools and a college for workingmen at Oxford, and holds examinations for social workers. It acts as a bureau of information, national and international. The headquarters of the guild were established at Oxford, 1919, and the following year the publication of “The Christian Democrat,” a monthly which is the official organ of the guild, was begun. Among the noted publications of the society are: “The Primer of Peace and War” by Plater, “The Nation’s Crisis” by Card. Bourne and “The Worker’s Right to Live” by Fr. Bernard Vaughan.

Catholic Stage Guild, The, organization in London, existing for the purpose of encouraging spiritual, artistic, and social intercourse among Catholics connected with the theatrical profession, thus rendering service to them and exercising a beneficial influence on the stage. The guild’s ambitions include the making of an international library of Christian dramatic literature; the private production of appropriate plays; and eventually the possession of its own theater. Monthly discussions as well as frequent social gatherings are held, and once a year an “Actors’ Mass” is said at the church of Corpus Christi, Maiden Lane. Membership is open to all Catholics; active members belong professionally to the theater and allied arts; associate members are those who, while not qualified for active membership, share the wish to foster the aspirations of the guild.
Catholic Standard and Times, official weekly newspaper of the Archdiocese of Philadelphia, founded as the “Catholic Standard,” 1866; combined with the “Catholic Times” under its present name, 1895; circulation, 45,525.
Catholic Telegraph, weekly newspaper pub-ished in Cincinnati, O., founded 1831; circulation, 13,100.
Catholic Theater Movement, The, a society founded, 1912, by John Card. Farley, to conduct an organized effort against irreligious and immoral tendencies in public amusements. At its inception an appeal was made for the cooperation, not only of the Catholic public, but of all God-fearing people who wished to protect themselves and their families against amusements opposed to Christian standards.
The principal activity of the organization is a “White List” of plays, published as a suggested, not an imposed guide. In addition, critical “Bulletins” are issued and are given generous space in the Catholic press; correspondence is carried on with pastors, parents, and teachers throughout the country; and nightly radio talks are given over station WLWL. The society receives the enthusiastic support of His Eminence Card. Hayes, its honorary president, and is under the immediate direction of Mgr. Michael J. Lavelle.—C.E. Suppl.
Catholic Transcript, the official weekly organ of the Diocese of Hartford, Conn.; founded 1898;
circulation, 30,126.
Catholic Truth Societies, in England. The Catholic Truth Society was initiated by Dr. (afterwards Card.) Vaughan when rector of St. Joseph’s Missionary College, and practically ceased to exist after 1872. Later Dr. Vaughan, as Bp. of Salford, became acquainted with the labors of some priests and laymen who were distributing cards of prayers and with them he reorganized the society in 1884. The aims of the society are: the spreading, among Catho-ilces, of small devotional works, and, among Protestants, of information concerning the Catholic faith and practises; the aiding of the uneducated poor in obtaining a better knowledge of their religion; and the promoting of the circulation of good and inexpensive Catholic literature. A certain proportion of the society’s publications must needs be exposures of the fictions propagated in England by Protestants, as well as considerations of the Anglican claims, but the publication for Catholics of devotional and educational works, at nominal prices, is the chief object. The society has published a great number of pamphlets and books containing prayers, book and other works in Gaelic, stories for young people, etc.; this work is supported by subscriptions, as the nominal sum charged for the publications could not defray the expenses.
For seventeen years the society held an annual Catholic conference which, since 1910, has been merged in the National Catholic Congress. The highest ecclesiastical authorities have given the Catholic Truth Society their cordial approval and support, and it is indulgenced by the Holy See.
In Ireland. The Catholic Truth Society of Ireland was organized at the meeting of Maynooth Union in 1899 for the purpose of printing and disseminating edifying and instructive Catholic literature, both to create a taste for wholesome literature, and to present an antidote against the poison of dangerous or immoral writings. The society has received the earnest support of the hierarchy and laity of Ireland, and besides religious, national, historical, and biographical publications, has made an interesting experiment in printing a prayer book and other works in Gaelic.
In Australia. The Australian Catholic Truth Society was started in 1904, has its headquarters in Melbourne, and has been active in the dissemination of sound Catholic literature and in the spreading of publications that are an antidote to works subversive of faith and morals.
In the United States, the official title is the International Catholic Truth Society (n.v.).—C.E., XV, 77.
Catholic Union and Times, official Catholic newspaper of the Diocese of Buffalo, N. Y.; founded 1872; circulation, 37,561.
Catholic University of America, Washington, D. C.; founded, 1887; is supported by the bishops of the United States; schools of philosophy, letters, sciences, law, sacred sciences, canon law; summer school; professors, 114; students (including Sisters College, Trinity College, and Summer School), 2,345; degrees conferred in 1929, 237.
Catholic Women’s League, The, a non-political English organization for the promotion of religious and intellectual activities, and social work;
for ensuring the representation of Catholic interests on public bodies; and for the formation and col-mctive expression of Catholic opinion. There is a Junior League for girls of 14 and upwards. The C.W.L. engages in many active social works, such as infant welfare, girls’ clubs and hotels, and par-
}
Lady's Catechists, and the Union of Catholic Mothers. In Palestine it has opened a weaving-school for Catholic Arab girls. Internationally, the C.W.L. of England and Wales is part of a worldwide organization, consisting of about 55 Leagues corresponding to 26 nationalities, designed to place the organized energies of Catholic women at the service of the Church, for the defense of Catholic principles. (E. V. W.)

Catholic World, The, a national monthly magazine of general literature and science, published by the Paulist Fathers in New York; founded 1865; circulation, 10,000.

Caqua, kas'da, island 20 m. off the south coast of Cuba, passed by St. Paul on his journey to Rome (Acts, 27), where precautions were taken for weathering the storm. It probably coincides with the present Gaudo Island.

Caughnawaga, or Sault St. Louis, an Iroquois reservation, situated on the St. Lawrence, near the Lachine Rapids above Montreal; area, 12,327 acres; population (2100 in 1905) almost all Catholics. Fr. Raffex, S.J., founded in 1667 a Christian community at Laprairie opposite Montreal. This mission after being moved several times was transferred to Caughnawaga in 1716, and is now under the care of Jesuits. The Indians are intelligent and industrious, being occupied in farming, bead-work, etc. The village contains a church, schools, and a hospital. It is governed by a mayor and council. Catherine Tekakwitha, "Lily of the Mohawks," whose process of beatification has been begun, spent her last years there and her tomb nearby is a place of pilgrimage. —C.E.

Cause (Lat., causa), a primary notion derived from observation of occurring changes. In general, defined as: a principle which by its positive influence determines the existence of something else. Four causes are enumerated as mutually contributing to the final result: (1) material cause, or the thing that is changed; (2) formal cause, or the new manner of being induced; (3) efficient cause, or the active agent effecting the change; (4) final cause, or the reason why the agent acts. An intelligent agent's mental pattern of an intended effect is the exemplary cause or idea. All things created are actualities of exemplary ideas formulated in the Divine intellect from eternity. Efficient causality is of chief concern. Every effect of an efficient cause is either a new entity or a new state, i.e., a creation or a change. Creation is attributable to God alone as the Primary Cause, all other causes but modify things that already exist. —C.E.; Crumley, Logic, N. Y., 1928.
martyrdom and were buried by St. Cecilia. She was then arrested, and placed in an overheated room, but was miraculously saved from suffocation and decapitated in her own home. From her zeal in singing the praises of God, Cecilia has been associated with music; many musical societies and academies are named in her honor. She is mentioned in the Canon of the Mass. In very early art she is usually represented in a prayerful attitude wearing the crown of martyrdom; since the 14th century she is depicted playing the organ, as she appears in the famous picture by Raphael at Bologna. Patroness of musicians, organ-builders, singers, and poets. Emblem: musical instruments. Her relics, discovered by Pope Paschal I in that portion of the Catacomb of Callistus known as St. Cecilia's cemetery, were moved to her church in the Trastevere quarter of Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 22 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Cedd (Ceddra), Saint, abbot (d. 664), Bp. of the East Saxons, b. Northumbria, England; d. Lastingham. He was educated with his brother St. Chad (Caedda) at Lindisfarne under St. Aidan. He was engaged in missionary work among Middle Angles and the East Saxons. In 654 he was consecrated Bp. of the East Saxons at London. Like St. Cuthbert he favored the Ronlan rather than the Celtic Rite. He founded the monastery of Lastingham in Yorkshire and became its first abbot. He died of the pestilence. Feast, 7 Jan.—C.E.; Butler, ed. Thurston.

Cedron, kēd’ron, or Kidron (Heb., dark), Brook or, ravine 20 m. long, E. of Jerusalem near the Mt. of Olives (2 Kings, 15; 3 Kings, 2; Jer., 31). Christ crossed it to Gethsemani (John, 18). Traditional tomb of the Blessed Virgin is venerated in the Valley of the Cedron.—C.E.

Celebrant, the priest who celebrates Mass; a bishop celebrating is said to pontificate. (Ed.)

Celebreb (Lat., let him celebrate), a testimonial given to a priest when traveling that he is in good standing, with the accompanying request that he be permitted to say Mass. Secular priests receive these from their ordinaries; religious from their superiors; orientals, traveling through Latin jurisdictions, from the Congregation for the Oriental Church. These testimonials should be of recent origin.—C.E. Suppl.

Celestial Hierarchy, an order of superiority or government among the angels, who are preeminently celestial beings. If we consider this order from the part of God, there is but one celestial hierarchy: the absolute, supreme dominion of God over all the angels. If, however, we consider this order from the part of the angels themselves, we find three distinct grades of superiority in which the inferior differ in perfection from the higher angels and, accordingly, are subject to them. Each of these grades or orders is called a celestial hierarchy; "celestial," in opposition to the ecclesiastical hierarchy, i.e. the order of government in God's church upon earth. And even as in the ecclesiastical hierarchy, there are three grades, bishops, priests, and deacons, subordinate one to the other; so, too, in each angelic hierarchy there are three groups differing in perfection and power, one from the other. These subdivisions of the angels are called choirs. (See ANGELS.)—Vonier, The Holy Angels, N. Y., 1928; O'Connell, The Holy Angels, N. Y., 1928. (A. J. S.)

Celestine I (Lat., heavenly), Saint, Pope (422-432), d. Rome. He was a Roman and a friend of Augustine, and defended the Church against the SemiPelagian heresy. He excommunicated Nestorius, strengthened the Faith in outlying provinces, brought about the testimonial of devotion shown to Our Lady of Ephesus, and sent St. Palladius and St. Patrick to preach the Gospel to Ireland. Feast, 6 April.—C.E.; Butler.

Celestine II (Guido del Castello), Pope (1145-48), b. Tuscany, Italy; d. Rome. He was a Roman and a friend of Augustine, and defended the Church against the SemiPelagian heresy. He excommunicated Nestorius, strengthened the Faith in outlying provinces, brought about the testimonial of devotion shown to Our Lady of Ephesus, and sent St. Palladius and St. Patrick to preach the Gospel to Ireland. Feast, 6 April.—C.E.; Butler, ed. Thurston.

Celestine III (Giacinto Busone), Pope (1191-98), b. Rome; d. there. A cardinal, he became a priest, was consecrated bishop, elected pope on consecutive days. He appointed and crowned Henry VI of Germany. Although lenient with Henry, he was firm with Alfonso IX of Leon and Philip Augustus of France in defense of the ecclesiastical marriage laws. He confirmed the military Order of Teutonic Knights.—C.E.; Mann.

Celestine IV (Guido Castilmoni), Pope (1241), b. Milan, Italy; d. Rome. A Cistercian, and Card.-Bp. of Sabina, he was elected pope during the papal warfare with Frederick Barbarossa, and reigned only 15 days.—C.E.; Mann.

Celestine V (Pietro di Murbone), Saint who (1294), b. Isernia, Italy; 1215; d. near Anagni, 1296. He was a Benedictine, lived a life of solitude, and founded the Benedictine Celestines. Two years after the death of Nicholas IV he was elected pope by the Council of Perugia. An unwilling and incapable occupant of the papal chair, he committed many mistakes, and resigned after a pontificate of five months. His successor, Boniface VIII, kept him closely guarded in case a faction should seek to restore him. Canonized, 1313. Feast, 19 May.—C.E.; Kirchenlexicon.

Celibacy (Lat., celibes, unmarried), in the Latin Church and in its strictest sense a positive obligation imposed by ecclesiastical law on certain clerics of observing perfect chastity under vow. This obligation is the foundation of the negative side of celibacy, viz., the prohibition to marry or to use marriage rights if already married, for those who come under the law of celibacy. Following the lead of her Divine Founder the Church has always held celibacy and virginity, especially for the primitive Church demanding celibacy for the clergy; customs, however, introduced the obligation which was latterly confirmed by written legislation. From the time of Pope Gregory the Great (590-604), celibacy was imposed on all clerics in major orders; and though the practice did not always conform with the legislation, the Roman pontiffs always insisted on it. The present law of the Code repeats the previous legislation for the Latin Church for all clerics in major orders. Clerics in Sacred Orders, who presume to marry, even only civilly, are by that very act under excommunication specially reserved to the Holy See. They also lose any office they may hold without any declaration being necessary.

Minor clerics are not obliged by the law of celibacy but if they attempt marriage they are thereby reduced to the lay state. Oriental clerics are not bound by these laws. They may not licitly, and more probably not validly marry after the reception of the subdeaconship. If they have been married before that time they may use marriage rights.—Ayrinhac, General Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1923; C.E.

Cell, small monastery or nunnery dependent on a larger house. Cells originated with the Benedictine Order and were commonly built on property belonging to the mother-house. Originally they were under the jurisdiction of provosts or deans, subject to removal by the superior of the main house. The inhabitants of these cells were obliged to contribute annually a definite amount of their incomes to the monastery to which they belonged and to appear personally on certain occasions. Cell also signifies the individual chamber or hut of a nun, monk, or hermit.

Cella (Lat., little room), one of the names of the small memorial chapels erected in earliest Christian cemeteries, also called memoria martyrum. It is supposed that the edifices erected by Pope Fabian (236-250) were cellar, used for the celebration of the funeral apar; in form they are celle tricoro, consisting of a rectangular nave terminating in three semicircular apses—C.E.

Cellarer, medieval name for the chief purveyor of foodstuffs and drinks for the use of a monastic community. He took charge of the hired servants, superintended the serving of meals, the supplying of fuel, carriage of goods, repairs of the house, etc. In recent times the title procurator is often used for this official.

Cellini, BENVENUTO (1500-71), goldsmith and worker in bronze, b. Florence; d. there. He worked exclusively as a goldsmith, the leading one of his day, until he visited the court of Francis I, in 1537, when he began casting bronze statues. His masterpiece is the colossal "Perseus" of the Loggia dei Lanzi in Florence, executed for Cosimo de' Medici, 1546. The story of its casting is vividly told in his famous autobiography and is an egotistical but picturesque record of his adventurous life. It includes his description of the siege of Rome, 1527, where he claimed to have killed the Constable de Bourbon and wounded the Prince of Orange. Among exquisite examples of his work are the salt-cellar of Francis I, now in the Vienna Museum, the cople of the latter, and the intricately wrought golden salt-cellar of Francis I, now in the Vienna museum. —C.E.

Celtic Rite, term applied not to one uniform rite, but to a variety of rites used in the ancient churches of Great Britain and Ireland, also in some monasteries founded by St. Columbanus and his disciples in France, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. Little certain knowledge is to be had about them. They were in use about the 13th century, and differed from other rites in determining the date of Easter, the form of tonsure, and the manner of administering Baptism. They were composed of original, Gallic, and Roman elements.—C.E. (M. E. D.)

Cemetery (Gr., keimai, lie down), a park-like enclosure reserved especially as a burial place. The blessing of cemeteries may be performed either solemnly or simply. The solemn blessing is contained in the Roman Pontifical and can be imparted only by the ordinary of the diocese. The simple blessing is contained in the Roman Ritual and may be imparted by the bishop himself or a delegated priest. If the cemetery belongs to exempt religious, the superior or his delegated priest may perform the blessing. It is not necessary that each grave be blessed at the time of burying a corpse therein. The blessing may only be lost by desecrating. Thus, should a homicide, or bloodshed, or grave profanity be committed, or an insulter or excommunicated person be buried in the cemetery, it is thereby desecrated, and a reblessing is required and performed by the compe-Cenacle (Lat., cenaeculum, dining-room), the upper room in Jerusalem where Our Saviour celebrated the Paschal Supper, instituted the Blessed Sacrament, washed the feet of His Apostles, and gave the wonderful discourse contained in the Gospel of St. John. There He appeared to His Apostles eight days after His death. In the same place the Holy Ghost descended upon the Apostles. (E. F. D.)

Cenobite (Gr., koinos, common; bios, life), a monk who forms one of a religious community, as distinguished from a hermit or anchorite, one who leads a solitary or eremitical life. The cenobitical type of monasticism was instituted by St. Pachomius in the East, c. 318, and, considerably modified by St. Basil, gradually replaced the eremitical.

Its introduction into the West dates from the visit to Rome of St. Athanasius, c. 340. The greatest development, adapting it to Western needs, came through St. Benedict's Rule. See Monasticism.

Censor (Lat., incendere, to burn) or THURIBLE (Lat., thuribulum, incense holder; thus, incense), a metal vessel in the shape of a vase or cup, with cover suspended by chains. It is used for burning incense at solemn offices of the Church. The cleric who carries it is called thurifer (incense-bearer).—C.E.; MacMahon, Liturgical Catechism, Dub., 1926.

Censorship, supervision of publications, whether print or picture, by the civil or religious authorities, to prevent abuse thereof.—C.E.

Censors of Books, clerics, in practise always priests, appointed according to canon law by the bishop of a diocese to examine, before publication, those writings or other things that are to be submitted to ecclesiastical supervision. The censors are to be chosen either from the secular or regular clergy. Conditions of age, learning, and prudence are to be considered in naming them. As a guarantee of fitness the censors, before entering upon their office, make a profession of faith before the bishop or his vicar-general. In examining what is submitted to them, they must lay aside favoritism and consider the teachings of the Church and the laws of sound morals in order to determine whether the things in question may be given to the public with safety. In each case the censor must give his opinion in writing. If his opinion is favorable, the permission to publish is granted. The fact of the favorable view of the censor must be shown on the publication. This is usually done by placing there the Latin words, Nihil obstat, meaning "Nothing hinders the publication," and the name of the censor. Then follows the word, Imprimatur, the name of the local bishop or of his vicar, and the place and date of permission. Chiefly works on religious subjects or those which have a bearing on religion are presented for censorship. See Imprimatur.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine; Woywod.

Censures, Theological, doctrinal judgments by which the Church stigmatizes certain teachings detrimental to faith or morals.—C.E.

Census, an official enumeration of the people of a country to obtain statistics concerning their ages, occupations, education, and the like. In ancient Rome the census was taken with a view to taxation. In canon law, census means a tax or tribute imposed on a benefice, usually by a bishop and payable to himself. In diocesan and parochial usage it is the enumeration of the faithful, and certain data about their spiritual needs and conditions. A census or enrollment of the people is mentioned several times in the O.T. and notably in the N.T. (Luke, 2), the enrollment of "the whole world" which occasioned the journey of Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem where Christ was born.—C.E.

Center Party, a political party founded by the Catholics of Germany in 1870 to defend in Parliament the rights of their Church. In 1892 a Catholic fraction with representatives of the Rhineland and Westphalia had been admitted into the lower house of Prussia, and after 1858 this Catholic fraction called itself the Catholic Center Party because it occupied the central section of the house. In 1870, when the Prussian Conservatives or Orthodox Protestants and the Liberals supported Bismarck's Kulturkampf against the Catholics, the latter united under Ludwig Windthorst. The platform of the Center Party was as follows: (1) the preservation of the fundamental character of the empire as a federal state; (2) the promotion of the moral and material welfare of all classes; (3) constitutional guarantees for the civil and religious liberty of all classes; and protection of all religious organizations against encroachments of the legislature. Many Protestants became affiliated with the party, which, under the capable leadership of Windthorst, continued to grow in strength so that by 1878 it had become so powerful that Bismarck himself felt the need of its support for his economic program, and began to work for the abrogation of the anti-Catholic laws passed at his dictation. The Center Party has since played an important part in Germany's political life. During the revolution of 1918 it held the balance of power in the Reich. Essentially a middle party, with firm Catholic principles, it has as a whole advocated recognition of the Weimar constitution, fulfillment of the Treaty of Versailles with the object of conciliating Germany's former enemies, a policy of compromise and moderation to adjust conflicting interests in the Reich, and denominational education and closer relations with the Vatican. At the last elections the Center Party obtained 68 seats in the Reichstag and represents over 4,000,000 votes. The party now finds support in the Rhineland, Wurttemberg, the Rhineland and the Ruhr, which touches on Westphalia, and in Silesia. There have been over 20 governments in power in Germany since 1919, and the Center has been represented in them all. —Sencourt.

Centurion, centū'tō (Lat., rag, patchwork), literary composition constructed by choosing passages of prose or poetry from one or more authors so as to form a whole having no connection with the original subjects, especially popular during the Middle Ages. The Byzantine empress Eudoxia is credited with having formed a history of the fall and redemption of man with lines from the works of Homer, while the works of Vergil supplied the material for the notable "Centuriatsalis" compiled by the Roman poet Ausonius, and for a Life of Christ, compiled in 1634 by Alexander Ross.

Central America, which physically speaking should comprise all the land between the low-lying isthmuses of Tehuantepec and Panama, is conventionally restricted to the modern political divisions of Guatemala, British Honduras, Honduras, Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Panama, and Canal Zone (United States); Mexico, in spite of its including Yucatan and much country east of the isthmus of Tehuantepec, is considered to be all in North America. With the exception of British Honduras, Central America is predominantly Catholic. Each division is treated in a separate article.

Central New Guinea, Prefecture Apostolic of, comprises the western part of the Mandated Territory of New Guinea mainland and adjacent islands; established 1913 as the Prefecture Apostolic of West Kaiserwilhelsmland, by the division of the Prefecture Apostolic of Kaiserwishelmsland, dating from 1906, founded by Fr. Eberhard Limbrook; name changed, 1923; entrusted to the Missionaries of the Society of the Divine Word. Prefect Apostolic: Joseph Lorks (1928). Churches and chapels, 18; priests, 7; religious women, 12; Catholics, 5041.

Central Oceania, Vicariate Apostolic of, Pacific Ocean, comprises the Friendly Archipelago, the Nueva Group, and Wallis and Futuna islands; established, 1842; entrusted to the Marist Fathers. Missionaries of the region included Bl. Peter Chanel, protomartyr of Oceania. Vicars Apostolic: Peter Bataillon (1843-77), Louis Elloy (1877-78), Amandus Lamei (1878-1906), A. Oiler (1906-11), and Joseph Blanc (1912). Vicars Apostolic of the former islands. S. Macabula, Friendly Islands. Stations, 16; priests, 25; religious women, 60; seminary, 1; high schools, 2; primary schools, 26; Catholics, 10,000.

Centurians of Magdeburg, a group of Protestant historians who treated the history of the Christian Church century by century and wrote the first five volumes (centuries) at Magdeburg, Germany. At their head was Matthias Vliech (Latinized Flacius), a native of Istria, the ancient Illyricum, from which he assumed the surname of Illyricus. The work was the first important church history written by Protestants. It covers the first 13 centuries in 13 separate folio volumes all published at Basel, 1559-74. The large funds required for the collecting, assembling, and publication of the material were furnished by kings, princes, and cities devoted to the Protestant cause. Among them were the kings of Sweden and Denmark, the dukes of Saxony, and the cities of Augsburg and Nuremberg. The Centurians wrote in Latin, but also prepared a German edition of the first four volumes. Several attempts, all unsuccessful, were subsequently made to bring the history down to modern times. Many refutations were prepared by Catholic scholars, the most notable of which was the "Ecclesiastical Annals" of Card. Baronius. The Centuries of Magdeburg were edited in thoroughgoing, systematic, and skilful fashion and were based on such original sources as the editors considered useful for their purpose. This purpose, however, was not to discover and state the truth, but to convict the papacy of having corrupted the teaching of Christ and to justify the religious opinions which the Lutheran Matthias Flacius opposed to the views of another Lutheran, Philip Melanchthon.—C.E.

Centurion, an officer in the Roman army in command of a body of men, numbering from 50 to 100; although not a commissioned officer in the modern sense, he corresponds somewhat to the present captain. Centurions are mentioned five times in the New Testament: Matt., 8 and 27; Acts, 10, 21, and 27.—C.E. (E. P. D.)

CEOLFRID 190 CEYLON

CEOLFRID, SAINT (642-716), Benedictine abbot of Wearmouth and Jarrow; d. Langres, France. Of Saxon nobility, he became a monk and was ordained at Ripon. He was prior at Wearmouth and deputy at Jarrow, under St. Benedict Biscop, whom he succeeded as abbot (690). Among his improvements was his augmentation of the libraries of both monasteries. In his last journey to Rome, prior to which he had resigned his abbacy, he carried as a gift to the pope the famous "Codex Amiatinus," written (600-716) at Wearmouth or Jarrow, containing the oldest text of St. Jerome's Vulgate, now in the Laurentian Library, Florence.—C.E.; Butler.

Cere-cloth (Lat., cera, wax) or CHRISEMABLE (Gr., chrio, anoint), linen cloth waxed on one side, which must completely cover the table of the consecrated altar. It must be the exact size of the table of the altar and is placed under the three linen cloths, the waxed side towards the table, preventing the altar cloths from being stained by the oil used at the consecration and keeping them dry. According to the rubries it should be removed once a year during the stripping of the altar on Maundy Thursday, but it may be changed whenever the altar is washed. It is not blessed and cannot take the place of one of the three rubrical linen cloths.

Ceremonies, congregation of the, in charge of the ceremonies in the pontifical chapel and court, performances performed by cardinals outside of the pontifical chapel, of regulating questions of precedence of cardinals, and of representation of various nations at the Vatican.

Ceremony, an external act, gesture, or movement that accompanies the prayers and public exercise of Divine worship.—C.E.

Cerne Abbey, a Benedictine monastery in Dorsetshire, England, founded in 987 by Aylmar, Duke of Cornwall. The famous "Book of Cerne" is a MS. collection of medieval prayers for private use. It was once the property of the Abbey of Cerne, but is now in the University Library, Cambridge.

Certitude, properly an attitude of the mind as certain, and "It is certain."—C.E.; Coffey, Science of Logic, N. Y., 1912.

Cervantes Saavedra, Miguel de (1547-1616), author, b. Alcalá de Henares, Spain; d. Madrid. He left the service of Card. Acquaviva in Italy to enter the Spanish army, was wounded at Lepanto. Later he was captured by the Corsairs and after five years in Algiers was ransomed. His first literary work was a pastoral romance "Galatea," followed by unsuccessful attempts at dramatic poetry. An irregularity in his accounts as tax collector led to his incarceration at Seville in 1597, during which period he is said to have evolved his masterpiece "Don Quixote" (first part, 1605; second, 1615). His remaining works are the twelve "Novelas exemplares," "Entremeses" (Interludes), "Viaje del Parnaso," rhymed review of contemporary poets, and the novel "Persiles y Sigismunda."—C.E.; Cervantes, tr. Shelton, History of the Kings of Portugal, Don Quixote, N. Y., 1923.

Cesalpino, Chia-zil-pë'në, Andrea (1519-1603), physician, philosopher, and botanist, b. Arezzo, Italy; d. Rome. He was educated at the University of Pisa where he later taught philosophy, medicine, and botany; directed the botanical gardens at Pisa, 1554-58; and was professor of medicine at Sapienza, and physician to Pope Clement VIII. As a philosopher he adhered to the doctrines of Aristotle, excluding any contrary to Revelation. He made important investigations concerning the circulation of the blood but is most famous for his botanical work "De Plantis Libri XVI" which contains the foundations of plant morphology and physiology. He made one of the first herbariums, and was the author of a mineralogical work. The plant species Cesalpinia is named in his honor.—C.E.

Ceva, Thomas (1648-1737), Jesuit mathematician, b. Milan; d. there. He was a prolific writer, and is best known for his geometrical theorem.

Ceylon, island, self-governing colony of the British Empire, in the Indian Ocean; area, 25,332 sq. m.; est. pop. 5,099,501. Catholicity was introduced into Ceylon in 1518 by Franciscans, who built churches and monasteries, preached the Faith, and made thousands of converts. St. Francis Xavier visited the island about 1542 and converted many of the northern Tamils. The Faith spread rapidly until it was attacked by members of the Dutch Reformed Church, the established religion. Under the Dutch rulers the practice of the Catholic religion was forbidden, penal laws were enforced, and the Catholics were severely persecuted. The Church survived these hardships, owing to the efforts of missionaries from Goa who administered the sacraments secretly and continued the work of evangelization. When the island came under British rule, freedom of worship was granted although the Church of England became the established religion. Originally Ceylon belonged to the Portuguese Diocese of Cochin, but in 1834 it became a separate vicariate Apostolic, and in 1845 comprised the two vicariates Apostolic of Colombo and Jaffna. In 1883 the central provinces formed the Vicariate Apostolic of Kandy, in 1886 the Portuguese royal patronage was abolished, and in 1887 Colombo was raised to an archdiocese. Six years later two new
The extension of the custom of chaining books so as to embrace the entire contents of libraries. As a result chained books became more numerous than ever. The Protestant Reformation did not essentially alter the medieval conception of a library. Hence we find that the leading Protestant libraries contained chained books in great numbers. Indeed, it can be safely stated that the number of chained books, in Protestant as well as Catholic libraries, during the two centuries following the Reformation, was far greater than that during the three preceding centuries.

The chained Bible was an institution in the medieval Church. From the 12th century on, the Bible could be found in countless monasteries and churches, chained to a desk, or lectern, or stall, near some window, where the student or pious reader would have sufficient light to read it. This demonstrates how strong was the popular demand for an open Bible in the medieval Church, and how earnestly the Church strove to make that open Bible a reality for all its communicants. Bias and ignorance have falsely interpreted this usage of by-gone days as a proof that the Church purposely withheld the Bible from the laity. No such malicious interpretation of the chained Bible was forthcoming so long as Protestants remembered their own chained Bibles. The myth, that Bibles in the Middle Ages were chained in order to prevent people from reading them, is a fallacy, as is evident from reading in geometry books of the 18th century, and was given its present currency principally through M. D'Aubigné, Swiss historian, in his history of the Reformation (1817).

Chair of Peter, portable chair preserved at the Vatican and believed to be a chair used by St. Peter, the extant testimony referring to it dating from the 2nd century. The feast of the Chair of St. Peter at Rome has been celebrated from the early days of the Christian era on 18 Jan., in commemoration of the day when St. Peter held his first service in Rome. The feast of the Chair of St. Peter at Antioch, commemorating his foundation of the See of Antioch, has also been long celebrated at Rome, on 22 Feb. The Mass for both feast days is the same; the Collect is as follows: "Oh, God, who, together with the power of the keys of the kingdom of heaven, didst bestow on blessed Peter Thy Apostle the privilege of binding and loosing, grant that by the aid of his intercession we may be released from the yoke of our sins."—C.E.

Chalcedon, Council of, the Fourth Ecumenical Council, held A.D. 451, in the pontificate of Leo I, at Chalcedon, a city of Bithynia, in Asia Minor. The principal purpose of the Council was to define the Catholic doctrine on the two natures of Christ, against the Monophysite heresy.—C.E. (M. P. H.)

Chalcedony, species of quartz; third foundation stone of the celestial Jerusalem (Apoc. 21).

Chaldean Rite, also known as the East Syrian, Assyrian, or Persian Rite, the liturgy used by the Uniat East Syrians and Nestorians. The language is old Syriac. There are three Anaphoras (Canons) used: the first, called that of the Apostles (Sts. Addeus and Maris), is the normal one; the other two, that of Nestorius and that of Theodore the Interpreter, are used only on occasions. The same pro-anaphoral part is used for all three. The Chaldean Uniat East Syrians and Nestorians communicate with a host dipped in the chalice.—C.E., XIII, 85; XIV, 413. (M. E. D.)

Chalice (Lat., calix, cup), the cup used at Mass to contain the Precious Blood of Christ, to commemorate that used by Our Lord at the Last Supper. A chalice is usually from 8 to 11 in. in height, with a wide base, a stem with a knob midway, and a cup. The whole may be of gold or silver, or the cup only. In case of poverty it is permitted to make the cup of inferior metal, but this must be gold-plated within. Chalices are blessed by a bishop, who anoints them with holy chrism, a ceremony which begins the blessing. As the Sacred Cup, it signifies faith. St. John is represented with a chalice and a serpent issuing therefrom, referring to an unsuccessful attempt to poison the Host, the serpent symbolizing the poison. For illustrations see Ardagh Chalice; Cellini.—C.E.

Challoner, Richard (1691-1781), Bp. of Debra, vicar Apostolic of the London district, b. Lewes, England; d. London. Born of Protestant parents, he was received into the Catholic Church at the age of 13, and educated at Douai, where he was later professor and vice-president. In 1730 he entered with zeal into the work of the mission at London, which involved many hardships. In 1741 he was consecrated bishop, and in 1758 became vicar Apostolic. As administrator he founded schools, instituted conferences among the London clergy, and aided the relief of the poor and aged. He was forced by the laws of England to spend his life in hiding, and with difficulty escaped Protestant informers. He wrote many religious books, among them the well-known meditations "Think Well On't," "Garden of the Soul," a favorite book of devotion, "Meditations for Every Day in the Year," and "Memoirs of Missionary Priests." He also prepared a revised edition of the Douay Bible and Reims New Testament, which is, practically speaking, the version of the Bible used by all English-speaking Catholics today.—C.E.

Challoner Society, the organization formed in England in 1928 to afford an opportunity for "cradle" and "convert" Catholics to meet each other socially. Meetings are held at the Interval Club, London. Lectures of special interest to converts are given.—E. V. W.)

Cham, one of the sons of Noe, probably the second. He is mentioned in the O.T. as having been irreverent towards his father, when the latter was intoxicated. On this occasion, Noe blessed Sem and Japhet for their filial piety; pronounced a curse upon Cham, the son of Cham; and foretold the characteristics of Cham's descendants, and the desecration to the rule of the descendants of Sem.—C.E.

Chamberlain, title of several classes of palace officials of the Roman court.

—Privy Chamberlains (Active), compose the College of Masters of Pontifical Ceremony, and are at present 9 in number (3 monsignori and 6 supernumeraries).

—Privy Chamberlains to His Holiness. The date of institution of this class is unknown; it probably developed by degrees as an honor for priests who had rendered signal service in missions representing the Holy See; since 1800 it is a simple honorary title. Their number, which is variable, is at present 729.

—Chamberlains of Honor of the Purple Habit have practically the same privileges as secular court chamberlains, whom they assist at Vatican functions, e.g., consistory and chapel, by carrying the fanelli (fans), sedia gestatoria (papal chair), tapers, etc. They have the added function of assisting in the antechamber of honor, wherein is the pontifical throne. They number at present 47.

—Chamberlains of Honor Extra Urbe (outside the city), instituted under Pius VI, are chosen from the clergy of cities other than Rome, have the title monsignor, belong to the papal household, and have the same vestments, excepting the red hat, as chamberlains of honor, but as they are not able to wear this costume at all times in Rome, they are not then called monsignori, and are of all the following divisions of chamberlains cease at the death of the pope who appoints them (in this case titles are suspended under the vacancy of the Holy See), but reappointment is customarily made through the medium of the major-domo on the election of the new pope.

Chanaan, kā’naan, Land or (Semitic, kūna, to ow down; hence, lowlands), term applied in a limited sense to the northern onent of modern Palestine, or Phenicia; or to the lowland of the Philistines on the southern coast.
They identify it more generally with the whole
Western Palestine, including the mountainous districts occupied by the Amorrites, and enclosed within the generally accepted boundaries of 33° 18’
lat. on the south, 30° 33’ N. lat. on the north,

Chanaanites, descendants of Chanaan, son of Cham, who inhabited all of western Palestine between the Jordan and the Mediterranean coast.
They came into Palestine from the north about 3000 B.C., and for a long time were under Baby­

as shown by their use of bronze, iron, and other metals, their building operations, and their use of valuable articles for domestic and religious purposes. They worshiped Baal, Moloch, and Ashtoreth.

Chanaan, kā’naan, Land or (Semitic, kūna, to ow down; hence, lowlands), term applied in a limited sense to the northern onent of modern Palestine, or Phenicia; or to the lowland of the Philistines on the southern coast.
They identify it more generally with the whole
Western Palestine, including the mountainous districts occupied by the Amorrites, and enclosed within the generally accepted boundaries of 33° 18’
lat. on the south, 30° 33’ N. lat. on the north, the Mediterranean on the west, and the Dead and lower course of the Jordan on the east.
According to British surveyors its maximum area was about 9700 sq. m. Among the famous places in what constituted the former country of Chanaan are Jerusalem, the Holy City; Bethlehem, the birthplace of Our Lord; Nazareth, the scene of His private life; Joppa, Hebron, Geshur, and Beersheba.
The land has numerous brooks and fountains, fine pasturages, and a most fertile region in the valley of the Jordan. Its famous mountains are Carmel, Geloe, and Thabor.—C.E.
Chanaanites, descendants of Chanaan, son of Cham, who inhabited all of western Palestine between the Jordan and the Mediterranean coast.
They came into Palestine from the north about 3000 B.C., and for a long time were under Babyonian influence. Their civilization was progressive,
as shown by their use of bronze, iron, and other metals, their building operations, and their use of valuable articles for domestic and religious purposes. They worshiped Baal, Moloch, and Ashtoreth.

Chancel

Part of the choir near the altar of a church, where the officiating clergy stand. The name is derived from cancellus, screen which formerly divided the choir from the nave. St. Clement's, Rome, still preserves the sixth-century screens of the choir and presbyterium. The word sanctuary is now used for the railed enclosure about the altar. In cathedrals the part between sanctuary and nave is called choir. Anglican usage retains the term chancel which was used in England before the Reformation.—C.E.

Chancellor

(Lat., cancellarius, man at the barrier), term which came to mean a notary, then the official charged with writing and sealing crown documents, and finally, the guardian of the great seal of state. From the days of Charlemagne, this office was generally held by an ecclesiastic. Card. Wolsey, Abp. Arundell (1886-88), and Sir Thomas More (1529-34), the last-named the first layman thus honored, are famous English Catholic chancellors. In the recent German Empire, the chancellor was president of the federal council and so, under the emperor, was charged with the direction of imperial affairs. In England, the lord high chancellor is the keeper of the state seal; as the highest law officer he is the cabinet, and appoints all the judges and justices of the peace, and, among other duties, supervises the interests of minors and lunatics. There is a lord chancellor in Ireland exercising similar legal powers. The chancellor of the exchequer is the British minister of finance. The titular head of a university is generally held by an ecclesiastic. Card. Wolsey, Abp. Chancery

Diocesan, a branch of administration that handles all written documents used in the government of a diocese.—C.E., IV, 798.

Chansés, Henri (1800-98), priest of the Paris Foreign Missions, b. Coubron-sur-Loire, France. He was murdered with eight Christians in his district of Pok-lo, Kwang-tung, China.

Changanacherry, Diocese of, Travancore, British India, see of the Syro-Malabar Rite; erected, 1923; suffragan of Ernakulam. Thomas Kuri-alancherry was first bishop of the diocese (d. 1925), succeeded by James Kallarakil (1927). Churches, 160; priests, secular, 271; priests, regular, 65; religious women, 394; seminary, 1; high schools, 7; elementary schools, 190; institutions, 4; Catholics, 175,650.

Chant

(Lat., cantus, singing). (1) A vocal melody belonging to a liturgical office, forming an intimate, often an integral part of it. A liturgical chant differs from sacred music, since the latter adorns an office without absolutely belonging to it. Liturgical chants are monodic, usually diatonic, and, in form, they vary from the simplest musical recitation of a text to the most elaborate and expressive melodies. See Ambrosian Chant; Gregorian Chant; Plain Chant. (2) An incantation used by primitive races to placate the gods, to charm beasts, and to affect the weather. Rhythm and repetition were essential to these magic chants.

Chantry

(Fr., chanter, to sing), originally the endowment of one or more priests to say or sing Mass for the soul of a person specified by the endower. In most cases the incumbent was charged with other duties such as that of attending the sick, of acting as chaplain to a gaol or hospital, or notably of giving instruction gratuitously. Henry VIII and Edward VI suppressed the chantries and confiscated the monies, inflicting grave injury on education. Between the year 1547 and 1645 no grammar school was founded in England which had not previously existed as a chantry. The term chantry was employed also to designate a small chapel specially erected for the authorized to conduct liturgical functions in the army.

Baptisms for the celebration of Masses for the soul of the testator were considered illegal in England, on account of false interpretation of the Chantries Act of Edward VI, 1547, the Act of William IV, and the case of West vs. Shuttleworth, until 1919, when the appeal of Francis Cardinal Bourne for Edward Egan, who had made bequests to the Jesuits for Masses, won this privilege for Catholics.—C.E.

Chapel

A sanctuary or informal church; part of a cathedral or large church; or a separate and detached place of worship. The earliest oratories or chapels, as distinct from the buildings where the bishop and presbytery presided over the regular assemblies of Christians, were probably martyrs' memorials. The spread of Christianity from the cities into the country must have early occasioned the erection of chapels for believers living at a distance from the bishop's church. Chapels were built in private homes and in the course of time many became regular parish churches. Other buildings such as court-houses, hospitals, and all religious houses had chapels attached to them in medieval times. The most important kinds of chapels include: ambassadors', bishop's, cemetery or mortuary, chantry, and charnel chapels, chapels of ease, gate-house chapels, Lady chapels, papal chapels, chapels of repose, royal, ship, votive, wayside, and bridge chapels.—Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1935.

Chapelle Ardente

(Fr., burning chapel; from the candles surrounding the catafalque), chapel or room in which the corpse of a sovereign or dignitary lies in state pending the funeral.

Chapel of Ease, a church or chapel built in an outlying district of a parish, so called because intended to relieve the parish church and accommodate the parishioners living at a distance from it. Today they are called succursals, churches. The clergy in charge act as vicars of the parish priest. Ordinarily such churches and chapels may not have a baptismal font or a cemetery independently of the parish church; nor may reserved parochial functions, such as Baptism and marriage, be performed in them without the permission of the pastor. For the convenience of the faithful, however, the bishop may permit, or even order, that a baptismal font be placed in such churches (canon 774, § 2). Frequently such chapels of ease develop into independent parish churches.—C.E. (A. C. E.)

Chaplain

(Lat., capella, chapel), a priest authorized to conduct liturgical functions in the army (see Chaplain, Military), or for an ecclesiastical association, a lay religious community, an institution, etc. The right of appointing chaplains for ecclesiastical institutions belongs to the local Ordinary, except for religious who appoint chaplains within their own territory, in which case the consent of the Ordinary is required should the chaplain chosen by the religious superior be one of the secular clergy. During his term of office the chaplain can bless the habit or insignia, the scapulars, etc., of the association, and invest the new members with them. For a just cause a chaplain may be removed from office by those who appointed him as well as by their successors or superiors. The chaplains of communities of non-exempt lay religious are appointed by the Ordinary; those of exempt religious by the religious superior. The chaplain has not parochial rights over the community. Accordingly the administration of Viaticum and Extreme Unction rests with the local pastor, unless the bishop withdraws the religious house from the jurisdiction of the pastor and subjects it to the chaplain. Approximately the same rule applies to funeral services, except that the chaplain and not the pastor conducts them in lay institutes of men. The chaplain of a hospital or other institution must adapt his services to the needs of the institution, avoiding all usurpation of parochial functions, such as the administration of solemn Baptism, if the institution is not withdrawn from parochial jurisdiction.—C.E.

Chaplain, Military, a priest who has charge of religious services in the army or navy, subject either to the local Ordinary, or to a constituted Bishop Ordinary, Episcopus castrensis (of the camp), for army and navy, with faculties varying according to circumstances. The common law of the Church states merely that military chaplains must observe the particular prescriptions given out by the Holy See. The Card.-Abp. of New York is at present Bishop Ordinary of the U. S. army and navy chaplains, assisted by four vicars general in charge of the Atlantic, Great Lakes, Gulf, and Pacific vicariates. In Great Britain the Card.-Abp. of Westminster is the ecclesiastical superior for the navy and the Rt. Rev. Wm. Keatinge, titular Bp. of Metellopolis, is bishop in ordinary for the British Army and also for the Royal Air Force. (s. b.)

Chaplains of Sisters, priests appointed by the bishop to say Mass and preach in convents. According to Canon Law (canon 464, § 1) such chapels are under the spiritual care of the pastor in whose parish they are situated. For a grave reason, however, the bishop may appoint chaplains to convents which are independent of the pastor. Their powers will be defined in the letters of appointment. Usually they say Mass, give religious conferences, and perform other ecclesiastical ceremonies. They are not the confessors of the religious unless especially appointed to this office. They may not perform any reserved parochial functions such as Baptism or marriage, in the convent chapel, without special permission of the bishop. They are usually appointed from the ranks of the secular clergy. In case of need, however, the bishop may appoint priests who are members of a religious order or congregation.—C.E.; Taunton, The Law of the Church, p. 1, 1806.

Chaplet, originally a wreath worn on the head, the name came to be used for beads strung together, especially beads upon which prayers are counted as they are recited. It is most frequently used to designate a string of 56 beads, a third of the Rosary, upon which are recited 30 Aves and 5 Paters. The term is also applied to strings of fewer beads used for reciting various prayers and aspirations in honor of Our Lord, the Holy Eucharist, etc., as well as for the prayers recited.

It is an emblem in art associated with Sts. Dominic and Alphonsus Liguori, referring either to their devotion to the Rosary, or indicating a special distinction.

Chappuis, shāp-pwē, MARY de SALES (1799-1875), a Visitandine nun, co-founder of the Oblates of St. Francis de Sales, b. Soyhières, Berne, Switzerland; d. Troyes, France. She sought zealously to promote a form of spirituality called "The Way," which met with opposition as well as favor.—C.E., IX, 7, 754.

Chapter (Lat., capitulum, dim. of caput, head). (1) Main division or section of a book; especially used to denote the many divisions of the books of the Bible. (2) Short lesson or passage from Holy Scripture called the "little chapter," read at Office. (3) A body of clerics instituted for obtaining greater solemnity of Divine worship, and, at cathedral churches, for assisting the bishop according to Church Law as his senate and council and governing the see during vacancy. The name arose from the custom of reading a chapter of the rules at a prescribed daily gathering of the members. In dioceses which have no cathedral chapters the board of diocesan consultants functions as the bishop's senate. Chapters are of various kinds, e.g., cathedral, collegiate, secular, regular, and consist of dignities and canonicates. Some of the principal offices are those of canon theologian and canon penitentiary. The institute known as chapter is derived from the presbytery of the early centuries; it grew in importance during and after the 8th century and was thoroughly established in the 10th. (4) General meeting or assembly of delegates members of certain religious orders to consider ways and means of improving the formation of the religious, facilitating their labors, and amending the constitutions.—C.E. (H. L. M.)

Chapter-house, a building attached to a monastery or cathedral in which the meetings of the chapter are held. In monasteries the chapter house was used daily after Prime for the reading of the "Martyrology" and "Necrology," the correction of faults, the assignment of daily tasks, the exhortation of the superior, and again for the evening collation. Secular canons used it for the formal transaction of public business of common interest to the body corporate. Its shape is varied. In England it was the object of careful designing, culminating in the polygonal chapter house of which Lincoln Cathedral (1240-60) has perhaps the earliest example.—C.E.

Charity (Gr., engraving instrument), the mark or trait by which the personality of one person is distinguished from that of another. The word is used to express the spiritual and indelible sign imprinted on the soul by the Sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders. The sacramental character marks the soul as distinct from those who have it not; as obliged to perform certain duties; as conformed to the image of God; as disposed for God's grace. Baptism marks the soul as a subject of Christ and His Church's Confirmation as a warrior of the Church militant; Holy Orders as a minister of its Divine worship.—C.E.

Charismata (Gr., gifts), a theological term designating certain extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, granted to individual Christians, not for their personal sanctification, but for the spiritual advantage of others. St. Paul and most of the first century Church, and weresignal aids in the rapid propagation of the Christian religion. Nor have they ever been entirely absent from the Church of Christ, as is evident from the acts of beatification and canonization of saints.—C.E. (A. C. K.)

Charitable Bequests, in law, gifts made by will for the welfare of the community or of an indefinite part of it, and so contrasting with what is left to private individuals; thus schools, orphanages, hospitals, churches, and libraries may be the recipients of charitable bequests. Technically a bequest is a gift of personal property, a gift of reality being termed a devise, yet as this distinction is often unknown to ordinary persons the courts include reality also under the term bequest if such is clearly the testator's intention. In Ireland, Canada, and some of the United States bequests for Masses for the dead have been sustained as charitable, but in England until quite recently they were held to be void in law as being for so-called superstitious uses. It is important that the makers of charitable bequests should ascertain the legal title of the institution to which the bequest is to be made.—C.E.

Charity (Lat., caritas, love), a supernatural, infused virtue, by which we love God above everything for His own sake, and our neighbor as ourselves for God's sake. As an act of supernatural virtue it requires a motivation based on Divine revelation. Charity, in the strict sense of the word, cannot exist in a person who has never heard of revelation, though he may perform many works from the sole motive of pleasing God. Charity, unlike natural virtues, is not acquired through frequent repetition of the same acts, but is infused with sanctifying grace; hence it is sometimes used to signify this grace. If it is a Divine name; God is charity (1 John, 4, 16). Almsgiving is called charity because it is one of its principal works. Today, outside of the Catholic Church, charity signifies any good turn done to the needy, regardless of the motive that prompted it.—C.E. (B. J. M.) Charity, Saint. See Faith, Hope, and Charity, SAINTS.

Charity and Charities. Charity to man is the fulfillment of duties over and beyond those of justice to our fellow creatures whom we recognize as having the same nature, the same destiny, the same Redeemer as ourselves. Charity, in this sense, is the fulfillment of one of the two great commandments which Christ formulated as containing all of God’s revealed will for man (Matt., 22).

Charity, as generally understood without reference to its religious implications, simply means giving aid to the needy. Charity is the collective title for all the aids and processes whereby ills are met and alleviated. Among savage people, charity may be seen as tribal loyalty. Feast and famine, responsibilities and duties, are the common portion of all the members of the tribe. At the same time, all who are not members of the tribe are viewed with hostility. The pagan civilizations had a larger organization and hence a greater respect for the rights of strangers. However, none had any great social consciousness of the rôle of charity. In Greece and Rome, the majority of the population was bound in slavery, and the misery of their condition aroused no sense of charitable obligation. Only under the later emperors do we find the first public charities, the support of poor children, under Nerva and Trajan.

Historians admit the great change introduced by Christianity. The Acts of the Apostles record the fact that the care of widows and orphans was esteemed a social obligation. The letters of St. Paul refer to a collection taken up in the churches of Greece and Asia Minor for the relief of the poor of Jerusalem. The early Fathers and bishops preached that charity was a duty, not an act which a rich man might freely undertake or as freely omit. Estimates show that about A.D. 250 the church of Rome cared for 1500 persons; that under St. Chrysostom, the church of Antioch supported 3000 widows and children, beside strangers and sick. In later Christian times, church revenues were divided into four parts, one of which was given to the poor. The clergy were the social workers of their time. The monasteries also became conspicuous charitable agencies. To use modern terminology, they did relief work on a vast scale, offering food and shelter to all who asked for it. Finally the religious orders, in great variety, each undertook some charity. In a word, the social work of our naturalistic age inherits from early and medieval Christianity its spirit, its ideals, and much of its actual working.

The revolt against the Church in the 16th century forced the separation of charities and the Church. In considerable part, the kings, princes, and other powers of the time joined the revolt because of the opportunity it afforded to seize the endowments of charities. The resulting distress was so great that the powers of the state had to be invoked. Poor laws sought at first to crush out appeals for aid. This failing, systems were instituted whereby each local district was required to care for all cases of need within its own borders. Local taxation was thus proportioned to the amount of charity given, and the rich taxpayers saw to it that nothing short of absolute need was heeded. From this developed the feeling that still persists, that to receive charity is to confess oneself in utter degradation.

With the Church crippled, and the state by custom negligibly, charity in modern times has become a private matter. Fortunately there have always been individuals profoundly conscious of the misery of their fellow creatures who congregate themselves to the struggle against this misery, and who arouse society to take action. The state today intervenes in various types of need, sickness, illiteracy, delinquency, etc., formerly cared for only by individuals, or by religious organizations. Modern social work may be characterized by two qualities: by insistence on prevention, that is, by seeking not merely to aid in an emergency, but more especially to discover and eliminate the causes which brought about the emergency; and by organization, whereby individual cases and social problems are met with all the knowledge and power which can be summoned from every direction. The so-called “scientific” spirit of modern social work is entirely admirable, in that it seeks a complete and permanent solution of every difficulty. The Catholic must, however, regret the absence of religion, and, as far as he is concerned, must be guided by its principles; hence no Catholic can subscribe to certain aspects of the programs of birth-control and eugenics. Furthermore the Catholic must hold firmly the doctrine, taught by Christ Himself, that the practice of charity is not optional, but a real duty binding on all who have the opportunity and the means. —C.E.; Koch-Preuss; Kerby, The Social Mission of Charity, N. Y., 1921. (E. F. MACK.)

Charlemagne (Lat., Carolus Magnus, Charles the Great; 742-814), King of the Franks, first sovereign of the Holy Empire. b. Aix-la-Chapelle or Liège; d. Aix-la-Chapelle. He was the eldest son of Pepin the Short, mayor of the palace, whom Pope Stephen III anointed as king (752). Before his death, in 768, Pepin divided his dominions between his two sons, Charles and Carloman. At the latter’s death (771) his subjects accepted Charles as their king. As “Roman Patriarch” Charles was obligated to defend the temporal rights of the Holy See, which were first threatened by the Lombards under Desiderius, whom he finally defeated at Pavia. He waged victorious warfare against the pagan Saxons, to whom he gave the alternative of baptism or death, their leader Wittekind finally accepting Christianity in 785. The invasion of Moslem Spain in 778 dealt with no significant result. The “Chanson de Roland” recounts the death of the paladin Roland during this campaign. Bertha, the king’s mother, who had been a strong influence for good, died in 783. About this time Charlemagne subdued uprisings of Tassilo, Duke of Bavaria, Areghis, the Lombard prince, the Thuringians, Saracens and Avars. In 800 he received the imperial crown from Leo III in Rome. In 806 he divided his empire by will among his three sons.

Charlemagne undertook the agricultural development of his realm, organized and codified the principles of ancient Frankish law, and through the scholars whom he attracted to his court inaugurated educational reform (see Carolingian Schools; Alcuin; Einhard). He furthered the spiritual welfare of the Church by his zeal for ecclesiastical discipline and took keen interest in the deliberations of synods. He improved and propagated church music, laying the foundations of modern musical culture. His canonization by the antipope Paschal III was never ratified. Charlemagne is the hero of a cycle of romance in the Middle Ages. He first appeared as a legendary figure in the book of the so-called Monachus Sangallensis (883). In France he became the center of the national epics, or "Chansons de Geste," which relate his legendary deeds and those of his paladins (Oliver, Roland, Turpin), and vassals. In the older epics he is the incarnation of majesty, truth, and justice, and the champion of God's church against the infidel, but the later epics paint him as a tyrant and oppressor. His Saxon wars left many legends in Germany, concerned mainly with Wittekind and his conversion, which, according to the French version, was short-lived and insincere. Through French influence the Carolingian legend spread to other countries; in Italy it inspired the Franco-Italian epics, and the "Reali di Francia" of Mignanetti, and culminated in the famous chivalrous epics of Boiardo and Ariosto; in Germany it appeared in the "Rolandslied" of Konrad der Pfaffe, "Karlmeinet," and the chap-books of the 15th century; in Scandinavia in the "Karlamagnus saga" (c. 1300); in the Netherlands in numerous translations like "Carel ende Ariost"; and in England Caxton published "The Lyf of Charles the Grote" (1485) and "The four sonnes of Aymon" (1486).—C.E.; Hodgkin, Life of Charlemagne, N. Y., 1903; G. James, Emperor Charlemagne, Akron, O., 1910.

Charles V (1500-58), Emperor (Charles I, King of Spain), b. Ghent; d. Yuste, Spain. He was the son of Philip, Duke of Burgundy, by Joanna, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella. He succeeded his father in 1506, and was declared the successor of Ferdinand of Aragon in 1516. In 1520 he was elected Holy Roman Emperor in the face of the opposition of Rome and France. At the Diet of Worms (1521) he appealed in person against Luther. In 1522 he gave his Austrian possessions to his brother Ferdinand and established a permanent regency for the Netherlands. From 1523-29 he waged war against Francis I, whom he defeated at Pavia (1525), and after the French coalition with Clement VII, marched against Rome, which was sacked by undisciplined troops (1527). The Peace of Cambrai (1529) concluded the struggle. Charles established legislation which regulated the social and industrial life of the Netherlands, adopted a progressive policy in Spain, and dealt successfully with colonial politics in America. He received the imperial crown from Clement VII, at Bologna, 24 Feb., 1530. In a campaign against the Turks he conquered Tunis, in 1535. A renewal of hostilities with Francis I resulted in the Peace at Crespy (1544). The general council, which he had urged, was convoked at Trent (1545). Soon after he began hostilities against the Smalkaldic League, and following the defeat of the Protestant princes he sought to enlist their services in the reorganization of the Empire. In 1552, however, they attacked his forces, and by the Treaty of Passau gained ascendancy in the Empire. Having transferred the government of the Netherlands and the Spanish Crown to his son Philip, in 1556 he abdicated the imperial throne in favor of his brother Ferdinand and retired to the monastery of Yuste. Here he was informed of political affairs, but ceased to take an active part in them.—C.E.

Charles Borromeo, Saint, confessor (1538-84), Carol.-Priest of the Title of St. Prassede, and Abp. of Milan, b. Arona, Italy; d. Milan. He was the son of Count Ghiberto Borromeo and Margherita de' Medici, and nephew of Pope Pius IV. When he received the tonsure at the age of 12, and later was made titular abbot of Sts. Gratian and Felinus at Arona; in 1552 he matriculated at the University of Pavia, where he received his doctorate in civil and canon law, 1559. Upon the election of Pius IV, he was summoned to Rome; the administration of all the papal states was intrusted to him; and he was made cardinal-deacon and administrator of the archdiocese of Milan though only 22 years old. He was legate of Bologna, Romagna, and the March of Ancona, and Protector of the Kingdom of Portugal, Lower Germany, and the Catholic cantons of Switzerland. Under his protection were placed the orders of St. Francis, the Carmelites, the Humiliati, and the Canons Regular of the Holy Cross of Christ in Portugal. He founded at Rome the Vatican Academy for literary work; many of the contributions to the Academy are found in St. Charles's "Noctes Vaticane." As papal secretary of state he labored for the reassembling of the Council of Trent, which took place, 1562, and was active in enforcing its reforms, and in composing the Roman Catechism, embodying the teachings of the Council. Finding these worldly occupations too engrossing, he secretly took Holy Orders, 1563, and was consecrated bishop, 1564. In 1565, at his own request, he took up residence at his episcopal city which had fallen into disorder through the absence of a resident archbishop for a period of 80 years; he devoted the rest of his life to reforming his diocese, creating parishes, and establishing monasteries. His simplicity and piety, his generosity and self-sacrifice during the plague, 1576, and his able administration of the diocese made him beloved by his flock. His literary works are numerous and his large correspondence indicates the esteem in which he was held by the sovereigns of Europe. Patron of Lombardy. Emblems: Holy Communion and coat of arms bearing the word Humilitas; also represented curing the sick. Canonized, 1610. Relics in the Cathedral of Milan. Feast, R. Cal., 4 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

CHARLES SPINOLA, BLESSED (1606-49), martyr, b. Paris; d. St. John's village, Canada. He joined the Society of Jesus, 1624, went to Canada, 1636, and remained there for 14 years. During the Iroquois attack on St. John's village he was slain. Beati¢ned, 21 June, 1825.—Wynne, The Jesuit Martyrs of North America, N. Y., 1925; Devine, The Jesuit Martyrs of Canada, Toronto, 1925.

CHARLES MARTEL (c. 688-741), Duke of Austrasia, son of Pepin of Heristal, d. at Quierzy on the Oise. By force of arms he became mayor of the palace in 717, and reestablished the authority of the Frankish monarchy, conquering the Neustrians, and the Saxons and other Germanic tribes. In 732 he defeated the Moors in the great battle of Tours, and was thereafter called Martel (the Hammer). He used ecclesiastical lands and dignities as military awards, but later restored the rights of the Catholic hierarchy and established social order. At his death he divided the Empire between his two sons.—C.E.

CHARLES SPINOLA, BLESSED (1606-49), martyr (1629), d. Nagasaki, Japan. He studied at Nola, Italy, under his uncle Card. Filippo Spinola, and entered the Society of Jesus at Nola, 1584. After his ordination, 1594, he evinced an interest in missionary work and, after two attempts to reach Japan, was finally successful. For 18 years he labored there, propagating the Faith and winning many converts. After four years spent in the dungeon of Omura, he was burned alive. Beati¢ned, 1867. Feast, 10 Sept.

CHARLESTON, DIOCESE of, embraces the State of South Carolina; area, 30,570 sq. m.; suffragan of Baltimore. Bishops: John England (1820-42); Ignatius A. Reynolds (1844-55); Patrick N. Lynch (1858-82); Henry P. Northrop (1883-1916); William A. Reynolds (1913-20); Louis J. O'Leary (1920). Churches, 53; priests, secular, 37; priests, regular, 3; religious women, 123; academies, 4; high school, 1; primary schools, 11; pupils in parochial schools, 1319; hospital, 1; Catholics, 9520.

CHARLEVOSX, Francois Xavier (1682-1761), Jesuit historian, b. St. Quentin, France; d. La Fleche. He taught in Quebec for four years, and later (1720-23) explored the French colonies in America, at the request of the government. For twenty-two years he was an editor of the "Memoires de Tre- voux," a monthly journal of bibliography, history, and science. He wrote a biography of Mother Marie de l'Incarnation, and histories of Japan, San Domingo, Paraguay, and Canada. The last (Histoire et description generale de la Nouvelle France) is his most important work, and was translated by John Gilmary Shea (History of New France, N. Y., 6 vols., 1860-72).—C.E.

CHARLOTTETOWN, DIOCESE of, Canada, comprises the Province of Prince Edward Island and the Magdalen Islands; suffragan of Halifax. Bishops:

Bernard A. McEachern (1829-35); Bernard D. McDonald (1837-59); Peter McIntyre (1860-91); James C. McDonald (1891-1912); Henry J. O'Leary (1913-20); Louis J. O'Leary (1920). Churches, 53; priests, 65; religious women, 151; university, 1; academies, 4; institutions, 3; Catholic population, 45,912.

CHARTERS, capital of the department of Eure-et-Loir, France. The ancient city was the capital of the Carnutes and an important center of the Druids. Its history as an episcopal see dates from the time of Constantine; suppressed in 1892, it was reestablished, 1922. Burned by the Normans, 898, conquered by the English, 1147, and recovered, 1432, the Protestants unsuccessfully attacked it, 1568; in 1591 Henry IV took coal; possessed the cathedral, 1594; and in 1870 the Germans entered, holding the town throughout the campaign. The cathedral, Notre Dame de Chartres, to which the city principally owes its fame, was a favorite place of pilgrimage for the kings of France; the list of famous visitors includes John the Good, who left his pilgrin's staff, now become the baton de garde of the chapter; Edward III of England; and several popes. The substructure of the building encloses a well and vault, which, according to tradition, the early Christians found surrounded by an altar and statue of a woman seated with her child upon her knees, erected by the Druids. Upon this site, c. 67, a church was built. What can now be seen of the early foundation, however, would appear to date from the 4th century. Destroyed by fire several times, in 1020 Bp. Fulbert invited the sovereigns of Europe to contribute toward rebuilding the cathedral, and though subsequent fires (1030, 1134, 1194) interfered with its progress, it was completed, 1220, and consecrated, 1260. Many of the original stained glass windows, of exceptional beauty, from which the "blue of Chartres" has become renowned, are still preserved; the damaged glass and frames are being restored through the munificence of John D. Rockefeller, Jr. Like the magnificently sculptured porches, they are symbolic representations of the glorification of Mary. The upper windows were presented by St. Louis, St. Ferdinand, and Blanche of Castile. The champleve of the chapter dates from the 10th, 17th, and 18th centuries. The cathedral became famous for the threefold devotion paid to Our Lady through veneration of: (1) the statue of Notre-Dame-sous-Terre, a reproduction of the original Druid figure; (2) the Vierge Noire de Notre-Dame-du-Filier (Black Virgin), in the upper church; and (3) the Voile de la Vierge (Veil of the Blessed Virgin), given to Charlemagne by Constantine Porphyrogenitus and Irene, transferred from Aachen to Chartres, c. 876, and raised as a standard against the Normans by Bp. Gantelme, 911. In 1914 the Congregation of the Consistory confirmed the apostolicity of the Church of Chartres and the ancient origin of the famous statue of the Virgin. Besides the cathedral, the famous school of Chartres must be credited to the energy of Bp. Fulbert. Opened by him in 990, it drew scholars from every part of France, as well as Italy, Germany, and England, and became a center of classical scholarship, and a strong opponent of contemporary rationalistic tendencies.—C.E.

Chartreuse, La Grande, mother-house of the Carthusian Order, in the Alps, 14 m. NE. of Grenoble, France. It was founded in 1084 by St. Bruno. St. Anthelm, the seventh prior, was the first general of the order. After losing most of its land in the French Revolution, the monastery supported itself largely by manufacturing the famous cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain. The congregation of La Grande Chartreuse was expelled by the French Government in 1903; it now resides with the general, at Farnea, near Lucca, Italy.—C.E.

Chastity (Lat., castigare, to chastise), VOW OF, so called because its exercise is the chastising of the flesh and its special concupiscence. It belongs properly to all Christians. To be saved one belongs properly to all Christians. To be saved one must subject the flesh to the spirit, and consequently that strongest of the desires which war against the soul. All spiritual writers agree that chastity is a special gift of God, always obtainable, but only by prayer and mortification. In religion the matter of the vow is conterminous with that of the virtue in its highest degree, so that lightness of matter cannot excuse from mortal sin the least delight deliberately sought or admitted.—C.E.
School in Paris, greatly aided the advancement of (laughing gas) and discovered and described its so-called "theory of substitution," and discriminated data in addition to corrected results of analysis.

pounds; organic chemistry treating of carbon and value of Bacon's system, inaugurated the employment of vegetable color tests to ascertain acidity and verified Dalton's law of multiple proportions.

Dumas

Catholics and other Christians have accomplished (1766-1844), author of the atomic theory in its modern application, of atomic symbols, and of the law of greatest simplicity. Sir Humphry Davy (1778-1829) experimented with nitrous oxide (laughing gas) and discovered and described its effect on the human system, made researches on marsh gas which led to the invention of his safety lamp, made investigations with the electrolysis of water which resulted in his identification of affinity with electricity, decomposed alkalis by electricity, definitely established the fact that alkaline earths were compounds, and discovered that oxymuriatic acid (chlorine) was an element. Charles Friedel (1832-99), professor of organic chemistry at the Sorbonne, isolated secondary propyl alcohol, did important research work on ketones and aldehydes, produced organo-metallic silicate compounds, and was co-author of the method of synthesizing benzene homologues. Martin Heinrich Klaproth (1749-1817) discovered uranium, titanium, and zirconium, and initiated the practice of publishing experimental data in addition to corrected results of analysis.
Justus von Liebig (1803-73), master in ultimate analysis, contributed to food improvements, introduced mineral fertilizer in agriculture, and isolated ethylenediacetic acids. William Henry Perkins (1838-1907), renowned for his experiments with coal tar products, discovered mauve or aniline violet, the first dye obtained from coal tar, thus laying the foundation of the industry of coal tar dyes, and first produced a vegetable perfume from a product of coal tar. Joseph Priestley (1733-1804) prepared oxygen and a method of analyzing air, and performed experiments to demonstrate the restoration of vitiated air by plants. William Ramsay (1852-1916) made contributions to the chemistry of dyes and explosives, determined thermal properties of liquids and solids, discovered argon, helium, neon, xenon, and krypton in the atmosphere, and produced helium from radium. Ira Remsen (1846-1927), pioneer in the rise of chemistry in America, prepared saccharine in 1879, did distinguished research notably on sulphides, double halides, and was the author of several standard text-books on chemistry. Christian Friedrich Schönbein (1799-1869) produced ozone from oxygen, collodion and gun cotton from ordinary cotton, and did valuable research in quantitative analysis. Charles Adolphe Wurtz (1817-84) made researches on phosphorus acids which led to the discovery of phosphorus oxychloride.

Chequer (L.L., scaccarium, chess-board, from the early custom of keeping accounts on a cheesered cloth), private room wherein the officials of a monastery transacted their business.

Cherokees (upland fields), the largest Indian tribe of Iroquoian stock, formerly occupying the Alloghany region, now living in Oklahoma with the exception of about 1300 in North Carolina. The whole tribe has been Christianized by Catholic and Protestant missionaries. They number about 20,000 of pure and mixed blood and have been admitted to citizenship.—C.E.

Cherubic Hymn (Cherubikon), hymn sung by the choir in Greek and other Oriental liturgies at the time of “the great entrance,” when the Bread and Wine are brought to the altar.

Cherubim, those angels who compose the second highest of the nine choirs. The word is a Hebrew plural and according to Pope St. Gregory, means “the fulness of knowledge; and these sublime hosts are thus called because they are filled with a knowledge which is more perfect as they are allowed to behold the glory of God more closely.” The Old Testament classical description of these mysterious beings (Ezech., 10) evokes to the mind the huge composite (man, bull, lion, eagle) figures adorning Babylonian edifices. It may fit the cherubim set at the entrance of the garden of Eden (Gen., 2) or those upon which God is said to ride and fly (Ps., 17), or again those which adorned the brazen sea (3 Kings, 7). It is doubtful, however, that the two cherubim placed over the mercy-seat of the ark, or those introduced into the veil hanging before the holy of holies of the Tabernacle; or again the two colossal figures contained in the holy of holies of Solomon’s temple, or carved in the woodwork of that temple, were of the same pattern. We may possibly think in these connections of winged man-like figures.—C.E.

Cherubini, kā-rōb-bē’nē, Maria Luigi Carlo Zenonio Salvatore (1760-1842), composer, b. Florence; d. Paris. At the age of thirteen his first Mass, a Credo, and a Te Deum had been composed. Later he turned to oratorio composition and in 1806 in his opera “Faniska” won enthusiastic applause. This secured him the directorship of court concerts to Napoleon I but, failing to please the emperor, he accepted the patronage of the Prince de Chimay and composed his Mass in F for the dedication of the village church of Chimay. His symphony for the London Philharmonic Society, 1815, increased his fame and under Louis XVIII he became director of the Paris Conservatoire. His Masses in F and A and two requiems are masterworks.—C.E.

Chester, ancient diocese, founded schismatically by Henry VIII, 1541, and canonically recognized by the pope, 1556. In various earlier times, however, as in 1075, it possessed a bishop and a cathedral. The last Catholic incumbent, Cuthbert Scott, died at Louvain, 1564.—C.E.

Chester Plays, one of the cycle of English miracle plays, performed during Whitsuntide in Chester. About the beginning of the 13th century, Actors were chosen from guilds and the performance lasted from three to six days. It was a narrative of Scripture, with the addition of legendary episodes from apocryphal Gospels or other sources, and was completed by the appearance of the Four Evangelists. In general it was rather more didactic and less popular than other cycles of plays.

Cheverus, Jean Louis Lebreux de (1768-1836), first Bp. of Boston, Abp. of Bordeaux, and cardinal; b. Mayenne, France; d. Bordeaux. A student at the Oratorian Seminary of St. Magloire, he was ordained in Paris, in 1790. Refusing to take the oath of allegiance to the revolution, he became director of the Paris Conservatoire. His Mass, a Credo, and a Te Deum had been composed.

Chevet, term in French architecture for a peculiar arrangement of the eastern end of a church, when the apse is enclosed by an open screen of columns on the ground floor, opening into an aisle, which again opens into three or more apsidal chapels. An example of this is the Basilica of St. Martin, Tours, from which others have been copied. Later the easternmost of the crown of chapels became the Lady Chapel.

Chevreul, Michel Eugène (1786-1889), chemist and physicist, b. Angers, France; d. Paris. He is famous chiefly for his studies on the constitution of animal fats, which led to the establishment of the stearin candle industry, the commercial manufacture of glycerine, and his researches on the harmony of colors, which led to a great increase in the variety of dyes obtainable from benzol.—E.C.

Cheyenne, Diocese of, embraces the State of Wyoming and Yellowstone National Park; area, 101,262 sq. m.; suffragan of Dubuque. Bishops: Maurice F. Burke (1887-93), Thomas M. Lenihan (1897-1901), James J. Keane (1902-11), Patrick A. McGovern (1912). Churches, 58; stations, 24; priests, secular, 27; priests, regular, 5; religious, women, 26; academy, 1; primary schools, 3; Indian school, 1; pupils in Catholic schools, 862; Catholics, 24,712.

Cheyenne (people of alien speech), an important Plains tribe of the Algonquian family; long confederated with the Arapaho. Their original habitat appears to have been Minnesota, whence they have moved westward and are now settled chiefly in Montana and Oklahoma. A Catholic mission was founded among them, 1884, by Rev. Joseph Eyler, who brought with him a community of Ursulines.

Chicago, city, Illinois. The earliest history of Chicago mentions James Marquette, a Jesuit missionary, who with two companions reached the mouth of the Chicago River, 4 Dec., 1674; he is reported, however, to have passed through this colony during the summer of 1673. He spent the winter of 1674-75 here, using his cabin as the first chapel on the site of the present metropolis. In 1696 Father Peter Pinet established the Miami mission of the Angel Guardian at Chicago, which then consisted of two villages with about 300 cabins. In 1849 an orphan asylum was erected by Rev. James Oliver Van de Velde, in order to care for the children whose parents died during the cholera epidemic of that year. In 1846 the Sisters of Mercy started a school, which became a great educational influence in the city; they later established a hospital. The parochial school system was organized in Chicago in 1860. The Religious of the Sacred Heart opened an academy in the same year, and nine years later St. Ignatius College was begun, the only Catholic institution of its kind in the city for years. Catholic education was promoted under Abp. Augustine Feehan, the De La Salle Institute, St. Cyril's College, and St. Vincent's College, now De Paul University, being started about this time. Two other Catholic institutions are the Ephpheta School for the Deaf and Loyola University. The result of many years' struggle was wiped out by the Chicago fire. The first free library in the city, the Union Catholic Library Association, lost a collection of 2500 volumes. In less than seven years all that had been destroyed was rebuilt again. One of the most impressive church edifices is the Holy Name Cathedral. Incidental to the World's Congress Auxiliary of the Columbian Exposition and World's Fair in Chicago, the sessions of the Second Catholic Congress of the United States were held in the fall of 1893, presided over by Abp. Feehan and William J. O'Connell. The delegates to the convention were welcomed by Pres. Bonney of the World's Congress Auxiliary "on behalf of the World's Exposition and the fifty million Catholics who loved justice and religious liberty." In 1926 occurred at Chicago one of the greatest Catholic gatherings of modern times, the 28th International Eucharistic Congress. Since 1866 it has been the metropolis of the Polish community in America; nearly all their schools are conducted by the Felician Sisters and the School Sisters of Notre Dame. There was an estimated population of 1000 German Catholics in Chicago, 1844, who have increased and established many schools and churches. The Lithuanian church is one of the best organized. The Illinois Catholic Historical Society was founded, 1918, under the leadership of Fr. Frederic Siedenburg, S.J., by a group of priests and laymen who met at Loyola University for the purpose of studying and surveying the Catholic history of Illinois. There are about 30 Catholic papers and periodicals, including the "Columbian," the "Extension Magazine," the "Illinois Catholic Historical Review" and the "New World." Catholics distinguished in public life in Chicago are: Eliza Allen Starr, convert, artist and teacher of Christian art; Judge Gibbons; Judge Clifford, both of the Circuit Court of Chicago; Judge Marcus Kavanaugh of the Superior Court; Dr. J. B. Murphy, surgeon of world fame; ex-Judge Edward F. Dunne, formerly mayor of Chicago; and Stephen A.
Chicago, Archdiocese of, Illinois, embraces Cook, Lake, Du Page, Kane, Will, and Grundy counties; area, 3,620 sq. m.; diocese, 1843; archdiocese, 1880; suffragans: Belleville, Peoria, Rockford, and Springfield. Bishops: William Quarter (1844-48); James O. Vandevene (1849-53); Anthony O'Regan (1854-58); James Duggan (1859-70); Thomas Foley (1870-79); Patrick A. Feeney (1880-1902); James Edward Quigley (1903-15); George Cardinal Mundelein (1915). Churches, 387; priests, secular, 767; priests, regular, 500; religious women, 6393; universities, 2; colleges, 5; seminaries, 9; academic, 39; high schools, 23; parochial schools, 357; pupils in parochial schools, 217,260; institutions, 65; Catholics, 1,250,000.

Chichester (Lat., Cassa castrum, Cissa's fort), ancient diocese, founded, 1082. The Catholic episcopal succession, broken by the schismatic Richard Sampson (1536), includes St. Richard (1245-53), and ends with John Christopherson (1557-59), who was succeeded by the Anglican, William Barlow. Finally, the heads of the 24 courses of priests and their lawful commands while under their authority. Children owe the same obligations to superiors who replace their parents. (C. A. F.)

Children of God, a title of the faithful in virtue of special adoption by God; also used by Our Lord in the Sermon on the Mount (Matt., 5) with special reference to peacemakers.

Children of Mary, the title given to confraternities of Our Lady established in schools of the Sisters of Charity in 1847, after the manifestation of the Miraculous Medal (1830); to sodalities founded in 1818 by St. Madeleine Sophie Barat in the convents of the Religious of the Sacred Heart; and to various other societies of women and girls, some of which are affiliated with the Prima Primaria (First Primary) of the Society of Jesus in Rome. —C.E.

Children's Crusade, a pious opinion was current in Europe in the Middle Ages that the Holy Land could not be captured except by the pure of heart. In accordance with this belief thousands of children were gathered, under the leadership of a

Chief Priest, Jewish, the equivalent of high priest. It is more frequently used in the plural, especially in the N.T., to designate the actual and the ex officium priests. According to Flavins Josephus, the sons of high priestly families also bore that title. Finally, the heads of the 24 courses of priests organized by David may have been called chief priests. (M. S.)

Chilocotin Indians (Tsilkotin), Athabascan tribe of British Columbia in valley of Chilocotin River, now on Anakem and other reservations. A mission was established for them by Bishop d'Heryoung shepherd of Vendôme and a youth from Cologne, for an expedition to Palestine in 1212. Many died of hunger and exhaustion on the way to Brindisi where the remainder were sold as slaves to the Moors.—C.E., IV, 550.

Chile, independent republic occupying the southwestern part of South America; area, 280,084 sq. m.; est. pop., 4,004,014. Missionary work among the Araucanian Indians was undertaken at the end of the 16th century by the Jesuits who were expelled, 1623. In 1840 civil marriage was introduced. Catholicism has been ascribed to St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew, the disciples of Nestorius, spreading in the jingol domain, and an archbishopric was established for three centuries, and Protestantism, Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism. Mohammedan ceremonial program. The bells of Boston, Brindisi are noted in England, and in the United States those of Old Christ Church, Philadelphia; Christ Church, Boston; Trinity Church, New York; St. Patrick’s Cathedral, New York; the West Point chapel chime; and the chimes in the Church of Our Lady of Mercy, New York, which are most beautiful.—Herrick, Chimes, N. Y., 1926.

China, republic constituting the largest political division of eastern Asia; area, 4,279,170 sq. m.; est. pop., 318,653,000, of whom the majority are Buddhists. The three religions recognized by the Chinese as indigenous and adopted by them are Confucianism, Buddhism, and Taoism. Mohammedans number about 20,000,000, Catholicism has been established for three centuries, and Protestantism since 1807. The introduction of Christianity into China has been ascribed to St. Thomas and St. Bartholomew. The disciples of Nestorius, spreading their heresy through Asia after the condemnation of their leader, 321, are supposed to have reached China in the 7th century, a theory based on the Singanfu inscription found c. 1623. In the 13th century Dominican and Franciscan friars visited the Mongol domain, and an archbishopric was established at Cambaluc with bishops at Zaitun and Peking, but all Christian missions disappeared upon the fall of the Mongols and the accession of the Ming dynasty, 1368. The first modern missionary was the Dominican friar Gaspar da Cruz (1556), and missions were solidly established by the Jesuits under Fr. Matteo Ricci, the pioneer missionary of Peking. The Church suffered under the conquest of China by the Manchus, 1644, but Christian missions were strengthened by French Jesuits and priests from the Missions Etrangères, and many won favor at court as astronomers and interpreters. In 1724 an edict of Yung Chang exiled to Canton all missionaries except those employed at court, and, in 1736, Kien Lung forbade preaching of Christian doctrine under penalty of death. This led to cruel persecution at Fukien, 1746, during which five Spanish Dominicans, Serrano, Aleobar, Royo, Díaz, and Sánz, the vicar Apostolic, were martyred. In 1811 a search warrant was sent out for foreign preachers, and persecution continued after France and England had united in military action against China. On 21 June, 1870, 21 persons were massacred at the French consulate in Tientsin, but France was impeded by the Franco-Prussian War from action in China, outbreaks occurred, and the Boxer Insurrection (1900) lengthened the list of martyrs. An agreement was effected by the French minister Gerard, 1895, that all passages in official codes disadvantageous to Christians be struck out. The World War drained the missionary strength which was largely French and gave an impetus to the missionary activity of other countries, especially the United States and Ireland. The empire was divided, 1879, into five ecclesiastical regions comprising 38 vicariates Apostolic, 4 prefectures Apostolic, 1 mission, 1 diocese (Macao), with 1280 foreign and 577 native priests for 1,014,266 Christians. In 1924 ecclesiastical administration was reorganized and divided as given below. In 1926 two native bishops were consecrated, Rev. Joseph Hu, vicar Apostolic of Taichow, and Rev. Simon Tsu, vicar Apostolic of Hainan.

Chinese Rites, a conventional term for certain ceremonies in use from time immemorial among the Chinese, which the Jesuit missionaries allowed their neophytes to retain after conversion, but which were afterward prohibited by the Holy See. These rites had to do with honoring ancestors or deceased relatives and paying particular tokens of respect to the great Chinese master, Confucius. Fr. Matteo Ricci, S.J., founder of the Catholic missions of China, in his endeavor to be as tolerant as possible of Chinese customs which did not manifestly interfere with the purity of the Christian religion, considered that these rites might be continued on the ground that they were not religious ceremonies. After 1630 other religious orders established missions in China, and much controversy sprang up with regard to the rites. The methods of the Jesuits were bitterly, sometimes unjustly, attacked. After a long period of misunderstanding the Holy See forbade the rites to the Chinese converts, declaring that the ceremonies in honor of Confucius or ancestors and deceased relatives are tainted with superstition to such a degree that they cannot be purified. This decision is contained in the Apostolic Constitution "Ex illa die" issued by Clement XI, 19 March, 1715, and in the Bull "Ex quo singulari" issued by Benedict XIV, 11 July, 1742. Ricci's error was one of judgment and not of faith or morals. To safeguard the reputation of the holy missionary the Holy See forbade it to be said that Fr. Ricci approved idolatry. (V. J. D.)

Chinese Mission Society of St. Columban, a Dene (Athapascan) tribe, whose habitat was the vicinity of Lake Athabasca, Manitoba, Canada. The first missionary, 1845, and at present about one thousand of them live at the mission of Ile-a-la-Crosse.

Chi-Rho, a monogram composed of two Greek letters so named, resembling the Roman X and P, but in reality CH and R. They are an abbreviation of the Greek word Christos (Christ).
Chirographus or Chirographum (Litterae Autographae), a personal papal letter, usually treating a contemporary event of grave concern, as those addressed to Card. Gasparri: on Holy Saturday, 1926, about Mexico; and on Corpus Christi, 1929, about Mussolini. (J. B.)

Chiroancy, κιρό­μαν­της (Gr., cheiro, hand; mantria, divination), divination by the lines of the hand, also called palmistry. It is an ancient practise known among the Chaldeans, Assyrians, Egyptians, and Hebrews.

Chivalry (Fr., chevalerie, horsemanship, knighthood), in its fullest sense, that aggregate of custom, discipline, ideal, and sentiment which guided the medieval gentleman’s conduct both in war and peace. The origin of chivalry may be traced to the general conditions existing in the 9th century. When the empire of Charlemagne disintegrated, the task of saving the Christian West from utter ruin fell to the feudal magnates and their vassals. Only the landed gentry were able to take the field against invaders, with horse and full equipment of armor at their own expense. Accordingly as the classes of society became more sharply defined the lords of landed estates emerged as a military aristocracy which gradually crystallized into a brotherhood in arms and controlled admission into its body by recognized usage. As portrayed in the early literature of feudal times, the military nobleman did not stand very high in the social scale in point of sentiment and fine manners. Too often he fought brutally and dealt unjustly. The Church intervened with a moderating hand. While her bishops strove hard to check violence by means of the Truce of God and the Peace of God in the 11th century, they at the same time held before the people the ideals of conduct both in war and peace. The chivalric ideals of conduct were embodied in the symbolic rites of reception. Even in the golden age of chivalry every knight did not fully live up to the standards of knighthood, and it softened and degenerated into the crudest form of violence when the knights began to withdraw themselves from the sustaining influence of religion. Chivalry, however, has left to posterity a legacy of ideals and sentiments which remain an object of esteem and inspiration to many.—C.E.; Chivalry, ed. Prestage, N. Y., 1928. (p. 2.)

Choir, the part of the church reserved for the stalls of canons, priests, monks, and choristers, separated from the rest by low carved partitions of stone or wood. In early churches it extended from the apse to the nave of which it was part, and the term was later made to include the entire eastern end of the church, regardless of its use. In a cruciform church the choir may be beyond the transepts, between them, or projecting into the nave.—C.E.

Choir Religious, members of a religious institute or order who are obliged to recite the Office in common; or at least in private, even though not bound by Holy Orders; usually those professed under solemn vows, as distinguished from lay religious or those professed under simple vows, e.g., nuns engaged in teaching as contrasted with the lay sisters or coadjutors in temporal matters.—C.E., XII, 756.

Choiseul, Étienne François, Duc de (1719-85), French statesman, d. Paris. He was ambassador at Rome during the contest between the Parliament and clergy concerning the Bull “Unigenitus,” and aided in obtaining Benedict XIV's Bull “Ex Omnibus” (1756), which calmed the dispute. Later at Vienna he allied Austria with France to oppose Prussia. Recalled to Paris, 1758, he organized the French navy against England, and brought about the “Family Compact,” or alliance of all the Bourbon states. He aided in suppressing the French Jesuits, 1754, and his religious policy aimed at paralyzing the Church. The Duc d'Aiguillon and Mme. du Barry brought about his downfall, 1770, and he was exiled to his estate in Touraine. His brother, Léopold Charles (1724-81), was Abp. of Albi and Cambrai.—C.E.

Cholonec, Pierre (1641-1723), Jesuit missionary in Canada, b. Finistere, France; d. Quebec. He is the author of a biography of Catherine Tekakwitha.—C.E.

Chorepiscopus (Gr., chorepiskopos, rural bishop), name originally given in the Eastern Church to a bishop whose jurisdiction was confined to a rural district. The chorepiscopi still exist among the Maronites and the Jacobites, but they disappeared in the West in the 11th century, being replaced by archdeacons.—C.E., XVI, 24.

Chorister (Gr., chorus, a band of singers or dancers), a member of the body of singers entrusted with the musical part of the church service, and organized and instructed for that end; originally, they were ecclesiastics or boys trained under ecclesiastical care in a house attached to the cathedral; lay and female choristers are a much later development. (C. J. B.)

Chrish, or Chirs, a mixture of oil of basil and balsam, blessed by a bishop on Holy Thursday and used in administering Baptism, Confirmation, and Holy Orders, and in the consecration of churches, altars, cathedrals, and in the blessing of bells, and baptismal water.—C.E.

Chrismal or Chrismatory, a metal jar or small cylindrical box for holding oil of catechumens, oil of the sick, and chrism. The word formerly designated: the cloth covering wrapped about relics; a pall or corporal; a vessel for the Blessed Eucharist; a cere-cloth covering of the altar-table; also, the white-hooded robes of the newly baptized.

—C.E.

Chrismarium, a place in a church set apart for the administration of chrismation. Also a jar used for the holy oils.—C.E.

Chrismation (Gr., chrion, anoint), the act of anointing persons, as in baptism, or things, as in the blessing of baptismal water.

Chrisom, white baptismal robe used in medieval times to envelope a newly christened child. Chrysom Child, one who dies within a month of baptism, so called because the chrisom served as a shroud.

Christ (Gr., Christos), equivalent of the Hebrew word Messias, meaning anointed. In the Old Law, priests, kings, and prophets were anointed; therefore the One who was to combine this threefold dignity in His Person was looked forward to as the Messiah, or Christ. As a rule the Evangelists spoke of Him as Jesus Christ, and pagans who knew not the import of the word for anointed often referred to Him not as Christos, but, regarding His character and leadership, as Chrestos (the excellent one).—Beauchler, Jesus: a Diatessaron, N. Y., 1896; Pohle-Preuss, Christology, St. L., 1922.

Christ, Order of the Knights of, military order, organized, 1317, to replace the Knights Templar, and granted their possessions; it undertook the conquest of Islam in Africa. The religious spirit gradually declined, the grand mastership became a prerogative of the crown, and in the 19th century its possessions were confiscated. The papal decoration, Order of Christ, owes its origin to this order.—C.E.

Christ, Portraits of. No authentic likeness of Our Lord exists. He has been the subject of art from the earliest times. In the Lateran is preserved the portraits made without hands (achirophaeta) according to tradition. Many portraits have been analogously based on two descriptions, one by John of Damascus (8th century), the other purporting to be by the fictitious Publius Lentulus, Pilate's predecessor in Judea. The early Christians represented Christ symbolically as the Lamb, the Dove, and especially the Fish, the Greek name for which is a compound of the initial letters of five Greek words for Jesus Christ, God's Son, Saviour. Symbols of Christ the Good Shepherd are found in the catacombs. During the 4th and 5th centuries an effort was made to portray Christ in reliefs and mosaics upon sarcophagi. From the 6th to the 10th, Byzantine art portrayed Our Lord for the most part in mere types, lacking life, expression, and inspiration. From the 10th century on, the portraits of Christ have advanced in proportion with the development of art, the most distinguished portraits coming from the various schools of the Renaissance.—Meille, Christ's Likeness in History and Art, N. Y., 1924.

Christadelphians, a religious sect found in the United States, Canada, and Great Britain. Dr. John Thomas, an Englishman, came to the United States in 1844 and organized a number of societies (also in Canada and Great Britain), using for his central idea “taking out of the gentiles a people for His name.” During the Civil War because they wished to be exempt from military duty, the name Christadelphians, or Brothers of Christ, was adopted. Not accepting the doctrine of the Trinity, they hold that Christ was Son of God and Son of man. Profession of faith in doctrines of the Church, and baptism by immersion in the name of Jesus for remission of sins, are necessary for admission to membership. In government Christadelphians are entirely congregational. Each local organization is an “ecclesia.” The members elect representatives from among themselves for the management of each ecclesia. No foreign mission work is carried on. They publish two periodicals. In 1925 in the United States there were 78 churches, and 3988 communicants.

Christ Child Society, organization founded by Mary Virginia Merrick, in Washington, D. C., 1891, for anointed often referred to Him not as Christos, but, regarding His character and leadership, as Chrestos (the excellent one).—Beauchler, Jesus: a Diatessaron, N. Y., 1896; Pohle-Preuss, Christology, St. L., 1922.

Christchurch, Diocese of, New Zealand, comprises the provinces of Canterbury and Westland, a small part of Nelson province, and the Chatham Islands; erected, 1887; suffragan of Wellington. The Marist Fathers undertook missionary work there in the 19th century. The first bishop, John Grimes (1857-1915), was succeeded by Matthew Brodie (1916). Churches, 67; priests, secular, 36; priests, regular, 23; religious women, 296; boarding and high schools, 8; primary schools, 29; institutions, 5; Catholics, 30,000.

Christen, kri'sen (G1., chrion, anoint). (1) To administer the Sacrament of Baptism. (2) To name in Baptism. (3) To name in some ceremony analogous to Baptism; hence, to name.

Christendom. The term is here used in its narrower sense to stand for the Christian polity, an ideal which lasted for many centuries. Its foundations are to be found in Jewish traditions of a theocracy. From the Peace of the Church proclaimed by Constantine to the inroads of the barbarians, Christendom was all but conterminous with the Roman Empire, but imperial traditions were so strong that the ideal was not perfectly realized. At first the Christian polity seemed to perish with the empire. The subsequent ideal of the Middle Ages was influenced by the “De Civitate Dei” (The City of God) of St. Augustine. Charlemagne again made Christendom a perpetual polity in the West. The revived empire in the 10th century was an imperfect copy of the Carolingian. Otto III tried to make the empire more spiritual. In the 12th century the ecclesiastical body became a real society, cosmopolitan through the universal language, Latin; and the papacy was the head in temporal as well as spiritual things. An important thought. The Franco-Norman civilization which developed in France, England, and southern Italy, created Gothic architecture and epic and lyric poetry. Clergy and laity have probably never since been so united. Innocent III failed to realize his ideal of Christian cosmopolitanism, and after him the power of the papacy declined. The 14th century was a time of national wars, the Great Schism, and the unimpeded progress of the Turk. The development of nationality and of secular law proved factors in the Reformation. The Church lost influence over thought, and heresy affected faith and morals. Since the confusion caused by the Reformation the word Christian has come to express our common civilization, rather than a religion which so many Europeans no longer profess.—C.E.

Christe, sanctorum decus angelorum, or O CHRIST, THE GLORY OF ANGEL CHOIRS!, hymn for Lauds on 29 Sept., feast of the Dedication of the Church of St. Michael the Archangel; and for Vespers on 24 Oct., feast of St. Raphael the Archangel. It is attributed to Rabanus Maurus (776-856). There are 13 translations; the English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Christian, name by which believers in Christ were known soon after His Ascension; it occurs twice in Acts, 11 and 26, and in 1 Peter, 4. Also, the name of the religion which He founded, of its doctrines and precepts; of the life, habits of virtue, piety, spirit and character of His followers; of the Church which is rightly known by this name, as against sects which assume it (Christian Scientists, Christian Socialists); of the civilization which this religion developed in the world as distinguished from the civilizations of paganism, Islamism, Judaism.

Christian Church (GENERAL CONVENTION). After the Revolutionary War members of different Protestant churches united in evangelistic and sacramental services. In 1792 Rev. James O'Kelley withdrew, with many others, from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and they organized under the name of "Republic Methodist." In 1794 they became known as "Christians," using the Bible as guide and discipline, and accepting Christian character as test of church fellowship. A similar movement began among the Baptists of New England under Dr. Abner Jones who organized a church at Lyndon, Vt., 1800; he was joined by Elias Smith, Baptist minister of Portsmouth, N. H., and many others. This same year the "Great Revival" started in the Cumberland Valley of Tennessee and Kentucky. Two ministers, Richard McNemar and John Thompson, with John Dunlavy, Robert Marshall, and Barton W. Stone, withdrew in 1803 from the Synod of Kentucky and organized the Springfield Presbytery, adopting the same principles as O'Kelley in the South and Jones in New England. In 1829 Alexander Campbell and followers separated from the Baptists of Pennsylvania and Ohio. Barton W. Stone, one of the original leaders of the "Christians," joined them in 1832 on condition that the Bible should be basis of union. The greater part of the original body remained, although a large number of "Christians" in Kentucky and Ohio followed Stone. In connection with a resolution adopted by delegates from the South to the general convention withdrew and formed a separate organization until 1890, when Southern delegates resumed their seats in the convention. They have no creed or doctrine other than the Bible. No follower of Christ is barred because of difference in theological belief, Christian character being the only test of church fellowship. They practise open communion, and labor to further the spirit of unity among Christians. The general government of the body is congregational, and each local church is independent in its organization. They publish six periodicals. Foreign missionary work is carried on in Japan and Porto Rico. In 1915 there were: 6 stations with 12 missionaries and 24 native helpers; 19 churches with 1423 members; also in Porto Rico there are 8 Sunday schools with 649 members. In 1925 in the United States there were 1050 ministers; 1052 churches; 116,409 communicants.—Winchester, Handbook of the Churches, N. Y., 1927.

Christian Democracy, a political system which stresses the fundamental rights of individuals and society in relation to civil authorities in the State, guaranteeing the liberty of the individual to act according to the dictates of Christianity. The radical form advocates a republican government; the less radical allows monarchical government with representation of the people. The oldest systems, of Lamennais (d. 1854) and Giotberti (d. 1852), were condemned by the Church because of revolutionary ideas. Leo XIII laid down the principles of true Christian democracy in his Encyclical "Graves de communi" of 18 Jan., 1901. Christian democracy is opposed to socialism and has no political end, as has political democracy. It teaches respect for all laws and opposes hatred between classes of society. Its principles of political activity were restated by Pius X in his Motu Proprio of 12 Oct., 1903. These principles are embodied in the program of the Catholic political parties of Belgium, France, and Italy, and these parties are designated as Christian democracies.—C.E., IV, 708; Buchberger, Kirchliches Handlexikon, I, 1068, Munich, 1917. (E. L. P.)

Christian, the religion of Christ; the faith which He has inspired; the teachings and moral practises inculcated by this faith; the spirit of justice, charity, of obedience to law, purity of morals, and sanctity of domestic life which characterize the manners of those who adhere to this faith; and the consequent character of the civilization which is known as Christian and which influences even those who have never believed in Christ or who have lost that faith. The institutions of mercy, of every form of sociological relief, of education, and even of religion, though they do not profess belief in Christ or inculcate Christian practises, still feel constrained to continue and imitate the benevolence, the enlightenment, and to some extent even the worship and ceremonial, to which all such institutions must trace their origin. Christianity is the inspiration to which our art, architecture, painting, music, and litera-
Christian Science (Church of Christ, Scientist), American sect chartered by Mrs. Mary Baker Glover (Patterson) Eddy at Boston, Mass., in 1879. It teaches a theosophic, therapeutic system of “healing,” rejecting doctrinal belief as a religious basis, and claims, through a revival of the Apostolic healing of Christ (hence the name Christian), to depend on the application of scientific rules (hence Science) in the accomplishment of its work. The foundress, Mary A. Morse Baker (1821-1910), passed her childhood amidst the religious unrest then characteristic of New England. Subject to hysterical and cataleptic attacks, she had a meager common school education, unable often to attend. She married George Washington Glover in 1843 and, after his death, Daniel Patterson in 1853, separated from him in 1866, and was divorced in 1873. Four years later she married Asa G. Eddy who died in 1882 of heart disease; according to Mrs. Eddy he died of “mesmeric poison mentally administered.” In 1862 Mrs. Eddy applied for treatment to Dr. P. Quimby, one time follower of Charles Poyen, French mesmerist, who now had discarded all medicines, adopting a “mental treatment” of healing, and declaring “Truth” to be the healer. Mrs. Eddy after three weeks’ treatment declared herself cured and began to study Quimby’s methods and ideas. She based her teachings on a manuscript said to have been written by Quimby, although she later denied any dependence on his teachings. In 1875 appeared her first edition of “Science and Health,” rejecting doctrinal belief as a religious basis, and claims, through a revival of the Apostolic healing of Christ (hence the name Christian), to depend on the application of scientific rules (hence Science) in the accomplishment of its work. began, the original name, The Christian Union, is still retained, while farther west the names Church of Christ, and Church of Christ in Christian Union, are employed. Although differing in name these organizations are affiliated and recognize each other as part of the same general movement. They publish one periodical. In 1925 in the United States there were: 386 ministers; 323 churches; and 17,800 communicants.

Christina, Saint, virgin, martyr (c. 250), d. Bolsena, Tuscany. The daughter of a pagan nobleman, she embraced Christianity, and in her zeal destroyed the gold and silver idols of her father, distributing them as alms among the poor. She suffered tortments and a cruel death under Diocletian, and has been venerated since the 4th century. Patroness of millers, archers, and mariners. Emblems: a knife, arrow, serpent. Relics at Palermo and Torcelli, head in Cathedral at Milan. Feast, R. Cal., 24 July.—Butler.

Christina Alexandra (1629-89), Queen of Sweden, daughter of Gustavus Adolphus II of Sweden. She was crowned in 1646 and for a time ruled with laudable zeal, but later gave herself up to amusement. She gradually became interested in Catholicity, resigned her throne (1654) in favor of her cousin Charles Gustavus, went abroad, and was publicly received into the Church at Innsbruck, Nov., 1655. A month later she arrived at Rome, where she devoted herself to religious practices, and the study of art and literature, and although sometimes accused was noted for her charity to the poor. She is buried in St. Peter’s.—C.E.

Christine of Stommeln, Blessed, virgin (1242-1312), b. Stommeln, near Cologne, Germany. From very early youth she experienced visions and mystical trials. At the age of 12 she joined the Beguines and at 15 received the stigmata. Doubted and misunderstood, she was forced finally to leave the Beguines. She died in peace. Relics in church at Jülich, where, although not officially venerated by the Church, she is honored, 6 Nov.—C.E.

Christmas (O.E., Cristes Maesse, Christ’s Mass) or Feast of the Nativity, 25 Dec., celebration of the anniversary of the birth of Our Lord. In the earliest days of the Church there was no such feast; the Saviour’s birth was commemorated with the Epiphany by the Greek and other Eastern Churches. First mention of the feast, then kept on 20 May, was made by Clement of Alexandria, c. 200. The Latin Church began c. 300 to observe it on 25 Dec., though there is no certainty that Our Lord was born on that day. Priests have the privilege of saying three Masses, at midnight, daybreak, and morning. This was originally reserved to the pope alone; beginning about the 4th century he celebrated a midnight Mass in the Liberian Basilica (in which, according to tradition, the manger of Bethlehem is preserved), a second in the church of St. Anastasia, whose feast comes on 25 Dec., and a third at the Vatican Basilica. Many peculiar customs of the day are the outcome of the pagan celebrations of the January calendar. The Christmas tree, of which the first known mention was made in 1605 at Strasbourg, was introduced into France and England in 1840. The feast is a holy day of obligation, preceded by the preparatory season of Advent and by a special vigil; should it fall on a Friday it abrogates the law of abstinence.—C.E.; Guéranger, tr. Shepherd, The Liturgical Year: Christmas, Dub., 1886. (J. F. R.)

Christology, the branch of theology dealing specially with the nature and personality of Jesus Christ, His realization of the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, and His life and teachings as narrated in the Gospels.—Pohle-Preuss, Christology, St. L., 1922.

Christopher (Lat., Christ-bearer); Saint, martyr (3rd century), d. Lydia, Asia Minor. He is one of the most popular saints of the East and West, and is invoked as one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers. The legends concerning him are confused and often contradictory; however, it is generally conceded that he was engaged in carrying people across a raging stream. One day he carried the Christ Child across, and his burden became heavier at each step until it was almost unbearable, for Christ bore in His hands the weight of the world; to prove His identity Christ caused Christopher’s staff to grow into a fruit-bearing tree. This miracle converted many, and excited the rage of the king, who caused Christopher to be imprisoned, subjected to tortments, and beheaded. Patron of travelers invoked against storms and sudden death. Emblems: a tree, the Child Jesus on his shoulders, giant, torrent. Feast, R. Cal., 25 July.—C.E.

Christopher, Pope (903-904), b. Rome; d. there. A cardinal-priest, he secured the papacy by de-throning and imprisoning Pope Leo V. He is considered an antipope by many reputable historians although the tradition of Rome places him in the list of legitimate pontiffs. He confirmed the privileges of the monastery of Corbie, Amiens, and was driven from the See by Pope Sergius III.—C.E.; Mann.

Christo profusum sanguinem, or The Martyrs’ Triumph Let Us Sing, hymn for Matins for the common of many martyrs, in Paschal time. This hymn was written by St. Ambrose (340-397). There are five translations of the original hymn and eight of the Roman Breviary text; the English title given is from a translation by J. Neale and others.—Britt.

Christ the King, Feast of, last Sunday in Oct., instituted to give public homage to Christ, the Ruler of the world, by Pope Pius XI, 1925. Every year on this day is renewed the consecration of the world to the Sacred Heart.—Ryan, Encyclical of Pius XI, St. Louis, 1927.

Chrodegang, Saint, confessor (703-766), Bp. of Metz, b. Hhasbana, Belgium; d. Metz, Lorraine. Educated at the court of Charles Martel, he became chancellor and prime minister. He introduced the Roman liturgy and chant into his diocese and established community life for his cathedral clergy, composing a special rule for them. He founded the Abbey of Gorze and St. Peter's Abbey on the Moselle, and introduced the League of Attigny, a confraternity of prayer. Relics, in Benedictine Abbey of Saint-Symphorien, were destroyed during the Revolution. Feast, 6 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Chromatius, Saint, confessor (c. 387-406), Bp. of Aquileia. A scholarly theologian, he was in active correspondence with Rufinus, St. Ambrose, and St. Jerome, many of whose works being written at his suggestion. He successfully combated Arianism in his own diocese. There are preserved 17 treatises by St. Chromatius on St. Matthew's Gospel. Feast, 2 December.—C.E.

Chronicles, Books of. See Paralipomenon.

Chronicon Paschale, a Byzantine chronicle written in the 7th century, following a system of chronology based on the paschal cycle. It is known also as Chronicon Alexandrinum, Antiquionum, Cassianianum, or Constantinopolitanum. Beginning with the Creation, it is continued down to the Lord's 629. The period 600-627 is original work. The author was probably a cleric attached to the Patriarch Sergius.—C.E.

Chronology, Biblical. The events related in Holy Scripture are only occasionally correlated with events of secular history and are seldom dated according to an era or epoch. Hence, an attempt to fix the period of these events according to the Christian era necessarily results in a variety of opinion. Some events can be dated with reasonable certainty; others must remain for the present a matter of conjecture; still others, e.g., those that precede the time of Abraham, cannot be determined even approximately. In Genesis, 5 and 10, we have fables of chronological units, but for various reasons the numbers given in our present text are considered corrupted and the fables themselves incomplete. Abraham seems to have lived c. 2108 B.C. The Israelites were led out of Egypt by Moses, c. 1448, if the exodus occurred under Amenophis II, or two centuries later (1220) if under Menephtah. The kingdom was established probably, 1098, in which case Saul reigned from 1058-1011; David from 1011-971; and Solomon from 971-929. During the period of the two kingdoms we come to the first dates on which all authorities agree, because they are found recorded on Assyrian monuments, These are: King Achab's defeat at Karkar, 854 B.C.; Jehu's tribute to Shalmaneser II, 842; Manaseh's tribute to Tiglath-Pileser, 788; the assassination of King Pnakke, 736; the capture of Samaria, 722; and Sennacherib's expedition against Jerusalem, 701. The destruction of Jerusalem by Nabuchodonosor probably occurred, 587-586. The first Jewish expedition returned to Judea from exile, 538, the first year of the reign of Cyrus. The revolt of the Jews against Antiochus IV of Syria under Judas Machabeus took place, 167.

Our Christian era begins presumably with the year of Christ's birth; but due to a miscalculation, it was made to coincide with the year 754 of the Roman era, which is about six or seven years too late. Our Lord was born "in the days of king Herod," (Matt., 2), who died, 750 A.D.C. (4 B.C.), and during a census ordered by Augustus and carried out in Syria and Palestine by Cyrenius (Luke, 2). This census, according to the Monument of Augustus found in Ancyrta, was begun, 746 A.D.C. (8 B.C.), and was probably taken in the provinces in the following year. Hence, we must probably advance the year of Our Lord's birth to 747 or 748 A.D.C. (7 or 8 B.C.). Jesus began his public ministry when He was about 30 years of age (Luke, 3), a few months after St. John began to preach on the banks of the Jordan, which was "in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar," or in A.D. 28-29. His ministry lasted three and a half years according to some commentators, two and a half according to others. Astronomical calculation has fixed three dates as possible for his death: viz., 18 March, 29; 7 April, 30; and 3 April, 33. The second has found more general favor.

Closely associated with the death of Jesus are His Resurrection, His Ascension, and the coming of the Holy Ghost. The first missionary work of Sts. Peter and John is found in Acts, 4-5, and is dated from the consecration of Peter, 59-60 A.D.C. The latter of the two dates has been found more popular, because of the narrative of Our Lord's Ascension, which is placed in Acts, 1, shortly before the departure of Peter and John to Rome, are dated from the departure of Felix and the arrival of Festus in Palestine; but every year from 55-61 has been claimed for this event. Recent writers favor 59 or 60. The Apostle reached Rome the following year and the narrative of the Acts of the Apostles closes with the year 62 or 63. —C.E.; Fotheringham, Chronology of the Old Testament, Camb., 1906; Ramsay, The Bearing of Recent Discovery on the Trustworthiness of the New Testament, Lond., 1902. (H.W.)

Chronology, General (Gr., chronos, time), the science of time-measurement. Mathematical chronology determines units to be employed in measuring time; historical chronology fixes in the general course of time the position of any particular occurrence or its date. The first requisite is the era, a fixed point of time. The Christian era was introduced c. 527 by Dionysius Exiguus, a Scythian monk resident at Rome. He made its starting point the birth of Christ, which he reckoned to have been in the year 753 from the foundation of Rome, making this the first year of his era. This year and those following are designated as A.D. (Anno Domini, in the year of the Lord), and the years before Christ are designated as A.C. (ante Christum, before Christ) or B.C. This system was not general in Europe until after 1000. The Greeks dated events from 776 B.C., by Olympiads (periods of four years intervening between the Olympic games). The Romans from a criterion of their city (753 B.C.). They designated years by A.U.C. (ab urbe condita, from the founding of the city), or by the name of the consul in office. The later custom of dating by the regnal years of the Roman emperors was imitated by popes and other rulers. The indications of papal documents consist of conventional periods of 15 years, beginning in the reign of Constantine, when Julius Caesar reformed the calendar in 45 B.C., he fixed 1 Jan. as New Year's Day. In Rome until the reform of the calendar, 1582, the year began with Christmas Day, a custom still continued in papal bulls. The Julian system of time-measurement was inaccurate and by the 16th century was 10 days in arrear. The New Style (as it was introduced by Pope Gregory XIII, who ordained that 10 days in Oct., 1582, should not be counted, that the year should begin 1 Jan., and that three leap years should be omitted in every four centuries. In 1583 the Julian Period, containing about 7980 years, was introduced by Joseph Scaliger for reckoning events in one astronomical system. The Mohammedans date from the Hegira (flight of Mohammed from Mecca), 16 July, 622. At the French Revolution a new system of chronology was introduced: the Era of Liberty began in 1789 and was replaced by the Republican Era in 1792. This calendar was abolished by Napoleon in 1806. The order of the days of the week has never been interrupted in the Christian period and is the same in the Old Style and in the New. Various methods have been devised for ascertaining upon what day of the week any given date falls. The best known is that of Dominical Letters.—C.E.

Chrysanthus and Daria, Saints, martyrs (283), d. Rome. The legend concerning them relates that Chrysanthus, the son of the noble Polemius of Alexandria, was converted at Rome by the presbyter Carpopus, and lived in virginial matrimonial union with Daria, a beautiful Vestal. Together they converted many Romans of high rank. Condemned to death they were led to a sandpit on the Salarian Way, and stoned. Patrons of Eissel and Salzburg. Emblems of Chrysanthus: skin of an ox, sandpit; of Daria: a lily. Relics at Munsterich, Germany. Feast, R. Cal., 25 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

Chrysogonus, Saint, martyr (304), d. Aquileia, Italy. At an early date he was venerated in Rome, where a titular church in Trastevere bears his name today. A 6th-century legend made him a Roman, the Christian teacher of St. Anastasia. Arrested in the persecution of Diocletian, he was condemned to death by the emperor and was beheaded and his body thrown into the sea. His name is mentioned in the “Communicantes” in the Canon of the Mass. Buried at Venice; head in his church at Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 24 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.
The Church of the Natural Law. This was the Church in the time of the beginning of things, which is called the period of the natural law. The Church was instituted to repair human nature immediately, after the lapse of our protoparents, with the promise of a future Redeemer. Just as Revelation itself in the beginning was less full and less clear, so also the Church in that state of beginnings was less clear-cut and was held together simply by the profession of the true faith, and the true cult, of God. Hence, the visible unity of the Church, at this time rather loose, was practically brought right down to one profession of the true faith, and to that of the true cult, to God. Therefore, the corpus of the Church, which is held together in unity, as constituted in its first formation, was perfect.

The Church of Moses. The whole economy of the ancient dispensation from the time of Adam lay in the fact that the old dispensation was a preparation and a type, and that that economy might correspond more perfectly to this purpose. God, in the course of time, chose and instituted through Moses a particular people in whom, as Revelation and its typical character became clear, the form of the Church became more distinct. The Church, according to this peculiar form, did comprehend the whole people of God, but was a peculiarly instituting society made up of a particular people of God. Therefore, the Mosaic Church did not constitute the whole Church of God, but was the principal part of the whole Church of God which was promised and instituted in the protoparents of the race for all posterity. Through the particular covenant entered into with the people of Israel, the universal promise made by God to Adam, for the whole human race was not abolished or restricted, but was especially preserved, propagated, and more distinctly explained in one chosen people. Therefore the Gentiles were not bound to that peculiar form of the Church which was defined for the Hebrews. Rather for the Gentiles up to the time of Christ the Church of the Natural Law remained. The form of that peculiar Church instituted in the people of Israel, instead of the more imperfect form of the Natural Law, was more clear-cut in the unity of its sacred ministry, in the element of spiritual sovereignty, and in the teaching power, by which the unity of that whole people was determined in the worship of God, as well as in sacred learning and doctrine. Yet this was but a foreshadowing and a preparation for the Church of Jesus Christ in the perfect status of the New Testament. The form of the Church, imperfect as it was in the Old Testament, did not cease to exist in Christ by way of destruction, but by way of translation, for He translated it from an imperfect to a perfect state. "I am not come to destroy but to fulfill."

The Church of Christ. The Church of God received from Christ a special form and constitution. Besides a more ample Revelation, the Church obtained from Christ, as its Author, the perfect organization of a supernatural society, viz., a hierarchy by which it was to be ruled and taught, and the sacraments by which it was to be sanctified. Henceforth men would adhere to Christ as their Head just as far as they were united to and subject to the hierarchy instituted by Him. The Church, considered from this special aspect, as a perfect society, is new, taking its beginning from Christ, and is accordingly called the Church of Christ. As the form given to the Church by Christ is a necessary mode of the Church in the state of the beginning of things, it remains clear that after the time of Christ, the true Church could not continue to exist without the form given by Christ. Therefore, no one can belong to the true Church of God, who is outside the Church of Christ.

Church and State. An understanding of the relationship that should exist between Church and State in a Catholic country such, at present, as Italy, requires a clear perception of the nature and functions of each. Both are perfect societies. That is, each has its own paramount purpose to attain, and each, endowed with the rights and powers necessary to secure that end. The purpose of the State is to provide for the natural well-being and happiness of its citizens, and to this end it has dominion, within the scope of its rights, over all individuals and groups that comprise it, with power of coercion limited only by the Divine law either of nature or of revelation. The purpose of the Church is to secure the supernatural well-being of its members, that is, to prepare them for the state of supernatural beatitude after death to which the Divine Will has destined them. The spheres, then, of these two societies are separate, that of the State being whatever concerns the material welfare, the peace and order of human society, and that of the Church being what concerns the spiritual welfare of men, their jurisdiction, however, is over the same individuals. Both are of Divine origin, the State indirectly through the natural law and the Church directly through the ordination of Christ. Each is supreme in its own field and not subject to usurpation of its rights by the other. Should a question arise, however, of disputed jurisdiction, and agreement is impossible of attainment, strictly speaking the position of the Church should prevail as being a higher society than the State in its origin and end. However, as Leo XIII points out, in his Encyclical Christian Constitution of States, the two powers can find a way of agreement or modus vivendi, as the present pope has done and is still doing in so many instances. Furthermore, since the natural welfare of men cannot be dissociated from their supernatural welfare, the State should protect the Church, foster its interests, and recognize it as the public and official State religion. On the other hand, the Church should respect the jurisdiction of the civil power as supreme in its own sphere, and teach respect and obedience to that authority as of divine obligation. This mutual relationship should hold where the majority of its citizens are Catholics. Where the majority of the citizens of a state are not Catholics, the Church for reasons of policy does not insist on recognition as the State religion. In a non-Christian State recognition of the Church as the State religion is out of the question as the Church has no jurisdiction in right or in fact over unbap-tized persons. There the Church should be accorded... the toleration and protection given to any corporate body with full freedom to administer its own affairs. This is the practical position of the Church today in all countries where it is not the State religion.—The Great Encyclical Letters of Pope Leo XIII, N. Y., 1903.

Churches, Blessing of. Any building intended for use as a church or public chapel should be solemnly blessed, before Divine services are celebrated therein. This blessing is reserved to the bishop, but, with his consent, any priest may impart it. The ceremony prescribed in the Roman Ritual consists mainly of sprinkling the exterior and interior walls with holy water, and prayers, followed by a Mass. This solemn blessing cannot be given to private or domestic chapels, nor to any building which the bishop prudently foresees will later be turned over to secular use. See Consecration of Churches.

Churches of God in North America, General. Eldership of the, religious denomination popularly known as "WINEBRENNERAN," founded by John Winebrenner, and organized at Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1845. The members are both orthodox and evangelical in doctrine, and Arminian rather than Calvinistic. They adhere to three obligatory ordinances as mere symbols: Baptism (by immersion), the Lord's Supper, and "the religious washing of the saints' feet"; accept the Word of God as their only rule of faith and practice; and are presbyterian in their government. A weekly magazine is published by them.

Foreign missionary work is carried on in the Bogra District, Bengal, where there were in 1916: 3 stations, 4 missionaries, and 11 native helpers; 1 organized church with 27 members; and 7 stations with 188 pupils. In the United States in 1925 there were: 449 ministers, 484 churches, and 28,484 communicants.

Churches of the Living God, two groups of Negro churches, differing in detail, although similar in general character. In 1925 in the United States there were: 150 ministers; 27 churches; and 5684 communicants. (1) Church of the Living God (Christian Workers for Fellowship), organized in 1880 by Rev. William Christian at Wrightsville, Ark., as the Church of the Living God (Christian Workers for Friendship). In 1915 the name was changed to Christian Workers for Fellowship. Its most important tenets are "believer's baptism by immersion, the washing of saints' feet," and the use of water and unleavened bread in the Lord's Supper." Instead of churches they have "temples" subject to the authority of a general assembly. The "chief" or "bishop" is the presiding officer, the ministry including evangelists, pastors, and local preachers. A monthly periodical is published. (2) The General Assembly of the Church of the Living God, dissenters from the Church of the Living God (Christian Workers for Fellowship) in 1902. The disagreement arose over the head of that body, and also because of different opinions regarding certain articles of faith and Church government. For several years it was in an unsettled state, but in 1908 it was organized as the General Assembly of the Church of the Living God. The Church corresponds closely to the Methodist Churches in doctrine and general organization. One periodical is published.

Churching of Women, a blessing given by the Church to mothers after childbirth.—C.E.

Church Maintenance, the support of the ministers, institutions, services, and buildings of the Church. This duty is incumbent on the laity today just as it was under the Old Law and in Apostolic times. The method of fulfilling it varies in different localities and ages. The Church has always endeavored to prevent any abuses or exactions on the part of her ministers, and regulations have been laid down, especially by vicars capitular and provincial councils which the clergy must obey. In the British Isles and the United States the money is usually raised by pew rents or charges for seats, together with special collections; but admission to the church must be free. In parts of Canada a tax based on the civil authorities' assessment is levied. In certain European countries the governments pay a small stipend for the clergy's support; this, however, is done not out of generosity, but in pursuance of an agreement with the Holy See to make restitution for the Church properties and revenues already stolen by the civil authorities.—C.E.

Churc of Brethren or Dunkards (Ger., Dunker), to dip, or DUNKARDS, one of the CONSERVATIVE GERMAN BAPTIST BRETHREN CHURCH, a Protestant sect established as a separate church at Schwarzenau, 1708, by Alexander Mack, Pietist, and seven of his companions. This group were probably the first to receive trine (triple) immersion in the history of the Protestant Church. They differed from other Pietists in that they were not averse to Church organization and did not abandon ordinances which Christianity hold necessary for salvation. Their doctrine, polity, and practise follow the same general line as the Quakers, Mennonites, and similar bodies, though they are entirely distinct from them. They were repressed by the state Churches of Germany, Holland, and Switzerland. Peter Becker settled in Germantown, Pa., 1719, the rest of the Brethren following shortly afterwards. The Church of the Brethren is Orthodox Trinitarian, believing in baptism by trine forward immersion. The government of the Church is almost Presbyterian. The power of discipline, including trial and excommunication, rests with the local congregation. They have three periodicals. In the United States in 1905 there were: 540 ministers; 1030 churches; and 120,103 communicants. The members are most numerous in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Virginia. Foreign missionary work was carried on in 1916 under the General Mission Board of India, China, Sweden, and Denmark, where there were: 60 American missionaries with 187 native helpers; 16 organized churches with 1803 members; 20 schools with 2439 students; and 5 hospitals.

Church of England, a corporate institution established by Queen Elizabeth and her ministers, chiefly by William Cecil, Lord Burghley. Constituted by the Act of Supremacy and Uniformity of 1558, it received its official doctrinal standards in 1571 by the promulgation of the Thirty-nine Articles (q.v.), and claimed continuity with the Catholic Church.
through the pre-Reformation Church in England. Since continuity, however, presupposes a successive existence without constitutional change, Anglicanism, whose priests were consecrated by an entirely new form of ordination, cannot be considered to possess this continuity. It cannot have Orders, for at the first it disclaimed the institution of a sacrificing priesthood; it has no jurisdiction apart from what it receives from the sovereign and Parliament; it never had Apostolic succession, since it originated in a repudiation of the Holy Roman See, the only remaining source of Apostolicity. Down to the 18th century it had been accepted with little question as the national religion, but it became extremely unpopular during the reigns of George IV and William IV, as being the religion of the reactionary ruling caste. The Anglican Church embraces three irreconcilable schools of thought based on entirely different principles, united only by the tie of a legal establishment: the High Church party, whose teaching approaches in some matters to Catholic doctrine; the Low Churchmen, or Evangelicals, who look on Rome as Antichrist and on Luther and Calvin as apostles of the true faith; and the Broad Churchmen, or Latitudinarians, who hold dogma to be of trifling importance compared with conduct. An advanced section of the High Church, 1850-1900, the “Ritualists,” sought to establish the right to use Catholic vestments and Catholic ceremonials in their churches, and were eventually successful. Recently a great effort has been made to substitute the name Anglo-Catholic and even Catholic simply, for the older names of High Churchmen, Tractarian, and Ritualist. The Low Church party is now insignificant in numbers and influence. The Broad Church or Modernist party has drifted much further from orthodoxy and has greatly increased in numbers and influence. Revisions in the Book of Common Prayer (q.v.) have quite recently created serious divisions in the Church. The Church of England is divided into the two provinces of Canterbury and York. The province of Canterbury comprises 30 dioceses; the province of York, 12. The archbishops of Canterbury and York and the bishops of London, Durham, and Winchester always sit in the House of Lords. Of the other 35 bishops, 21 only have seats in the House of Lords, by seniority of date of appointment. The number of parish clergy (incumbents) is 12,906; the number of communicants, 2,510,037.—C.E.

Church of God (General Assembly), religious organization founded in Tennessee, Aug., 1886, under name “Christian Union,” reorganized in 1902 under name “Holiness Church,” and in 1907 adopted name “Church of God.” They follow the teachings of Arminius, and also are in accord with the Methodist bodies. The requisites for membership are “profession of faith in Christ, experience of being ‘born again,’ bearing the fruits of a Christian life, and recognition of the obligation to accept and practise all the teachings of the church.” The Lord’s Supper, water baptism by immersion, and foot-washing are the sacraments observed by this body. The government is described as “a blending of congregational and episcopal, ending in theocratical, by which is meant that every question is to be decided by God’s Word.” The chief ruler is the pastor of the local church. They publish one periodical. According to the last census there were in the United States 923 ministers, 666 churches, and 21,076 communicants.

Church of God and Saints of Christ, religious organization of colored people. In 1886 William S. Crowdy, Negro cook on the Santa Fe Railroad, claimed to have had a vision from God ordering him to lead his people to the true religion and endowing him with the gift of prophecy. At Lawrence, Kan., he organized the Church of God and Saints of Christ. He had only a few followers at first, but the numbers increased rapidly and headquarters were removed to Philadelphia. Appointed bishop, two white men associated with him were later raised to the same office. The prophet believed that the Negro race is descended from the ten lost tribes of Israel and taught that man’s salvation depended upon obedience to the ten commandments and the teachings of the Bible. A pamphlet called the “Seven Keys” published under the direction of the Broad Churchmen, or Latitudinarians, who hold dogma to be of trifling importance compared with conduct. An advanced section of the High Church, 1850-1900, the “Ritualists,” sought to establish the right to use Catholic vestments and Catholic ceremonials in their churches, and were eventually successful. Recently a great effort has been made to substitute the name Anglo-Catholic and even Catholic simply, for the older names of High Churchmen, Tractarian, and Ritualist. The Low Church party is now insignificant in numbers and influence. The Broad Church or Modernist party has drifted much further from orthodoxy and has greatly increased in numbers and influence. Revisions in the Book of Common Prayer (q.v.) have quite recently created serious divisions in the Church. The Church of England is divided into the two provinces of Canterbury and York. The province of Canterbury comprises 30 dioceses; the province of York, 12. The archbishops of Canterbury and York and the bishops of London, Durham, and Winchester always sit in the House of Lords. Church of the Nazarene (The Established Church of Scotland), Presbyterian in doctrine, governed by kirk sessions, presbyteries, synods, and the General Assembly. The Church of Scotland was Catholic until 1560, when the jurisdiction of the Pope was abolished by the Scots Parliament, the Mass proscribed, and a Confession of Faith, drawn up by John Knox and other divines, ratified. In 1927 there were 1800 ministers, 1715 churches, and 739,787 communicants.

Church of the Nazarene, formerly Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene, a religious movement which began in the United States towards the close of the 19th century, in New England, in New York City, and in Los Angeles, Calif. The founders were dissenters from the Methodist churches because they believed that full liberty to emphasize the doctrine of entire sanctification, called the “full gospel,” was not allowed even in the Methodist churches. The organizations in New York and New England united as the “Association of Pentecostal Churches of America” in 1896. The Los Angeles body joined the others at the first convention of the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene.

Church Unity Octave, the observance of which was extended by Pope Benedict XV to the Universal Church and enriched with indulgences, 25 Feb., 1916, had its inception in 1908 under Rev. Paul J. Francis, when he was a "Pro-Roman" Anglican of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. The first practical result was the submission and reception of 17 members of the Society of the Atonement, of which Fr. Paul was the founder and Superior, into the Catholic Church, 30 Oct., 1909. In Dec., the Octave received the sanction and blessing of Pius X, and 22 Sept., 1921, Card. Dougherty presented a resolution to the hierarchy that "the Unity Octave be held throughout all the dioceses in the United States." The Octave is observed from 18-25 Jan., and a plenary indulgence has been granted on the first or last day under the usual conditions.—C.E., Suppl.

Churchwardens, officials charged with the care of the secular offices of Anglican churches and, in England, supervisors of the poor.

Chus, kū'sil. (1) Son of Cham and father of Nimrod (Gen., 10). (2) The country known to the Greeks as Chus is called Ethiopia in Is., 18 and 20, and was long a powerful nation.

Chusai, kū'si, friend and counselor of King David (2 Kings, 15), originally of Arach. In the revolt of Absalom he sided with David although pretending to uphold Absalom, whom he advised in such a way as to save David’s cause (2 Kings, 15-17).—C.E.

Ciasca, Aquisto (1383-1902), Augustinian cardinal, b. Polignano a Mare, Italy, d. Rome. He was entrusted by Leo XIII with several missions and took part in the Vatican Council as a theologian and interpreter for the Oriental bishops. As Oriental scholar he held important positions. He discovered and edited a valuable Arabic version of the "Diatessaron," and published the extant fragments of a very ancient Coptic Old Testament in the Bor­gian museum. In 1893 he was made Secretary of the Congregation of Propaganda.—C.E.

Chiborium (Gr., kiborion, cup), the vessel which contains the small Hosts used for the Communion of the faithful. It is similar to a chalice, but the bowl is usually larger and has a cover. The materials are gold, silver, or baser metals, but the interior must always be gold. When it contains the Blessed Sacrament it is enshrined in a silk drapery, always white or gold in color. It is blessed by a bishop or by a priest deputed by him. The term was also for­merly applied to the canopy surround­ing the altar.—C.E.

Cieplak, Jan Felix (1857-1926), Abp. of Vilna, b. Dabrowa, Poland; d. Passaic, N. J. A teacher of theology in the Academy of Petrograd, he was made bishop, 1908; archbishop, 1919. As successor of Abp. Ropp of Petrograd, who had been exiled by the Bolsheviks, Cieplak was summoned several times by the Soviet Department of Religious Affairs for refusing to carry out the following decrees: 1. To sign an agreement acknowledging government ownership of Church property and prohibiting religious instruction. 2. To order the clergy not to resist the confiscation of Church treasures. In 1923, Cieplak and Mgr. Budkiewicz were seized and taken to Moscow for trial, with 13 other priests, charged with inciting Catholics to a counter-revolution. After a farcical trial, Budkiewicz and he were condemned to death but, in deference to universal public protests, the sentence of the archbishop was commuted to imprisonment. After spending 13 months in the Bolshevik prisons, Cieplak retired to Rome. In 1926 while visiting the Polish centers of the United States he died. —McCullagh, Bolshevik Persecution of Christianity, N. Y., 1924.

Cimabue, che-ma-b60’a Gio­vanni (Cenni 1302), painter, b. Florence; d. there, probably. He was reputed to be the founder of Italian painting by Vasari, who gave biographical data now known to be unreliable. Through Dante’s tribute in the "Purgatorio" his name was associated with Giotto’s and he became the legendary teacher of the latter. The "Madonna of the Rucellai," in the church of Santa Maria Novella in Florence, long attributed to him, is now known to be the work of the Sienese Duccio di Buoninsegna. The only authentic example of his work is the mosaic of "John the Baptist" in the apse of the Pisa cathedral. A fresco of the "Madonna and Child with St. Francis," in the lower church at Assisi, is ascribed to him.—C.E.

Cincinnati, city, Ohio. In the early part of 1811 an unsuccessful attempt was made by the pioneer Catholics of the wilderness, which then constituted Cincinnati to establish a congregation. This project received further impetus in 1814 when Bp. Flaget celebrating the first Mass in Cincinnati in the house of Michael Scott exhorted the congregation to erect a church. Owing to the intense anti-Catholic sentiments prevalent and a city ordinance prohibiting the erection of a Catholic church within the corporate limits, the first church, a plain barn-like edifice, was erected, 1822, on the northwest corner of Vine and Liberty Streets then outside the specified restrictions. This log structure served as the cathedral of Bp. Fenwick, first bishop of the newly created diocese of Cincinnati, but following the removal of the prohibitive ordinance the church was moved to the site later occupied by the College of St. Francis Xavier. Bp. Fenwick by a personal visit to Europe secured the aid of the nobility of France and of the pope for the erection of a cathedral, and 17 Dec., 1826, St. Peter’s Cathedral was completed. From a printing press which Bp. Fenwick received while in France was issued, in 1831, the first edition of the “Catholic Telegraph.” A school was opened in conjunction with the cathedral and was placed in charge of the Sisters of Charity who arrived in the city 27 Oct., 1829, and who also had an orphan asylum under their supervision. Bp. Fenwick also established the first Dominican convent in the United States, the Priory of St. Rose. Rev. John Baptist Purell, second Bp. of Cincinnati, founded the famous Mount Saint Mary’s of the West, and gained renown by his able refutation in open debate of the charges made by Rev. Alexander Campbell that the Catholic Church was an enemy to enlightenment. It was he also who dissuaded a mob incited by the Knownothing party from burning the cathedral and killing the Apostolic Visitor, Abp. Bedini. The large number of German Catholic immigrants resulted in the erection of Holy Trinity Church in 1841 the cornerstone of the present cathedral was laid, and in 1850 the Archdiocese of Cincinnati was created. The city (1929) had 66 churches and 62 parochial schools, in addition to academic institutions, including Mt. St. Mary’s of the West (Norwood), Teachers’ College of the Athenaeum of Ohio, St. Xavier College, and the College of the Sacred Heart; orphan asylums and hospitals. Cincinnati’s renowned College of Musicians was founded, 1878, through the instrumentality of a Catholic, Reuben R. Springer, who conceived the idea and endowed it generously. Another Catholic who contributed appreciably to the cultural life of the city was Mrs. Sarah Peter, a convert, who did valuable service in selecting works for the Cincinnati Art Museum. She also brought over several religious communities to aid in the charitable and educational work of Cincinnati, among them the Franciscans, Sisters of Mercy, and the Little Sisters of the Poor. Catholic pop. (est.), 105,000.—C.E.

Cincinnati, Archdiocese of, Ohio, comprises the counties south of the northern line of Mercer, Auglaize, and Hardin, all west of the eastern line of Marion, Union, and Madison Counties, and all west of the Scioto River to the Ohio River; area, 12,043 sq. m.; diocese, 1821; archdiocese, 1850; suffragans: Cleveland, Columbus, Covington, Detroit, Toledo, Rapid City (South Dakota), New York, Proteus, Nashville, Fort Wayne, Bp. and Alsip; Edward Fenwick, O.P. (1822-32); John B. Purell (1833-83); William H. Elder (1883-1904); Henry Moeller (1904-25); John T. McNicholas, O.P. (1925). Churches, 229; priests, secular, 300; priests, regular, 208; religious women, 2,782; colleges, 4; seminaries, 3; normal schools, 4; academies, 11; high schools, 14; parochial schools, 134; pupils in parochial schools, 40,131; institutions, 27; Catholics, 220,000.

Cincture. See Girdle.

Circumcissions (Lat., circumciser, around; cella, cell), schismatics who probably began before the death of Constantine, joined the Donatists, and lived as brigands throughout Africa. They had no occupation but spent their time playing, drinking, and performing acts of violence. Frequently they sought their own death, considering suicide as martyrdom.

Circumcision (Lat., circumcisio, a cutting around, specifically the removal of the foreskin from the penis) was once widely practised, whether as a rite of religious import, for physical well-being, or as a ceremony of varying significance. It was venerated by the Jews as of sacramental meaning due to its institution by God as a sign of the covenant between Himself and Abraham and to be practised on Abraham and his nation (Gen., 17). The Child Jesus was circumcised out of reverence for the Law (Luke, 2).—C.E.

Circumcision, Feast of the, 1 Jan., commemorates the occasion when this rite of the Jewish religion was received by Our Lord, eight days after His birth. This festival is traceable to the year 567; it may be older. The Mass and Office give prominence to the part the Mother of Our Lord has in the work of Redemption.—C.E. (x. i. 8.)

Circumcision, the mutual inexistence of the three distinct persons of the Blessed Trinity, the Father being whole and entire in the Son, likewise in the Holy Ghost, and so the Son in the Father and the Holy Ghost; and the Holy Ghost in the Father and in the Son. The expression is used also to denote the particularity of the two distinct natures in Christ.—Pohle-Preuss, Divine Trinity, St, L., 1922.

Cisalpine Club, association of Catholic laymen founded in England, 1792, to perpetuate the movement which had found expression in the “Declaration and Protestation” signed by the Catholic body in 1789. This declaration represented the final and definite break with the Jacobite political party, the possible success of which up till that time had been considered by most Catholics as the only chance for a revival of Catholicity in Great Britain. The signers accepted the House of Hanover as legitimate rulers and reverted to the Oath of Allegiance of James I. In 1788 Lord Stanhope, a member of the Established Church, drew up the “Protestation” which disclaimed some of the more objectionable doctrines ascribed to Catholics and which was signed by the bishops, nearly all the priests, and the foremost Catholic laymen, and resulted in the Relief Act of 1791. Lay members of the committee were accused by the Bp. of Hippo, undertook the formation of the Cisalpine Club, the members of which pledged themselves “to resist any ecclesiastical interference which may militate against the freedom of English Catholics.” Membership usually numbered between 40 and 50 and four or five meetings were held annually. At first the association took an active part in Catholic affairs and established a school at Oscott, but after a few years it became a mere dining club. After Catholic Emancipation the members formed an “Emancipation Club,” which was dissolved after 17 years.—C.E.

Cistercians. See Order of Citeaux.

Citation, in the wide sense, any judicial summons to appear before an ecclesiastical court; in the strict sense, a legal act through which the defendant is, by order of the judge, called before the court to give his evidence. A citation, which has to conform to certain legal formalities, is necessary except when the defendant appears of his own accord before the judge to give his evidence.—C.E.

Citeaux, Abbey of, original mother-house of the Cistercian Order, 12 m. s. of Dijon, France. It was founded in 1098 by St. Robert, a Benedictine Abbot of Molesme, for the purpose of restoring the most literal possible observance of the Rule of St. Benedict. St. Alberic and St. Stephen Harding were his two immediate successors; twenty-three of the abbots are venerated in the order as saints or blessed. St. Bernard of Clairvaux began his monastic life here. In the French Revolution the monks were expelled from Citeaux and the abbey was sold in 1791 as state property. Since 1898 it has been occupied by the Order of Reformed Cistercians (Trappists).—C.E.

City, term frequently used to designate the Church; “a city seated on a mountain” (Matt., 5); also applied to heaven (Heb., 12). The “City of God” is the title of Augustine’s great work. (Ed.)

City of God, celebrated apologetic work of St. Augustine, constituting the most complete defense of Christianity against the attacks of paganism, To grasp fully its import, it is necessary to know the circumstances that led to its writing. In a desperate attempt to crush the new religion, paganism employed libel and calumny besides the sword, the most persistent accusation being that the Christians were guilty of the evils which befall the Roman Empire. At length, however, the Church won her freedom, and had already enjoyed a century of triumph, when the worst calamity of all overtook Rome; on 24 Aug., A.D. 410, the city was taken by the Goths. The question of responsibility for the disaster was again raised, and the old charge was revived. Prosperous under the gods, the pagans could now say with a semblance of truth, “Rome perished in Christian times!” The result was demoralizing, for many simple Christians, bewildered and at a loss for a reply, faltered in their faith. In order to encourage these and to refute the ancient calumny, Augustine, Bp. of Hippo, undertook to write the apology which he called “De Civitate Dei” (City of God). In 22 books, written at intervals from 412 to 427 A.D., and published in parts as written, the great Doctor surveys the whole course of history pointing out that the downfall of Rome was caused not by the Christians but by the immorality of pagan cults, by the perversions of pagan philosophies, by pagan unbelief, and by the corruption of pagan life. In a historical and doctrinal panorama, he displays God’s plan as embracing and ordaining all things with supreme wisdom and harmony. In the last 12 books, he shows that the natural unity of the human race was broken by the sin of Adam, from whom in consequence sprang two kinds of men or “Cities”; the one ruled by self-love, the other by love of God. The latter constitutes the “City of God,” which in opposition to the civitas diaboli (city of the devil) will outlast all the kingdoms of this world, and progress invincible and imperishable unto an assured future of happiness. Although the purpose of the “City of God” is directly apologetic, by setting forth the course of humanity in a universal form, unifying it under one Providence, and verifying the providential guidance in the facts of history, it is the foundation and kernel of a complete system of the universe, and the key to the formation of the Cisalpine Club.

Civil Allegiance, the duty of loyalty and obedience which a person owes to the State of which he is a citizen or a subject. In the light of Christian principles this duty does not involve submission to a force which may never be resisted, nor compliance with a condition for the sake of peace and security; it is a religious duty founded on obedience to God by whose authority the civil rulers exercise their power.—C.E.

Civilization (Lat., civilis, pertaining to citizens in the State), a social order characterized by a high degree of accumulated knowledge, art, law, and social organization. It is distinguished from savagery and barbarism, which are social orders inferior in these respects, and has been possessed in different degrees and different ways by China, India, medieval Europe, Rome, Greece, Assyria, Egypt, etc., as well as modern Europe and America. There is an intimate relationship between civilization and religion. The chief points of contact are: (a) Ideals. Every civilization is built around central ideas of what is right and valuable. Greece emphasized liberty and beauty; Rome, order and administration under law; medieval Europe, the Kingdom of God on earth. The central philosophy of the present era includes elements drawn from the past, with, perhaps, a consciousness of the opportunity and possibility of doing great and new things. The worth of individual men is highly emphasized, hence democratic institutions; and the existence and requirements of social life are consciously studied and its influence extended. Although the 16th-century revolt against the Church has caused repeated repudiation of the doctrines and institutions of religion, many of the most cherished ideals are inheritances from the religious thought of the past. Christ revealed God’s interest in and love for every individual soul. The present consciousness of human worth is due more to this than to any arguments of natural philosophy. Christ preached a life of faith, hope, and charity toward others, all expressed in good works (in direct opposition to the indifference and fatalism of Asiatic thought). These doctrines of the necessity and worth of justice and cooperation are the basis of social life. Christ taught the double obligation of every citizen to God and to Caesar—to live a moral life as an individual, and to contribute his part to the temporal success of society. This religious sanction is a great supporting force of law and order.

(b) Knowledge. All civilization rests upon a cumulative body of common knowledge, diffused throughout the population. Both in the building of this system and in the diffusion of its contents, the Church has ever held an important place. Religion has ever been the center of the work of education; has maintained schools and honored scholars; and, through the sermons and example of religious leaders, has constantly spread abroad the highest ideals and views of life and living. In a commercial age, such teaching is held subordinate to education in business and manufacture; but a lack of true and higher thought always leads to discord, unhappiness, and a break-down of the very material prosperity upon which the lower teaching concentrates.

c) Social organization. Civilization exists in a body of men living in social union, wherein the individual cooperates with the community and the community with the individual. The ordering of these intricate inter-relationships is achieved partly by codes of laws, partly by accepted customs, and largely by the good will of the individuals themselves. Man is by nature social. He will seek to establish his life along lines that avoid conflict with his fellows, hence custom and law arise. However, this social tendency is limited. Social life requires sacrifice of individual liberties and opportunities, and man’s innate selfishness will operate to oppose such sacrifices, unless some other force press him to submit. This force is found only in religion. Those who appeal to patriotism, to devotion to the human race of the future, or to the socialistic state, find little response. Religion teaches an order of duties in justice and charity, and recognition of the established rights of others, and in addition, guarantees rewards for the observance of these rights, and punishment for their violation. Positively, religion is the great socializing force. Negatively, religion serves to repress all dangers to social organization. Crime in the individual is branded by religion. More especially, social forces are diagnosed and their true nature exposed. Thus crime in the individual is diagnosed and their true nature exposed. Thus religion teaches an order of duties in justice and charity, and recognition of the highest ideals and views of life and living. In a commercial age, such teaching is held subordinate to education in business and manufacture; but a lack of true and higher thought always leads to discord, unhappiness, and a break-down of the very material prosperity upon which the lower teaching concentrates.

Civilization varies with time, places, and peoples. It is an adaptation wherein the various elements of human life reach a high degree of harmony. A civilization that ignores or contradicts religious truths and influence is necessarily imperfect and incomplete. Inevitably such a situation means conflict, friction, and suffering, until the discord is dissolved and harmony restored. An unreligious or antireligious civilization involves such fundamental discordance with truth as to be unthinkable and incapable of existence. A civilization like our own, containing much of Christian thought and living, with much that is unchristian, is necessarily subject to conflicts and troubles. Progress requires the restoration of religion in its fullness to the life of society and of every individual, and continuation of this religious life in perfect adaptation to every change of social, economic, and political history.

CIVILTA CATTOLICA, ché-vel-ta’ ká-töl’k-ká (Catholic Citizenship), a fortnightly review, published in Rome, which treats political, social, and religious questions from the Catholic standpoint, gives the news of the world, and criticizes important books. It was established, with the approval of Pius IX, 1850, by Frs. Curci and Zaparelli, of the Society of Jesus. Since 1853 it has had its own printing establishment in Rome, having been published there, after the first six months in Naples, except for an interval in Florence, 1870-87.

C.J.M. = Congregation of Jesus and Mary, or Endist Fathers.

Clairvaux, former Cistercian abbey, department of Aube, France. Founded in 1115 by St. Bernard, as a branch of Citeaux (q.v.), it sent out many colonies of monks who formed other monasteries. Bl. Bernardo Pignatelli, later Pope Eugene III, was a monk of Clairvaux. In the French Revolution the property was confiscated, and since then the abbey buildings have been used for a penitentiary. —C.E.

Clairvoyance (Fr., clairevoyant, clear seeing), ability, more commonly pretended, to perceive events at a distance or things not visible to normal sight under ordinary conditions.

Clandestinity (Lat., clandestinus, secret, hidden), illegal secrecy; an impediment to valid marriage. It means that a marriage ceremony of a Catholic is void unless performed by a priest in his own parish, or by a bishop in his own diocese, or by a delegate of either. There is an exception in lawful “marriage without a priest” (q.v.).—C.E.; Ayrinhac, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919. (J. F. S.)

Clarendon, Constitutions of. At a council held at Clarendon, Wiltshire, 1164, Henry II forced Thomas Becket and the English bishops to accept 16 constitutions, eneroaching upon the rights of the Church, which he alleged to be customary of the realm.

Clare of Assisi (Lat., clarus, famous), Saint, virgin (1194-1253), cofoundress with St. Francis of Assisi of the Poor Clares, b. Assisi, Italy; d. —C.E. A daughter of Bl. Ortolana, and endowed from early childhood with the rarest virtues, she was won ov by St. Francis to the service of Christ, pronouncing her vows, 1212, despite the opposition of her father. She lived in retirement with the Benedictine nuns of San Paolo, but fled from there to Sant' Angelo in Panzo to escape the persistent efforts of her family to make her abandon her vocation. After some time St. Francis brought her with her sister, St. Agnes, and other companions to Assisi, where they took up residence in a small house adjoining the chapel of San Damiano, which became the first establishment of the order. St. Francis appointed Clare superioress of this convent, 1215, and she ruled until her death. She observed the strictest poverty and austerity, declining the offer of Pope Gregory IX to mitigate the rule. During her life the order spread throughout Europe; her mother, her aunt, Bianca, and a younger sister, Beatrix, joined her. When the soldiers of Frederick II, devastating the valley of Spoleto in 1234, attacked the convent of San Damiano, Clare held a ciborium before the sacred Image, for this reason she is usually represented in art holding a ciborium. Patronress against sore eyes. Emblem: a monstrance. Relics at Assisi. Canonized, 1255. Feast, R. Cal., 12 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Clare of Montefalco, Saint, virgin (c. 1208-1308), b. Montefalco, Italy; d. there. She was probably a secular Franciscan tertiary in her youth, but later a nun in the Third Order of St. Augustine. She became Abbess of Santa Croce, 1295. Her life was remarkable for her devotion to the Passion of Christ. Emblems: scales. Feast, 18 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Clare of Rimini (Chiara Agolanti), Blessed, mar. (1282-1346), Poor Clare, b. Rimini, Italy; d. there. Having led a dissipated life, she repented, and as a Franciscan tertiary resolved to expiate her sins by penance. Later she became a Poor Clare and superioress at Rimini. Beatified, 1784. Buried in cathedral of Rimini. Feast, Rimini, 10 Feb.—C.E.

Claret and Clara, Antonio Maria, Venerable (1867-79), prelate and missionary, b. Saltmaul, Spain; d. Pontfroide, Narbonne, France. He engaged in missionary work in Catalonia and the Canary Islands. Returning in 1849 to Vich, where he had been ordained, he established the Congregation of the Missionary Sons of the Immaculate Heart of Mary and founded the great religious library at Barcelona. In 1851 he was made Abp. of Santiago de Cuba, but in 1857 was recalled to Spain, where he was confessor to Isabella II and for nine years rector of the Escorial monastery. By his writings he contributed to the revival of the Catalan language. Pope Leo XIII declared him venerable in 1899.—C.E., XVI, 26.

Clasped Hands, denoting lifelong union, a symbol of matrimony. (J. F. S.)

Classis, an inferior tribunal of the elders and pastors of the parishes in certain Presbyterian Churches. It existed in England under the Commonwealth, and in certain Reformed Churches of the Continent and America.

Claude de la Colombière, Blessed (1641-82), b. Saint-Symphorien-d'Ozon, France; d. Paray-le-Monial. He entered the Society of Jesus, 1659. In 1674 he was made superior of the Jesuits at Paray-le-Monial and there became the spiritual adviser of St. Margaret Mary Alacoque. He was sent to England, 1676, as chaplain to the Duchess of York, later Queen of England. Even while at court he continued his missionary labors. He was later arrested in the Oates persecution and was imprisoned and banished from England, escaping death only because of his services to the English queen, and through the intervention of Louis XIV. The last two years of his life were spent at Lyons and Paray-le-Monial, as spiritual director to the Jesuit novices. His works include six volumes of sermons, letters, and moral treatises. Beatified at Paray-le-Monial. Feast, 15 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Claudia, a Christian woman of Rome, probably the wife of Pudens, mentioned by St. Paul (2 Tim., 4).

Claustral Year (Lat., annus claustralis), a year of strict residence, signifying the first year following the appointment of a canon, when he was bound by such strict rules as to suggest the sacredness of enclosure in monastic life.

Clavius, Christopher (Christopher Clavius; 1538-1612), Jesuit astronomer and mathematician, b. Bamberg, Bavaria; d. Rome. Known as the “Euclid of the 16th century,” he distinguished himself in mathematical research at Coimbra and was appointed to the chair of mathematics at the Collegium Romanum. He devised a method of dividing a measuring scale which was the precursor of the so-called Vernier’s measuring instrument, but his greatest achievement was the execution and success of the Gregorian Calendar reform which prevailed through his efforts. His numerous scientific works have been published collectively under the title of “Christophori Clavii a S. I. Opera Mathematica quinque tomis distributa.” Among them are a practical geometry and algebra, an exposition of gnomonics, and a treatise on the Gregorian Calendar reform.—C.E.

Clavus, Claudius (Claudius Claudisson Swart), cartographer, b. Salling, Denmark, 1388. He was apparently an ecclesiastic. His maps of northwestern Europe and Greenland, accompanied by descriptions of those regions, exercised a great influence on the development of cartography, his works being utilized by the leading map-makers for four centuries.—C.E.

Clean, a term which primarily indicates freedom from foreign substances. Accordingly, it became in the Bible an elemental notion, controlled by numerous laws which affected details of life, ranging from food and contacts to ceremonial requirements. The notion passed into the moral sphere, connoting absence from sin. It received its highest sense when applied to such a spiritual condition as “the clean of heart” (Matt., 5). (J. A. N.)
Clemens non Papa (Jacques Clement; d. 1558), composer of the Netherland school, b. Flanders. He is said to have been chapel-master to the court of Charles V. The pseudonym, non Papa, was used to distinguish him from his contemporary, Pope Clement VII. A forerunner of Palestrina and Lassus, his works are chiefly sacred, including masses, motets, and psalms.—C.E.; Butler.

Clement I (Lat., clementia, merciful, mild), Saint, Pope (c. 88-c. 97), b. Rome; d. probably in exile, c. 99. The first Apostolic Father, little is known of his life except that his "Epistle to the Corinthians" is authentic. The work remains today one of the valuable monuments of the sub-Apostolic age, and a strong proof for the primacy of the Catholic Church. His name occurs in the Canon of the Mass, and Origen and Jerome identify him with Paul's fellow-worker (Philip, 4). Patron of marble-workers, stone-cutters, and mariners. Feast, 23 N.; Butler.

Clement II (Suger), Pope (1046-47), b. Saxony, Germany; d. near Pasaro, Italy. Bp. of Bamberg, he was proposed for the papacy by King Henry III, whom he later crowned emperor and upon whom he bestowed the title "Patricius." He opened his short pontificate with reform measures attacking simony, cenonaries, but after a peace with Charles V, he crowned the latter at Bologna, 1530. He refused to annul the marriage of Henry VIII and Catherine of Aragon, and of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. He was a friend of Philip Neri. Chiefly a spiritual ruler, he revised the Vulgate, Breviary, and Missal, instituted the Forty Hours' Devotion, founded the Scots and Clementine Colleges at Rome, and freed the papacy from Spanish influence. He heard, 1584, a presentation of the controversy between the Jesuits and Dominicans on the question of grace, but gave no decision in favor of either side, until 1598, when he notified each order that they must continue their teaching on the subject but must not deviate from the doctrines of the Church in regard to the question. He ended the Thirty Years' War by abdication of Henry IV of Navarre who had abjured Calvinism.—C.E.; Kirchenlexicon.

Clement III (Guido Le Gros), Pope (1265-68), b. S. Gilles, France; d. Viterbo, Italy. He was Bp. of Puy, Abp. of Narbonne, and Card. Bp. of Sabina. As pope he was noted for his asceticism and his hatred of nepotism. He helped establish the Angevin dynasty in Naples by aiding Charles of Anjou against Manfred. Owing to Ghibelline antagonism Clenlent never sided with the court of Charles V. The pseudonym, Clemens non Papa, was used to distinguish him from his contemporary, Pope Clement VII. A forerunner of Palestrina and Lassus, his works are chiefly sacred, including masses, motets, and psalms.—C.E.; Pastor.

Clement IV (Guido di Li Borgo), Pope (1294-1303), b. Fermo, Italy, 1242; d. Rome. He was a Knight of Rhodes and fulfilled the schismatic Friars Minor. Charitable and courageous, he gave asylum in Avignon to the Jews during the Black Death.—C.E.; Kirchenlexicon.

Clement V (Guillaume de Nogaret), Pope (1305-1314), b. Villandraut, France, 1264; d. Roquemaure. He was Abp. of Bordeaux, and thus an English subject, but also a friend of Philip the Fair of France. He took up his residence at Avignon and made it appear that the papacy was a department of the Gallican Church, while the cardinals ruled the Papal States. At Philip's request he began the condemnation of Boniface VIII, suppressed the Templars, issued the Bull "Clericis Laicos," and absolved Philip from guilt in Nogaret's violations. He excommunicated Robert Bruce for his share in the murder of John Comyn, and completed the "Corpus Juris Canonici."—C.E.; Pastor.

Clement VI (Pierre Roger de Beaufort), Pope (1342-52), b. Castle of Maumont, Corrèze, France, 1291; d. Avignon. He was a Benedictine, Abp. of Sens, and of Rouen and was created cardinal in 1338. He purchased Avignon for the papacy, opposed Emperor Louis the Bavarian, and received the submission of the schismatic Friars Minor. Charitable and courageous, he gave asylum in Avignon to the Jews during the Black Death.—C.E.; Kirchenlexicon.

Clement VII (Giulio de' Medici), Pope (1523-34), b. Florence, Italy, 1478; d. Rome. He was a Knight of Rhodes and fulfilled many important offices, and was made cardinal in 1513. To protect the Papal States, he allied himself with France, Florence, and Venice against the Emperor Charles V and the Colonna family. He was imprisoned and Rome was sacked by the German mercenaries, but after a peace with Charles V, he crowned the latter at Bologna, 1530. He refused to annul the marriage of Henry VIII and Catherine of Aragon, and of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. He was a friend of Philip Neri. Chiefly a spiritual ruler, he revised the Vulgate, Breviary, and Missal, instituted the Forty Hours' Devotion, founded the Scots and Clementine Colleges at Rome, and freed the papacy from Spanish influence. He heard, 1584, a presentation of the controversy between the Jesuits and Dominicans on the question of grace, but gave no decision in favor of either side, until 1598, when he notified each order that they must continue their teaching on the subject but must not deviate from the doctrines of the Church in regard to the question. He ended the Thirty Years' War by abdication of Henry IV of Navarre who had abjured Calvinism.—C.E.; Kirchenlexicon.
Clement X, and was made cardinal in 1669. As pope he labored to preserve the peace of Europe against Louis XIV, and began the struggle with him over the droit de régale, i.e., concerning revenues of vacant dioceses and abbey. He aided Poland against the Turks in the Insurrections, and beautified Rome.—C.E.

Clement XI (Giovanni Francesco Albani), Pope (1700-21), b. Urbino, Italy, 1649; d. Rome. Bp. of Rieti, Sabina, and Orvieto, he filled many important offices and was appointed cardinal-priest. He opposed nepotism, and labored unceasingly for the peace of Europe, becoming involved in disputes with Russia, Austria, Poland, and Naples, and over the question of the Spanish succession. His Bull "Unigenitus" opposed Jansenism. He established and strengthened the foreign missions, and enlarged the Vatican Library. C.E.; Kirchenlexicon.

Clement XII (Lorenzo Corsini), Pope (1730-40), b. Florence, 1652; d. Rome. He was Abp. of Nicomedia, nuncio to Vienna, and Card.-Bp. of Frascati. As pope, he established a foreign mission among the Copts in Egypt, promulgated the first decree against Freemasonry, and formed a union with the Greek Church, beautified Rome, and improved its public works.—C.E.; Kirchenlexicon.

Clement XIII (Carlo della Torre Rezzonico), Pope (1758-69), b. Venice, Jesuits. When Bp. of Padua he held a synod against Freemasonry, encouraged reconnection with the Greek Church, beautified Rome, and improved its public works.—C.E.; Kirchenlexicon.

Clement XIV (Lorenzo, or Giovanni, Vincentio Antonio Ganganelli), Pope (1774-82), b. Sant' Arengelso, Italy, 1705; d. Rome. Educated by the Jesuits, he became a Franciscan, held many ecclesiastical offices, and was appointed cardinal in 1739. At this election the concord was the victim of pressure exerted by France and Spain. He inherited the trying legacies of Clement XIII, and in support of his policy to keep peace with the Catholic princes and thus combat the irreligion which was rampant in Europe, he issued his Brief of suppression against the Jesuit Order, 1773. No other reason was given by the pope for the Brief than that it was necessary for the preservation of peace between the Church and the Christian princes. It was ignored in many places. His policy was unsuccessful, and temporal princes began to legislate in ecclesiastical matters. Clement founded the University of Münster in 1773.—C.E.; Kirchenlexicon.

Clementines, a collection of the decrees of the Council of Vienne, 1311, under Pope Clement V, published by authority of Pope John XXII, 25 Oct., 1317. They are official and form the Seventh Book of the Corpus Iuris Canonici. The collection comprises five books divided into titles and chapters. The decrees refer to the disputes concerning the Franciscan Spirituals, poverty among the Minorites, the Mendicants, visitation of convents, the Beguines, benefices, the management of the Inquisition, etc. References are made thus: "C. 2 in Clem. De Testibus II, 8," meaning Second chapter of the Clementine, book two, title eight.—C.E. (P. J. L.)

Clement Mary Hofbauer (John Dvůrák), Saint, confessor (1751-1821), apostle of Vienna, second founder of the Redemptorists, b. Tasswitz, Moravia; d. Vienna. He studied at Venice, and visiting Rome as a pilgrim, he joined the Redemptorist Order and was ordained, 1785. With a companion, Thaddäus Hübl, he introduced the congregation into Warsaw, 1786, where it had phenomenal success until 1808, when its houses were suppressed and the fathers exiled from the grand-duchy. Clement then acted as chaplain to a Ursuline convent in Vienna. He was the chief supporter of religion in Austria, and contributed greatly to the extinction of Josephinism. Canonized, 1909. Feast, 15 March.—C.E.

Clement of Alexandria (Titus Flavius Clemens; d. c. 215), Christian writer, b. probably at Athens. He succeeded Pantanus as head of the catechetical school of Alexandria, c. 190. During the persecution of 202 the school suffered and Clement withdrew to Caesarea in Cappadocia, where he governed the local Church during the imprisonment of his pupil, Bp. Alexander. He was honored as a saint until the 17th century, when his name was dropped from the Clementine revision of the Martyrology, owing to the uncertainty surrounding his life, teachings, and cult. His writings, lacking technical precision and order, were easily misjudged, and he was censured by Pope Gelasius and Photius; however, his rule of faith was sound. In opposition to the rationalizing Gnostics, then a force in Alexandria, he made faith the basis of his speculations, but interpreted Scripture in too allegorical a manner.—C.E.

Clement of Ireland, Saint, confessor (c. 750-818), b. Ireland; d. Auxerre, France. So great was his fame that Charlemagne invited him to his court and made him regent of the school of Paris from 773 until his death. After Alcuin's retirement (786), Clement was named master of the royal school at Aix-la-Chapelle. He is probably the author of a biography of Charlemagne. Buried in the church of St. Astutor. Feast, 20 March.—C.E.

Cleophas, name of two N.T. personages, the former, one of the disciples to whom Our Lord appeared on the way to Emmaus (Luke, 24); the latter, the husband of Our Lady's sister Mary (John, 19), identified as Alphus, father of James.—C.E.

Clepper (Clappe), wooden rattle, anciently used to summon the faithful to church on the last three days of Holy Week when the church bells were silent, and still used in religious houses.

Clerestory, part of a building rising above the roofs of other parts and pierced by windows, applied especially to churches whose division into central nave and side aisles of less height and width permits lighting from windows above the aisle roofs; found in the earliest Christian basilicas as well as Byzantine and Romanesque churches, and most beautifully developed in Gothic in relation to ribbed vaulting and flying buttresses.—C.E.

Clergy (Gr., kleros, lot, portion), a term applied to those separated from the laity, attached in a special manner to Divine service, and capable of administering the rites of the Church. Therefore the word clergy embraces the whole ecclesiastical hierarchy. To be numbered among the clergy one must receive at least first tonsure.—C.E. (R. B. M.)

Cleric, one who has been assigned to the Divine ministry by the reception of the clerical tonsure, and thus rendered capable of obtaining the power of orders and jurisdiction, benefices, and pensions; loosely used to designate also one who enjoys the clerical privileges of immunity and exemption, such as a religious, a novice, or a member of a society having community life without vows.—C.E. (s. b.)

Clericalism, the advocacy of exaggerated claims on the part of the clergy, especially in matters that lie in the field of the proper jurisdiction of the State. Quite generally, however, it is used as a term of denunciation in the literature of free-thinkers, radicals, and secularists who aim to banish all religious influence from public life, and consequently decry as clericalism the rightful application of moral principles to matters economic, social, and political. Latin masonry especially loses no opportunity to raise the cry of clericalism in the furtherance of its designs of secularism. Instead it favors laicism, i.e., the activity of the laity to the exclusion of the clergy in every sphere. Gambetta is credited with the slogan: "Clericalisme, voilà l'ennemi!" (clericalism, that's the enemy.) (A. J. M.)

Clerical Privilege. The privilege consists in this, that the clerics are not under the jurisdiction of the lay courts even in merely temporal matters, which would otherwise belong to the competence of such courts. Clerics should be tried only by an ecclesiastical court, unless otherwise legitimately provided for in particular places (can. 120). This benefit forbids any cleric to be summoned before a lay judge as a defendant. There is no infringement of the privilege if the cleric is cited as a witness, or if he is to be a representative of a lay person. Except with the permission of his own Ordinary, however, a cleric may not give testimony without necessity in criminal cases tried in a lay court, prosecuting for a grave personal penalty. Legitimate permission whereby a cleric may be called as a defendant into such courts may be the result of a Concordat, a custom, or the like. The Third Council of Baltimore forbids clerics to have other clerics cited before lay tribunals. Those who enjoy this privilege are all those who have received at least the first tonsure and have not lost their clerical privileges; likewise religious and their novices. By permission of the proper authority clerics and religious may be brought before the aforesaid judges in order to summon a cardinal, a legate of the Holy See, a bishop, even a titular, the highest superior of the Pontifical Institute, a major superior of the Roman Curia for matters pertaining to his office, the permission of the Holy See is required; for all others, the permission of the Ordinary of the place where the trial is to be held is required. If the requisite permission is not obtained and the above mentioned nevertheless are brought to trial, the following penalties are contracted: for citing a cardinal, a legate of the Holy See, one of the major officials of the Roman Curia for business pertaining to their offices, one's own Ordinary, one incurs by that very fact, an excommunication especially reserved to the Holy See; if another bishop, even only a titular, an abbot, or a prelate nullius, or one of the supreme moderators of the Pontifical Institute, is cited without the necessary permission, an excommunication simply reserved to the Holy See is thereby incurred; if the permission of the Ordinary is neglected, a cleric so acting is thereby suspended from office reserved to the Ordinary, and the laity are to receive suitable punishment from their Ordinary.—Ayrinhac, General Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1923. (w. g.)

Clerk, one of the secular or regular clergy; now commonly called cleric (q.v.). (s. h.)

Clerke, Agnes Mary (1842-1907), astronomer, b. Skibbereen, Ireland; d. London. She studied astronomy in Paris and received her universal renown with "A Popular History of Astronomy in the Nineteenth Century" (1885), which became a standard work, and also wrote "The System of the Stars," "The Herschels and Modern Astronomy," "Problems in Astrophysics," "Modern Cosmogonies," and contributed articles to the Catholic Encyclopedia.—C.E.

Clerks of St. Viator, religious order founded in 1835 at Vourles near Lyons, France, by Fr. Louis Joseph Querbes, under the patronage of St. Viator. The object is teaching, and before Fr. Querbes's death three provinces of the society existed in France and one in Canada. All important houses in France have been suppressed, but flourishing schools exist in Spain and in Belgium, where the superior-general resides. The society came to Clerks of St. Viator

Joliette, Canada, in 1848 and established schools and colleges: Bourget College, Rigaud; the Deaf and Dumb School and St. Louis School, Montreal; St. Viator’s School, Joliette, now Seminaire de Joliette; and many others. In the United States the Viatorians have had schools in Bourbonnais, St. George, Kankakee, Aurora, and Chicago, Ill.; Cohoes and Ogdensburg, N. Y.; Baker City, Ore. In all these the Brothers have been replaced by Sisters, except at Bourbonnais, where the Brothers maintain St. Viator’s College and high school. The Viatorians also conduct parishes. Since 1882 the establishments of the Middle West have been independent of the Canadian province and have a separate obedience. The novitiate and headquarters of the province were moved to Chicago in 1888.

Statistics: 4 provinces; 125 houses; 800 religious, of whom 120 are priests.—C.E., XV, 399.

Clerks Regular, generic name of religious institutes of men, combining the activities of the secular clergy with the solemn vows and common life of monks, though without the obligation of choir service, e.g., Jesuits, Theatines; in a broader sense, similar institutes without the solemn vows, e.g., Passionists, Redemptorists; or even without vows, e.g., Sulpicians, Salesians.—C.E.

Clerks Regular of the Pious Schools, called also PiARISTS, Seculars, Clerks of the Mother of God, and the Pauline Congregation, a religious order founded in Rome in 1597 by St. Joseph Calasanctius, to provide free education for poor children. Calasanctius gathered about himself several companions, established schools, and united his brothers to the Clerks Regular of the Mother of God (1614). In 1617 these two societies were separated and by a Brief the Congregation of St. Joseph Calasanctius was instituted, the members professing three simple vows. The society spread rapidly and in 1621 was elevated to the rank of a regular order with solemn vows and all the privileges of the mendicant orders, Suppressed by a Bull in 1646, the Congregation of Pious Schools was restored in 1656 with simple vows and an oath of perseverance in the congregation. Clement IX in 1669 restored the Piarists to the condition of regulars, and Innocent XI in 1684 declared them immediately subject to the Holy See. The general house is in Rome. Statistics: provinces, 14; schools, 344; religious, 4454.—C.E., XIII, 588.

Clément (1847-1854), convoked and presided over by Pope Urban II, 28 Nov., 1095, at Clermont-Ferrand, France, for the purpose of preaching the First Crusade. In an eloquent appeal, the pope described the sufferings endured by the Christians and the pilgrims in the Holy Land, and exhorted his immense audience to take up arms for the deliverance of Our Lord’s Sepulcher. Thousands of knights answered his appeal, bound themselves by an oath, and as an outward sign of their resolve, had a red Cross sewed on the shoulder: hence the name Crusades. The pope granted the Crusaders a plenary indulgence and placed all their properties under the special protection of the Church, threatening with excommunication anyone who would interfere with their estates during their absence. Cleveland, city, Ohio. The small Catholic population of Cleveland, in the early 19th century, was served by visiting Redemptorists and Fathers of the Most Precious Blood, the first resident secular priest being Rev. John Dillon, in 1835-36. A church, St. Mary’s on the “Plats,” was built, 1838, and dedicated, 1840, by Rt. Rev. Forbin Janson, of Toul and Nancy, who accompanied Bp. Purell from the Fourth Provincial Council of Baltimore. It remained the only church until the accession of Bp. Rappe as incumbent of the newly erected see, 1847. The Catholics numbered 4000, and work was immediately begun on a temporary church and school for the German population. The following year a diocesan seminary was opened in a stable, financial assistance from Europe making it possible to move it to more worthy quarters, 1850. Under the bishop’s active administration the city made rapid strides; the cathedral, begun in 1848, was completed in 1852; the Ursuline Nuns opened an academy and two orphanages, 1853; St. John’s College was founded, 1854, but closed a few years later for lack of patronage; Charity Hospital was opened, 1855; the Jesuits were introduced, and the House of the Good Shepherd established, 1869; and in 1870 a home for the aged poor was opened. The Sisters of St. Joseph, of Notre Dame, and other religious orders took up their work here; the present pilgrimage commenced, 1874, and the following year the bishop was forced to bring a suit of restraint against the taxation of Catholic school property; this was won in the superior court. An auxiliary bishop with special jurisdiction over the foreign population, was appointed, 1907, the first appointment of the kind made in the United States. Today Cleveland has 90 parish churches and 86 parochial schools with 47,623 pupils. Approximately 50 per cent of the population is Catholic.

Cleveland, Diocese of, Ohio, embraces counties of Ashland, Ashtabula, Columbiana, Cuyahoga, Geauga, Lake, Lorain, Mahoning, Medina, Portage, Stark, Summit, Trumbull, and Wayne; area, 7050 sq. m.; established, 1847; suffragan of Cincinnati. The Jesuits, Frs. Potier, Bonnecamp, and De la Richardie were the earliest missionaries; years later Fr. Edmund Burke and Fr. Edward Fenwick, O.P., with other Dominicans, ministered there, succeeded by the Redemptorists, the Fathers of the Precious Blood, and several celebrated seculars. Bishops: Joseph Hendren (1850-51), Thomas Burgess (1851-54), William Clifford (1857-93), William Brownlow (1894-1901), and George Burton (1902); Churches and chapels, 91; priests, secular, 398; priests, regular, 119; religious women, 2433; colleges; 4; seminaries, 1; academies, 16; high schools, 12; primary schools, 175; students in Catholic schools, 96,574 (in parochial schools, 72,346); Bp. Joseph Schrembs (1921). Churches, 259; priests, secular, 398; priests, regular, 119; religious women, 2433; colleges; 4; seminaries, 1; academies, 16; high schools, 12; primary schools, 175; students in Catholic schools, 96,574 (in parochial schools, 72,346).

Clifton, Diocese of, England, comprises the counties of Gloucestershire, Somerset, and Wiltshire; established, 1850; suffragan of Birmingham. Bishops: Joseph Hendren (1850-51), Thomas Burgess (1851-54), William Clifford (1857-93), William Brownlow (1894-1901), and George Burton (1902); Churches and chapels, 91; priests, secular, 398; priests, regular, 93; secondary schools.
Clinical Baptism. (Gr., klinikos, of a bed), in general, Baptism given to any one sick abed; in particular, Baptism administered at child-birth. "To be born," is an essential for Baptism. Medical men as well as theologians now teach as morally certain that the human fetus is animated at conception by the rational soul. Hence Baptism in difficult parturition or within the womb is sometimes required.—Coppenes-Spalding, Moral Principles and Medical Practice, N. Y., 1921; Fletcher, Notes for Catholic Nurses, Lond., 1912.

Cloyne, cloe-ne, Diocese of, Ireland, comprises Monaghan, nearly all of Fermanagh, a large portion of Tyrone, and portions of Donegall, Louth, and Cavan; suffragan of Armagh; founded by St. Patrick, who appointed St. Macarten first bishop. Heber MacMahon (1633-50) figured prominently in the war of the Irish Confederates. Present bishop, Patrick McKenna, since 1909; residence at Monaghan.

Churches, 87; priests, 107; religious women, 170; seminaries, 2; colleges, 4; high schools, 10; numerous primary schools; institutions, 6; Catholics, 98,690; others, 53,040.

Cloister. (Lat., claudere, to close), ecclesiastically cloister means an enclosure for religious retirement; formally, it signifies the legal restrictions opposed to the free egress of those who are enclosed, and to the free entry of outsiders within the limits of the material enclosure. Present canon law preserves every convent or monastery of regulars, on its completion, to be encloistered. The houses where only two or three religious dwell permanently and observe their rule as they can, are subject to this law.—C.E.

Clonard, School of, most famous school of the 6th century, founded by St. Finnian at Clunlad Eairaid. The "Twelve Apostles of Erin" were instructed in Sacred Scripture at Clonard which at one time had more than 3000 pupils, according to the Office of St. Finnian. Its glory departed in 1206 when the See of Meath was transferred from Clonard to Trim.—C.E.

Clonfert, Diocese of, Ireland, comprises portions of Galway, Roscommon, and Offaly counties; suffragan of Tuam; founded, 535, by St. Brendan the Navigator. A famous school developed around the monastery which he established there. The west doorway and east windows of the old cathedral, used by the Protestants since the Reformation, are noteworthy specimens of the Irish Romanesque style. Bishops of the diocese include Cummanian Fada, whose learned "Paschal Epistle" is of importance, John, an Italian prelate who beautified the cathedral (13th century), Thomas Gilmarin (1810-18), Thomas O'Doherty (1919-24), John Digman (1924); residence at Loughrea. Churches, 46; priests, secular, 52; priests, regular, 31; religious women, 105; college, 1; high school, 1; numerous primary schools; institutions, 6; Catholics (1927), 37,200; others (1911), 108.

Clongowes Wood College, Sallins, County Kildare, founded, 1814, conducted by the Jesuits. It has also a preparatory school and numbers 20 professors and 250 students.

Clonmacnoise, Abbey and School of, founded 544 at Ard Tipprait on the Shannon, by St. Ciaran. The masters were chosen simply for their learning and zeal, and pupils thronged from all parts of Ireland, France, and England. In the 12th century it was a center of Celtic art, architecture, sculpture, and metal-work, and its ruins may still be seen, with the exception of the little church of Ciaran.—C.E.

Clontarf, town, Ireland, on Dublin Bay, now incorporated with Dublin, famous for victory of Brian Boru over the Danes, c. 1014.

Closed Doors. (Gr., thyron ekkleisemonen, the doors being shut), an expression associated in particular with Christ's apparition to the Apostles both on Easter Sunday evening (John, 20, 19) and again one week later (John, 20, 26). Our Lord thus manifested the subtlety of His glorified body by which He was able to enter the room, "the doors being shut." In the parable of "The Ten Virgins" (Matt., 25) occurs the expression "the door was shut," indicating the security of those within and the exclusion of those without, or as St. Augustine says "where enemies do not enter nor friends go forth." The plural "doors" is usually employed because the oriental door had two leaves.—Fonck, Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1914.

Closed Times, seasons of the year during which there are certain restrictions concerning marriage. Formerly a marriage at Mass was not allowed from the beginning of Advent until after Epiphany, and during Lent and the octave of Easter. The present code of law does not forbid a marriage Mass at any time; it prohibits the nuptial blessing during Advent and on Christmas Day, and during Lent and on Easter Sunday, but with the bishop's permission the blessing may be given even during those times.—Ayrinhac, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919. (J. P. S.)

Clothing of Religious. The formal bestowal of the religious habit on a postulant or novice at the time of profession implies their acceptance of the obligations contracted by the three essential vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. During the ceremony the aspirant withdraws for the robing, the aspirant receiving the veil, ring, and bridals, and he is again one week later (John, 20, 26). Clothing of Religious. The formal bestowal of the religious habit on a postulant or novice at the time of profession implies their acceptance of the obligations contracted by the three essential vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. During the ceremony the aspirant withdraws for the robing, the different articles of the habit having been blessed by the bishop. The manner of profession for a nun, according to the "Pontificale Romanum," prescribes that the professed receive the veil, ring, and bridals from the bishop at the altar. Originally the reception of the habit from abbot or bishop, apart from any formal vows, constituted profession. A probationary habit is worn during the novitiate.

Clothing of the Dead. According to the Roman Ritual the corpses of clerics should be dressed in ordinary ecclesiastical costume, over which should be put the vestments distinctive of their order. Thus a bishop or priest has the amice, alb, girdle, maniple, stole, chasuble, and biretta; the deacon has his dalmatic and stole; the subdeacon his tunicle; and the cleric his surplice. No special dress is required for the laity, but the breast should be decently laid out and it is customary to place a rosary, crucifix, or other pious article in the hands of the deceased.

Clotilda, Saint, matron (c. 474-545), Queen of the Franks, b. probably Lyons; d. Tours. She was the daughter of Chilperic, King of the Burgundians of Lyons, and wife of Clovis I, whom she converted, 496. After the death of Clovis, 511, Clotilda's son, Chlodomir, was slain in a war against the Burgundians and two of his children were murdered by her other sons, Childebert and Clotaire, who subsequently made war on each other. Clotilda spent the remaining years of her life in prayer and penance near the tomb of St. Martin, at Tours. Popular early poetry disfigured her noble personality, but historically she has permanently established her untarnished fame. She is represented in art as a battle in the background, in memory of the conversion of Clovis. Emblems: a crown, church in hand. Buried in the church of St. Genevieve, Paris. Feast, 3 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Clovesho (CLOPHESHOCH), ancient English town, probably near Lincoln, where important councils of the Anglo-Saxon Church were held in 742, 747, 794, 798, 803, 824, 825. They represented the See of Canterbury and the whole English Church south of Humber. The most important were: the second, presided over by Cuthbert, Abp. of Canterbury, in which letters of Pope Zachary were read, 31 canons were passed, and usage of the Roman Church was prescribed; the third, which by the authority of Pope Leo III restored to Canterbury the Mercian Sees and abolished the archbishopric erected at request of King Offa. These councils were representative of church and realm. Kings of Mercia and chief men were present as well as bishops and abbots, and both laymen and clerics signed decrees.—C.E.

Clovis (CLODWIG or CLUDOWECH; 466-511), son of Childeric, King of the Salic Franks. Becoming ruler of the Tournai Franks in 481, he began his conquest by taking Soissons, and extending his boundaries to the Loire, after which he invaded Courtrai and Tongres. He conferred on the vassals of his kingdom into that nation which was to be for ages the chief defender of western civilization and Catholicism. In 506 he defeated the Visigoths Alaric II at Poitiers, and finally completed his conquests by annexing Cologne. He displayed great talent in governing, and made Paris his capital. He founded there as a mausoleum for himself and Clotilda the church of the Apostles, later St. Genevieve, which held his remains until the French Revolutionists destroyed the sanctuary and scattered his ashes.—C.E.

Clune, Diocese of, Ireland, comprises a large portion of County Cork; suffragan of Cashel; first bishop, St. Colman MacLenin (560-601). Seven recorded devastations of Clony took place from 822-1137. Its bishops were nearly all English from 1265-1429. Clone and Cork were united under Bp. Purell (1429), John O'Brien was Bp. of Clony and Ross (1748-69); these followed Mrs. Hewe McKenna (1769), William Coppinger (1791), Michael Collins (1830), Bartholomew Crotty (1833), David Walsh (1847). Ross was separated 1849, and the See of Clony occupied by Timothy Murphy (1849), William Keane (1857), John MacCarthy (1874), Robert Browne (1894); residence at Cobh. The ancient cathedral at Clony was a great masterpiece of Romanesque architecture. After the suppression of the monastery, 1790, it was bought by the town and practically razed to the ground. The library was partly destroyed by the Huguenots and again by the mobs of the French Revolution.—C.E.; Medieval Academy of American Research, 1929. The abbey-church of Cluny was the largest monument in Christendom before the building of St. Peter's of Rome, and a masterpiece of Romanesque architecture. After the suppression of the monastery, 1790, it was bought by the town and practically razed to the ground. The library was partly destroyed by the Huguenots and again by the mobs of the French Revolution.—C.E.; Medieval Academy of American Research, 1929. It is customary to place a rosary, crucifix, or other pious article in the hands of the deceased.

Coadjutor of the Bishop, a bishop deputed by the Holy See to assist the diocesan bishop either in the administration of the diocese or pontifical functions. The powers of coadjutors depend on the Apostolic letters of appointment and secondly on the condition of the bishop assisted. As a rule the Coadjutor of the Bishop

The term 'coadjutor' has the right of succession to the episcopal see. (R. B. M.)

Coat without Seam (Christ's), a name for the Church, emblematic of the only body of Christians without division or dissension. The term is derived from the garment worn by Our Lord at the time of His Crucifixion for which rather than divide it the Roman soldiers cast lots. According to an ancient pious tradition the coat was woven by His Mother. (Ep.)

Cobbett, William (1766-1835), political writer, and author of "History of the Protestant Reformation." b. Farnham, England; d. Guildford. The son of a Surrey farmer, he derived his education mostly from intensive reading. He joined the army in 1784, saw service in Canada, and was discharged in 1791. Passing to the United States, he edited and published in Philadelphia his violently anti-American "Porcupine's Gazette." Shortly after his return to England in 1800, he started publication of the "Parliamentary Debates," which eventually became the "Hansard" of today. His vigorous language brought him several arraignments for libel, and finally a two-years' imprisonment. To escape his debts, he fled to the United States in 1817, and there published his famous English grammar. Returning to England, he successfully contested Oldham for Parliament in 1832, and again in 1834. In his greatest work, the "History of the Protestant Reformation" (1824-27), he defends the rights of the monasteries against the depredations of Henry VIII and Elizabeth.—Dict. Nat. Biog. (M. C. B.)

Cobo, Bernabe (1582-1657), naturalist, b. Spain; d. Lima, Peru. He was successively rector of the Jesuit colleges of Arequipa, Pisco, and Callao. From 1630-50 he was in Mexico as a missionary. His long residence in Spanish America equipped him with full and reliable information as to its natural features and inhabitants, and he may be considered the foremost authority on the subject in the 17th century. His "History of the New World," until recently neglected, is invaluable from a historical and scientific viewpoint. —C.E.

Cochin, Diocese of, India, comprises two stretches of territory on the Malabar coast; founded, 1558; suffragan of Goa. Franciscan missionaries under Fr. Henry de Coimbra arrived in Cochin, 1500. Pioneer missionaries included St. Francis Xavier, the Franciscans Joao d'Elvas and Pedro d'Amarrante, and Fr. Manuel de S. Mathias with eleven companions. The Dominican missionary, Jorge Themudo, was first bishop. Mateo de Oliveira Xavier occupied the see, 1597-1600, succeeded by Jose Ribeiro in 1909. Churches and chapels, 77; parochial schools, 88; institutions, 11; Catholics, 118,228.

Cock, The, emblem in Christian art associated with St. Peter with reference to his threefold denial of Christ before the cock crew. In Christian symbolism it stands also for vigilance and diligence. Two examples may be found in the hymns, "Ales diei munitius," sung at Lauds, Tuesday, and "Eterne rerum Coadjutor," sung at Lauds, Sunday. In the former, W. Courthope's translation of the first verse reads:

As the bird, whose clarion gay Sounds before the dawn is grey, Christ, who brings the spirit's day, Calls us, close at hand.

In the latter, the second verse as found in "The Hymner" reads:

Now the shrill cock proclaims the day, And calls the sun's awaking ray— The wander pilgrim's guiding light, That marks the watches night by night.

Cock-Crow, the time of day when the male fowl first crows; early morning. It was then that Peter denied Our Lord (Matt., 26; Mark, 14; Luke, 22; John, 18). (C. J. B.)

Cockle or Tares. The two names used in the original text point to plants of quite different characters: (1) a general term applicable to all ill-smelling and harmful plants; (2) the bearded darnel, the only grass with a poisonous seed. Hence the rendering in both Donay and Authorized versions is inaccurate. It is mentioned in the parable of the man who sowed good seed in his field, but whose enemy came and oversowed cockle in the wheat (Matt., 13).—C.E., XII, 152; Fonck, tr. Leahy, Parables of the Gospels, N. Y., 1914.

Cockle among the Good Seed, descriptive term given to a parable found only in the first Gospel (Matt., 13). It is the story wherein the Kingdom of Heaven is likened to a farmer who sowed his field with good seed, and found later that his enemy had oversown it with cockle, which is the nature of this noxious weed that even the practised eye cannot detect its presence, nor distinguish it from the wheat until the crop is well advanced. The farmer's servants would have gone immediately and uprooted the cockle, but the wise owner instructed them to suffer both to grow on to full harvest time, when the wheat could be safely gathered into his granaries and the worthless cockle bound into bundles and burned. The evangelist has given no particulars as to the time or place for this parable. It was addressed not only to the disciples but to the multitudes. Many commentators think it was delivered from a little fishing boat just as was the parable of "The Sower" (Matt., 13). Summarized the parable is this: The sower is Christ; the field is the world; the good seed, the Disciples of Christ; the cockle, those who live in sin; the enemy, the devil and his agent; the harvest, the end of the world; the reapers, the angels; the fire, hell; the barn, heaven. The parable illustrates chiefly the origin, the continuance, and the end of evil in the Kingdom of Christ. The explanation of the parable furnishes its application as well. By application can be understood sin, the essence of all evil, in the Church of our day and in its members. The simile of sowing the cockle is often applied to bad example. Some of the Fathers of the Church have found in this similitude a rule for action in dealing with heretics. This parable is read on the Fifth Sunday after Epiphany.—Fonek, Parables of the Gospels, N. Y., 1914.

 Codex, a book or tablet of writings inscribed on leaves of parchment, vellum, or papyrus, lighter than the waxed wood-leaves once used, with sheets or in part) of the Bible made before the invention of printing. The earliest codices are written in a running hand. Generally the material used was parchment (animal skins cleaned and prepared, by a special process, for writing upon both the flesh side and the hair side) or vellum (parchment of fine grade from calves, kids, etc.). Codices of papyrus exist only in short fragments. Sometimes the surface was colored and the lettering tinted as with the golden codex of the Vetus Italica at Verona and the silver codex of the Gothic Gospels at Upsala, which were on purple leaves. The writing was commonly arranged in two columns, but Vaticanus has three and Sinaicicus has four. The letters were not divided into word-groups and there was no punctuation save some breathing marks. The lines were more or less angular than the others and linked in a running hand. COEDUCATION out of the system, and it turns out to be a fatal objection as the consequences of the "indifference" said to be produced by it prove contrary to the essential interests of family life. Coeducation prevails in a good number of Catholic elementary schools but Catholic policy is generally opposed to it in secondary schools and institutions leading up to college. The system prevailing in these is education of boys by male teachers, girls by women, usually belonging to a religious order. In some instances the same professors, both lay and religious, give courses at men's and women's colleges. Identical education exists in the graduate schools and summer courses of Catholic universities.—C.E.

Coemgen or Kevin (Gael., fair-begotten), Saint, abbot (c. 498-518), founder of the monastery of Glendalough, Ireland. Of the royal race of Leinster, he was baptized by St. Cronan, educated by St. Petroc, and later embraced the monastic life. After founding his monastery he retired into solitude, remaining only at the urgent entreaties of his monks. Patron of Dublin. Cult approved, 1902. Feast, 3 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Coemhubum (Gr. koinos, common; bios, life), a community of monks, or cenobites, living in the same house under one authority; a monastery; convent; religious community. Their origin is ascribed to Anthony, the anchorite, of the 3rd century, and with a greater degree of probability to Pachomius of Tabenna, of the 4th century. The earliest were very probably for women. An ancient Irish cenobium was originally a sept, or family, whose chief had become its religious head or had relinquished the headship to a comarba (Gael., comharba, successor, vicar, abbot). The word cenobium is sometimes used for the basilica or church of the monastery.

Coeur d'Alene Indians (Fr., awl-heart), a small tribe of Salishan stock, formerly residing in Idaho and now on a reservation within the same boundaries. The entire tribe was converted to Catholicity within ten years after the Jesuit Fr. Nicholas Point, in 1841, established the De Smet mission. They have greatly advanced in industry, religion, and education. Coeducational schools were taught. Theology was taught in the monastery.

Cogitosus, a monk of Kildare, Ireland, who lived probably at the beginning of the 9th century. Author of a panegyric life of St. Brigid.—C.E.

Coif, close-fitting cap, cowl, or head-dress, usually white, worn under the veil by women of religious orders.

Coimbatore, Diocese of, India, comprises the collectorate of Coimbatore without the taluk of Kollegal, the collectorate of the Nilgiris, the taluk of Palghat and part of Wuluvanad in Malabar, the Chittoor taluk and the Nelliampathy Hills in the Cochin territory, and the taluk of Karur (District of Trichinopoly); established, 1886; suffragan of Pondicherry; entrusted to the Society of Foreign Missions of Paris, and diocesan clergy. Bishops: Joseph Bardon (1886-1903), and Augustin Roy (1904). Churches and chapels, 126; priests, 54; religious women, 120; seminary, 1; schools, 85; institutions, 7; Catholics, 43,792.

Coimbra, University of, founded Lisbon, 1288 by the Abbot of Alcobaça, and several priors of convents and parish priests who defrayed the salaries of the doctors and masters from their monasteries and churches; sanctioned by a Bull of Pope Nicholas IV, 1290. In 1308 it was removed to Coimbra where canon and civil law, medicine, dialectics, and grammar were taught. Theology was taught in the monasteries of the Dominicans and Franciscans. The university was twice removed to Lisbon but was finally settled in Coimbra, 1537, and theology was regularly taught at the beginning of the 16th century. During the reign of John III (1521-57) important reforms were carried out, the faculties were brought together under one roof and illustrious professors were invited from Castile, among them the theologian Alfonso de Prado, the canonist Martin de Aspilcueta (Doctor Navarrus), and the physician, Francisco Frasco. The college of classical languages and literature was confined to the Jesuits and colleges were also founded for the students of the various religious orders. In 1770 the university was reorganized and faculties of mathematics and natural history were created, while the Jesuit college, confiscated at the time of the expulsion of the Society from Portugal, was turned over to the faculty of medicine for its clinics and laboratories. The laboratories of physics, chemistry and natural history were also located there. There are now faculties of theology, law, medicine, mathematics and philosophy, a botanical garden, museum, and observatory. The library contains over 300,000 volumes; professors, 116; students, about 1500.—C.E.

Coleman, Edward, controversialist, politician, and secretary to the Duchess of York, executed at Tyburn, 1678. Accused of complicity in the Titus Oates Plot, he was condemned to death, though innocent. He had engaged successfully in religious controversy with Stillingfleet and Burnet.—C.E.

Coleridge, Robert Southey (1772-1843), writer and preacher, b. Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, England; d. Roehampton. He was the son of Sir John Taylor Coleridge, Judge of the King's Bench, and a great-nephew of Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the poet. Educated at Oxford, he received Anglican orders in 1848. He was actively interested in the Tractarian Movement and, although he served as curate at Alphington for a time, he abandoned the Anglican Communion and became a Catholic in 1852. Ordained in Rome in 1856, he joined the Jesuits on returning to England in 1857. He served as professor of Scripture at St. Beuno's in North Wales from 1859-65. He then went to London to become first Jesuit editor of "The Month," taking on the editorship of "The Messenger" also, after 1877. His published works include a classic commentary on "The Public Life of Our Lord," "The Life and Letters of St. Francis Xavier," "The Life and Letters of St. Teresa," and a harmony of the Gospels, "Vita Vitae Nostrae," in English and Latin versions.—C.E.

Collet, John (1467-1519), religious writer and founder of St. Paul's School, London, b. London; d. there. The son of Sir Henry Colet, twice Lord Mayor of London, he was educated at Oxford. From 1493-96 he traveled abroad, studying canon and civil law, the classics, and the Early Fathers. He was ordained in England, 1497-98, and lectured at Oxford, in Latin, on the Epistles of St. Paul, basing his commentaries rather on the life and personality of St. Paul than on the customary textual criticism. Erasmus, then visiting at Oxford, became his staunch admirer. He lectured on the New Testament until 1504, when he was made dean of St. Paul's Cathedral by Henry VII. In London he became the friend and spiritual adviser of Thomas More. Inheriting a fortune from his father, in 1505, he devoted about £40,000 of it in 1509 to founding St. Paul's School, which remained on the original site adjoining the cathedral until it was removed to Hammersmith in 1884. In 1512 Colet was defended by Abp. War-ham against charges which originated doubtless in his outspoken criticisms of corruption in the Church. He is sometimes erroneously considered a forerunner of the so-called Reformers; he should rather be classed with Sir Thomas More and Bp. Fisher. Of his works several have been edited and published by Rev. J. H. Lupton, sur-master of St. Paul's School, among them, “Opus de Sacramentis Ecclesiae” (1867), “An Exposition of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans” (1873), “An Exposition of St. Paul's first Epistle to the Corinthians” (1874), and “Letters to Radulphus” (1876).—C.E.

Colgan, John (c. 1600-57), hagiographer and historian, b. Co. Donegal, Ireland. He joined the Franciscans and studied at the College of St. Anthony of Padua, Louvain. After teaching theology, he gave himself up to Irish studies and published his great work on Irish saints, written from materials collected by his fellow religious, Michael Ward. He also wrote a biography of Duns Scotus, and left in manuscript three valuable hagiographical works which have apparently been lost.—C.E.

Coliscum, The, known also as the Flavian Amphitheater, commenced a.d. 72 by Vespasian, dedicated by Titus (80). The structure consists of four stories, each exhibiting a different order of architectural. Its form is that of an ellipse, 620 ft. long, 525 wide, and 157 high. The arena was of wood covered with sand. There was a marble terrace reserved for privileged spectators, a special gallery for the emperor, tiers of seats for the ordinary citizens, and standing room for the lower Collegiate (Lat., collegium, college, corporation), a term applied to a body of persons or its corporate acts; when applied to things, e.g., collegiate church, it refers to the corporation or Magisterium of persons directing the Church. Church law distinguishes between physical and moral personality. The latter is either collegiate or non-collegiate. Collegiate personalities are chapters, councils, boards, committees, and must consist of at least three physical persons. Non-collegiate personalities are the ecclesiastical chapters of the cathedral chapter.

Collegiate Chapter, a body of clerics instituted for the purpose of observing greater solemnity of Divine worship. Churches at which such chapters function are known as collegiate churches. The canons or members of the chapter are governed by definite regulations established in church law and by their capitular constitutions. Only the Holy See can institute or suppress collegiate chapters. The history of the collegiate chapter as an ecclesiastical corporation developed along with capitular history in general, but the collegiate chapter did not enjoy the prestige or power of the cathedral chapter.

Collegium Cultorum Martyrum, or Association for venerating the Martyrs in the Catacombs, founded in the middle 19th century, to direct excavations in the catacombs. It holds religious services and popular addresses in the catacombs on martyrs' feast-days, to stimulate interest and knowledge regarding the early Church.

Colman, Saint, confessor (c. 605-676), founder of the Abbey and Diocese of Mayo, b. Connaught, Ireland. A monk of Iona, he was chosen Bp. of Mayo. Feast, 8 Aug.—C.E.

Colombia, independent republic in the northeastern extremity of South America; area, 440,846 sq. m.; est. pop., 6,617,833. Shortly after discovering early in the 16th century the country was visited by Dominican, Franciscan, and Jesuit missionaries who erected churches and schools. The most distinguished of the Dominicans were Fray Juan de Quevedo, first bishop of Bogota, and in 785, the ecclesiastics had temporal jurisdiction over a considerable territory extending along the right bank of the Rhine, including the Duchy of Westphalia, acquired in 1180. In the 11th century the archbishop was appointed Arch-chancellor of Italy, in the Holy Roman Empire. Dissensions with the townspeople forced Engelbert II to remove his residence to Bonn, 1275. The Golden Bull, 1256, made the archbishop one of the seven electoral princes. A university was founded in Cologne in 1388, and the city gradually developed into a free imperial city. Secularization occurred in 1801, the principality being divided among France, Hesse-Darmstadt, and Prussia. Its cathedral, the greatest Gothic monument in Germany, begun in 1249 and finally completed in 1890, is reputed to contain the tombs of Albertus Magnus and Duns Scotus. In the church of St. Ursula are preserved relics of St. Ursula and the 11,000 virgins martyred with her.—C.E.

Cologne University, founded by Urban VI, 1388, at the instance of the town council, and inaugurated, 1389. It was represented at the councils of Constance and Basel. The Renaissance was opposed at Cologne. At the time of the Reformation the university strongly defended the Catholic Faith. It declined after the 16th century. During the French Revolution French troops entered Cologne, 1794, and in 1796 the university was closed.—C.E.

Colomba of Rieti, Blessed, virgin (1406-1501), Dominican tertiary, b. Rieti, Italy; d. Perugia. She established at Perugia a convent of which she became prioress, and saved the city from plague by offering herself as a victim. She was notable for her devotion to the Blessed Sacrament. Invoked against sorcery and temptation. Beatified, 1627. Relics at Perugia. Feast, O.P., 20 May.—C.E.

Colombia, Archdiocese of, Ceylon, comprises the Western and Northwestern provinces; reestablished 1886; suffragan sees, Galle, Jaffna, Kandy, and Trincomalee; entrusted to the Oblates of Mary Immaculata and the diocesan clergy. The island was first evangelized by the Franciscans. Odorico de Pordenone baptized many there in 1273, and with the rapid spread of Christianity after 1500 a diocese was erected with Don Juan de Monteiro as first bishop. Under the Dutch in the 17th century the see fell into abeyance. Archbishops: Ernest Bonjean (1886-92), Theophilus Melizan (1893-1905), and Anthony Coudert (1905). Churches and chapels, 22; priests, secular, 22; priests, regular, 104; religious women, 57; seminaries, 2; English colleges and high schools, 18; English elementary schools, 25; vernacular schools, 465; institutions, 22; Catholics, 275,441.

Colombo, Matteo Realdo (1516-59), anatomist and discoverer of the pulmonary circulation, b. Cremona, Italy; d. Rome. He taught at Padua, Pisa, and the Pontifical University of Rome, where he wrote his celebrated work on anatomy. He was the first to use living animals to demonstrate movements of the heart and lungs.—C.E.

Colonna, celebrated family, probably an offshoot of the Counts of Tusculum, named from the castle of Colonna in the Alban Hills. It played an important role in the history of medieval and Renaissance Italy and still flourishes in Rome and Naples. The Colonna are first mentioned in 1101, and assume a prominent position about the destruction of Tusculum 90 years later. They were Ghibellines, antipapal, fond of liberty, and perpetually in strife with the Orsini, their Guelph neighbours. Though they incurred excommunication very frequently, they were rarely without representation in the cardinalsate from the time Giovanni was appointed in 1192. Among their well-known cardinals were Egidio (q.v.); Nicola (1278) and his nephew Pietro, the bitter enemies of Boniface VIII; Giovanni (d. 1348), papal biographer; Odo, who became pope under Martin V; and ended the Great Western Schism; Prospero (d. 1463), patron of art and letters; Pompeo (1517), infamous for his part in the desecration of St. Peter’s and the Vatican in 1526. The most celebrated lay member was Marcantonio, victor in the great naval battle of Lepanto in 1571.—C.E.

Colonna, Egidio (Ægidius A. Columna, Æ­gidius Romanus, or Giles of Rome; c. 1247-1316), Augustinian philosopher and theologian, called Doctor fundamentissimus, b. Rome; d. Avignon, France. He studied under Thomas Aquinas at Paris, and was the first Augustinian to teach in that university. Though Honorius IV asked him to retract publicly certain opinions, the general chapter of the Augustinians ordered all its members to accept and defend all his teachings. In 1292 he was elected superior general. In 1295 he was named Abp. of Bourges by Boniface VIII, and, despite the protests of the French nobles, his appointment was approved by Philip IV, his former pupil. Colonna favored Boniface VIII in his struggle with Philip IV, and may have written the famous Bull “Unam Sanctam.” His theological followers were known as the Ægidian School. One of his most important writings was the treatise composed for his royal pupil on the conduct of rulers.—C.E.

Colonnade, a number of columns supporting an entablature, symmetrically arranged in one (monostyle) or more rows (polystyle), called peristyle when surrounding and Revolute or Caduceus. The most notable in ecclesiastical architecture is that of St. Peter’s, with 284 columns in four rows and 162 statues of the saints on balustrades, erected by Bernini, 1665-67.

Colorado, the 7th state of the United States in size, the 35th in population, and the 38th to be admitted to the Union (2 Aug., 1876); area, 103,948 sq. m.; Pop. (1920), 939,629; Catholics (1928), 115,829. The first Catholic church was built in 1858 at Los Conejos, in the southern part of the state, by members of a Spanish colony who had come from New Mexico in 1852. This church and others at Trinidad and La Costilla were served by missionary priests sent out by Bp. Lamy of Santa Fé. In 1880 the latter appointed Rev. Joseph P. McDermott of Trinidad abp. of the Archdiocese of Santa Fé. Through the efforts of the Bp. and the Reverend Bp. Machebeuf and Rev. Jean B. Raverdy to establish a parish in Denver. The Diocese of Denver (q.v.) comprises the state. Catholic influence on the place-names of the state is shown in the following: Loretto, St. Elmo, San Acacio, San Luis, San Pablo, Santa Fé, Trinidad. The United States Religious Census of 1910 gave the following statistics for church membership in Colorado: Total Church Membership 257,977.

Colored Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Negro offshoot of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church organized as a separate church in May, 1809. While accepting the Westminster Confession of Faith, in general, they emphasize the following points: “(1) There are no eternal reprobates; (2) Christ died not for a part only, but for all mankind; (3) all persons dying in infancy are saved through Christ and the sanctification of the Spirit; (4) the Spirit of God operates in the world coextensively with Christ’s atonement, in such a manner as to leave all men inexcusable." They are in accord with other Presbyterian bodies as regards their government. They publish a semi-monthly periodical. According to the last census in the United States there were 430 ministers, 139 churches, and 13,077 communicants.

Colored Methodist Episcopal Church, a Negro body of Methodist Episcopal churchs organized at Jackson, Tenn., 16 Dec., 1870. This organization was made up of those Negros who were not members of other Negro bodies and desired a church of their own. In doctrine they are in complete agreement with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and also in polity, with a few necessary variations.
Four weekly periodicals are published by them.
There were in 1925 in the United States 2659 ministers, 3572 churches, and 342,001 COlumniants.

Colors, Liturgical. The Church employs in her Divine services the symbolism of colors. The liturgical colors are black, gold, green, purple or violet, red, rose, white, and blue or azure (qq.v.). Colors are symbols of different truths, thoughts, and sentiments. The Divine services are offered for various purposes and in honor of different classes of saints, each of these is signified by an appropriate color, while at certain services. The Colossians, Epistle to the, a short letter written by St. Paul during his first Roman captivity (A.D. 61-63) to the Christians of Colosse in Phrygia. It has always been accepted as part of the N.T., and it is only in recent times that rationalistic scholars have wrongly claimed that it was not a genuine work of Paul. The theme of the letter is "the preeminence of Christ." Paul was forced to vindicate the unique position of Christ as Creator, Head of the Church, and the only Mediator, because of false teachers who were trying to pervert the faith of the Colossians. After a fitting introduction (1, 1-14) he establishes the right of Jesus Christ to the titles of Creator, Preserver, and End of all things. He is also the Head of the Church, which is His Body; through Him only has the work of redemption and reconciliation been accomplished (1, 15, to 2, 5). This positive treatment of the subject is followed by a vigorous rejection of the heretical teaching of the innovators. To what school of thought or philosophical system these teachers belonged is not known to us, but from the epistle we gather that they were propagating a false cult of angels, an exaggerated asceticism, and some observances borrowed from Judaism (2, 6, to 3, 4). The letter concludes with a series of exhortations, which resemble very closely the final chapters of the Epistle to the Ephesians (3, 5, to 4, 18).

Portions of the Epistle to the Colossians are read in the Mass and Office of Christ the King.—Callan,

Columba, Saint, confessor (521-597), apostle of the Picts, Abbot of Iona, b. Gartan, Ireland; d.
Iona, Scotland. He entered the monastic life at Moville, studied under St. Finnian, and was later ordained by Bp. Etchen of Clonfad. In 563 he left Ireland, journeyed to Scotland, and founded a large monastery on the island of Iona. He made numerous conversions among the Picts, having won over their king, Brude. During his exile he returned twice to Ireland, and was prominent at the Council of Drumceat, 575. The Benedictine rule has, since Columba's time, replaced his monastic rule, which was prevalent in Germany, Gaul, Britain, and northern Italy.
Besides his missionary work, he is said to have written 300 books. Patron of Ireland and Scotland. His remains are interred at Downpatrick with those of St. Patrick and St. Brigid. Feast, 9 June.—C.E.;

Columbanus, Saint, confessor (543-615), Abbot of Luxueil and Bobbio, b. West Leinster, Ireland;
d. Bobbio, Italy. He studied at Clununis and Bangor, where he became a monk. About 583 he left Ireland with 12 companions, including St. Gall, and after remaining a short time in Britain, arrived in France. At the invitation of King Gontram of Burgundy he erected a monastery at Annegray in the Vosges, which was so successful that he soon established others at Luxueil and Bobbio. The superiors of these houses remained subordinate to Columbanus who wrote for them a rule embodying the customs of the Celtic monasteries. He also instituted an unending choir service of Divine praise.
Having labored fruitfully for nearly 20 years, he was attacked by the Frankish bishops, jealous of his ever-increasing influence. They exposed his observance of the Celtic Easter tide, and his exclusion of men as well as women from his monastic precincts, and he was exiled from Frankish territory.
Waging war against vice in the Burgundian royal household, and endeavoring to win King Thierry II from a life of sin and debauchery, he was exiled to Nantes, but arriving there, made his way to Soissons and in 611 reached the Austrasian court.
He set out to evangelize the Suevi and Allemanni.
His efforts being ineffectual, he proceeded to Italy, arriving at Milan, 612, where he at once began to confute the Arians. At the suggestion of King Agilulf he wrote a famous letter to Pope Boniface IV on the "Three Chapters" discussion, in which his zeal outran his knowledge and discretion. Agi-lulf gave him a tract of land at Bobbio, between Milan and Genoa, where his celebrated abbey was to be for centuries a stronghold of orthodoxy in northern Italy. Among his writings is his brief monastic rule, which was approved by the Council of Mâcon, 627, but was superseded by the Benedictine Rule. Invoked against insanity and indulgtions. Represented in art, bearded, wearing the monastic cowl, holding in his hand a book within an Irish satchel, surrounded by wolves. Relics in the monastery at Bobbio. Feast, 21 Nov.; O.S.B., and in Ireland, 24 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Columbia, monthly magazine published by the Knights of Columbus, at New Haven, Connecticut.
In addition to the National K. of C. news, it features articles by leaders in industry, business, civics, literature, and athletics; founded 1893, and published in present form in 1891; circulation, 72,083.
Columbia College, Dubuque, Ia., founded, 1873; conducted by the diocesan clergy; preparatory school; College of Arts and Sciences; Summer school; professors, 29; students, 706; degrees conferred, in 1929, 57.

Columbus, Christopher (c. 1451-1506), discoverer of the New World, b. at or near Genoa, Italy; d. Valladolid, Spain. While quite young he became a mariner and acquired a knowledge of astronomy. About 1471 he arrived in Portugal and vainly endeavored to interest the king in his plan for reaching the Far East by sailing westward. He went to Spain, in 1485 or 1486, where his project was rejected by Ferdinand, who was then engaged in a war with the Moors. Finally in Jan., 1492, Columbus interested the Franciscan Juan Perez, Prior of La Rabida, confessor of Queen Isabella. The latter supported his plan and by April, 1492, the expedition was definitely arranged. The Santa Maria, Pinta, and Nina, with 120 men and Columbus as admiral, sailed from Palos on 3 Aug., 1492. He sighted land on 11 Oct. at 2 A.M., having descried a light four hours before; and shortly after, Columbus landed on an island he named San Salvador, now Watling’s Island in the Bahamas. Having discovered Cuba and Haiti, where he established the colony of La Navidad, he returned with the news to Palos in March, 1493. Six months later, he made a second journey, visiting the Caribbean Islands, Jamaica, and Haiti, where the first Mass was celebrated Dec. 8, 1493, by Fr. Perez who accompanied him. Starting on a third voyage 30 May, 1498, he explored Madeira, the Canary Islands, Trinidad, and the South American mainland. Because of sedition in the Haitian colony, he was sent in chains by Ferdinand’s agent to Cadiz, 1500, where the Spanish sovereigns indignantly released him. In May, 1502, Columbus, commencing a fourth journey, visited Honduras, sailed along the Central and South American coast, and returned to Seville, 7 Nov., 1504. The explorer’s primary object was the conversion of the pagans he discovered. He brought priests with him and even established a convent, of which Father Perez was the guardian, at Santo Domingo.—C.E.; Thatcher, Christopher: Columbus: His Life, His Works, His Remains, N. Y., 1905; Irving: Life and Voyages of Columbus, N. Y., 1868.

Columbus, Diocese of, comprises that part of the State of Ohio south of 40° 41' N. lat., and between the Ohio River on the east and the Scioto River on the west together with the counties of Franklin, Delaware, and Morrow; area, 13,685 sq. m.; established, 1868; suffragan of Cincinnati. Bishops: S. H. Rosecrans (1868-78), John Ambrose Watterson (1880-99); Henry Moeeller (1900-03), James J. Hartley (1904).

Churches, 157; priests, secular, 162; priests, regular, 34; religious women, 1102; colleges, 3; academies, 3; high schools, 33; primary schools, 70; pupils in parochial schools, 16,992; institutions, 10; Catholics, 140,186.

Column, a pier of stone or similar material, slender in proportion to height, and used as a support. It consists of three parts (capital, cylindrical or polygonal shaft, and base), is named for the architectural order to which it belongs, and in Gothic is most frequently clustered. The size and position of church windows are usually determined by the space between columns.—C.E.

Comb. Liturgical Cobs of ivory were used after the 5th century, the most famous still extant being the Comb of St. Lupus (623). As an emblem in Christian art it is associated with St. Blaise, commemorative of his flesh being torn with iron combs.

Come, all ye faithful. See ADESTE FIDELES.

Come, Holy Ghost, send down those beams, or VENI SANCTE SPIRITUS, sequence for the feast of Pentecost and throughout the octave. It was probably written by Pope Innocent III (1161-1216). About 40 translations are in existence. The English title given is by J. Austin; the fourth verse reads:

Lord, wash our sinful stains away,
Refresh from heaven our barren clay;
Our wounds and bruises heal;
Thy sweet yoke our stiff necks bow,
Our wand’ring feet heal.

Comes (Lat., companion), liturgical book containing the Lessons, Epistles, and Gospels.

Comgall, Saint, abbot (c. 510-601), founder of the monastery of Bangor, b. near Magheramorne, Ireland; d. Bangor. After a short military career he studied under St. Finnian of Clonard, and St. Ciaran.
With a small following he retired to an island on Lough Erne and practised austere monastic life. He founded the monastery at Bangor, 532. Emblems: fish, pebble. Cult approved, 1962. Feast, 10 May.—C.E.

Commandery, a landed estate or manor, or a group of manors, in charge of a knight of one of the medieval military orders, as the Knights of Malta or the Teutonic Knights; originally an in commendam benefice, i.e., one bestowed as a charge or trust. The order of Knights of Alcantara, c. 1540, numbered 37 “Commanderies,” with 53 castles and villages. Later, the pension attached to a commandship of a knightly order was termed commandery; also a conventual priory of a non-military religious order, or the buildings pertaining thereto.

Commandments of God. See Ten Commandments.

Commandments of the Church, in a broad sense, the laws or precepts issued by the Church in pursuance of her office of authentic and authorized organ and interpreter of Revelation, binding on the faithful universally, with the gravest sanction; in a restricted sense, a particular code of precepts, limited in number, broad in character, moral and ecclesiastic, rather than doctrinal in content. The Church has defined nothing concerning the form and number of these commandments, although recommending in a general way the observance of such a code. Theologians in drawing up lists of these technical commandments have varied in details. The six commandments of the Church noted in the catechisms officially promulgated in the United States and prescribed in substantially their present form by the Fathers of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1886) are the following:

1. To keep the Sundays and Holy Days of obligation holy by bearing Mass and resting from servile work.
2. To keep the days of fasting and abstinence appointed by the Church.
3. To go to confession at least once a year.
4. To receive the Blessed Sacrament at least once a year and that at Easter or thereabouts.
5. To contribute to the support of our pastors.
6. Not to marry within a certain degree of kindred nor to solemnize marriage at the forbidden times.

—C.E.; Koch-Preuss.

Commemoration, the recital of a part of the office of a certain feast or day when the entire office cannot be said because it is impeded by one of higher rank. Commemorations are made at Vespers and Lauds and consist of antiphon, versicle, and prayer; they are sometimes made at Matins by means of the ninth lesson. A commemoration of the Holy Cross is made during Paschal time. At Mass the commemoration is made by adding Collect, Secret, and Postcommunion of the feast or saint commemorated.—C.E.

Commendatory Abbot, the title originally given to a provisional administrator of a vacant abbey (held in commendam, i.e., in trust); later given for life with a claim to abbatial revenues and some degree of jurisdiction, if held by an ecclesiastical. It was ultimately abolished almost entirely, owing to serious abuses.—C.E. (S.B.)

Commentaries on the Bible, explanatory notes or treatises on the Scriptures. Of many and varying sources, they may be classed under Jewish, patristic, medieval, and modern commentaries. Among the Jewish are Philo, the Targums, Mishna and Talmuds, Midrashim, and Karaites. The Patriotic were grouped in schools, the Alexandrian, Anti-chene, and Intermediate. Among the medieval are the Greek and Latin catenats (catena, a chain), so called because they selected passages and linked them together. Among the modern are the great Jesuit commentators, principally that of Cornelius a Lapide, rivalled by equally capable Dominicans, Franciscans, Oratorians, Carmelites, and Benedictines. Protestants have also labored in this field, many of them very reverently, but others in a rationalistic spirit. (E.D.)

Commissariat of the Holy Land, the territory or district assigned to a commissary of the Friars Minor for the purpose of collecting alms for the maintenance of the Holy Places in Palestine; also, the convent where the aforesaid commissary resides. Annual collections for the Holy Land, taken up in each diocese of a commissariat, are conveyed through the commissary to Jerusalem. There are 46 commissariats throughout the Christian world, seven in English-speaking countries; in the United States one is established at Mount St. Sepulcher, Washington, D. C.—C.E.

Commission. (1) A body composed of persons legally appointed to perform some duty. A pontifical commission is a special committee of cardinals, named for certain purposes, such as the care of biblical studies or the restoration of church music. A prelatical commission is a committee of prelates and scholars mostly attached to Roman Congregations in charge of special departments. A diocesan commission is a committee of clerics to care for the seminaries, synodal examinations, church music, and purity of teaching. (2) A document issued by competent authority conferring rank or power on a person designated therein. (3) The office or rank so held.—C.E.

Commixture, Liturgical, in the Canon of the Mass, the dropping of the Sacred Particle into the chalice after the Pater Noster.
Common Life

Common Life, as a condition of the religious state, is opposed to the crometical or solitary religious state. Common life implies membership in a religious community, involving submission to a common rule and to the same superiors, and secondly, a community of goods, such as food, clothing, and lodging. By the profession of vows, religious become members of the community, and thus assume the obligation of applying their talents and faculties for the benefit of the community, and in return have a right to support by the community. Though common life is not essential for the religious state, still the Church has always esteemed it as an important help in fostering the religious life, for which, according to present legislation, it is a requisite (canon 487).

Common of Saints, the Masses or Collects, and Post-communions in the Missal and the Offices in the Breviary for apostles, martyrs, confessors, virgins, and holy women, and for all the saints and the blessed for whom there is not a proper office.

Common of the Mass (ordinary, more properly order, of the Mass), the ceremonies and prayers which are the same in every Mass, such as the prayers at the foot of the altar, Offertory, Canon, and in most Masses, the Last Gospel.

Commune, period of French history, May 18-21, 1871, when Commune of Paris attempted to set up a government opposed to the National Assembly of Versailles. The leaders of the revolutionary party, out of hatred for the Church, arrested priests and religious, prominent by their personal character or official position. The martyrs of the Commune may be divided into three groups: (1) those who, on the 24 May, were executed within the prison of La Raquette: Mgr. Georges Darboy, Archbishop of Paris; Abbe Deguerry, curé of La Madeleine; Abbe Allard, and two Jesuits, Fathers Leon Ducoudray and Alexis Clerc. (2) The Dominican Fathers of the College of Arceuil, who perished on the 25 May: Father Captier, superior and founder of the college; Fathers Bourard, Delorme, Coutrault and Chatagneret, his associates; and eight laymen who were either professors or servants of the college. (3) The third group perished on 26 May. Over 50 prisoners were taken from the prison of La Raquette to an enclosure, cité Vincennes, and were literally hacked to pieces. The massacre lasted one hour. Among the victims were 11 ecclesiastics: 3 Jesuits, Fathers Pierre Clivant, Anatole Bengt, and Jean Caulbert; 4 members of the Congregation of the Sacred Heart of Jesus and Mary; 3 secular priests, and 1 seminarian. Shortly after the atrocity, the regular troops seized La Raquette, and took possession of the last stronghold of the Commune.—C.E.

Communication of Characters should rather be called “interchange of attributes.” It consists in this: Christ, being God and man, two sets of properties can be predicated of this one person, viz., the Word, the second person of the Holy Trinity. Though He be designated by a name which connotes His Divinity, human attributes can be predicated of Him; e.g., as Father Faber says in his hymn for Christmas, or as the Breviary Hymn of Lauds on Christmas night sings,

God just born one hour,

Behold Him fed on infant fare
Who feeds the feathered fowls of air.

In this language there is beauty on account of the antithesis resulting from the great difference and contrast of the two natures. It may be said that the Eternal died, because this person Christ, the Eternal, had a truly human nature and could and did die. It may not be said, however, that Eternity died, because this abstract noun “eternity” does not designate a person. There are certain expressions to be avoided, though strictly correct, on account of the associations that they might have with heresy, e.g., one of the Trinity suffered. Also the expression “Christ is divine,” which non-Catholics use, even when they deny the Divinity of Christ, ought to be avoided, because the word “divine” might seem to imply that Christ partakes of the Godhead. He is the Godhead. “Christ is God” is the correct expression. Pohle-Preuss, Christology, St. L., 1922.

Communion, the part of the Mass at which the celebrant partakes of the sacred species; the reception of the Sacred Host by the faithful.

Communion, a body of Christians professing the same belief.

Communion, holy, the reception of the Holy Eucharist, in which Christ the Lord Himself is contained under the species of bread and wine. It is accomplished when the communicant is received into the Church, arrested priests and religious, prominent by their personal character or official position. The martyrs of the Commune may be divided into three groups: (1) those who, on the 24 May, were executed within the prison of La Raquette: Mgr. Georges Darboy, Archbishop of Paris; Abbe Deguerry, curé of La Madeleine; Abbe Allard, and two Jesuits, Fathers Leon Ducoudray and Alexis Clerc. Communion, Holy, Effects of. Holy Communion, partaking of the Body and Blood of Christ, unites us with Him, increases our love of Him, obtains forgiveness for venial sin, remission of punishment incurred by sin, preservation from future sin, quieting of the violent passions of anger and lust; it acts as healing remedy of body and soul and pledges us a happy immortality. This medicinal effect of the Sacrament is a frequent theme in the post-communion prayer.—Catholic Faith in the Holy Eucharist, ed. Lattey, St. L., 1923.

Communion-Antiphon, a verse of Holy Scripture or other text, sung by the choir and recited by the priest, after the Communion and ablutions at Mass.—C.E.

Communion-Bench, an altar-rail with step, on which communicants kneel to receive Communion.—C.E.

Communion-Cloth, a long white linen cloth, extended along the altar-rail and held over it by communicants, to receive the particles of Sacred Host which may by chance fall. It is replaced in most churches by the Communion plate, or paten.

Communion of Children. In ancient times in the Eastern Church infants received Communion immediately after Baptism; in the West it was common to communicate them in the hour of death. The Fourth Lateran Council (1215) and the Council of Trent laid the precept of Paschal Communion and Viaticum on children after attaining the years of discretion. Responsibility for the fulfillment of this precept by younger children rests mainly on their parents or guardians. Before the age of discretion (about seven years) they are not to be given Communion. Yet in danger of death they may receive, if they are able to distinguish the Holy Eucharist from ordinary bread and reverently adore it. Outside the case of the danger of death, it is necessary that they have a deeper knowledge of Christian doctrine, and that they approach Holy Communion with due reverence. The judgment on their sufficient disposition is left to the confessor and parents or guardians.

The parish priest is to watch that children be neither admitted too soon nor kept back too long from the Communion of Children. The decision of Pope Pius X that the First Communion be received privately with parents; then after fuller instruction and more complete preparation all children, who have already received privately, be admitted to solemn Communion, held once or twice a year.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Communion of Saints, an article of the Apostles' Creed, a spiritual solidarity binding together the faithful on earth, the souls in purgatory, and the saints in heaven, in the same mystical body of which Christ is the head, and in constant supernatural interchange. The merits of Christ are communicated to each one, and those of each one to the others. The faithful on earth mutually exchange merits and satisfactions. The souls in purgatory profiting by our sufferages, and the saints in heaven honored by our veneration, intercede for us in turn.—C.E.

Communion of the Sick. In accord with the recommendation of frequent Communion, the sick are to be given Holy Communion, not only in danger of death and in order to fulfill the Paschal precept, but as often as they reasonably ask for the sacrament. Public conveyance is the right of the pastor, but Communion may be brought privately by any priest. In public conveyance, as described in the ritual, the priest is vested and accompanied by ministers with lights. This is customary except in certain countries. Due reverence and respect are observed in private conveyance, and in the actual administration, the priest is properly vested. The state of grace is required in the sick as the proper disposition of soul. It is permissible for those who have been ill for a month without certain hope of speedy recovery to receive Holy Communion, at the advice of the confessor, once or twice a week, after they have taken medicine, even if solid, or some liquid food. They may communicate the other days fasting. The sick chamber should be neatly arranged and near the bed a small table covered with a white cloth, with a crucifix, two candles, a small vessel of clean water, Holy Water and sprinkler, and communion card.—C.E.

Communion Paten or Plate, a saucer-shaped vessel resembling the paten used at the Mass, but usually with a handle. It is held under the chin of the communicant, to guard against the dropping of the Sacred Host. It is not blessed. (J. r. s.)

Communion under Both Kinds. The present practice of the Roman Rite is to give Holy Communion only under the species of bread. Only priests sacrificing receive under both kinds. The Council of Trent declared there was no Divine precept for others, neither are they deprived of any necessary graces, since the Body and Blood of Christ, whole and entire, is received in each species. For weighty and just reasons the Church gave the force of law to the custom of Communion under the species of bread only. The Ultraquist controversy (sob ateraque specie, under both species) was definitely settled by this council. The necessity of communion under both kinds was first asserted in the 14th century in Bohemia, as a phase of the Hussite heresy and was considered in the councils of Constance (1415) and Basel (1431). Later revived by the Reformers, the Council of Trent declared: "The practice of the Roman Rite is to give Holy Communion only under the species of bread. The Ultraquist controversy was decided in favor of the Roman Rite. The grant of the bull granting the privilege of the Eucharistic celebration in Bohemia was revoked by the Bull of John IV authorized the giving of the chalice to the laity in Austria and Bohemia, but the practice did not flourish. Communion under both kinds has always been and is still practised with exceptions in the Eastern Church. That no Divine command exists is evident from Sacred Scripture. In the Gospel of St. John (6) the same effects are promised to Communion under one or both kinds. It is a free question whether greater graces are received in Communion under both kinds, but the inconveniences of the practise outweigh the loss of these graces. Irreverence to the sacrament through danger of spilling, corruption, or the impossibility of procuring sufficient pure wine, may be instanced. The question is a matter of discipline and does not affect the substance of the sacrament. Exceptions to Communion under both kinds existed from the beginning and gradually for the reasons cited and others equally good, Communion under the species of bread alone became customary.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, II, St. Louis, 1922.
Communism. In general, communism rests on two fundamental principles, community of goods and the abolition of private ownership. Anarchism includes not only the destruction of all private property but all forms of political government. Socialism holds the doctrine of collective ownership and management of all property and the agencies of production. Communism differs from socialism in holding to the ownership of industry and its products, not by a centralized state but by small federated communities. According to W. Bliss, "Socialism puts its emphasis on common production and distribution, communism on life in common." Every age and country has experimented with communist organizations founded on discontent with the established industrial system. J. H. Noyes cites 47 failures of these communities in America. On the theoretical side the most famous contributions are Plato’s “Republic” and More’s “Utopia”; while on the practical side the names of Robert Owens and John H. Noyes stand out. The seeming success of some of these communities may be ascribed to the following: the members were a selected group, enthusiastic and willing to undergo sacrifices for principles and ideals; the organizers were able, inspiring, and efficient leaders; with very few exceptions, religious principles constituted the bond which held them together for any period. When religion was not the end, community of wives as well as of property was substituted; free love and moral deterioration were the result. The success of religious communities founded on the abolition of private property is cited by communists as the true Christian ideal. Thus the early Christian community in Jerusalem, in which all things were held in common, and the various religious organizations, both male and female, are brought forward to substantiate their contention. It is to be noted, however, that these communities were voluntary and not compulsory, that they never condemned private ownership, that they were for the few, selected by reason of vocation and not for the world at large, and finally that they were intended for individual spiritual perfection rather than for social reform and equal distribution. The Church’s doctrine in relation to the principles of communism may be briefly summed up as follows: The Church upholds the doctrine of private property and hence condemns any compulsory or universal communism. It is a false interpretation of the moral truths dealing with man’s equality, origin, needs, nature, and destiny which would lead to a doctrine of universal communism. For the few who have vocation to the religious life, the Church sanctions the principle of a voluntary communism for perfection. In the encyclical of Pope Leo XIII specific condemnation of both communism and socialism is proclaimed. The doctrines of both are contradictory to the principles of morality and religion as taught by Christ and safeguarded by His Church.—C.E.; Cathrein, tr. Gettelfmann, Socialism, N. Y., 1904. (A. S.)

Communist Societies. Two bodies similar in general character, but not affiliated in any way, may be classed as communist societies. These are the Amana Society and the United Society of Believers (qq.v.).

Compagnie du Saint-Sacrement, Catholic secret society combining the characteristics of a pious confraternity, a charitable society, and a militant association for the defense of the church. Founded at the Convent of the Capuchins in the Faubourg Saint-Honoré, Paris, 1630, by Henri de Lévis, Duc de Ventadour, Henri de Pichery. Jacques Adhémar de Monteil de Grignan, and the Capuchin, Philippe d'Angoumois. It numbered among its members some of the most celebrated Catholics of the 17th century but was never formally recognized by Rome. It was governed by a board of nine members which was changed every three months and which was administered by a superior, usually a layman, and a spiritual director. Initiations were held weekly. The society aimed to correct abuses among the clergy and in the monasteries; to aid country parishes; the poor in hospitals, galeries and prisons; and to establish foreign missions. Through its efforts the General Hospital and the Seminary of Foreign Missions were established. Fifty important branches were maintained outside Paris, but in 1665 the membership began to decline and after the act passed by Parliament forbidding all illicit assemblies, congregations, and communities which was directed at it, it ceased to exist about the year 1665.—C.E.

Comparative Religion, name of the science which compares one religion with another with a view to discovering common elements in all of them, and to tracing their development from primitive forms to their present tenets and practices. The effort of many students of this science to prove that Christianity is merely an evolution of the religions of primitive races and of paganism has proved futile chiefly through the studies of Catholic experts in ethnology, and the labors of Catholic missionaries among primitive peoples, notably the members of the Society of the Divine Word.

Complacency, love of, the first alteration of the appetite by an appetible thing which pleases, affects, and inclines the appetite towards it. This love is followed by desire, i.e., a movement of the appetite towards the appetible thing, and by joy, i.e., the ultimate rest in possession of the appetible thing. Love of complacency is sometimes used to signify the love with which the blessed in heaven love God for His own sake because of His infinite goodness, in contradistinction to love of concupiscence, whereby the creature is loved as the source of the creature's happiness. (R. J. M.)

Complin or Compline (Lat., complectorium, complement), the concluding hour of the Divine Office. Its institution in the West is generally ascribed to St. Benedict (c. 480-c. 543). Originally it was recited after the evening meal or before retiring; it now follows immediately after Vespers. It includes a short lesson, the Pater Noster, Confiteor, three psalms, little chapter, respond, invariable hymn, and the Canticle of Simeon with its antiphon and collect.—C.E.

Complutensian Polyglot. See Polyglot Bibles.

Compostela, Pilgrimage of. As early as the 5th century the custom prevailed of making devotional journeys to the shrine of St. James the Greater, at Compostela, Spain. The habit of carrying home scallop shells from Galicia as proof of the journey, extended to other pilgrimages, until this shell became, not only the symbol of St. James, but also of pilgrims. Boys of London may still be seen building grottos of oyster shells on 5th August, formerly the feast of St. James. The pilgrimage was frequently made in expiation of sin.

Conan (Mochoonna), Saint (d. 648), missionary, b. Ireland; d. Isle of Man. He was a monk at Iona and tutor to the sons of King Eugene IV of Scotland. In 600 he became Bp. of the Southern Hebrides and the Isle of Man. Feast, 13 and 26 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Concelebration, the rite by which several priests, say Mass together, all consecrating the same bread and wine. In the Latin Church the rite survives only at the ordination of priests and consecration of bishops. In all the Eastern Churches concelebration is common.—C.E.

Conception College, Conception, Mo., founded, 1883; conducted by the Benedictine Fathers; preparatory school; college of arts and sciences; professors, 8; students, 52; degrees conferred in 1929, 6.

Conclave (Lat., cum, with; clavis, key), the enclosure of the cardinals while electing a pope. The first conclave literally fulfilled the then meaning of the word. Cardinal electors, few in number and used to the medieval mode of sleeping in halls instead of small separated apartments, not only assembled in the one large room to vote as now, but also lived in the same room, in no instance going beyond the room that adjoined. Our locked-up juries illustrate the principle that urged Gregory X. to order election in conclave. He wanted to avoid protracted vacancies of the Holy See, his own election having been preceded by a vacancy of two years and nine months. The shutting up that the citizens of Viterbo had unlawfully practised upon the cardinals who elected him was something that might well be legalised in the opinion of the pope. So he introduced the law of conclave in the Council of Lyons, 1274, over the protests of the cardinals. The few repeals or non-observances of the law since, have emphasized the wisdom of the secret election. Popes, Leo XIII last, have permitted the cardinals by majority vote to dispense with conclave in an emergency. Pius X forbade the use of the alleged civil veto. Pius XI ordered that at least 15 days and not more than 18 intervene between the Pontiff's death and the opening of conclave. Cardinal O'Connell of Boston had just reached the conclave when the new pope was elected.—C.E. (J. D.)

Concord, Book of, also called Formula of Concord, an accumulation, published, 1580, of the Confessions accepted by practically the whole Lutheran Church as authentic, containing the three General Creeds, the Augsburg Confession, Luther's Catechisms, and the like.

Concordances of the Bible. It is often useful or even necessary for scholars, preachers, and others to locate a given text in the Scripture, that is, to know in which book of the Bible it occurs, and in what chapter and verse it will be found. Or there may be question of ascertaining the instances in which a given word or phrase occurs. These purposes are served by a concordance, which is an alphabetic list of the words in the Bible, an indication (by book, chapter, and verse) as to where each word occurs, and a short passage including the given word. Thus, by recalling one word of a passage, it is possible to locate the passage quickly. There are complete and abridged concordances of the Hebrew Old Testament, the Greek New Testament, as also of many versions. For the Authorized Version there are four well-known Concordances composed respectively by Crudcn, Strong, Walker, and Young. There is a complete concordance to the American Revised Version (called the American Standard Bible) by Hazard. For the Catholic Bible (Douay Version), we have a "Concordance of the Proper Names in the Holy Scriptures," by Williams, St., L., 1923, and a "Verbal Concordance to the New Testament" by Thompson, Lond., 1928. The word "concordance" is sometimes, but incorrectly, used for a collection of Scripture texts arranged according to subject matter. Such are Vaughan’s "Divine Armory" and Williams's "Textual Concordance." (N. T.)

Concordat, kon-kor'diit, an agreement between the Holy See and a civil government on spiritual matters in dispute or likely to be in dispute. On 11 Feb., 1929, Italy in the Lateran Palace entered into her first concordat with the Church. The treaty’s most controversial provision had to cede in part less vital rights respected had to cede in part less vital rights. After two years of negotiation, the new concordat was signed. By the treaty the conflicting claims to the temporal sovereignty of the papal states were settled. By the concordat a detailed understanding was arrived at touching those religious matters with a temporal relationship, as holding of church property, assisting at Catholic marriages without any temporal relationship, as holding of church property, assisting at Catholic marriages without any formal pledges and permanent status. Pope Pius XI has arranged concordats, or modus vivendi, with Serbia, the Bolivis, Bavaria, Poland, France for Syria, Lithuania, Czechoslovakia, Portugal, Mexico, and Italy.—C.E.; Raccolta di Concordati, Rome. (J. d.)
Concordia, Diocese of, Kansas, bounded w. by Colorado, n. by Nebraska, e. by the eastern limits of Washington, Riley, Geary, and Dickinson counties, and s. by the southern limits of Dickinson, Saline, Ellsworth, Russell, Ellis, Trego, Grove, Logan, and Wallace counties; area, 26,683 sq. m.; established, 1887; suffragan of St. Louis.

Concubinage, the more or less permanent state of a man and a woman living together in unlawful intercourse. In its strict sense the term is applied to those unions only in which the man and woman are free from an obligation arising from a vow, marriage, Holy Orders, or relationship by blood or marriage; it makes no difference whether or not the parties live in the same house, the maintenance of illicit relations being the essential element. The ecclesiastical punishments that may be inflicted on those who live in concubinage are set forth in can. 2357., § 2, 2358, and 2359, § 1 of the Code of Canon Law.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Concordus (Lat., concur, to run together), a competitive examination for all aspirants to certain ecclesiastical offices to which the care of souls is annexed; the cooperation and concurrence of God and man in the performance of a duty. (J. Macc.)

Concupiscence (Lat., con, with; cupio, desire), yearning for something, mostly for something evil or contrary to reason, the inclination of the lower appetites, the opposition of the flesh to the spirit, which, though not sinful, is often the occasion of sin. This is the Catholic view. The Lutheran and Protestant view generally, even the Anglican, is that concupiscence is of itself sinful, the very essence of original sin which even Baptism does not remit. This is in accord with Luther's doctrine on the slavery of the human will, nature being so tainted, the will so enslaved by concupiscence as to be incapable of actions not similarly tainted. It is fortunate not all know, or live strictly in accordance with, the principles to which they subscribe. St. Paul knew and confessed the struggle between the "law in my members warring against the law of my mind" (Rom., 7) but he also knew that "the grace of God by our Lord Jesus Christ" would deliver him from the body of death.—C.E.

Concursus (Lat., concurre, to run together), a competitive examination for all aspirants to certain ecclesiastical offices to which the care of souls is annexed; the cooperation and concurrence of God in the performance of a duty. (F. R. T.)

Conditional Baptism, Baptism administered with these words expressing a condition, "If thou art not yet baptized, I baptize thee," etc. Baptism cannot be repeated; but in the reception of converts, when, after diligent investigation, there remains a reasonable doubt as to the fact or validity of their Baptism, the sacrament is given conditionally.

Conf. = confessor of the Faith.
Conf. Doct. = confessor et doctor (Breviary).
Conference, a formal appointed meeting for the discussion of important affairs; a meeting of priests to discuss questions of theology, liturgy, and clerical discipline.—C.E.

Conferences, Pastoral, an assembly of priests for the reading and discussing of cases of conscience. This assembly is made up of secular priests, and all those religious, who are pastors, and if conferences are not held in the monastery, all religious priests having faculties must attend the diocesan conferences. The material for these conferences is to be taken from moral theology and liturgy (at times a dogmatic thesis). These conferences should be held monthly if possible in the episcopal city and in each deanery, and when for a solid reason this cannot be done the cases are to be sent to the priests, who are to forward a written solution of the cases to the Ordinary or his chancellor. Secular priests are exempted from attending these conferences. Other priests may be dispensed from attendance at conferences, for solid reasons, by their Ordinary.—P.C. Augustine.

Confession. See Auricular Confession.

Confession, Sacramental, the manifestation of one's own sins, committed after Baptism, to a priest, in order to obtain their forgiveness in the Sacrament of Penance. Confession was constituted an essential part of this sacrament by Christ Himself, when He said: "Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained" (John, 20). By these words Christ established the Sacrament of Penance as a judicial process, and its ministers, the Apostles and their successors, as judges, with the right and the duty to pass judgment on those who have sinned after Baptism. Now, in order to perform this office properly, a priest must have a knowledge of the penitent's transgressions, which can be obtained only from a sincere confession of the penitent himself. This self-examination should include a competitive examination for all aspirants to certain ecclesiastical offices to which the care of souls is annexed; the cooperation and concurrence of God and man in the performance of a duty. (D. R.) the high altar of the basilica erected over the tomb, the basilica itself; or even the new resting-place to which the remains of a martyr were translated, or the hollow reliquary in an altar. The most celebrated confession, in the sense of tomb, is that of St. Peter, under the high altar of St. Peter's, Rome. The relics of St. Peter, originally interred in a stone sarcophagus in an underground vault on the Via Cornelia, were secretly removed to the catacombs of St. Sebastian during the persecution of 328, and from there transferred to the Vatican, a basilica being erected over them by Constantine. The vault in the Confession of St. Peter has not been opened since the 9th century.—C.E.

Confessional, an enclosed place where the priest hears confessions. It is usually composed of three adjoining compartments, the middle one for the priest, the side ones for penitents. The priest communicates with the penitent through a square opening, covered by a grating. When hearing a confession on one side, the priest draws a shutter over the opposite grating in order to insure privacy for the penitent. (p. j. c.)

Confession at Sea. Any priest making a sea-voyage is empowered to administer the Sacrament of Penance provided he has received sacramental jurisdiction from his own Ordinary or from the Ordinary of the port of embarkation or from the Ordinary of any port touched on during the voyage. Such a priest can validly and licitly impart sacramental absolution to his fellow-voyagers and to those who for any reason visit the ship at some port; moreover, in case he goes on shore for a brief visit (not more than three days) he can hear the confessions of persons who ask him to do so, and can even absolve from cases reserved to the Ordinary of the place.—Kelly, The Jurisdiction of the Confessor, Wash., 1927; Codex Iuris Canonici, can. 883. (F. J. C.)

Confessions of St. Augustine, an autobiography supplemented by psychological and theological analyses, written by St. Augustine, c. 400, and giving an account of his early life and spiritual development until shortly after his conversion. For candor and self-appreciation without conceit it is admirable; it contains many sublime passages about the relation of the soul with God. Since 1887 a new edition of St. Augustine appeared in the “Corpus Scriptorum Ecc. Latinorum” of the Vienna Academy, the “Confessiones” by P. Knöll (XXXIII). E. B. Pusey’s “Library of the Fathers” (Oxford, 1839-55) contains a translation of the “Confessions” as does the “Augustinian Library” of Marcus Dods (Edinburgh, 1872-76).

Confessor. (1) One who has given heroic testimony to the Christian faith. In the early Church, this term frequently designated a martyr. In modern ecclesiastical language, however, a confessor is a male saint who did not shed his blood for the faith. The Church divides such saints into two classes: those who were bishops (confessores pontifices); and those who were not bishops (confessores non pontifices). (2) A priest empowered with the necessary jurisdiction to hear confessions and to impart sacramental absolution.—C.E. (F. J. C.)

Confidence, a habit of the will perfecting, as regards their matter, faith and hope with the conviction that God will grant our desire. It is allied to piety. By this we serve God as a beloved Father, and trust Him to perform unstintedly a Father’s part. (H. J. W.)

Confirmation (Lat., confirmare, to make fast), a sacrament of the New Law, in which, through the prayer and the anointing of the forehead with chrism by the minister, the Holy Ghost is communicated to a baptized person, to make him a strong and perfect Christian and a soldier of Jesus Christ. The ordinary minister of this sacrament is a bishop; since it imprints a character on the soul, it cannot be repeated. On the part of the recipient, there is required a state of grace, a general knowledge of Christian faith and doctrine.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, I, St. L., 1923. (B. R. M.)

Confirmation Name, the name of a saint, chosen by the person to be confirmed and imposed by the bishop in Confirmation. Added to the Christian name, it gives the person confirmed a heavenly patron whom he should endeavor to imitate. (B. R. M.)

Confraternity (Lat., I confess), a general knowledge of sins in the form of prayer. It is part of the introductory prayers of Mass, is said at Prime and Complin, before Holy Communion and Extreme Unction, before the Apostolic blessing given to a dying person, before confession, at the ceremony for publication of indulgences, and also in private devotions.—C.E.

Confraternity to the Will of God, a supernatural act whereby the Christian sums up his faith, hope, and charity in accepting adversity as part of God’s providence ordering all things to work together for good. Inasmuch as it excludes rebellion, it is a strict duty; nor is grace ever lacking for its loving performance. (H. J. W.)

Conf. Pont. = confessor pontifice [confessor of the faith, bishop (Breviary)].

Confucianism, the complex system of moral, social, political and religious teaching built up by...
Confucius on the ancient Chinese traditions, and perpetuated as the racial and national religion. Confucius (551-478 B.C.) is the latinized form for K'ung-tze or K'ung-fu-tze; b. and d. Shan-tung. Of good birth, with zeal for virtue and wisdom, he opened a school at twenty-two. Later as minister of justice he raised the State to unprecedented prosperity. Upon resignation with a band of disciples he went about teaching. He is venerated by his followers as the greatest of men. His main shrine is at the Imperial College, Pekin. The sacred Confucian texts consist of six “King” (classics) dating from an unknown period down to A.D. 100, and of the four “Shu” (Books), about 475-400 B.C. To Confucius are attributed appendices to the “Y-King,” the “Chun-ts’u,” and the “Hsiao-King.” His teachings are described by disciples in parts of the “Li-ki,” and in all the “Shu.” The religion of ancient China approved by Confucius is a form of nature worship approaching monotheism. The supreme god is T’ien, Ti, or Shang-ti, with numerous ministering spirits of nature. T’ien rules by a benign providence; he confines punishment to this life. The human soul enjoys a conscious though undefined existence after death. To perfect self is the one end of life. Virtue is cultivated by purely natural means, with knowledge as an indispensable aid. The cardinal virtues are: sincerity, benevolence, filial piety, and propriety. Polygamy is permitted. Sacrifices are of supreme importance, consisting of food offerings to departed ancestors, public benefactors, spirits, or T’ien. There is no priesthood. The officials were heads of families, feudal lords, or the king. “Ancestor-worship” was that of the people. Each home had its ancestral shrine with the names of the deceased. Food-offerings were there made as refreshment. There were also offerings to Confucius, other benefactors and lower spirits. Offerings to higher spirits were reserved to the feudal lords and king. Confucius exalted the monarchical government extended to a patriarchal system as the ideal. Prevalent Taoism and Buddhism are regarded as mere accretions to Confucianism. There are about three hundred million Confucians.—C.E.; Legge, Religions of China, London, 1880; Kudo, Ethics of Confucius, Tokyo, 1904.

Congregatio de Auxiliis, a commission established by Clement VIII, and continued by Paul V, to settle the theological controversy regarding grace, which towards the end of the 16th century had arisen between the Dominicans and the Jesuits. After nine years of intermittent and ineffective discussions (1598-1607), Paul V dissolved the commission and reserved the settlement of the case to the Holy See. A decision has not yet been rendered.—C.E. (n. o.)

Congregation. (1) A body of Catholics, usually the members of a parish, assembled together in a church for Divine worship. (2) A body of delegates chosen by the professed or senior members of the province of a religious order or congregation, to consider matters pertaining to the government, good works, and welfare of the order; also called chapter by some religious institutes.

Congregation, Papal (or Roman), a department of the Roman Curia, consisting of a number of cardinals, and permanently established to handle a certain class of administrative business. One of the cardinals presides over it as prefect, or as secretary if the pope is the prefect. To it are attached the required officials and a body of consultors. Its function is to see that laws are observed, to publish instructions to this end, to apply the law in particular cases, and to grant dispensations within its competency. The congregations lack legislative and, except the Holy Office, judicial power. As first organized by Sixtus V, 22 Jan., 1588, there were 15 congregations; but the number has varied according to the needs of the times. Today there are 11, excluding the so-called Congregation of the Fabric of St. Peter’s. These are the Congregation of the Holy Office; of the Consistory; of the Discipline of the Sacraments of the Council; for the Affairs of Religious; for the Propagation of the Faith; of Sacred Rites; of the Ceremonies; for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs; of Seminaries and Universities; and for the Oriental Church.—C.E., XIII, 136; Annuaire pontifical catholique. (C. E. D.)

Congregational Church, a Protestant Church, founded by Robert Browne (b. 1550), at Norwich, England. It was originally called Brownism, and independence or Independency, in dissent from the Anglican Church; its members were called Independents, Separatists, or Brownists. It was the Pilgrim Fathers, or Puritans, who adopted the name Congregationalism which was later used in England, where the sect prospered under Cromwell, one of their leaders. The Congregational Union of England and Wales was formed in 1833, and revised in 1871. The official title in the United States is National Council of Congregational Churches in the United States. Affiliated with it since 20 Oct., 1925, is the Evangelical Protestant Association of Congregational Churches, formerly the Evangelical Protestant Association of Congregational Churches and the Congregational Union of North America. Each Congregational church is autonomous and yet there is interdependence, or loose union among the churches, resulting from various efforts at consolidation. A Statement of Faith, adopted at Kansas City in 1913, is the sole creed of Congregationalism in America; it subscribes to the freedom of the individual soul and the independence of each local church. Four periodicals are published. Foreign missionary work of the Congregational Church is carried on through the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions in Southern and West Central Africa, the Turkish Empire, India, Ceylon, China, Japan, Philippine Islands, Pacific Islands, Mexico, Spain, Austria, and the Balkans. There were in 1916: 106 stations; 661 American missionaries with 5273 native workers; 701 churches with 83,135 members; 14 theological seminaries, 18 colleges, 115 boarding and high schools, and 1466 other schools; with 86,581 students. In the United States in 1925 there were: 5582 ministers; 5645 churches; and 907,583 communicants.—Congregational Yearbook, N. Y., 1927.

Congregational Singing, a form of aiding the piety of the faithful and of increasing the solemnity of Church service, is strongly recommended in the Motu Proprio of Pius X of 22 Nov., 1903, and in the "Divini Cultus Sanctitatem" (Holiness of Divine Worship) of 6 Feb., 1929. To enable members of the congregation to sing properly, several schools have been started in various places of late years, like the Society of St. Gregory in England, and the foundations of Justine Ward at Manhattanville College, New York, the Catholic University of America, and Rome.—C.E.

Congregation of Discalced Clerks of the Most Holy Cross and Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ (Passionists), founded by St. Paul of the Cross, with the permission of Benedict XIII, 1725. The first house was established on Monte Argentario, Tuscany, c. 1728, although the rule had been drawn up in the year 1726. It was approved by Benedict XIV, 1741, and confirmed in 1789 by Clement XIV. This, with a further solemn confirmation by Pius VI, 1775, secured the institute on a permanent basis. The mother-house was established on Monte Celio, Rome, 1778. The society is administered by a general, provincials, and rectors. Classed in the Church as a mendicant order, its members follow the Evangelical Counsels to the twofold end of sanctification and the equilibration.

The society is not a religious order proper, but an ecclesiastical body under the immediate jurisdiction of the bishops. It is composed of priests, postulants, and lay-brothers. During the lifetime of Fr. Eudes the society established seminaries at Caen, Coutances, Lisieux, Rouen, and Rennes. During the French Revolution, three Eudists, Frs. Hebert, Potier, and Lefranc, perished in Paris in the massacres of 1792, and the society was dispersed. Re-established in 1826 by the surviving members, the order began to prosper in the latter half of the century. Too late to resume the direction of seminaries, the Eudists entered upon missionary work and parochial duties in non-Catholic countries. They are likewise engaged in propagating the faith in the foreign mission field. More than twelve foundations have been started in various places of late years. Statistics: 20 provinces, 115 houses, 2639 religious (1014 professed, 144 clerics, 450 lay brothers, 158 novices, and 600 students).—C.E., XI, 521; Ward, The Passionists, N. Y., 1923.

Congregation of Jesus and Mary (Eudist Fathers), ecclesiastical society founded in 1643, at Caen, France, by St. John Eudes, for the education of priests in seminaries, and for the giving of missions. The society is not a religious order proper, but an ecclesiastical body under the immediate jurisdiction of the bishops. It is composed of priests, postulants, and lay-brothers. During the lifetime of Fr. Eudes the society established seminaries at Caen, Coutances, Lisieux, Rouen, Evreux, and Rennes. During the French Revolution, three Eudists, Frs. Hebert, Potier, and Lefranc, perished in Paris in the massacres of 1792, and the society was dispersed. Re-established in 1826 by the surviving members, the order began to prosper in the latter half of the century. Re-established in 1826 by the surviving members, the order began to prosper in the latter half of the century. Too late to resume the direction of seminaries, the Eudists entered upon missionary work and secondary education in colleges. The "Law of Associations" (1806) ruined the establishments in France. Besides scholasticates in Belgium and Spain, the society conducts seminaries at Cartagena, Antioquia, Pamplona, and Panama, South America; and San Domingo, West Indies. In Canada they are entrusted with the Vicariate Apostolic of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, a seminary at Halifax, N. S., a college at Church Point, N. B., etc. In France, where the majority still remain, the Eudists continue to preach missions and to take part in various other works. Statistics: 40 houses, and about 600 members.—C.E., V, 596.

Congregation of Jesus-Mary, founded by Claudine Thévenet at Lyons, France, 1818, primarily for the education of girls. The congregation has 70 houses, including colleges, normal schools, boarding and day schools, orphanages, dispensaries, and guest-houses, in France, Spain, England, Ireland, Switzerland, Italy, Germany, India, Argentina, Canada, the United States, and Mexico. The mother-house is in Rome; the total number of religious is 1600.—C.E., VIII, 385.

Congregation of Notre Dame de Montréal, founded at Montreal, in 1657, by Marguerite Bourgeoys, for the teaching of girls, in missions and schools. The congregation has 170 houses, including schools, colleges, a teachers' institute, normal schools, a cooking school, business schools, and kindergartens, in Canada, and the United States. The mother-house is in Montreal; the total number of religious is about 1600.—C.E., VIII, 385.

Congregation of Notre Dame de Namur, founded, 1803, at Amiens, France, by Bl. Julie Billiart and Marie Louise Françoise Blin de Bourdon, for the education of youth, and the training of religious teachers. The community lived first under a provisional rule, based upon that of St. Ignatius, drawn up by Mother Julie and Fr. Joseph Varin, made in Italy before 1810 were suppressed with other religious orders under Napoleon, but, restored c. 1814 under Pius VII, they were increased by numerous branch-foundations abroad, notably in England, Ireland, and the United States, and have flourished remarkably in recent years. Statistics: 20 provinces, 115 houses, 2639 religious (1014 professed, 144 clerics, 450 lay brothers, 158 novices, and 605 students).—C.E., XI, 521; Ward, The Passionists, N. Y., 1923.

Congregation of Jesus and Mary, founded, 1803, at Amiens, France, by St. John Eudes, for the perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament. The first house was opened at Marseilles, 1659; another at Bollène shortly afterwards. Marseilles, the original mother-house, was suppressed during the French Revolution, when the nuns were dispersed, but was reopened, 1816; the Bollène house also suffered, but resumed activities, 1802. Some of the Bollène nuns founded a house at Cambington, England, 1863, which was later moved to Taunton, Somersetshire, where it still stands. Convents of the Congregation are situated at Oxford, and near Newport, England; in Normandy and in the south of France; and at Hal, Belgium.—C.E., II, 596.

Congregation of the Christian Retreat, an order composed of two branches, the Fathers, and the Sisters, of the Christian Retreat, founded at Fontenelle, France, by Fr. Antoine Recueveur, 1759. The Fathers of the Christian Retreat formerly directed colleges in France, and still hold the office of chaplains to the various houses of the congregation, whose purpose is the giving of spiritual retreats and the education of the young. The Sisters teach, and do fine needlework. The congregation has over 10 houses, including schools, in England, France, Switzerland, and Belgium. The government is under a mother-general. Total religious, upwards of 1000.
—C.E., III, 721.

Congregation of the Holy and Immaculate Heart of Mary, a congregation founded for the education of girls by Fr. Dupuis in Pondicherry, India, 1844, under the rules of the Third Order Regular of St. Francis of Assisi. The congregation has 37 convents; to the more important of these an orphanage is usually attached. The religious, numbering 250, are also in charge of schools and pharmacies; the mother-house is at Pondicherry.

Congregation of the Holy Cross (Religious, or Priests, of the Holy Cross, or of Notre Dame of the Holy Cross), an amalgamation of two French Societies, the Brothers of St. Joseph (Josephites) founded at Ruillé, 1820, by Fr. Jacques Dujarié, and transferred to Le Mans, being there united with the Fathers of the Holy Cross (Salvatorists), established in 1839, by Fr. Basile Moreau. The congregation consists of priests and lay brothers bound by simple vows and the threefold purpose of self-sanctification, preaching the Divine Word, and the Christian education of youth in all phases of instruction. The oldest and most extensive existing province is that of the United States, with the mother-house at Notre Dame, Indiana, dating from 1842; the Canadian Province was established five years later. The special mission field assigned Holy Cross by Propaganda is the Province of Eastern Bengal. At the General Chapter of 1920 the rules and constitutions were thoroughly revised to conform to the New Code of Canon Law. Statistics: 8 provinces, about 60 houses; over 800 members (of whom about 240 priests).—C.E., VII, 403.

Congregation of the Holy Ghost and of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, founded on the feast of Pentecost, 1703, by Claude François Poullart des Places to prepare missionaries for the most abandoned souls in Christian or pagan countries. It sent missionaries to the French colonies, to India, and to China. After the French revolution only one member remained, Fr. Berout, who restored the congregation. In 1848 the Society of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, founded by Fr. Libermann, 1842, was united with that of the Holy Ghost. He is regarded as the founder of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost and of the Immaculate Heart of Mary as it exists today. The missions in Africa, distinctive work of the congregation, costing the lives of 700 missionaries in 60 years, are due to the initiative of two American prelates, Bp. England of Charleston and Rev. Dr. Barron. There are also missions in Northern Madagascar, Mauritius, Réunion, Comoro, Nossi-Bé, Mayotte and Rodriguez Islands, Trinidad, Saint Pierre and Miquelon, Martinique, Guadeloupe, French Guiana, Tefé, Haiti and in 3 archdioceses and 13 dioceses of the United States, specializing in colored missions. They conduct important educational institutions, including the French seminary at Rome, the colonial seminary at Paris, and the colleges of Blackrock, Rockwell, and Rathmines in Ireland, 3 colleges in Portugal, and at Ottawa, Port-au-Prince, Port of Spain, and Pittsburgh, Pa. (Duquesne University). There are six provinces, of France, Ireland, Portugal, Germany, Belgium-Holland, and the United States, and the vice-province of England. The superior-general resides at Paris; the Cardinal Prefect of the Propaganda holds jurisdiction over all. In March, 1902, the congregation was officially recognized by the Colonial Office of the British Government. Statistics: 6 provinces; 272 houses; 29 missions (vicariates Apostolic and prefectures Apostolic); approximately, 2888 members (professed and aspirants) including 19 bishops.

Congregation of the Holy Union of the Sacred Hearts, founded, in 1826, by Fr. Jean Baptiste Debrabant, for the education of youth. The congregation has about 80 houses, including schools and academies, in France, Belgium, England, Ireland, Italy, the West Indies, South America, and the United States. The mother-house is in Tournai, Belgium; the total number of religious is over 1000.—C.E., Suppl., 378.

Congregation of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (Congregation of Scheutveld), founded, 1863, in the Field of Scheut, near Brussels, by Ven. Théophile Verbiest, for mission work in heathen lands; constitutions definitively approved, 1900; placed under the jurisdiction of Propaganda, 1821; Constitutions revised and approved, 1923. From the seminary in Belgium (Scheutveld College) the first mission was established in Mongolia, 1863. The congregation operates in Northern and Southern Kansu, China, in Mongolia, the Belgian Congo, the Philippines, and among the Indians on the Mississippi. There is a procurator resident at New York and a procurator general at Rome; two of the Fathers devote themselves to par in works, among the Belgians of London. The great scientific and intellectual activity of the missionaries, evinced through 539 publications, is considered a necessary supplement to their apostolic labors. In connection with their missions the Fathers maintain a good number of benevolent institutions, such as hospitals and schools. Statistics: 7 vicariates Apostolic; 1 prefecture Apostolic; 582 churches and chapels; 1074 schools (including colleges, boarding schools, elementary and normal schools); 3 seminaries; total membership, 742 (priests and brothers) including 484 at the missions.—C.E., VII, 167; C.E. Suppl., 378.

Congregation of the Missionaries of Mariannhill, in 1882 Rev. Francis Pfanner, then prior of the Trappist (Reformed Cistercian) Monastery of Mariastern (Bosnia), volunteered to establish a monastery in Cape Colony, in order to try to adapt the rule of the order to the missionary life. He settled in a place he called Dunbrody in 1880, but was forced to abandon it in 1882, and transferred his community to Mariannhill, Natal. In 1883 Mariannhill was erected into an abbey, with Fr. Pfanner as first abbot. During the next few years Fr. Pfanner founded seven mission stations throughout Natal, to provide for the needs of the natives. Between 1894 and 1900 nine stations were established in Natal and Cape Colony, and two houses in German East Africa. Later a station was erected in Rhodesia, and two more in Natal. The Congregation of Regulars, in 1909, issued a decree separating Mariannhill from the order of Reformed Cistercians, forming of it the "Congregation of the Mariannhill Missionaries."
Statistics: 60 religious, 30 missions.—C.E., IX, 661.

Congregation of the Missionary Sisters of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, founded at Hiltrup, Germany, in 1899, by Rev. Hubert Linckens, to assist the Missionaries of the Sacred Heart in their special field of labor, the South Sea Islands. Later, their activities became more numerous and varied. The Congregation in the United States is recognized under the official title, "Mission Workers of the Sacred Heart." The order has 85 houses, including schools, hospitals, homes for aged, correction homes, orphanages, and other institutions, in the United States, Germany, Oceania, Africa, and Australia. The mother-house is at Reading, Pa.; total religious, 1200.—C.E., XIII, 306.

Congregation of the Mission of St. Vincent de Paul (REDEMPTORISTS), a congregation of priests and laymen, founded at Paris, 1625, by St. Vincent de Paul. The special object of the congregation determines that each member, besides devoting himself to his own perfection, shall be employed in preaching the Gospel to the poor, especially to poor country people, and in helping ecclesiastics to the knowledge and virtues requisite for their state. In many countries they are called Lazarists, from the Priory of St. Lazare, in Paris, where St. Vincent de Paul dwelt, and where he established his principal works. In English-speaking countries they are generally known as Vincentians, and they are called Paules in Spanish countries. During the lifetime of the founder establishments were made not only in France but also in Poland and in Italy, and the congregation undertook missionary work in Ireland, the Hebrides, Barbary, and Madagascar. In the interval between the death of St. Vincent (1660), and the French Revolution, forty-three theological and nine preparatory seminaries were established in France by the Vincentians. In 1641, a papal Bull authorized an establishment in Rome; in 1697 the pope gave them the house and church of Sts. John and Paul on the Coelian Hill. They were called to Genoa, 1645; to Turin, 1655; to Naples, 1668. Charles II invited them to London for his chapel, as Louis XIV had done in France for his chapel at Versailles. In Poland, in the time of John Casimir, they were summoned to Warsaw, 1651; and later to many other cities, so that before the Revolution Poland was one of the most flourishing provinces. They established themselves at Barcelona, Spain, and from there made several other settlements. They reached Portugal in 1718, and at the time of the Revolution of 1834 there were six establishments in the country. During the 18th century the Vincentians passed over into China; they were called to Macao by the Portuguese Government in 1784, and directed many houses of education there; after the suppression of the Jesuits they replaced that order in the Levant and in China. At the outbreak of the French Revolution there were in France, Spain, Portugal, and the Palatinate, along with the missions outside Europe, about 150 Vincentian establishments. During the Revolution all the Vincentian foundations in France were destroyed. In 1804 an imperial decree reestablished the Congregation; under the government of the Restoration, 1816, a royal ordinance recognized it, and in 1891 the Council of State considered it as legally recognized in France. The Vincentians had gone to Ireland during St. Vincent's lifetime; they gave missions and heard confessions, but were forced to flee the country during Cromwell's régime. On the foundation of Maynooth College, 1789, one of the priests returned and in 1832 a new community was organized. The first Scotch house was established at Lanark, 1859; the Australian mission was begun in 1885; and the Congregation was brought to the United States, 1816. Statistics: 240 houses or mission residences, 4107 religious, of whom 2620 are priests.—C.E., X, 357.

Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer (REDEMPTORISTS), society of missionary priests founded, 1732, by St. Alphonsus Mary Liguori, at Scala, Italy, for the purpose of laboring among the neglected country people in the neighborhood of Naples. The order was approved by Benedict XIV, in 1749. By 1823 ten houses had been opened in different parts of Southern Italy and Sicily. The congregation was introduced into Poland, in 1786, by Fr. Clemens Mary Hofbauer and Fr. Thaddeus Hübl. Fr. Hofbauer also made three foundations in Southern Germany, at Wiesbaden, Wetzlar, and Rabenhausen, but these were eventually suppressed and the fathers banished. At the request of the Emperor Francis I, the first house of the Redemptorists was canonically established in Vienna, 1820. Prior to 1848 six houses had been founded in Austria; the congregation had been introduced into Belgium, where four institutes were opened; and it had established itself at Witten, Holland, 1836. During the same period important foundations were made in North America; the fathers were called to Pittsburgh, 1839; Baltimore, 1840; to New York, 1842; to Philadelphia, 1843; to Buffalo, 1845; to Detroit, and New Orleans, 1847; and to Cumberland, 1849. Meanwhile they had been invited to Bavaria, and four institutes were organized in the course of the revolution that swept over Europe in 1848, the Congregation suffered greatly; in 1847 it had been banished from Switzerland, and in 1848 from Austria. The Congregation spread to Ecuador during the presidency of Garcia Moreno, and a few years later gained a foothold in Peru, Chile, and Colombia. In the United States new houses were organized, so that by 1875 the original American province was divided into the eastern province of Baltimore, and the western province of St. Louis. Since that time the French province has been divided into three provinces and two vice-provinces, Spain has become a province, the Austrian province has been divided, and provinces have been created for Poland, Canada, Bavaria, Holland, and England. The Irish and Australian houses now form separate provinces independent of England, and several new provinces have been erected recently. In 1899 several missions in the Congo State were entrusted to the Redemptorists. The mother-house is in Rome, where the superior general resides. Some famous heads of the society include Fr. Peter Paul Blum, Fr. Bonaventure, Fr. Raphael, Fr. Ignatius Smets, Fr. Nicholas Mauron, Very Rev. Mathias Raus, and Fr. Patrick Murray, the present superior general. Statistics: 21 provinces, 15 vice-provinces, 310 houses, 5262 religious, of whom 2829 are priests.

Redemptoristines, community of nuns, founded at Scala, Italy, 1731, by Fr. Thomas Falcoia, with a rule based on that of St. Augustine. The object of the order is to honor and imitate the Hidden Life of Our Lord, to assist the Church in every way, and the Redemptorist Fathers in their evangelical labors, by prayer and meditation. A second monastery was founded, at St. Agatha of the Goths, by St. Alphonsus Liguori. Convents of the society now exist in Austria, Belgium, Bavaria, France, Holland, Ireland, England, Spain, Canada, and the Tyrol. Each house is independent and under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese in which it is located. Statistics: 27 houses; total religious, about 1000.—C.E., XII, 682.

Congregation of the Pallottine Missionary Sisters, founded by Ven. Vincent Pallotti in Rome, 1833, as a second class of his Pious Society of Missions, to help the priests in their missionary work as teachers and catechists, and to care for the temporal necessities of their churches and houses. The Sisters follow the Rule of St. Francis, live in community, and dedicate themselves to the spiritual and temporal welfare of their sex, especially among emigrants in America, and Indians in Africa. The congregation maintains 30 houses, which include schools, hospitals, orphanages, kindergartens, and homes for the aged, in the United States, Central America, England, Germany, Switzerland, and South Africa. The mother-house is in Germany; the total number of religious is about 400.—C.E., XII, 107.

Congregation of the Retreat of the Sacred Heart (Society of Mary), founded at Quimper, France, 1678, by Claude Therese de Kermeno, in collaboration with Fr. Huby, under the title Institute of Retreat, later changed to Ladies of the Retreat. The Sisters follow the Rule of St. Ignatius, uniting active works with the contemplative life, by conducting retreats, educating girls of the upper classes, and instructing poor children. The congregation has 23 houses, including day and boarding schools in France, England, Ireland, and Belgium. The mother-house is at Angers, France.—C.E., XII, 795.

Congregation of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary or Congregation of Picpus, founded probably at Poitiers, 1800, by Fr. Coudrin (d. 1837), established at Paris (Rue Picpus), 1805. Formally approved in 1817 by Pius VII, in 1825 by Leo XII, and in 1840 by Gregory XVI, it has been frequently entrusted by the Holy See with missionary work, more especially in island groups of the Pacific. They are also engaged in the instruction of children, the exercise of perpetual adoration, and practises of mortification. The members take simple vows for life and are governed by a superior-general residing at Braine-le-Comte, Belgium. Statistics: 9 provinces; 3 missions; 50 houses; 500 religious.

Congregations, Religious (Lat., congregare, to collect together), originally, a religious community dwelling in a monastery, as that instituted by St. Pachomius, c. 318. The regular organization of religious congregations began with the Rule of St. Benedict in the 6th century. From the 10th century a group of monasteries bound together by a common rule would, for the sake of closer unity, acknowledge the authority of a particular one, as in France where sixty-five monasteries followed Cluny (Congregation of Cluny). Later the term “congregation” was applied to an association of priests not bound by vows, e.g., the Oratorians of St. Philip Neri, 1566; or such as, though bound by simple vows, remained secular, e.g., St. Vincent de Paul’s Priests of the Missions, or Lazarists, 1625. This gave rise to the generally accepted usage of the word as designating those institutes resembling religious orders but lacking some accidental characteristic, viz., the solemnity of the vows.

Congregations, Catholic, gatherings for the promotion of the spiritual, social, and intellectual welfare of Catholics. They are religious, national, international, sociological, social, political, and educational. The first large congress was held in Austria, Germany, 1848, and since that date such congresses have been held nearly every year in Germany. They have also been held in France, since 1868, and in Belgium, Holland, Hungary, Spain, Argentina, Switzerland, Denmark, Ireland, England, and the United States. They were known in pre-emancipation times in England and Ireland, and today, in England, are held under the auspices of the Catholic Truth Society (founded, 1872), and in Ireland under the Catholic Truth Society of Ireland (founded, 1903). Catechetical congresses have been held in Germany, Switzerland, and France; and international congresses from time to time, the first and most famous of which took place at Meechin, 1885-86. In English-speaking countries such gatherings as congresses only when national in scope. The so-called “Congresses of Religions” have been disapproved of by the Holy See.—C.E.

Congrua (i.e., Congrua Portio), a term used in canon law to designate the lowest sum proper for the yearly income, living wage, of a cleric. Principal among the financial burdens bearing a benefice is that of supporting the beneficiary in accordance with the dignity of his state. The Council of Trent suggested that one third of the revenues of a benefice might constitute the congrua, but due to the change of money value, the exact determination remains with local legislators. The salary of pastors and assistants in the United States, as fixed by diocesan synods, might be regarded as the canonical congrua.—C.E.

Congrium (Lat., congrus, suitable), essentially the same as Molinism (q.v.). It differs from Molinism accidentally in the emphasis it places upon the congruousness of efficacious grace (its being adapted to the nature and circumstances of the recipient); hence the name. Originated by Molina, it was more fully developed by Bellarmine, Suarez, Vasquez, and Lessius.—C.E. (b. o.)

Coninck, Giles de (also called REGIUS, 1571-1633), Jesuit theologian; b. Baileul, French Flanders; d. Louvain. He held the chair of scholastic theology at Louvain for eighteen years. A moral theologian of distinction, he is noted for his commentary and exposition of the entire teaching of St. Thomas, and his work concerning morality.—C.E.
Connecticut, the 46th state of the United States in size, the 29th in population, and the 5th state to be admitted to the Union (9 Jan., 1788); area, 49,655 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 1,380,631; Catholics (1920), 601,984. Proof that Jesuit missionaries labored among the Indians of Connecticut exists in the laws passed by the colony, 1648, expelling Jesuits and threatening them with hanging if they returned. In 1650-51, however, Fr. Gabriel Drulilletes, S.J., visited New Haven as an envoy from Canada to establish friendly trade relations with government officials. In spite of the arrival in Connecticut, 1755, of 400 exiled Aca- dians, and an early influx of Irish immigrants, many of whom served in the Revolution, no ministry of priests was allowed within the state until the Constitution of 1818 established religious freedom. Occasionally missionary priests had visited the French troops of Rochambeau’s army, or settlers of French descent. In the early 19th century there were visitations from Bp. Jean Cheverus of Boston, and his successor Bp. Benedict Fenwick. Finally, 1828, a resident priest, Rev. Bernard O’Cavanaugh, was appointed to Hartford, an upper room serving as the first chapel. By 1834 there were churches in Hartford and New Haven. The Diocese of Hartford (q.v.) comprises the state. Catholic influence on place-names of the state is limitted. In suite of the Carmel, the U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in Connecticut:

Conon, Pope (686-687), d. Rome. He was favored by Emperor II, who remitted some of the taxes in papal territories. Having consecrated St. Kilian, of Ireland, bishop, he commissioned him to preach the faith in Franconia.—C.E.; Mann.

Conrad of Urach (Teut., Kuonrat, bold in counsel), BLESSED, abbot (c. 1180-1227), Card.-Bp. of Porto and Santa Rufina. He entered the Cistercian monastery at Villers in Belgium, 1190, and in 1200 was chosen abbot. He held the offices of Abbot of Clairvaux, Citeaux, and general of the order. Pope Honorius III created him cardinal, 1219, and charged him to suppress the Albigenese in France. From 1224-26 he preached a crusade in Germany. At the death of Honorius III, he refused the papacy. Feast, 0. Cist., 30 Sept.—C.E.

Consalvi, EROLOE (1757-1824), cardinal, statesman, b. Rome; d. there. He began his public career as private chamberlain to Pius VI, 1783, and in 1786 was connected with the temporal government of Rome. When the French entered Rome, 1798, and proclaimed a republic, Consalvi was thrown into prison but subsequently released. He acted as secretary of the conclave, at Venice, 14 March, 1800, at which Card. Chiaramonti was elected pope (Pius VII), and accompanied the new pope to Rome as secretary of state. He signed the French Concordat with Napoleon, though what are known as the Organic Articles were subsequently added to the document by Napoleon without his knowledge. He negotiated the agreement with the Cisalpine Republic. When dissension arose later between Na­ poleon and Pius VII, in order to secure peace Con­ salvi resigned his position, 1806. After Napoleon deported Pius to Savona, 1809, Consalvi was then forced to go to Paris, where he lived in retirement. When he declined to assist at the emperor’s mar­ riage to Marie­Louise, 1810, Na­ poleon expelled him from the Tuileries, deprived him of his dignities, and exiled him to Reims. He joined Pius VII at Fontainebleau, 1813, and on Pius’s abdication ac­ companied the pope to Rome. He died in retirement. He visited the agreement with the Cisalpine Republic.

Conscience (Lat., conscientia, knowledge of one’s self). (1) The immediate intellectual perception a person has of his own existence and actions. The more common term for this is consciousness. (2) A judgment of the intellect, dictating what is to be done as morally right, or what is to be avoided as morally wrong, in the particular circumstances in which one is now placed. Conscience is an act of the virtue of prudence. In that it is concerned with the morality of a particular case, conscience differs from a knowledge of the fundamental principles of right and wrong (synderesis), and from the understanding of their general conclusions (moral science).

Conscience is said to be certain when it dictates something as right or as wrong, without experiencing any reasonable fear of the opposite being true. It is doubtful when it is undecided which of two contradictory views is true. A fundamental law of ethics decrees that a person is never allowed to act with a doubtful conscience. This means that one who seriously doubts the lawfulness of some action and nevertheless performs it, commits sin. The same is true of one who doubts whether it is permissible to omit some action, and yet omits it. One who is in such a state of doubt and wishes to perform (or to omit, as the case may be) the action in question should first obtain certainty of conscience. When strict certainty cannot be obtained, it is sufficient to have moral certainty in the broad sense, viz., that which is based on arguments of probability. All Catholic theologians admit this principle, although there is a variety of views as to how much probability in favor of liberty is required in order that a person may justly abstain from obeying a law that probably binds him. Conscience is true when its dictate as to what is right or wrong is correct; erroneous, when it judges what is really wrong as right, or vice versa. The prescriptions and the prohibitions of a conscience that is invincibly erroneous must be followed. In other words, when a person who acts in good faith judges erroneously that he is obliged to perform or to omit a certain act, then he commits sin if he fails to perform or to omit it, as the case may be. For the light of his own reason constitutes for every individual the ultimate subjective norm of his conduct; and God's rewards or punishments are meted out to every one, according as he has obeyed or disobeyed the voice of his own conscience. Conscience is sometimes taken in a broader sense to signify the knowledge and the remembrance a person has of the right or wrong of his past actions. In this sense we speak of the examination of conscience.—C.E.; Maher, Psychology, Lond., 1911.

Conscience (Lat., consciense, to declare, to do, declare to be sacred), an act by which a thing is separated from common and profane to sacred use; or a person or thing is dedicated to the service and worship of God by prayers, rites, and ceremonies. The consecration of a bishop, a church, a fixed altar and altar-stone, a chalice and paten. As distinct from blessing: the ceremony is more elaborate, it can never be repeated, more numerous graces are attached to it, it elevates persons or things to a permanent state, and their profanation constitutes the sin of sacrilege. The term Consecration, without any qualification, means the most solemn part of the Mass; the priest, imitating Our Lord at the Last Supper, changes first the bread and then the wine into His Body and Blood, the appearances of bread and wine which still remain thus becoming sacred, Sacred Species, as they are called, because they veil the Real Presence.—C.E.

Consecration (Lat., consecrare, to dedicate), one of the twelve marks antiquely sculptured or painted on the walls or pillars of a new church, and anointed with chrism at the consecration of the church; examples: ancient cathedral of Brechin, Scotland; Uffington, Berkshire.

Consecration of a Bishop, an act which confers fullness of the Sacrament of Holy Orders, and so the fullness of the priesthood, and impresses on the soul the episcopal character. By it the bishop, from Divine institution, receives the Divine power to confer the Sacraments of Holy Orders and Confirmation, and, from ecclesiastical law, has the right to the episcopal insignia and is the minister of consecrations and benedictions reserved to the episcopal order. Also from Divine institution, by consecration the bishop attains to a permanent state, and their profanation constitutes the sin of sacrilege. The blessing and bestowal of the episcopal insignia, the episcopal character, the supremacy of the Holy See. The ceremony is more elaborate, it can take place inside or outside of Rome, the bishop-elect makes an act of faith, he also anoints the hands of the bishop-elect. Consecration is reserved to the Roman pontiff. When the consecration takes place outside of Rome, the bishop-elect is notified of his election by means of an Apostolic letter and is authorized to select the prelates for his consecration, i.e., a bishop consecrator, and two assistant bishops, called co-consecrators. Usually the consecration day is a Sunday or the feast of an Apostle, though by dispensation of the Holy See another feast-day may be chosen. Before the consecration the bishop-elect makes an act of faith and takes an oath of loyalty to the Holy See. The ceremony takes place at Mass, and both bishop-elect and consecrator concelebrate. The principal parts of the ceremony are: (1) The imposition of hands; while the open book of the Gospels is held on the shoulders of the elect, the consecrator and co-consecrators each impose hands on the head of the bishop-elect saying, "Receive the Holy Ghost." (2) The anointing: the consecrator anoints the head of the bishop-elect with holy chrism in the form of a cross as he says, "May thy head be anointed and consecrated by heavenly blessing in the pontifical order"; he also anoints the hands of the bishop-elect. (3) The blessing and bestowal of the episcopal insignia, the crozier, ring, miter, and gloves. (4) The enthronement; vested in full pontificals, the new bishop is enthroned and then, as the Te Deum is intoned, he passes through the church, accompanied by the consecrators, and blesses the people.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Consecration of Altars (Lat., consecrare, to make sacred). Mass may be celebrated only on a consecrated fixed or portable altar (see Altar-Stone). A fixed altar, a permanent structure of stone, must be consecrated by the bishop of the diocese, or by another bishop with his consent. Fixed altars are consecrated in consecrated churches, or in those which, though only solemnly blessed, will later be consecrated. The ceremony consists in placing in the stone-covered cavity in the center of the altar-table, near the front edge, relics of canonized martyrs and three grains of incense, anointing the altar with holy oils, incensing it, burning incense upon it, and celebrating Mass upon it. When a number of portable altar-stones are consecrated, Mass is said on one of them.—C.E., IV, 278.

Consecration of Churches, a custom of Apostolic origin. All cathedrals and, as far as possible, all parish churches should be consecrated. The principal condition for consecration is assured permanency of construction and purpose. Temporary churches, wooden churches, and those burdened with debt are not usually consecrated, but only blessed (see Churches, Blessing of). The consecration, also called dedication (q.v.), is performed by the bishop of the diocese or another bishop with his permission. The ceremony in use today is a combination of French and Roman rites and consists mainly of a triple sprinkling of all the exterior and interior walls with holy water, the consecration of at least one altar in the church, the anointing and incensing of twelve metal, stone, or painted crosses on the inside walls, and, finally, the celebration of Mass. Some of the details of the ceremony, the history of which dates back to the sixth century, are as follows: There is prescribed a threefold procession around the church, accompanied with the aspersion of the outer walls with holy water, and at each passing of the main entrance the presiding prelate knocks at the door. After the third round of the building and the third knocking at the door, the church is entered solemnly. The Litany of the Saints is then chanted. Thereupon the Greek and Latin alphabets are traced in a large cross of monogram X for Christ. A further threefold procession around the interior of the church follows, likewise accompanied by the sprinkling of the interior walls, after the table of the altar and its supports have been washed with the so-called Gregorian water, wherewith is also connected a sevenfold procession around the altar to be consecrated. Special mortar is blessed for the sepulcher of the relics to be placed in the altar-table. The oil of catechumens and chrism are used for the consecration of the altar proper. The anointing of the walls of the church at twelve places, designated by crosses, follows and then is burned a small number of grains of incense at the five points of anointing the altar-table. Finally, the altar linens and other paraphernalia are blessed with their own rites, and Mass is said at the altar. The essence of the consecration consists in the anointing of the twelve crosses painted or affixed to the inner walls, with the form “Sanctificetur et consecretur hoc templum” (Let this temple be sanctified and consecrated). Since consecration adheres to the walls, it is lost when the walls in part are simultaneously demolished, or the inner ones destroyed; also when additions enlarge the walls in any dimension.—C.E., IV, 280.

Consent, in matrimony, is the very essence of the contract. It can be given only by a person who is not legally hindered from giving it; it must be voluntary, without a degree of compulsion that would prevent the exercise of free will; it must be mutual, given not by one but by two; and it must signify that the parties take each other then and there (not conditionally, nor at some future time), with the intention of living together as husband and wife until death shall part them.—C.E.; Ayrinhac, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919.

Consistory (Lat., consistere, to stand together), a court, especially an ecclesiastical court; a court of presbyters; an assembly of cardinals for purposes of deliberation, presided over by the pope. The last is secret, if only the cardinals and the pope are present; semi-public, if bishops also take part in it; and public, if Apostolic prothonotaries or other prelates are called to it.—C.E.

Consistory, Congregation of the, is next in importance to that of the Holy Office. One section of it provides for the establishment, in places not subject to the Congregation of Propaganda, of new dioceses, collegiate and cathedral chapters, and the election of bishops; the other section attends to all the business of renewing and supervising the administration of dioceses, reports of the bishop or administrators, appointment of Apostolic visitors, and the government, temporal administration, and discipline of seminaries.—C.E., XIII, 139.

Consolation, Spiritual, a supernatural illumination of the intellect giving rise to joy, peace, courage, and divine love, attracting the will and heart to virtue and heavenly things. Substantial consolation affects the intellect and will. It is often a simple tranquillity in God's service. Sensible consolation overflows into the feelings. (R. D.)

Consors paterni luminis, or O LIGHT of LIGHT, O DAY-SPRING BRIGHT, hymn for Matins on Tuesday. It was written by St. Ambrose (340-397). There are twelve translations; the English title given is by J. Chadwick and J. Chambers.—Britt.

Constance, town, Baden, Germany, and former state of the Holy Roman Empire. Christianized about the 2nd century, and fortified by the Romans, 304, Constance became an imperial city in 1195, was the scene of the Sixteenth Ecumenical Council (1414-18) and, from the 7th century until the Reformation, was the seat of the largest diocese in Germany, including among its bishops, St. Conrad (934-975) and St. Gebhard II (979-995). From the 13th century, these prelates were princes of the German Empire, and had temporal jurisdiction over a principality of about 482 sq. m., with a population of some 50,000, which principality was divided between Baden and Switzerland in 1802. The diocese, which sustained great losses during the Reformation, was dissolved by Pope Pius VII in 1821.—C.E.

Constancy is the virtue whereby one bears the continual burden of a Christian life. It differs from perseverance in this, that as perseverance regards the attaining of the end, with a special difficulty in the length of time to reach it; so constancy, regarding rather the succession of impediments, overcomes their number and variety. (H. J. W.)

Constantine, Pope (708-715), b. Syria; d. Rome. In 709 he visited Constantinople; it appears that he approved those canons of the Trullan Council which were not opposed to the true Faith and to sound morals. He opposed the Monothelite emperor, Philippicus Bardanes, who deposed Justinian II, and he would have suffered at his hands had not Bardanes been overcome by Anastasius. The latter, with John, the Patriarch of Constantinople, then made a profession of orthodoxy to the pope. During the pontificate of St. Egwin, Bp. of Worcester, came to Rome with two Anglo-Saxon kings, Coemred and Offa, and received many privileges for the monastery at Evesham.—C.E.; Mann.

Constantine (Flavius Valerius Constantinus; c. 275-337), Roman emperor, b. Nish, Serbia. Son of a Roman officer, Constantius, and St. Helena, Constantine attended the court of Diocletian and later fought under Galerius, the Eastern Emperor. On the resignation of Diocletian and Maximian (305), Constantius was made emperor but died in 306, and Constantine was raised to the dignity of Caesar, by the army in Britain. Maxentius, the tyrannical profligate son of Maximian, was proclaimed Caesar in Rome. Galerius and Licinius acknowledged Constantine as emperor, and in 311 war broke out between Maxentius and Constantine. With a small army Constantine invaded Italy. He was victorious at Susa, Turin, and Verona. Assured by a vision that he would triumph in the sign of Christ, he marched on Rome and completely defeated Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge, 28 Oct., 312. Shortly after, with his brother-in-law Licinius, he issued the Edict of Milan, granting liberty of worship to the Christians (313). In 314 the treachery of Licinius in the East led Constantine to attack him at Chalce, and later at Castra Jarba, but a peace was soon arranged, which lasted for eight years. Licinius then began to persecute the Christians and infringe on Constantine's rights. The latter routed his army near Chalcedon. Constantine, now sole emperor, transferred his capital to Constantinople, and devoted himself to promoting the moral, economical, and political welfare of the empire. He remained a cæterum till shortly before his death, when he received Baptism. As Pontifex Maximus, although he protected the rites of heathenism, he abolished offensive forms of worship, and suppressed divination and magic. He bestowed many favors on the Church, granting clerics immunity from taxation and military service, allowing the Church the right of inheritance, and removing the legal disabilities attending on celibacy. He forbade the abduction of young girls, and did much for the welfare of children, women, and slaves. He adorned the churches magnificently, and strictly obeyed the precepts of Christianity.—C.E.

Constantinople (Gr., Konstantinou, of Constantine; polis, city), former capital of the Ottoman Empire, situated in European Turkey, on the Strait of Bosporus, between the Sea of Marmora and the Golden Horn, an inlet to the north. Comprising Stamboul, the city proper, and the important suburbs of Galata and Pera, it includes also Scutari, across the strait. It was founded as Byzantium, 667 n.c., by Greeks from Megara, led by Byzas. Chosen by Constantine as the capital of his empire, a.d. 330, it was renamed in his honor. As the residence of the rulers of the Byzantine Empire (q.v.) it was the center of the civilized world for nearly eight centuries. Numerous Church councils were held there. St. John Chrysostom and St. Gregory of Nazianzus were among its bishops. In 451 the patriarchate was established. Unfortunately, frequent inroads of heathenism, Arianism, Nestorianism, and Iconoclasm, finally culminated in the schism of the 9th century, under Photius, and the setting up in 1054 of the so-called Orthodox Greek Church. The Latin Empire, established in 1204, after the conquest of the city by the Crusaders, lasted only until 1261. In 1453 the city fell into the hands of the Turks. The last attempt to dislodge them was the disastrous effort of the Allies in 1915, by way of Gallipoli. The importance of Constantinople has been lessened by the selection of Angora as the new capital of Turkey, in 1923; the expulsion of the caliph, spiritual head of the Moslems, in 1924; and that of the Greek patriarch in 1925.

After the fall of Constantinople, 1453, the churches were converted into mosques. The most famous was the church of St. Sophia (Holy Wisdom), the masterpiece of Byzantine architecture. The church of St. Irene (Holy Peace) is now an armory. On the site of the ancient church of the Holy Apostles now stands the mosque of Mohammed II. The church of the Holy Virgin, in the Greek quarter of Phanar, is one of the city's rare examples of early Byzantine.
The modern pro-cathedral is in the Pancaldi quarter. Catholics of the Latin Rite number about 45,000 and are under a vicar Apostolic, who resides in Pancaldi, and acts also as delegate Apostolic for the Uniat of the city. These include about 5000 Armenians, with a patriarch living in Pera; 1500 Greek Catholics, under a bishop residing in Constantinople and Athens; and a small group of Bulgarians, under an archbishop in Galata. Religious orders include Franciscans, Dominicans, Jesuits, Capuchins, Assumptionists, and Sisters of Charity. They conduct schools, colleges, orphan asylums, and hospitals. Schismatic Christians formerly included about 200,000 Greeks; their number has been lessened through exchange of nationalities since the war, and their patriarch now lives in Saloniki. There are also about 100,000 Armenians, or so-called Gregorians, under a patriarch; 15,000 Bulgarians, claiming membership in the Orthodox body but repudiated by them; and a small number of Orthodox Russians.—C.E.

Constantinople, Councils of. All four were held in the capital of the former Byzantine Empire; all were Ecumenical. The principal acts of these Councils were disciplinary and dogmatic. The First Council of Constantinople, 381, condemned Arianism, Macedonism, and kindred heresies. It formally approved of the Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed. The Second, 553, anathematized the “Three Chapters,” and issued dogmatic condemnations against Arius, Nestorius, and other heretics. The Third, 680, defined the Church’s doctrine on the two wills (human and Divine) in Christ, at the same time anathematizing the opposite (Monothelite) heresy. The Fourth, 681, condemned Photius and the acts of the false Photian council.—C.E.; Hefele, History of the Councils of the Church, Edin., 1894-90. (M. P. H.)

Constantinople, Creed of. See Nicene-Constantinopolitan Creed.

Constantinople, Rite of, or Byzantine Rite, is followed by all Orthodox churches, by Melchites in Syria and Egypt, and Balkan Uniats, Italo-Greeks in Calabria, Apulia, Sicily and Corsica, by over 100,000 Christians. It is of Antiochene origin. It employs the Greek, Arabic, Old Slavonian, and Romanian languages, and follows the Julian Calendar (Old Style), the liturgical year beginning 1 Sept. There are four great fasts: of Christ’s Birth, 15 Nov. to 25 Dec.; of Easter, seven weeks before the feast; of the Apostles, first Sunday after Pentecost to 28 June; of the Mother of God, 14 days from 1 August. Instead of a Missal and Breviary, it has many service books, 20 in number. The liturgy followed is that of St. Chrysostom but, except Palm Sunday, on all Sundays in Lent, Maundy Thursday and Holy Saturday, the Eves of Christmas and Epiphany, the Liturgy of St. Basil is used.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Orthodox Eastern Church, Lond., 1907. (Ed.)

Constitution, Papal, an important papal law or grant. Popes have long used Constitutions for dogmatic and disciplinary pronouncements. Since 1911 they have been using Constitutions for erecting or dividing dioceses. Constitutions are now sub pleno power, letters, that is, have the older Bull form.—C.E. (J. D.)

Consistental (Lat., con, with; substantia, substance), a translation of the Greek, homousios, chosen at the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) as the only correct word to express the nature of the Son of God. He is not inferior to the Father, nor posterior, nor merely like unto Him, but identical in substance and in essence with Him. He is truly God, of God of very God, consubstantial with the Father, as the Nicene Creed has it, having, or rather, being, the Godhead no less than the Father. (J. M. B.)

Consubstantialization, known also as Imparation, the error of those who hold the coexistence in the Eucharist of the Body and Blood of Christ with the bread and wine. Denying transubstantiation, Wyclif and Luther held, as the High Church Party (Anglicans) today holds, the doctrine of consubstantiation.—C.E. (A. J. M.)

Consuetudinary, the title of a book containing the liturgical customs or consuetudines of individual churches, especially those of monastic orders. The purpose of such books was not only to record peculiar monastic customs, but also to render the liturgy conformable to a particular monastic rule. Producers of such works were, among others, Mabillon, “Vetera analecta”; d’Archery, “Spicilegium”; Herrgott, “Vetus disciplina monastica”; Martine, “De antiquis monachorum ritibus.”—Fortescue, The Mass, N.Y., 1914. (D. B.)

Consultors, members of a council. The officials of a bishop in matters of diocesan administration are called diocesan or parish priest consultants (parochi consultores). They number from four to twelve in each diocese, and are proposed by the bishop and approved by the diocesan synod. They consider appeals made in the administrative removal of the so-called irremovable pastors (parochi inamovibiles), and in the transfer of all pastors. Their term of office expires after ten years or when the next synod is held, but they are eligible for reappointment.—C.E. (S. B.)

Contemplation consists in an imperfect vision of the Supreme Being, and of His infinite perfections. There are two kinds, one in the natural or ordinary state, which is that of all Christians striving to save their souls; the other in the preternatural, in which the mind is elevated to God and Divine things, joined with an admiring and loving intuition of these. St. Augustine defines it as an agreeable admiration of perspicuous truth. St. Bernard says it is a certain elevation of the mind dwelling or resting upon God, and tasting the joys of eternal sweetness. Richard of St. Victor defines it as the free insight of the mind, dwelling with admiration on the sights or scenes of wisdom. St. Thomas tells us it is the simple intuition of Divine truth, and that it terminates in affection and love. Mystical contemplation is Divine and effective; it enlightens the intellect, and inflames the will in a special manner, and above all, the human way of acquiring knowledge by reasoning and inference.—C.E.; Devine, A Manual of Mystical Theology, Lond., 1903. (M. J. W.)

Contemplative Life, a way of living especially adapted to induce and facilitate contemplation. Based on the preeminent Christian duty of seeking to increase one’s knowledge and love of God, contemplation is in itself the noblest occupation that may engage man’s faculties, and has been held in veneration since the early Christian Fathers retired into the desert in imitation of Christ. The contemplative seeks that union with God which is to reach perfection in the life to come. To this end he strives to prepare his soul by the exercise of Christian virtues, by estrangement from the world, profession of vows contrary to the worldly spirit, silence as an aid to converse with God, and by self-mortification. His investigation of Divine things necessitates the study of history and science, in short, of whatsoever bears witness to the development of the Divine plan. His great function is, of course, worship, and in the community this sacred duty is performed in a public, official way by the recitation of Divine Office. Moreover, the second great commandment, love of our neighbor for God’s sake, is fulfilled by contemplatives by means of prayer for suffering humanity, and by penance as an atonement for sinners. Those who profess this religious ministry have greater merit theoretically, than those in active orders, but the individual vocation must in all cases be considered. Undoubtedly the contemplative life presupposes a remarkable vocation.—C.E.; Pourrat, tr. Jacques, Christian Spirituality, Lond., 1924.

Contempt, a habitual mean estimate, manifested in depreciatory words or actions. According to the justice of the estimate, contempt is sinful or the reverse, heightening guilt or merit. Thus, the deliberate “Thou fool,” would render grievous a momentary anger; St. Paul, despising the world as a crucified slave, increased his meritorious renunciation.

Conti, Gregorio (Victor IV), antipope, 1138. He was elected by the partisans of the Pierleone faction in opposition to Innocent II. Through the efforts of St. Bernard he submitted to the lawful pope.—C.E.

Continence (Lat., continere, to contain), the virtue or strength of will by which man controls his bodily emotions, particularly those connected with sex; a form of the virtue of temperance; the state of one who controls the sex instinct.—C.E. (w. j. w.)

Continuity, term used in a general sense by theologians to designate the successive existence of the Church from its foundation by Jesus Christ to the present day without a change in its dogma or hierarchical constitution. Specifically, it was a theory advanced by the High-Church Anglicans in the 18th century when they claimed communion with the Holy See on the grounds that their Church was identical with the pre-Reformation Church in England, hence with the Catholic Church. The absurdity of this claim is only too apparent, and never was it exposed more forcibly than by Card. Bourne at the thirteenth centenary of York (Tablet, 1927, CXLIX, 555).—Thurstan, The Faith of York, Lond., 1927.

Contract (Lat., con, together; trahere, to draw), an agreement by which two or more persons mutually bind themselves to give, do, or abstain from something. It requires mutual consent clearly manifested by the parties on both sides, so that there may be no substantial mistake or fraud or misrepresentation on either side; the consent must be deliberate and free, and the subject matter must be definite and certain, possible and honest. Marriage is a form of contract which Christ raised to the dignity of a Sacrament.—C.E.; Slater, Manual of Moral Theology, N. Y., 1925.

Contrition (Lat., contracere, to bruise), sorrow for, and detestation of, one’s past actual sins, with the purpose not to sin in future. Contrition is the principal act of the virtue of penance, and an essential element of the Sacrament of Penance. To be conducive to salvation and to justification contrition must be based on a supernatural motive and must extend to all mortal sins. Contrition is called perfect when its motive is love for God. Such contrition procures the remission of sins without the actual reception of a sacrament, though it must contain, at least implicitly, the intention of receiving either Baptism (in the case of an unbaptized person), or Penance (in the case of one already baptized). Contrition proceeding from any other supernatural motive than Divine charity is called imperfect contrition, or at- trition, and constitutes a sufficient disposition for the remission of sins, through the actual reception of Baptism or of Penance.—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, III, St. L., 1924.

Contumacy (Lat., contumacia, stubbornness), obstinate disobedience to the lawful orders of a court.

Convent (Lat., conventus, assembly), in the history of monasticism a word of two distinct technical meanings: a religious community of either sex when spoken of in its corporate capacity, e.g., hermits of an Eastern laura, or a Western monastic establishment; also the buildings in which a strictly monastic order resides, as distinguished from the home of a “congregation.” In the popular significance it is an abode of female religious, corresponding to the term “monastery” as applied to a male establishment. In the latter sense it is treated in the present article. Varying in details according to each religious order, the features common to all conventual life differ little from those characterizing monasticism (q.v.). The division of convents into two classes, strictly enclosed and diastemated, requires subdivision according as they are contemplative, or active, or a combination of both. The motive actuating the older orders was mainly contemplative. Whether of the contemplative or the active type, convents have always been homes of industry, enriching the Church by their cultivation of the fine arts and needlework. In many modern orders, by educational and hospital work, the conduct of retreats, and the administration of penitentiaries, orphanages, and homes. Legislation relating to convents requires episcopal consent and papal approbation for new establishments, episcopal supervision of the convents in each diocese, excepting those exempt, and prevention of coercion in the admission of postulants; among the chief regulations is the law of enclosure. The recital of Divine Office is incumbent upon choir nuns of the older contemplative orders. Some have undertaken the observance of perpetual adoration.—C.E.

Convent Schools, conducted by religious orders of women, have existed for centuries, the education of girls having from the earliest days occupied the chief works of cloistered women. In the 6th century Cæsarius, Bp. of Arles (501-573), drew up rules for the schools established by his sister, Cæsaria. English nuns went with St. Boniface to Germany in the 8th century and founded schools throughout Saxony that were especially well known. In 747, the Council of Clovesho enjoined abbesses as well as abbots to provide for the education of all their household. During the warring ages from the 6th to the 13th centuries convents offered a safe shelter for the daughters of noble families and others, and the names of brilliant women educated in such schools take the learned abbess, St. Hilda; in Whitby, and the 10th-century poet and dramatist, Roswitha or Hroswitha, educated at Gandersheim by the abbess Gerberg, niece of Otto I. The education ordinarily given in medieval convents comprised reading and writing, liturgical singing, spinning, weaving, and embroidery. The Reformation closed the convent schools of England and Germany, but in southern climes they continued to be a refuge from the worldliness of court and society. After the French Revolution there was an increase in such schools, and during the last century many teaching orders were added to those already established. The first convent school in North America was founded by the Ursulines in Quebec, in 1639. French members of the same order established the first convent in the United States, in 1727, in New Orleans. The aim of convent schools is to combine secular and religious education with the training of character through religious influences. They include elementary schools, academies or high schools, and colleges. Many orders conduct their own training-schools, and hundreds of religious receive the named degrees each year in the larger colleges and universities.—C.E.; Steele, The Converts of Great Britain, Lond., 1892; Burns, Growth and Development of the Catholic School System in the U. S., N. Y., 1912.

Conventual Mass, the Mass which is said publicly every day in churches in which the Divine Office is said daily, i.e., in all cathedrals, in churches which have chapters, for which reason it is often called chapter Mass, and in churches of religious who are obliged to recite the office publicly, e.g., canons regular. With the Office the Mass completes the official or liturgical service of God in such churches. (Ed.)

Conversi, Order of Friars Minor. See Order of Friars Minor Conventual.

Conversion (Lat., convertere, to turn round), the "converted," term applied to those who, in adult life, renounced the world and entered a religious order; synonymous with "lay brother."—C.E.

Conversion (Lat., con, with, toward; vertere, to turn), one who turns or changes from a state of sin to repentance, from a law to a more earnest and serious way of life, from unbelief to faith, from heresy to the true faith. It consists not merely in joining a Church but in a change of heart and in the acceptance of the doctrines and submission to the laws of the Church established by Jesus Christ. This appears best in the narratives of the process of conversion by notable converts. St. Augustine of Hippo wrote his "Confessions"; and Card. Newman's "Apologia pro Vita Sua" is famous. Others are: Kinsman, "Salve Mater"; Brownson, "The Convert"; or, Leaves from my Experience"; Kent Stone, "The Invitation Heeded"; Ronald Knox, "A Spiritual Exile"; Mrs. Anstee Baker, "A Modern Pilgrim's Progress." In the United States, 36,376 converts were reported during 1929, the total Catholic population being listed as 20,112,758. In Great Britain since the Oxford Movement of 1840, many lists have been made of the more prominent converts from Protestantism to the Catholic Church. These have been collected by W. Gordon Gorman in his work, "Converts to Rome," Lond., 1899. The number of converts in England in 1925 was 1,088; in 1926, 1,174; in 1927, 12,065. In missionary countries, the number of converts has been very great especially in China, often as many as 200,000 a year. —C.E. (Ed.)

Converts' Aid Society, Tau, was established in England, in 1886, by Cardinal Vaughan, at the express wish of Leo XIII. Its principal purpose is to provide material assistance to necessary converts clergy of the Established Churches of England and Scotland, and of other Protestant denominations in Great Britain. The society's work is not limited, however, to giving financial aid; it has an employment bureau, and efforts are made to secure suitable positions for its clients. In the case of unmarried men who appear to have a vocation for the priesthood the society defrays the expense of their temporary sojourn in a religious house, and afterwards facilitates their proceeding to the Beda College in Rome, or to one of the British seminaries. In 1929 as many as 100 convert clergy, having been ordained, were engaged in priestly duties in Great Britain. More recently the society has enlarged its scope so as to extend aid to convert Anglican nuns, of whom there is an increasing number. In many instances the society is instrumental in finding Catholic friends for those who by heroically following the call of conscience have forfeited former friendships, one of the trials of most converts; it helps to educate the children of married convert clergy, and arranges temporary homes for them for whole families. The society concerns itself only with those who have actually been received into the Church.

(E. V. W.)

Converts League, an organization founded in New York in 1895 with the object of familiarizing converts to the Church with Catholic associates and of aiding for a time those who on account of change of faith suffer pecuniary or social disadvantage. Its annual meeting and reception occurs near the feast of the Conversion of St. Paul the Apostle, 25 Jan.

(Ed.)

Convict Priests in Australia, priests who labored among the Catholic convicts in the Australian penal settlements. These convicts had been compelled to attend Protestant religious services until 1803, when Fr. James Dixon was permitted to exercise his clerical functions, under galling restrictions. In 1804 Fr. Dixon's privilege was withdrawn and a period of persecution of Catholics began anew, and continued until 1829, the year of the arrival of Frs. Conolly and Therry.

Convocation (Lat., con, together; vocare, to call), the act of calling together an assembly; an assembly; an ecclesiastical meeting of Anglican clergy, resembling a synod, summoned by the archbishops of Canterbury or York to meet when Parliament is sitting.—C. E.

Conway, Katherine Eleanor (1852-1927), journalist and author, b. Rochester, N. Y.; d. Boston. Joining the staff of the Boston "Pilot," in 1883, she served as associate editor, 1890-1905, and as managing editor, 1905-08. From 1908-15 she was managing editor of "The Republic," of Boston, and from 1911-15 a professor at St. Mary's College, Indiana. She was awarded the Lastare Medal by the University of Notre Dame, in 1907, and the papal decoration, "Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice," by Pius X, in 1912. Among her books are "The Christian Gentlewoman," "New Footsteps in Well-Trodden Ways," "Watchwords from John Boyle O'Reilly," "Fifty Years with Christ the Good Shepherd," and various volumes of poetry, including "A Dream of Lilies" and "The Color of Life."

Cook Islands, Prefecture Apostolic of, formerly Cook and Manihiki, Pacific Ocean; formed, 1876; entrusted to the Hermits of St. Augustine of Ireland. Vicars Apostolic: John Hutchinson (1887-97), John Murray (1898-1914), and John Heavey (1914-22); residence at Avarua, Raratonga.

Cooktown, Vicariate Apostolic of, Australia, comprises the northern part of Queensland; established, 1876; entrusted to the Hermits of St. Augustine of Ireland. Vicars Apostolic: John Hutchinson (1887-97), John Murray (1898-1914), and John Heavey (1914-22); residence at Cairns.

Cope (M. L., cappa, cape), pluvial (Lat. pluvia, rain), or cappa pluvialis, long liturgical mantle, fastened at the breast with a cloak- or morse; made of silk or cloth, and semi-circular in shape. The earliest mention of a cappa is found in Gregory of Tours, and in the "Miracula" of St. Fursuus, and meant an ordinary cloak with a hood, for common wear. It was not in general use in church ceremonies until the 12th century, when it was regarded as the special vestment of cantors. It could, however, be worn by any member of the clergy, and among monks was worn by the whole community, excepting the celebrant and his ministers, at High Mass on great feasts. The only conspicuous change it has undergone during the ages has been in the shape of the hood, which in the beginning was small and triangular and intended to be of practical utility in protecting the head in processions, etc., but is now merely an ornamental appendage resembling a shield of rich embroidery, artificially stiffened, and sometimes adorned with fringe. The cope is assigned to the celebrant in nearly all functions in which the chasuble is not used, e.g., processions, greater blessings and consecrations, solemn Vespers and Lauds, Benediction, absolution and burial of the dead, Asperges before Mass, etc., and is worn at pontifical High Mass by the assistant priest who attends the bishop. Its color follows that of the day. See Cappa Chorialis; Cappa Clausa; Cappa Magna; Mantum.—C. E.

Copenhagen University, founded by Bull of Sixtus IV, 1475, at the request of King Christian I, and established by the Abp. of Lund. After the Reformation it was reorganized, 1539, by Johann Bugenhagen, Lutheran theologian.

Copernicus, Nicolaus (Nicolas Koppernigk; 1473-1543), canon of Frauenburg, Dominican tertiar, author of the heliocentric planetary theory, b. Thorn, Poland; d. Frauenburg, East Prussia. He was educated at Krakow, Bologna, Padua, and Ferrara, studying medicine and jurisprudence at the last two. Though a cleric, it is uncertain whether he received higher orders. He gained renown as a physician practicing at Heilsberg (1506-12). He translated the letters of Theophylactus into Latin, 1509, and published a treatise on monetary reform, 1528. About 1528 he completed his work on the revolutions of the celestial bodies, revealing his genius in grasping the truth long before it could be proved. He hesitated to publish it, but, influenced by the spread of the doctrine and the urging of Card. Schonberg, Abp. of Capua, and Bp. Giese of Culm, he surrendered his manuscripts for publication. The work was seen through the press by Schoner and Osiander, in Nuremberg, appearing just before the death of Copernicus. It was dedicated to Paul III. Osiander, to please Luther and Melanchthon, introduced the word "hypothesis" on the title page, and substituted a new preface without permission. The Protestant theologians soon objected to the theory and continued to do so. Catholic opposition began only seventy-three years later, at the time of the Galileo affair. The book was put temporarily on the Index (1616) till nine sentences declaring the system certain were removed or changed.—C. E.

Coppee, Francois Edouard Joachim (1842-1908), poet, novelist, and dramatist, b. Paris; d. there. He was called the poet of the lowly. Simplicity and truth in portraying familiar scenes constitute the charm of his popular short stories. His drama is noted for lofty ideals. Two of his most successful plays in verse are "Le Passant" and "Severo Torelli." He was elected to the Academy in 1884 and founded an annual prize of 1000 francs for young poets. About 1898 he returned to the Catholic Church.—C. E.

Coptic Rite, that used by the Coptic Church. It has three forms, that of St. Cyril, St. Gregory of Nazianzus, and St. Basil. They differ only in the Anaphoras (Canons). The Anaphora of St. Cyril, also called St. Mark's, together with the part common to all, is a duplicate of the Greek St. Mark. When the translation into Coptic was made, certain well-known Greek forms were retained, but were written in Coptic characters. At present St. Basil's Liturgy is used on Sundays, weekdays, and for requiems; St. Gregory's on certain great feasts; and St. Cyril's during Lent and on Christmas Eve.—Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914. (M. E. B.)

Cor arca legem continens, or Jesus, behind Thy Temple's veil, hymn for Lauds on the feast of the Sacred Heart. It was written by an unknown author in the 18th century. There are seven translations; the English title given above is from the Marquess of Bute's "Roman Breviary."—Britt.
Corbie (Corbev), Monastery of, Benedictine abbey in Picardy, founded, 657, by St. Bathilde, with monks from Luxeuil. Under St. Adelhard the monastic school became famous and sent a colony to establish Corvey abbey in Saxony. The buildings destroyed by fire, 1137, were later restored. Mazarin was among the commendatory abbots of Corbie. At the incorporation of the abbey into the Congregation of Saint-Maur, 1618, its declining fortunes revived. At its suppression, 1790, the buildings were partly demolished but the church still remains with fine portal and towers; the library was transferred to Saint-Germain-des-Prés, 1824. Paschalis Radbert (d. 865), was one of the outstanding scholars of Corbie.—C.E.

Corcoran, James Andrew (1820-91), theologian, editor, and Orientalist, b. Charleston, S. C.; d. Ordained in Rome, 21 Dec. 1852. He was the first native of the Carolinas to receive priestly orders. He edited the “United States Catholic Miscellany,” the “American Catholic Quarterly Review,” and Bp. England’s works. He was secretary to the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore, and one of the theologians of the doctrinal commission of the Vatican Council.—C.E.; Beringer, Les Indulgences, Paris, 1865. (j. v. s.) Core, Dathan, and Abiron, leaders of a revolt against Moses and Aaron (Num., 16), which took place probably at Cades, shortly after the Israelites left Sinai. Core was destroyed by fire from heaven, and Dathan and Abiron were swallowed up by the earth.—C.E.

Corinth, ancient city, Greece, situated at the isthmus separating the Gulf of Corinth from that of Ægina. It was of prehistoric legendary origin, and became a flourishing city by reason of its position between the Peloponnesus and central Greece. About 1100 B.C. it waged victorious warfare against Athens, and later founded many colonies, including Syracuse. Sacked by the Romans, 146 B.C., it was restored by Julius Caesar. It was the scene of St. Paul’s successful apostolate (Acts, 18), and the recipient of two Pauline epistles, A.D. 57 and 58. It was captured by the Turks, 1458, and held by them until 1821, except for an interval from 1687-1715, when the Venetians controlled it. In 1658 an earthquake destroyed it, and it was replaced by New Corinth, 3½ m. to the northeast. Lequien mentions only 20 Latin prelates from Corinth, 1210-1700, although Eubel gives 22 archbishops from 1212-1476. The name exists as a titular archbishopric.—C.E.

Corinthians, Epistles to the, two epistles written by St. Paul in the year 57, the first from Ephesus and the second from Macedonia. A twofold occasion led to the writing of the first epistle. St. Paul learned that dissensions and strife regarding the worth of various preachers had arisen at Corinth and that some Christians had caused grave scandal by their evil conduct; at the same time, the Corinthians sent him a letter in which various questions were proposed for solution. The object and plan of the epistles are discussed in the introduction. The purpose is the demoralization and correction of abuses and crimes, 1, 10, to 6, 20, in which are treated the dissensions, avoidance of sinners, sins of injustice and impurity; and a reply to the questions addressed to him, 7, 1, to 16, 4, in which are treated marriage and celibacy, meats offered to idols, divine services and the Holy Eucharist, the charisms, the resurrection, the collection for the poor of Jerusalem. The second epistle was written some months after the previous letter and is closely connected with it. The occasion for this epistle was the report brought to Paul by Titus, that the first epistle had been well received, and that the Corinthians were repentant and ready to make amends, but, on the other hand, some misunderstandings had arisen and there was the suspicion of false apostles who were attacking Paul and endeavoring to destroy his authority. The epistle is thus divided: (1) apologetic, 1, 12, to 7, 10, in which St. Paul defends himself against accusations, commends the Corinthians, and exhorts them to greater virtue; (2) hortatory, 8 to 9, in which they are exhorted to generosity towards the poor;
(3) polemical, 10 to 13, in which Paul attacks and unmasks the false apostles and shows his own Apostolic power and authority.—C.E.; MacRory, Cork, Diocese of, Ireland; comprises Cork City and a portion of County Cork; suffragan of Cashel; founded in the 6th century by St. Finbarr. The old cathedral of St. Finbarr, called Gill Abbey, stood until 1725 on the spot now occupied by the Protestant cathedral. It was the home of a famous school (see Cork, School of). St. Nessian (in the early centuries) and Bl. Thaddeus McCarthy (1492) were in the long line of bishops; also the famous Bp. Giolla Aedh Ó Muighín (1152-72). Bp. Daniel Cahalan succceeded Bp. Thomas O'Caillaghan in 1916. Churches, 72; priests, secular, 129; priests, regular, 90; convents of nuns, 27; colleges, 4; high schools, 20; institutions, 10; poor schools for 470 children; Catholics, 169,335.

Cork, School of, founded by Barra, or Finbarr, saint and scholar, near Lough Eire, 620. It flourished even after the Danish settlement. In 1174 the monastery and school of Cork were refounded by Cormac MacCarthy, King of Munster.—C.E.

Cormac MacCuillean (836-908), Irish bishop and King of Cashel, slain at the battle of Ballymoun.
He was the author of an Irish glossary and possibly of the lost Psalter of Cashel.—C.E.

Cornoaro, Elena Luceria Piscopia (1646-84), wife of B. Venetia; d. Padua, Italy, is associated with noble descent and esteemed for her learning throughout Europe, she was awarded the doctorate in philosophy by the University of Padua, 1678, and was a member of various academies. Her writings include academic discourses, translations, and devotional treatises.—
C.E.

Cornelle, Pierre (1600-84), dramatist, b.
Rouen, France; d. Paris. He was educated by the Jesuits, and, after admission to the bar, devoted himself to literature. His early comedies attracted the attention of Richelieu, who employed him for a time to revise his own plays. In 1636 the success of "Le Cid," which marked a new epoch in French drama, angered Richelieu, who had it severely criticized by the Academy. After four years of silence, "Horace" and "Cinna" appeared, and from that time till 1651 Corneille produced a series of plays, mostly masterpieces; "Polyeucte" was perhaps his crowning triumph. Sincerely devout, he pursued a lofty ideal in his work and portrayed characters whose heroism, sense of duty, and readiness for self-sacrifice set a standard of the highest morality. He completed a translation of the "Imitation of Christ" in 1656.—C.E.

Cornelius, a centurion of the Italic cohort, converted at Cesarea (Acts, 10). His baptism was an important event, as it was the first case of an uncircumcised Gentile being received into the Church without submitting to the Jewish ceremonial laws.
—C.E.

Cornelius, Saint, Pope (251-253), martyr, b.
Rome; d. Centumcellae (Civita Vecchia). He had scarcely been elected when Novatian set himself up as antipope. Cornelius gathered sixty bishops at a synod in Italy and established himself as the legitimate pontiff. Through St. Cyprian and St.
Dionysius he gained the support of Africa and the East. As pope he sanctioned St. Cyprian's mild mea-urses for receiving again into communion those who had apostatized in the Decian persecution, and his concern with the saint remains as evidence of the primacy of the chair of Peter. Feast, R. Cal., 14 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Corner-stone, a stone placed in a prominent corner of the foundation of a church, or other building, laid at a ceremony which marks the beginning of the erection of the superstructure. It is inscribed with the date, and has a cavity to receive coins and other mementoes of the time and circumstances. The corner-stone of a ecclesiastical building symbolizes Christ, who is the Corner-stone of faith and Foundation of the Church. It also symbolizes St. Peter, the first vicar of Christ, to whom Christ said: "Thou art Peter [Gr., petra, rock]; and upon this rock I will build my Church" (Matt., 16.)

Corner-stone, Blessing on, the series of rites at the laying of the corner-stone of a church. The procedure is as follows: a wooden cross is erected the day before on the spot where the altar of the church is to stand; the following morning, the bishop, or one degreed by him, blesses this spot; then he blesses the corner-stone, engraving crosses on each side of it with a knife, lays it, and blesses the entire foundations in three sections. These ceremonies are accompanied by prayers, singing of appropriate psalms, and sprinkling of holy water. Next a hymn to the Holy Ghost is sung, and two prayers are recited imploiring
God's blessing on the continuation of the work started.
Then the celebrant, if he deems it opportune, exorts
the people to contribute to the fabric, and dismisses them with his blessing and the proclamation of an indulgence.—C.E., XIV, 303. (J. C. T.)
Cornette (Fr., head-dress), large, spreading, white, linen head-dress, worn by the Sisters of Charity. In the 14th century the cornette was a common head-gear for both men and women, and reached almost to the ground. Later it was a wide band of material wound around the head and reaching to the belt, to which it was attached.

Coronation, act or ceremony of crowning a monarch. The coronation ceremony of the emperors at Constantinople did not exist before the time of Constantine who first assumed the diadem, which became the symbol of sovereignty, and introduced the ceremony of adoration by prostration. The next change was the setting of the diadem on the sovereign's head by the Patriarch of Constantinople. The ecclesiastical element in the ceremonial rapidly developed. At first the emperor was not crowned in a church and the ritual centered in the conferring of the chalmys and crown. The rite of anointing was probably not introduced in the East until the 12th century. In the West toward the close of the 7th century the Visigothic kings were crowned by the Bp. of Toledo. In England the Egbertine Order is the earliest form of investiture and seems to show a compromise between Celtic and Reaching to the Tilt. "Liber Regalis," introduced at the coronation of Edward II, 1307, forms the substance of the ritual used at the present day. English has been substituted for Latin and all Roman expressions have been suppressed. The oath to maintain the Protestant Reformed Religion and the presentation of the Bible were introduced in the time of William III. The English coronation order has much in common with that formerly used for the coronation of the Emperor, and King of the Romans. The French king had the privilege of communicating under both species, and used the oil from the Sainte Ampoule. No religious ceremony is now in use in Spain when the king ascends the throne. A splendid ceremony was used for the crowning of the Russian emperor.

Coronation of Our Lady (in Art). Among the many masters who have painted the subject are: Borgognone; Cima da Conegliano; El Greco; Fra Angelico; Ghirlandajo; Justus of Padua; Lippi; Memling; Perugino; Pinturicchio; Raphael; Rubens; Signorelli; Velasquez; Veronese.

Corot, k6-ro, (JEAN BAPTISTE CAMILLE (1796-1875), painter, b. Paris; d. there. He first studied art at twenty-six, under Victor Bertin. He was in Rome from 1825-27 and 1834-43. He began as a Classicist and painted during this first period several religious pictures, among them "The Martyrdom of St. Antuan" and a "Baptism of Christ." Thirty years later is in the church of St. Nicolas du Chardonnet, in Paris. He is famous for his landscapes, done as a member of the Barbizon group and notable for poetic treatment, silvery color, and unusual effects of light. He was beloved by his brother artists for his unfailing kindness and liberality. He was made a commander of the Legion of Honor in 1867. His paintings in the Louvre include "The Pool," "Dancing Nymphs," and "The Road from Sivres." He is well represented in the United States.

Corporal (Lat., corpus, body), a small, square, white linen cloth, on which the Sacred Host and chalice are placed during Mass.

Corporations (Lat., corpus, body), an association to which is considered in ordinary transactions as an individual. An ecclesiastical corporation, i.e., a moral person, is a juridical entity which from public authority is perfectly capable of acquiring and exercising legal rights. Such a corporation may be collegiate, e.g., chapters or religious orders, which are made up of individuals; collective, in which the members merely combine some of their powers and rights; or non-collegiate, e.g., seminaries or benefices, whose legal rights are exercised by administrators. The Catholic Church and the Apostolic See receive their legal personality from God; other moral persons, from ecclesiastical authority, either by enactment of the law, or by a formal decree of erection granted by the legitimate superior; some of them suffices for collective persons. The reason for the existence of moral persons must be religious or charitable. At least three physical persons are required for a collegiate body; a certain patrimony must be assigned for a non-collegiate body, to be administered for the accomplishment of the purpose of the institution. All moral persons are assimilated to minors, the law extending to them the protection it affords those under age. Non-collegiate bodies act through their administrators. Collegiate bodies act through the votes of their members, an absolute majority being necessary for deciding questions. By their nature, moral persons are perpetual. They cease to exist legally if suppressed by the power that can erect them. A collegiate body ceases de facto by the loss of all its members; but legally it exists for 100 years, so that 75 years after the death of the last member such a body could be revived. Ecclesiastical corporations, as such, are not recognized by the law of the United States; they are, however, given the status of private corporations.—C.E.; Ayrinhac, General Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1923. (c. X.)

Corpus, a body; a complete collection of writings on any subject. The Corpus Iuris Civilis is the collection of Roman Christian laws. The Corpus Iuris Canonici includes the "Decretals" of Gregory IX, Boniface VIII, and Clement V, the "Decree" of Gratian, the "Extravagantes" of John XXII, and the "Extravagantes communes." Corpus Delicti (Lat., body of the crime) means the aggregate elements which constitute a particular fact a crime.—C.E., IV, 391.

Corpus Christi, Diocese of, comprises that part of the State of Texas situated south and east of Las Hermanas and San Roque Creeks, south of the Nueces River as far as the eastern line of McMullen County, south of Atascosa, Karnes, DeWitt, Victoria, and Calhoun Counties; area, 22,391 sq. m. Elevated to a diocese in 1912 from the Vicariate Apostolic of Brownsville. The Oblate Fathers, notably Fr. Verdet, were first missionaries of Texas; Fr. O'Reilly built the first church in Corpus Christi in 1856. Vicars Apostolic of Brownsville: Dominican Manucy, Titular Bp. of Delfia (1874-84); Peter Verdaguer, Titular Bp. of Anton (1890-1911). Bishops of Corpus Christi: Paul J. Nussbaum (1913-20); Emmanuel B. Ledvina (1921). Churches, 46; missions, 101; stations, 290; priests, secular, 35; priests, regular, 50; religious women, 358; colleges, 3; novitiates, 3; academies, 6; primary schools, 27; pupils in parochial schools, 2873; institutions, 5; Catholics, 29,903 (of whom 13,800 are Mexicans).

Corpus Christi (Body of Christ), Feast of, celebrated on Thursday after Trinity Sunday in honor of the Body of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament and in commemoration of the institution of the Blessed Sacrament. It was established, 1240, at the suggestion of St. Julian of Mont Cornillon, by Bp. Robert de Thoronet of Liège, where the first consecration was held the following year, and its observance was extended to the whole Church by Pope Urban IV, 1264. It is a holy day of obligation in England, Ireland, and Scotland. The office for the day, the most beautiful in the Roman Liturgy, was written by St. Thomas Aquinas and the custom of procession was approved and encouraged by Popes Martin V and Eugène IV. The procession dates from c. 1275, though originally not directly connected with the celebration of the Feast. It is held either on the feast itself, on the following Sunday, or on the day of the octave of the feast, and is of prescription, unless circumstances are such that it must be omitted. During this procession it is customary to halt at several altars, and from one or two of them Benediction is given. In many places it is customary to have this procession in the open air, weather permitting. Some country churches that have the cemetery close at hand always have two altars within the confines of the cemetery for the purpose of these stops or halts in the Corpus Christi procession. In city parishes and where it is held inside the Church. Then the side-altars are used as stopping or halting places for the procession, and from each Benediction is given. Finally the solemnity is concluded with Benediction given from the high altar of the church.

Corpus diejeunians, or Long Parting Haste Thy Body Tamed, hymn for Matins on feast of St. John Cantius, 20 Oct. It was written in 18th century, by an unknown author. It has four translations; the English title is by W. Wallace.—Britt.

Correctories, Latin critical works enumerating and discussing Scripture passages with different readings drawn from ancient MSS. and writings. Their purpose was to secure more perfect copies of the original Latin text. The most important were made by the Paris University, the Dominicans, and the Franciscans, in 13th century. The publication of the official Latin text, 1598, rendered them superfluous.—C.E.

Correggio, kör-rég'ji (Antonio Allegri; c. 1494-1534), painter, b. Correggio, near Modena, Italy; d. there. Little is known of his life, though he is one of the greatest Italian artists. His work shows the influence of Mantegna and Leonardo da Vinci. He founded a school in Parma, where he painted the frescoes that adorn the Convent of San Paolo and the cupolas of the cathedral and the church of San Giovanni. He is noted especially for his masterly handling of light and shade. Two of his finest paintings are the "Holy Night" in the Dresden museum, and "the Marriage of St. Catherine" in the Louvre.—C.E.

Cosmas of Hagopolitusa of Cosmas of Jerusalem (8th century), hymn-writer, b. probably Damascus; d. probably Maïuma, port of Gaza, southern Phœnicia. He was foster-brother of St. John of Damascus and entered with him the monastery of St. Sabas, near Jerusalem. In 743 he was appointed Bp. of Maiuma. Among the best representatives of later Greek classical hymnology, especially the liturgical chants known as "Canons, his hymns are in general use in the Orthodox Greek Church, which commemorates him, 14 Oct.—C.E.

Cosmas and Damian, Saints, martyrs (c. 303), b. Arabia; d. Ægea (now Ayass), Cilicia. They were twin brothers, physicians, and practised at Ægea; they accepted no money from the poor, and, being Christians, their good example brought many to the Faith. Arrested in the persecution of Diocletian, they were subjected to torture, but remained unharmed, and were finally beheaded. Their three brothers, Anthimus, Leontius, and Euprepius, were martyred with them; numerous myths and legends grew up around them. Patrons of physicians, surgeons, druggists, and barbers. They are mentioned in the Canon of the Mass and the Litany of the Saints. Body: Church of S. Giovanni, Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 27 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Cosmas da Carboniam, Blessed, martyr (1656-1707), b. Constantinople. He became a priest of the Armenian Church 1683, and in 1686 was converted to Catholicism. From 1697 to 1707 he was pastor of St. George's in Sulu Monastir. At that period a bitter persecution of Uniates in the Ottoman Empire was just beginning. Fr. Carboniam was arrested in April, 1707, as "rebellious to the laws of the Ottoman Empire." In Nov. he was again incarcerated as the result of riots of schismatic priests and laity, and condemned to death. Beheaded, 25 June, 1709.

Cosmas Indicopleustes (6th century), traveler and geographer, b. Alexandria, Egypt. He explored the region south of Egypt as far as Cape Guardafui and east probably as far as India (Indicopleutes, voyager to India). On retiring from his travels he entered the monastery of Raithu on the Peninsula of Sinai. Here he wrote his "Christian Topography," an account of his travels and investigations with a description of the universe as he imagined it, and with explanatory maps. The work is valuable as being the first effort of patristic geography.—C.E.
Cosmogony (Gr., kosmos, world; gignomai, become), the science concerning the origin of our world. That the world was created out of nothing by God's Omnipotence, is both a dogma of faith and an unassailable conclusion of reason. This part of the origin of the world is today generally discussed in cosmology, a branch of philosophy. Cosmogony rather refers to the evolution of the world after its creation. The ancients thought that ever since the 6th day of creation the world remained substantially the same. Modern astronomy and geology assure us of the contrary. This naturally led to two questions: In what state was the world first created? How did the world come to its present state? During the last century the so-called nebular theory of Kant and Laplace was generally accepted by scientists; but owing to its manifold shortcomings, it is generally abandoned nowadays in favor of other theories. Any theory of cosmogony must, of course, start from the assured findings of cosmography, a description of the universe (present and past) and of the laws governing its changes. Various modern sciences are engaged in making this description more and more accurate, e.g., geography, geology, paleontology, astronomy, and astrophysics. Notable contributions to the science have been made by the following Catholic scientists: Joachim Barvande, Nicolaus Copernicus, Armand David, André Dumont, Galileo Galilei, Etienne Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire, Dumas, D'Hallay, J. B. P. A. Lamarck, Auguste De Laparent, Karl August Lossen, Albertus Magnus, Charles Saint Claire-Deville, Heinrich Scherer, S.J., Nicolaus Steno, Wilhelm Heinrich Wägen, and Martin Waldseemüller.—C.E.; McWilliams, Cosmology, N. Y., 1928.

Cosmos, a Greek word, having two meanings apparently far apart: the universe and beauty. Yet the good common sense of the Greeks rightly joined the two meanings in one word. For in spite of the infinite variety of objects, the universe exhibits a most marvelous unity of design and ultimate purpose. Now unity in variety is one of the most commonly accepted definitions of beauty. Moreover, the order and beauty resplendent in the universe is the visible exemplar of man's activity; man is naturally urged to imitate this order and beauty in every sphere of action. (A. C. C.)

Cosmography. See Cosmogony.

Cosmology (Gr., kosmos, world; logos, knowledge or science), the study of the general characteristics and basic principles of the material world. Its material object, the material universe, is one with the physical sciences; its formal object differs. The particular sciences are confined to their particular subject, to the proximate causes of corporeal phenomena, and to the formulation of the governing laws as revealed by observation and experiment. Cosmology complements the physical sciences. It begins at their terminus. Based on their findings it passes beyond sense-perception to the ultimate causes of material bodies in general as ascertained by natural reason. Man's unique sphere entitles him to a special study, i.e., psychology, to which corporeal life as such is more aptly reserved. In the guise of physics the study is as old as philosophy itself, and originally constituted its entire scope. Scientific progress with its numerous findings has separated the two, and cosmology now ranks as an independent metaphysical science. The name was first used, 1730. Its method is essentially a posteriori. It answers the "Whence, What, Why?" of the corporeal world. Hence its threefold task and divisions. The subject of the universe in general comprises two divisions: (1) The first treats of its primordial efficient cause reduced to the two theories of monism and creationism (qq.v.), its evolution or development, its magnitude, and its final destiny; (2) the second treats of its final cause, revealing purposive finiteness.

The third division treats of its constituent causes: (a) of the common properties of bodies—extension, space, time, and activity with its efficiency, physical laws, and necessity; miracles; and (b) of the essential composition of bodies reduced to the theories of mechanism, atomism, dynamism, and hylomorphism (qq.v.). The philosophy of the schoolmen holds: (1) That the universe was created by God out of nothing; that the present state of the inorganic world is due immediately to the agency of material forces. (2) That its final cause is to manifest its Creator's glory through the medium of man, whose welfare is the secondary purpose. (3) That the constituent principle of physical bodies is a substantial union of two co-principles or incomplete substances, matter and form. Primary matter is the indeterminate, passive principle. Substantial form is the active, determining principle imparting specific determination. It is the root cause of activity. The union of the two constitutes the complete specific substance, the adequate principle of activity. Such a philosophy.—C.E.; McWilliams, Cosmology, N. Y., 1928.

Costa Rica, republic of Central America, between Panama and Nicaragua; area, approximately 23,000 sq. m.; est. pop. 480,326. The country was discovered by Columbus in 1502; colonization was attempted in 1509 by Diego de Nicuesa, and more successfully, 14 years later, by Francisco Hernandez. It was made a province of Guatemala. It gained independence in 1821, and the present Constitution, which has been altered many times, was adopted in 1870-71. The first Bp. of Costa Rica, consecrated in 1851, was Anselmo Llorente y Lafuente. The Constitution provides that "The Catholic Apostolic Roman is the religion of the state which contributes to its maintenance without impeding the exercise in the republic of any other religion not opposed

Costume, Clerical, garb worn by clerics. All clerics are obliged by law to wear becoming ecclesiastical garb in accordance with legitimate local custom and the prescriptions of the Ordinary of the place. According to the Code all priests are bound to wear the cassock while they are celebrating the Sacrifice of the Mass and conferring the Sacraments in the Church. The Third Plenary Council of Balti-more decreed that all clerics, while in the church or at any place where they should wear the cassock, when, however, they are outside they should wear a shorter black garment coming to knee. Custom has sanctioned the wearing of the sack coat. The Roman collar is also part of the clerical costume to be worn abroad as well as at home or in the church. Minor clerics who do not wear the clerical costume are to be admonished by the Ordinary, and if a month elapses before they resume it they are automatically reduced to the lay state; major clerics in similar circumstances lose any office they may hold and are to be suspended by the Ordinary. Laymen may not wear a clerical habit unless they be seminarians or aspiring to Orders, or if they are in the service of the Church and are actually taking part in some service either in the church or outside of it.—C.E., Ayrinhac, General Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1923.

Cotta (Lat., a garment) or Surplice, a vestment of white linen, reaching to a little below the hips, having wide sleeves, often ornamented with lace. It is worn over the cassock by clerics and altar boys at many sacred functions, signifying the purity of heart becoming God's ministers. The name surplice (Lat., superpellicem; super, over; pellicem, fur clothing) indicates its origin. It was formerly a linen gown worn over fur clothing by ecclesiastics while chanting the divine office in cold weather.—C.E., XIV, 342. (w. c. v.)

Council, a group of persons called together to deliberate; an advisory body; individuals elected to administer municipal or county affairs; the administrative committee of a society; an assembly of church dignitaries and scholars to discuss and regulate doctrinal and disciplinary matters, such councils being called provincial, national, or general or ecumenical.

Council, Congregation of the, Roman congregation appointed by Pius IV, 1564, at first to supervise the execution of the decrees of the Council of Trent, and later to interpret them. For a time, when the Rota ceased to function, this congregation took over matrimonial cases. It also reviewed the reports of bishops on their dioceses, a function now belonging to the Congregation of the Consistory. At present the council has the supervision of the discipline of the secular clergy, and matters relating to bishops which were the concern of the former Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. It has charge of the observance of ecclesiastical precepts of fasting and abstinence, feast-days, dispensations, and the activities of parochial and pious organizations. With it is associated the Congregation of Loreto which has special care of the shrine at that place.—C.E., XIII, 141. (ed.)

Council, General, a legally convened assembly of ecclesiastical dignitaries and theological experts representing the entire Church for the purpose of discussing, defining, and regulating matters of Church doctrine and discipline. The members of the council cannot act independently of the Supreme Pontiff, who presides over the assembly in person or by delegate; and no decree has binding force until it is confirmed by him.—C.E. (A. B. G.)

Councils, Canons of, the decrees of general councils which contain the condemnations of heretical doctrines. The contradictory of the truth is put down, and the condemnation of anathema is attached to anyone who would hold this negative proposition. The canons of councils are of defined faith. (M. P. H.)

Counsels, Evangelical. That the Christian life demands from all a serious discipline of natural affections, is clear. "He that loveth father or mother, . . . his father or daughter more than me, . . . that taketh not up his cross and followeth me is not worthy of me. He that findeth his life shall lose it" (Matt., 10). Or this the narrowest interpretation must be, that one ruling his life by the love of worldly goods is outside the way of salvation; to be in it one must be ready to keep the Commandments at any cost. This does not exclude the possibility of Christia-n life, a service of love. "If thou wilt be perfect, go sell what thou hast and give to the poor. . . . And come follow me" (Matt., 19). Since to keep the Commandments suffices for salvation, the call to perfection is generally of counsel only. To be complete the renunciation must include worldly possessions, family ties, and personal initiative, wherefore Christians have always held poverty, chastity, and obedience to be its matter. Because in this they follow the Gospel teaching, which not only praises such complete renunciation, but also invites all to undertake it, promising a great reward, they have termed poverty, chastity, and obedience, made permanent by vows, the Evangelical Counsels.—C.E., Koehler-Preus. (B. G. W.)

Counter-Reformation, more appropriately called Catholic Reform, the period of Catholic re-vival which began c. 1522 and lasted to the end of the Thirty Years War in 1648. It consisted chiefly in the efforts made by ecclesiastical and civil authorities to stem the tide of Protestantism, by the introduction of genuine reforms within the Church and by the use of moral means and coercive measures to bring back former Catholics into the fold. The Counter-Reformation is divided into: (1) ecclesiastical movements, carried out under the leadership of churchmen; (2) political movements, carried out under the immediate direction and with the support of civil rulers. The ecclesiastical Counter-Reformation consisted in the efforts made by word and example to restore genuine Catholic life. It assumed important proportions by the restoration of primitive observance in some existing religious orders and by the establishment of new religious institutes. The reform of the Carmelites by St. Teresa (1515-
COUNTER-REFORMATION

COURT

82) may be cited as an example of restoration of discipline; the founding of the Society of Jesus by St. Ignatius Loyola (1491-1556) will serve as an illustration of a new religious order. The ecclesiastical Counter-Reformation received its official direction from the papacy and, under the latter, notably from the Council of Trent (1545-83). This nineteenth general council, in luminous and peremptory fashion, restated Catholic doctrine on points controverted by the Protestants; suppressed existing abuses, prescribed special training for the clergy in seminaries, made salutary regulations regarding monastic life, and imposed thoroughgoing reform. St. Charles Borromeo, Cardinal Archbishop of Milan, was conspicuous by his activity in enforcing the reforms decreed by the council. St. Francis de Sales was noted in that the subsequent increase of genuine Catholic piety. A political counter-reformation was energetically carried out in Bavaria by some of its rulers. Its best-known leaders, however, were Philip II and Mary Tudor, husband and wife, the former reigning in Spain and the Netherlands, the latter in England. Philip II was everywhere the champion of Catholicism, and Mary restored it in her kingdom; both rulers would have achieved more lasting results had they proceeded with greater discretion and moderation. The political Counter-Reformation played an important part in the antagonism between England and Scotland, England and Spain, and Poland and Sweden, and in the religious wars of the 16th and 17th centuries. The general result for the Catholic Church was favorable to the Counter-Reformation, both ecclesiastical and political, was internally a renewal of religious life and externally an increase of Catholic power and influence.—C.E.; Pollen, English Catholics in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, N.Y., 1920. (N. A. W.)

Countries, Catholic and Protestant, Compared. The statement is often carelessly made that Catholic nations are inferior to Protestant, and that this difference indicates the superiority of Protestantism as a religion. The statement is a loose generalization, and embraces a variety of errors.

Politics. Forgetting the earlier history of Europe, proponents of this claim used to point to the supremacy of England, Germany, the United States, and the secondary position of France, Italy, Spain, and the South and Central American republics. Of course, none of these countries is exclusively Catholic or Protestant, and often the rulers of so-called Catholic nations have long been men of doubtful religious belief to say the least. The history of the World War and the subsequent decade has undone this argument. Imperial Germany is no longer viewed with pride. England and the United States today associate with themselves France, Italy, and Japan, and of these the first two are among the Catholic nations, and the last is non-Christian, clear evidence of the lack of relation between religious belief and political power.

Economic. Admittedly, the greatest development of finance, manufacture, and commerce has been in England, the United States, and Germany. The true reason for this is, however, not the predominantly Protestant religion, but the presence of opportunity and the play of economic forces. The invention of power machinery and the adaptability of these countries to its use, made of them typically commercial peoples, while France, Italy, and other countries remain typically agricultural. Religious beliefs had no more to do with this trend of development than in the parallel example of the development of a commercial city in the midst of country villages. Moreover, recent industrial crises in England, Germany, and northern France, indicate that a purely industrial community runs serious risks, and is not necessarily preferable to a pastoral or agricultural community.

Culture. No serious and well-informed person will claim any supremacy of culture for the predominantly Protestant countries. In fact, it is commonly admitted that the so-called Catholic countries have various officials to assist the bishop. These Morality. Every religion tends to reduce immorality and crime; hence statistics of crime really prove only the absence of religion. However, if such statistics be taken only as indicating the failure of religion, a rough comparison can be made, and will be not unfavorable to the Catholic nations. The United States has, unfortunately, an unhappy reputation due to the prevalence of certain crimes, and the inability of the courts and police to repress them. The comparison however is not profitable; attention should rather be given to the encouragement of all forces everywhere which work against evil. The Catholic Church, with its divine instruction, its carefully systematized moral code, and its long practice in dealing with consciences, is efficient and constant in denouncing sins of all kinds and in all places.

In fairness, the debate should be dropped as useless and incapable of final answer. National life is too vast and intricate to be accurately measured and computed. All nations have their faults and their virtues and the presence of certain crimes in one nation is sure to be balanced by blamable failures in another. The true religious spirit of Christ is never national, never contemptuously proud, embraces and seeks all good, hates sin, but remains charitably kind to sinners. Those inspired by this spirit find no utility in invidious comparisons. —(E. F. Mark.)

Courage, one of the passions of the appetite, irascible, as it is called, which not only desires but strives for its object and endures trial of strength to attain it; it is also the cardinal virtue of fortitude.—Coppen's Moral Philosophy, New York, 1924.

Court, Diocesan. A fully organized diocese must have various officials to assist the bishop. These form the diocesan court. It consists of: a vicar-general with general vicarious power in spiritual and temporal matters, who is one tribunal with his bishop and can be removed from office at will; an official, who corresponds to a chief justice in the civil courts, having ordinary power; a chancellor, to keep the records; a promoter of justice, like a district attorney; a defender of the bond of Marriage and Sacred Orders, whose duty it is to defend the existence of a true marriage or valid Orders when either is attacked; synodal judges, who may be called associate justices and who are generally named in the diocesan synod; examiners, who preside at examinations of the clergy and intervene in certain cases of removal of parish priests; parish priest consultors, who are also called in sometimes in the removal of irremovable pastors or in the transfer of ordinary pastors; auditors, who assist the judges in ecclesiastical trials by citing witnesses, etc.; messengers or beadle, to serve citations on parties to a suit; notaries, who act as secretaries and sign all official acts of a trial.—Ayringac, Constitution of the Church in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1925. (F. J. L.)

Cousin, cō-za̅n, Jean (c. 1500-1560), painter, sculptor, and etcher, b. Soucy, France; d. Sens. He is considered the founder of the French school, and the first Frenchman to have used oil-paint. His only authentic existing picture is the much-admired “Last Judgment” in the Louvre. The windows of the Sainte Chapelle of Vincennes, painted by him, are the finest example of glass-painting in France. The windows in Sens cathedral representing the legend of St. Eutropius are also his. He is now best known for biblical and historical illustrations in woodcut.—C.E.

Covenant, name given to the subscribers (practically the whole of Scotland) of the two Covenants, the National Covenant of 1638 and the Solemn League and Covenant of 1643. Their object was to band the nation together in defense of its religion against the attempts of the king to impose upon it an episcopal system of church government and a new and less anti-Catholic liturgy. The Covenanters as national bonds ceased with the conquest of Scotland by Cromwell but many upheld them throughout the Restoration. The struggle which ensued was a struggle for supremacy as to which should decide the religion of the country, the King or the Kirk. After nearly a century of strife both sides had lost and won. The King had been defeated in his attempts to dictate the religion of his subjects; Presbyterianism became the established religion. But it had been equally proved that the subjection of the State to the Church, the supremacy, political as well as ecclesiastical of the Kirk, was an impossibility. In this the Covenanters had failed.—C.E.

Covington, Diocese of, Kentucky, comprises that part of Kentucky lying east of the Kentucky River and of the western limits of Carroll, Owen, Franklin, Woodford, Jessamine, Garrard, Rockcastle, Laurel, and Whitley Counties; area, 17,286 sq. m.; established 1834; suffragan of Cincinnati. The Sulpician Fathers Flaget, Badin, David, and Nerinx set an illustrous example for their successors by their missionary labors there. Bishops: George Aloysius Carroll, S. J. (1833-68); Augustus Marie Toebbe (1870-84); Camillus Paul Maes (1885-1915); Ferdinand Brossart, now titular Bp. of Vallis (1916-23); Francis W. Howard (1923). Churches, 82; priests, secular, 95; priests, regular, 8; religious women, 714; brothers, 5; high schools, 6; academies, 10; primary schools, 47; students in parochial schools, 9520; institutions, 5; Catholics, 64,000.—C.E.

Cowl, hood covering the head, worn by the monastic orders. In the Middle Ages the cloak had a hood attached which could be drawn over the head, and the cowl became a great cloak with a hood. The cowl of the Benedictines, Cistercians, etc. is a great mantle with a hood which may be thrown back over the shoulders; the Franciscans have a smaller hood attached to their habit. Canons wear it on their mozzetta and bishops and cardinals on the cappa; the cowl of the Augustinians and Servites is a separate hood. The color of the cowl is that of the habit.—C.E.

C.P.P.S. = Congregatio Pretiosissimi Sacramenti, or Fathers of the Most Precious Blood.

Cranmer, Thomas (1489-1556), prelate, b. Nottinghamshire, England; d. Oxford. While a public examiner in theology at Cambridge, he gained the favor of Henry VIII by a plan to obtain his divorce from Catherine of Aragon. As his counselor in this matter, he was sent on an unsuccessful embassy to Rome. He was consecrated Abp. of Canterbury in 1533. In the presence of witnesses, he declared that the oath of obedience to the pope which he had to take was only a matter of form which would bind him to nothing against the king's interest. He became his tool in obtaining his divorces, and in framing a new ecclesiastical organization based on the theory of royal supremacy. After Henry's death he was a powerful potentate of the kingdom, and signed the will of Edward VI which designed Lady Jane Grey as heir. The nation rallied to Mary, the rightful heir, Cranmer was tried and sentenced. After a dispute upon the Mass with Catholic theologians, 1554, he was sentenced to go to Rome to answer the charge of heresy. He refused and sentence was pronounced. Though he made a recantation of his heretical opinions, a council of the Church decreed that since he had caused a schism he must be executed. Four recantations of his erroneous doctrines followed. He retracted immediately before his execution all that he had denied in his recantations.

Crashaw, Richard (c. 1613-49), poet, b. London; d. Loreto, Italy. The son of a Puritan divine, he was educated at the Charterhouse and at Cambridge. In 1634 he published his first volume of Latin poetry, "Epigrammatum Sacrorum Liber." As an Anglican he refused to subscribe to the Covenant in 1644, and took refuge in Paris, subsequently becoming a Catholic. Through Queen Henrietta Maria he was befriended by Card. Palotta who took him into his household in Rome, 1648-49, and finally secured him a benefice at Loreto. His later poetry, mainly religious, and notable for imagery and unusual metrical skill, appeared in a volume called "Steps to the Temple," published in 1646, and re-edited with additions, posthumously in 1652, as "Carmen Deo Nostro."—C.E.; The Poems of Richard Crashaw, ed. Martin, Oxford, 1927.

Crashaw, Francis Marian (1854-1909), writer to the World, and Limerick, Ireland; d. London. Arrested on account of his faith, he was imprisoned in the Tower of London from 1567 till his death. His jailers unsuccessfully assailed his moral character, and he is said to have died of poisoning.—C.E.

Creation (Lat., creare, to create), the production of something out of nothing, that is, so that prior to the production of the thing nothing whatsoever existed that enters into its makeup. Creation, therefore, differs essentially from all other modes of production. Before the tailor can begin his work, the cloth must exist; likewise, the chemist does not produce his new compounds out of nothing, but out of some preexisting substances. Both faith and reason teach us that the origin of the world was by creation. The All-Wise, Almighty, All-good Creator by the fiat of His doing so. When a new substance like the human soul comes into existence, its origin is due to God's immediate creative act. For not all nature can produce even a new material substance, and much less a new spiritual substance like the soul of each man, nor can any artifice of science produce life in any form, vegetable, animal, much less human. The All-wise, Almighty, All-good Creator by the exercise of His free will commands, and creatures begin to be as and when He decrees, and develop according to His plan and purpose. Thus God the Creator is the Lor'd, the Upholder, and the Ruler of the universe.—Pohle-Preuss, God, the Author of Nature and the Supernatural, St. L., 1923. (c. F. C.)

Creator Alme Siderum, or DEAR MAKER OF THE STARRY SKIES!, hymn for Vespers for Sundays and week-days during Advent; Ambrosian school, 7th century. There are about 30 translations, including both the original and the Roman Breviary texts; the English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Creator. (1) That which has been created, i.e., produced out of nothing, viz., all things outside of God. (2) In philosophy, a contingent being, i.e., one not necessarily determined by reason of its nature to actual existence, but presupposed as a first cause, a necessary being, as its efficient cause, namely God. (C. J. D.)

Credence or CREDENCE-TABLE, small table of wood, marble, or other suitable material placed in the sanctuary of a church, near the wall on the Epistle side, to hold the cruets, acolytes' candles, and other requirements for the celebration of Mass. At solemn Mass the chalice, paten, corporal and veil are placed here from the beginning of Mass until the Offertory. On solemn festivals it is covered with a linen cloth extending to the ground on all sides, on less solemn days the cover is shorter, and on ordinary days it merely covers the requisite part. In the Byzantine Rite the credence is a large table where the first part of the Liturgy is said.—C.E.
Credibility, the motives, reasons, or grounds for believing in a person, doctrine, or institution. The Catholic Church claims to be a Divinely-founded institution speaking, in matters of faith and morals, with the certainty and authority of God. Her credibility rests on the authority of God speaking to her. She holds that her Founder and Guarantor of her inerrancy, Jesus Christ, is God. Christ affirmed that He was God. Mere affirmation, ordinarily, would not confirm such a claim. Christ proceeded to give proof of His assertion by performing miracles, which are God's seal confirming the person or mission in whose behalf they are performed. Jesus proclaimed: “I and the Father are one” (John, 10). The Jews accused Him of blasphemy because He claimed to be God. He replied: “Do you say of him whom the Father hath sanctified and sent into the world: Thou blasphemest; because I said: I am the Son of God? If I do not the works of My Father, believe me not. But if I do, though you will not believe this, believe the works” (John, 10). He then proceeded to do what was possible to Divine power alone. The miracles He wrought were the seal of God on His mission, confirming His claims. He gave sight to the blind and hearing to the deaf, cleansed the leper, made the cripple whole, commanded the elements, and raised the dead to life. He it was Who, in His tenets of Zwingli and Calvin. The “Confessio Tolerantiae,” 1531, is a radical document of two Strasburg preachers, which was soon abandoned. The “First Confession of Basel” or of Mulhausen, drafted by Melanchthon, 1531, and later enlarged, was promulgated by the city of Basel, 1534. It is brief and conciliatory towards Lutherans, and was revised, 1561. The “Second Confession of Basel” or the “Helvetica Prior” was drafted by the city of Basel, 1536. Its tone is Zwinglian. For years it was the creed of Swiss Protestants. It was superseded by the “Helvetic Posterior,” 1566, which was the private confession of Bullinger of Zurich and was formally accepted by most Reformed Churches of Europe. Following the earlier confessions, it is lengthier. Calvin’s following writings are accepted as dogmatic: the “Catechism of Geneva,” 1541; the “Consensus of Zurich,” 1549, expounding Calvin’s views on the sacraments; and the “Consensus of the Pastor of the Church of Geneva,” 1552, proclaiming absolute predestination. “The Gallicana” for French Protestants was drafted by Calvin and revised in various synods from 1552 to that of 1571. Called the “Rochelle Confession,” it was written by Guy de Bray and assistants to prove the accepted belief from Scripture. Revised by various synods of the Netherlands it was finally subscribed by the Synod of Dort, 1619, as the creed of the Reformed Churches. Together with the “Heidelberg Catechism,” it is accepted by the Netherlands’ Reformed Churches and offshoots. The numerous minor Reformed Confessions, such as the Hungarian, Bohemian, Polish, etc., are of a local and transient nature. The Church of England adopted the Thirty-nine Articles (q.v.), which, with various modifications suitable to political conditions, were also adopted by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, formed after American independence, in a general convention, Trenton, N. J., 1801.

The Scottish Confession. With the ascendency of Protestantism in Scotland, a revolutionary Parliament was convened at Edinburgh, 1560, and commissioned John Knox to compile a new creed. Based on the Swiss Confessions. Known as the "Scottish Confession," it was ratified by Parliament and imposed as the religion of Scotland. It is of a Calvinistic nature, and remained until superseded by the Westminster Confession. James VI, 1581, commissioned James Craig to draw up a condemnation of papistry. Known as the "King's Confession," or the "Scottish Confession," it endorses the Confession of 1560 and proceeds with a vituperation of Catholicism. It remained for generations favored by the Scots.

The Westminster Confession. To bring order out of religious chaos, the English Parliament convened an assembly of Protestant divines at Westminster Abbey, 1642. To win over the Scots, Parliament, 1643, ordered the Assembly to frame a suitable Confession of Faith as a common basis of convictions suitable to political conditions, were also adopted by the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America, formed after American independence, in a general convention, Trenton, N. J., 1801.

The Westminster Confession. To bring order out of religious chaos, the English Parliament convened an assembly of Protestant divines at Westminster Abbey, 1642. To win over the Scots, Parliament, 1643, ordered the Assembly to frame a suitable Confession of Faith as a common basis of agreement. Dominated by Calvinists, the Assembly submitted the complete "Westminster Confession" to Parliament, 1646. After revisions it was ratified by Parliament, 1648, and by the Scottish Church, and regarded by Presbyterians generally as authoritative. A Larger and a Shorter Catechism were also compiled and approved. These three documents supplanted the earlier standards in the Reformed Churches of English speech. The Confession is the latest and most elaborate of the Reformed creeds.

Creighton University, Omaha, Neb., founded 1878; conducted by the Jesuits; preparatory school; schools of arts and sciences, commerce, law, medicine, dentistry, pharmacy; summer school; teachers' courses; professors, 237; students, 2906; degrees conferred, 1929, 385.—C.E.

Crescens, Saint, bishop (1st century), disciple of the Apostles. He was the companion of St. Paul during his second Roman captivity, and is mentioned as having left the Apostle to go into Galatia (2 Tim., 4). The earliest tradition represents him as Bp. in Galatia. Later accounts made him Bp. of Crete, Syllabary. The tribe now numbers 15,000, two-thirds on Manitoba reservations. The majority of the Christian portion is Catholic.—C.E.

Crescent (Lat., crescere, to burn), the destruction by fire, of the human body, in opposition to the burying of corpses. It was customary among the semi-barbarous Pre-Canaanites, but neither universal nor constant among the Greeks and Romans. The Jews buried the dead. Hence, the Christians had the example of the Senecas for their own exclusively employed form of disposing of their dead. The Church has never deviated from this time-honored practise. Although no article of faith would be jeopardized by cremation, it was looked upon as an abomination in the sight of God, being a violent and unnatural destruction of the human body, as Boniface VIII declared. It is well known that Freemasons especially promoted cremation, particularly since their meeting at Naples, 1860. The number of crematoria does not increase rapidly, as men instinctively abhor the process. The Church has frequently warned against it, consequently the law of the Church repudiates cremation. It is not lawful for a Catholic to carry out the order of anyone who orders his body to be cremated, unless they retract this order before death, are deprived of ecclesiastical burial (can. 1240). Those who dare to command or compel competent authorities to give Christian burial to such as have their bodies cremated incur excommunication reserved to none.—C.E.; Corpus Iuris Canonici, can. 2339; P.C. Augustinianum.

Crescent (Lat., crescere, to increase), the name given to that part of the moon which can be seen during the first quarter, when the moon is apparently increasing. The representation of the crescent moon was from ancient times the symbol of Byzantium (now Constantinople); after Byzantium was taken by the Turks, A.D. 1453, the crescent became the emblem of Turkish power. The crescent thus came to represent the forces of Mohammedanism as opposed to the Cross, the emblem of Christianity. However, the crescent also appears in Christian art under the figure of Our Lady, according to Apocalypse, 12: "A woman clothed with the sun, the moon under her feet."

(T. H. Q.)
Criticism, biblical, the scientific study of the human elements that have entered into the composition and preservation of the books of the Bible. The literary and historical criticism of the Bible considers these human factors as operating in the composition of the sacred writings, while textual criticism considers them as affecting the preservation of the books. Since textual criticism seeks to determine the true reading of the texts, it supplies the material upon which literary and historical criticism works; hence textual criticism is often called "lower criticism" while literary and historical criticism is called "higher criticism." Textual criticism is made necessary because the original manuscripts of the sacred writers have not been preserved and the earliest copies of them exhibit many different readings. The textual critic gathers and compares these readings in vigorously open-ended searches to decide exactly what the author wrote. Literary and historical criticism tries to discover who the author of the book was, when and where he wrote, what were his sources, methods, and purpose, and what is the historical value of his work.

As a department of purely human science subject to error, criticism is recognized as being subordinate to faith by those who regard the Bible as the inspired word of God and who consequently keep its Divine elements in mind even while studying its human aspects; Catholics, furthermore, believing that the Church is the Divinely-appointed custodian and interpreter of the sacred books and of revelation in general, acknowledge the right of the Church to say the final word on the conclusions reached by criticism.

CLASSES OF CRITICS. The importance of biblical criticism comes chiefly from the judgment it is able to pronounce upon the reliability of the Bible as a record of the past, for these sacred books are at the center of religion, and the estimate placed upon their historical trustworthiness cannot fail to influence men's religious convictions. By establishing the reliability of the books containing Divine revelation criticism may supply the believer with additional reasons for his faith and prepare the unbeliever to accept the truths of revelation; by determining the character and environment of the authors together with their methods and aims, criticism may lead to a better understanding of the books themselves. In general, biblical critics may be divided into two classes, those defending the historical reliability of the Bible and those attacking it. The defenders of the Bible are often called the conservative or traditional critics, while the others are called the radical, negative, or rationalistic critics; sometimes, though incongruously, the radicals are called "higher critics." On the whole the conservatives respect the Divine character of the sacred writings and place a high value on external evidence, while the radicals reject everything supernatural and draw their arguments almost entirely from internal evidence, colored for the most part by their subjective views on philosophy and history. The general results arrived at by the two groups are quite opposed; the conservatives pronounce the sacred writings trustworthy in all their substantial features, but the radicals find in them at best only a nucleus of fact more or less completely hidden under a mass of poetry, legend, myth, fiction, or fraud.

METHOIDS. In his endeavors to restore the original text, the textual critic collects and compares the various readings found in the extant copies of the book, in translations, and in quotations from it by early writers. The evidence secured from these sources is called external; other evidence, called internal, is derived from the book itself by studying the context in which the doubtful readings are found, and the style and character of the author. The earliest Hebrew manuscripts are from the 9th or 10th century, and the Greek from the 4th century. The literary and historical criticism also has at his disposal both external and internal evidence. The external evidence is drawn from written sources outside the sacred writing under discussion; such sources may be later books of the Bible, the writings of ancient ecclesiastical or profane authors, and the information provided by the researches of archaeology and general history. The internal evidence comes from the book itself; it may be linguistic, consisting in the vocabulary, grammar, and style of the writer and furnishing material for literary criticism, or it may be the facts recorded or the thoughts expressed, and these when compared with other historical sources furnish material for historical criticism. The external evidence is as a rule far more reliable than the internal and its results are not to be set aside easily. Internal evidence, if rightly used, is often of great value, but its results are chiefly negative, showing what could not have been the case. When it is not controlled by external evidence, it is apt to lead to conclusions that are merely subjective to the critic. Many critics however rely exclusively on internal evidence and as a consequence they wander off after their own fantasies instead of keeping to facts.

HISTORY. The history of biblical criticism consists chiefly of the attacks made on the Bible by radical critics and of the defense of the traditional position by conservatives. In 1678 Richard Simon, a French priest, arguing from variations in style and from the lack of harmony in parallel passages in the Pentateuch, suggested that these books could not have been the work of Moses alone. Another French Catholic, Jean Astruc, a physician, conjectured (1753) that Moses had made use of two sources, in one of which God was called Elohim while in the other He was called Jehovah (Yahweh). This conjecture was elaborated and extended to the whole Pentateuch by Eichhorn in 1780-83; in 1853 Hupfeld distinguished four documents in the Pentateuch, none of them by Moses. Out of this documentary theory later radical critics, notably Graf and Wellhausen, evolved the Development Hypothesis; this makes the Pentateuch a "patchwork quilt" of many documents representing different periods in the history of Jewish religion from the 9th to the 7th century B.C. and worked into the present form by many successive editors. The radical attack on the N.T. is rooted in the 17th century whose leaders were the English Deists, especially Hobbes (1588-1678), and Spinoza (1632-77). The supernatural elements of the N.T. stood squarely against their principles and so had to be explained away. Reimarus (1694-1768) attributed them to fraud, Paulus (1761-1831) to natural causes, Strauss (1808-74) to mythology gradually and unconsciously built up by popular religious enthusiasm, and Renan (1823-92) to the romantic imaginations of the early Christians. Later critics favor a process of idealization by which the "historical" Christ was idealized till completely replaced by the Christ "of faith."

Radical criticism asserts that the O.T. cannot be accepted as historical. Like other nations, the Jews must have passed by natural processes through polytheism to monothelism; this development is disguised in the Bible where the notion of one God appears from the beginning; hence these books could have been composed only in the latter stages of the religious development when the prophets strove to strengthen their position by attributing recent ideas and practices to a remote past. Though the books contain some real history, they have obscured it by including much of a legendary or poetic character after the imaginative fashion of the Orient. One after another, editors patched together various writings and expanded them. The prophets were chiefly reformers; their predictions were made after the events supposedly foretold or were guesses about the immediate future. The O.T. is the natural product of oriental minds on a par with the religious literatures of other ancient eastern nations. Conservative critics, however, have proved that monotheism was the primitive religion of man; this proof destroys the foundation of the radical theories. It would have been impossible to foist off forgeries on the Jews in the manner described by radicals, especially when the object was to impose the galling yoke of the Old Law. The patchwork theory is untenable; the peculiarities of the biblical narratives are fully accounted for by the oriental tendency to repetition and by minor changes made in the books in their transmission. These books are historically reliable in all matters of importance and their comparative restraint and lofty religious teaching place them immeasurably above other ancient literatures and support the idea of their Divine inspiration.

Radical criticism on the N.T. has labored to reduce Christ to a purely human level. In its extreme forms it has asserted that He never even existed or that He was an impostor or a fanatic; usually however it has strove to extol Him as the perfect man in close communion with God, the preacher of a pure code of morals based on the universal fatherhood of God. The books are not historical; they give the distorted and exaggerated estimate placed upon Christ by His enthusiastic followers long after His death. Conservative critics, however, have established the historical reliability of the N.T. by both external and internal evidence. They have forced most of the radicals to admit that the books were written by Christ's disciples in the comparatively short period assigned them by tradition (before the end of 1st century), and this admission excludes all theories built on the supposition of a gradual idealization of Christ. They have shown that the real weakness of radical criticism is its prejudice against the supernatural by which it has been led into an unscientific rejection of the evidence. Sanely weighed, this evidence exhibits Christ as the God-Man, and it demands to be received at its full value since it possesses all the requisites of valid human testimony.

Croke, Thomas William (1824-1902), Abp. of Cashel, b. Ballyclough, Ireland; d. Cashel. He labored among the Irish peasantry during the years of misery following the great famine. Appointed to the See of Auckland, New Zealand, he took part in the Vatican Council, and in 1874 was transferred to Cashel. There he vigorously supported the Irish national cause, and made several visits to Rome in its defense. He labored to improve the education of his people, and his counsels aided greatly in the establishment of the National University of Ireland.

Crookston, Diocese of, Minnesota, embraces counties of Becker, Beltrami, Clay, Clearwater, Hubbard, Kittson, Lake of Woods, Marshall, Mannonen, Norman, Pennington, Polk, Red Lake, and Roseau; area, 17,210 sq. m.; established, 1910; suffragan of St. Paul. Bishop: Timothy Corbett (1810). Churches, 84; priests, secular, 41; priests, regular, 16; religious women, 262; high schools, 7; academies, 3; primary schools, 10; pupils in parochial schools, 1897; Indian industrial schools, 2; pupils, 288; Catholics, 25,487.

Crookston, an ornamental staff in the shape of a shepherd's crook, conferred on bishops, mitered abbots, and certain other prelates. It usually consists of a metal tube, plated with silver and gold; sometimes of elaborately carved wood, or even of pure gold and silver. The crook symbolizes that the bishop should act as a shepherd to his flock; it may wander from its fold; the pointed lower end, that he should goad on the spiritually indifferent; and the head, that he should support the weak. The bishop always carries the crook in the left hand with the crook turned outward toward the people, in accordance with the above symbolism; other prelates using the crozier hold it with the crook turned inwards. The popes have not used the crozier, because the bishop was the shepherd of the 11th century; this is supposed by some to symbolize the giving of his staff by St. Peter to one of his disciples to raise a dead person to life. As the emblem of a saint, it indicates that he was a bishop or abbot; it is especially associated in art with Sts. Benedict, Bernard, and Giles.—C.E.; MacMahon, Liturgical Catechism, Dub., 1926.

Cross, the most important of Catholic emblems, symbolizing the Church's holy faith and the redemption of mankind, because Jesus Christ, Our Redeemer, died on a cross of wood. In the Catholic Church, the commonest of Catholic emblems, symbolizing God's service; and, when blessed, either as a cross or the crucifix, it becomes a sacramental. Crosses were used among many nations for the execution of criminals; but nevertheless in certain regions they were held in religious honor because of their symbolism. The swastika was emblematic of the revolutions of the sun and consequently of life; and the Egyptian crux ansata (cross with a handle) was a symbol of the reproductive powers of Nature. There are many varieties of crosses: the ordinary form, called the Latin cross; the Greek cross; the St. Andrew's cross; the Tau cross; the Maltese cross; the Celtic cross; the crosier, the crux ansata; the “ragged cross”; the forked cross or croix fourchée; the anchor-cross; the “cross croslet” and the archiepiscopal or patriarchal cross.—C.E.; Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, ed. Smith and Cheetham, Lond., 1880. (J. F. S.)
Cross, Episcopal or Pectoral. (Lat., pector, breast), a golden cross worn on the breast by bishops and abbots, and sometimes by canons. It is worn at Mass and solemn functions, and usually as part of ordinary walking dress, suspended about the neck by a silken cord or gold chain, and is a reminder to the wearer that in imitation of Christ he should bear with love and patience the crosses and afflictions which God sends him in this life. Formerly the term pectoral cross was applied to those crosses which enclosed relics of the True Cross.—C.E., IV, 534.

Cross, Greek, a cross the four arms of which are of equal length. It is found only rarely in early Christian art. Later it was used on pillars and roofs of churches to denote that they were consecrated. It is much used in the decoration of Eastern churches. A Greek cross inscribed in a square formed the ground plan of the church of Saint Sophia, built by the Emperor Justinian in Constantinople, 537, and thereafter of many other Eastern churches. (J. C. T.)

Cross, Processional, a crucifix carried on top of a staff at the head of most liturgical processions, symbolizing that the faithful are followers of Christ. Usually the cross is carried with the figure of Christ upon it facing forward, but if it is the cross of the pope, of his legate, or of an archbishop, it is borne with the figure turned toward him. The cross-bearer, preferably a cleric, leads the procession, unless there is a censer-bearer. In more solemn processions the cross-bearer is a subdeacon, clothed in amice, alb, and tunic; in less solemn, a cleric wearing a cassock and surplice.

Cross, Veneration of the. Honor paid to the True cross, even to relics of the True Cross, is paid not to the lifeless wood, but to Our Lord, who suffered and died thereon for mankind. Kissing the cross, genuflecting before it, or wearing it upon the person are merely marks of respect. There is a special ceremony on Good Friday called Adoration of the Cross (q.v.). (J. C. T.)

Cross-bearer, the cleric or minister who carries the processional cross, or crucifix with long handle.—C.E.

Cross Crosslet, a form of cross in which each arm has a cross-bar, thus making four crosses in one, with their bases joined. (J. F. S.)

Cross in Hand, emblem in Christian art associated with Sts. Helen, John the Baptist, and Bruno as the general symbol of redemption, and in the case of St. John the Baptist as precursor.

Cross in the Mass. The crucifix on the altar recalls Christ's death, which the Mass really, though mystically, renews. During Mass the priest often bows to the cross, expressing adoration, prayer in the name of Christ crucified, and hope in His merits. The latter two meanings, besides a reference to the Trinity, are expressed in frequent signs of the cross which the priest makes over himself and over the oblations during Mass. (J. C. T.)

Crossraguel, monastery of the Cluniac Benedictines founded in Carrick, Scotland, at the beginning of the 13th century by Duncan, Earl of Carrick. It flourished until the Reformation when it was confiscated by the government, 1561, and a layman, Allan Stewart, named commendator by the queen. The Earl of Cassilis claimed the lands for himself, and, as Stewart refused to surrender his rights, the earl had him roasted at a fire and basted with oil until he consented.

Cross Reversed, emblem in Christian art associated with St. Peter, symbolizing the manner of his martyrdom.

Cross Saltire, emblem in Christian art associated with St. Andrew, symbolizing the manner of his martyrdom.

Cross Week, week in which Rogation Days (q.v.) occur.

Crouchmas (corruption of Cross Mass), old English name for the feast of the Finding of the Cross, 3 May.

Crown, the symbol of kingly power. It is used in representations of Christ the King, of Mary as Queen of Heaven, and of saints of royal blood.

Crown of Flowers, emblem in Christian art associated with St. Dorothy and St. Rose of Lima, both being represented also with a crown of roses, St. Dorothy by reason of her miraculously posthumous gift of roses and the resulting conversion. Thus she is sometimes erroneously confused with Sts. Rosa and Rosalia.

Crown of Glory (O.F., corone, crown), a headress resembling the fillets, wreaths, and garlands of the ancient Greeks, emblematic of sovereignty. The Roman emperors are frequently represented as wearing either the diadem, the laurel crown—a simple emblem of glory—or the radiating crown which symbolized the deification of the emperors. In ecclesiastical usage the saints are portrayed with crowns to symbolize their reigning with Christ.

Crown of Thorns, the thorny wreath plaited by the soldiers of Pilate and put on the head of Jesus, when they mocked Him as king of the Jews (Matt., 27; Mark, 15; John, 19). For centuries it was venerated at Jerusalem. Probably during the 11th century it was conveyed to Constantinople. In 1238 Baldwin II are urged to have crucifixes in their homes, and the same blessed symbol is usually attached to rosaries. The tablet at the top of a crucifix is called the "title." It bears the letters I N R I, the initials of Jesus Nazarenus, Rex Iudæorum (Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews), the inscription placed on the cross of Our Lord by order of Pilate. On some crucifixes a skull and bones are shown at the foot, reminding us that Golgotha (Mount Calvary) meant "a skull," probably because it was a burial-place, or from a fanciful legend that in the hole dug for Our Lord's cross was found the skull of Adam. To all who, after a worthy Communion, recite before a crucifix or a picture of the crucified Saviour the prayer beginning "O Good and Most Sweet Jesus," a plenary indulgence is granted, applicable to the souls in Purgatory. Those prevented from visiting the Stations of the Cross can gain the indulgences attached thereto by holding a crucifix especially blessed for this purpose and reciting devoutly 20 Our Fathers, Hail Marys, and Glories. A plenary indulgence can be gained at the hour of death by holding a crucifix with the "Apostolic Indulgence" attached and by using a crucifix to which the indulgence for a good death is attached.—C.E., IV, 517; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1917; Beringer, Les Indulgences, Paris, 1905. (J. F. S.)

Crucefixion, the manner of the shameful death by which Our Saviour redeemed the world. Crucifixion was in use amongst the Romans, Greeks, and other ancient nations. The victim, after a cruel scourging, was either nailed or bound to the cross. The Romans for the most part confined it to slaves and seditious persons. For a Jew to be crucified was considered a disgraceful thing and the person crucified was regarded as one accursed. (E. F. D.)

Crucefixion of Our Lord (IN ART). Among the many masters who have painted the subject are: Alberti; Albertinelli; Baldovinetti; Borgognine; Agostino and Annibale Caracci; A. and L. Della Robbia; Dürer; El Greco; Filippino; Fra Angelico; Francia; Grünewald; Hullein, the Elder; Limosin; Lorenzo; Mantegna; Murillo; Pacchiairotto; Perugino; Pinturicchio; Raphael; Rembrandt; Reni; Rubens; Santa Croce; Solario; Titian; Trübner; Van der Weyden; Van Dyck; Vasari; Velasquez; Veronese.

Crudeles Herodes, Deum, or Why, impiously Herod, vainly fears, hymn for Vespers on the feast of the Epiphany. It was written by Sedulius in the 5th century. There are approximately 25 translations, including the Roman Breviary and the original texts; the English title given is by J. Neale.

-C.E.

_Crut_, small vessel for containing the wine and water necessary for the celebration of Mass; two are always employed. The Roman Missal directs that they be made of glass but other materials, as gold and silver, are sometimes used. In the early Church the wine for the Holy Sacrifice was brought by the faithful in a jar-shaped vessel and was poured by the deacon into the chalice. At the ordination of an acolyte, an empty cruet, symbolical of his duties is presented to him by the bishop.

-Pope Pius recognized his medical and literary work by conferring on him the Knighthood of St. Gregory, 1905.

_Crusade of Rescue_, charitable organization founded in England by Card. Vaughan to provide homes for destitute Catholic children. In 1928 there were 599 children in the society's homes and the crusade was also responsible for 92 others in Canada.

_Crusades_. Since the Middle Ages, the term "Crusade," originating from the cross of cloth worn on the garments of the participants, has been applied to all expeditions of wars undertaken, in fulfillment of a solemn vow, and directed against infidels, i.e., Mohammedans, pagans, heretics, those under ban of excommunication. Not only the expeditions to recover the Holy Land from the Turks, but also other wars such as the attack on the Albigensians in the 13th century, and the battles waged by the Spaniards against the Moors from the 11th to the 16th centuries are included in the meaning of the word. All crusades were announced by preaching, supposed a union of all peoples and sovereigns under the direction of the pope, and were granted indulgences and temporal privileges. The Eastern Crusades, directed against the Mohammedans in the Holy Land and the most important of all these undertakings, began in the 11th century and continued till the end of the 13th, and are described as eight in number, which excludes two later expeditions undertaken in the 14th and 15th centuries. They met with little success principally because the undisputed authority of the pope was shaken by dissensions between the Church and the empire, and unity of command was thus lost, and because avaricious political leaders caused a deviation from the original purpose.

_First Crusade_ (1095-1101). For centuries, thousands of pious Christians had been making pilgrimages to Jerusalem where the Holy Sepulcher, the most movable of relics was preserved. In 1070 the city was captured by the Seljukian Turks, the Greek emperor Diogenes defeated, 1091, and Asia Minor and all Syria became the prey of the heathens. The idea of sending an army to rescue the Holy Sepulcher, first conceived by Pope Gregory VII, was taken up by Urban II who commissioned Peter the Hermit, a recluse of Pityear, to preach the crusade. Urban convoked a council at Clermont-Ferrand, in France, Nov., 1095, and a vast and enthusiastic throng of clergy, knights, and laymen pledged themselves by vow to depart for the Holy Land, crying "God wills it." Several disorganized and undisciplined bands set out, one led by Peter the Hermit and Walter the Penniless, but were scattered or slain before ever reaching Palestine. The regular crusade, however, was well organized, and contained four principal armies, under the command of Godfrey of Bouillon, Hugh of Vermandois, brother of King Philip I of France; Raymond of Saint-Gilles, and Tancred. After enduring many misfortunes, they finally captured and plundered Jerusalem, 15 July, 1099, and Emperor Conrad III of Germany. These crusaders besieged Damascus, 1148, but never reached Edessa.

_Second Crusade_ (1145-47). The fall of the principality of Edessa into the hands of the Moslems, 1144, produced the second expedition which was preached by St. Bernard, Abbot of Clairvaux, and supported by Louis VII of France, his wife Queen Eleanor of Aquitaine, and Emperor Conrad III of Germany. These crusaders besieged Damascus, 1148, but never reached Edessa.

_Third Crusade_ (1188-92). After Saladin's army invaded the Kingdom of Jerusalem and captured the Holy City, 1187, the Third Crusade was organized. Under Emperor Frederick Barharossa, who started, 1189, and Philip Augustus of France and Richard Ceur de Lion of England, who led the following year, the armies finally won St. Jean d'Acre, 1191, and Richard concluded a truce with Saladin, 1192.

_Fourth Crusade_ (1198-1204). Instituted, 1198 by Pope Innocent III and under the leadership of Simon de Montfort, Baldwin of Flanders, and Boniface of Montferrat, it culminated in the conquest of Constantinople, 1204.

_Fifth Crusade_ (1217-19). Also inaugurated by Innocent III, it was brought to an end when Damietta was taken by the Egyptians and a peace was made.

_Sixth Crusade_ (1228-39), Emperor Frederick II, Thibaud of Champagne, and Richard of Cornwall made treaties with the Moslems by which Jerusalem was restored to the Christians, 1229.

_Seventh Crusade_ (1248-52). Proclaimed by Innocent IV. and conducted by St. Louis IX, King of France, this crusade was unsuccessful.

_Eighth Crusade_ (1267-70). Caused by the merciless destruction of the Sultan Bibras and having St. Louis and Charles of Anjou as commanders, it terminated in the death of the former and the fall of the last Christian towns, 1291.

14TH- AND 15TH-CENTURY CRUSADES. Two subsequent attempts were made to rescue the Christian states. The first, 1344, in which Clement VI, the Hospitallers, the King of Cyprus, and the Venetians were prominent, involved numerous leaders and countries, and continued with very little success until 1400. The second, also a fruitless effort, 1443, after the Turkish Murad II had defeated the Greek emperor at Constantinople, 1422, and the Council of Florence had proclaimed a religious union of East and West, 1439, was brought to a close by the fall of Constantinople, 1453.

—C.E.; Calthrop, The Crusades, Lond., 1913.

Crutch, emblem in Christian art associated with Sts. Anthony and Maur, in the case of the former symbolizing feebleness and age.

Crutched Friars (Crossed Friars), English branch of the mendicant order of "Fratres Cruciferi," claiming Eastern origin and flourishing in Italy in the 12th and 13th centuries; suppressed, 1566. They sought permission to settle in England at the synod of Rochester, 1244, and in time established eight or nine houses there. They followed the Augustinian rule and each friar carried in his hand a wooden staff surmounted by a cross; hence their name.—C.E.

Crux Ansata, a ring or handle. It is symbolic of Nature and reproduction, and is shown in the hands of Egyptian deities.

Crypt (Gr., krypté, hidden), a secret recess or vault. The origin of the crypts of the Middle Ages was the custom which prevailed in Rome, after the catacombs became disused, of bringing martyrs into the city and burying them in tombs under churches. In the basilicas these tombs were called confessiones. The terms is sometimes applied to the lower story of a two-storied building. Such a crypt might be fully above ground and lighted by windows.—C.E.

C.S.B. = Congregation of St. Basil, or Basilians.

C.S.C. = Congregatio Sanctissimorum Cordium, or Missionaries of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary.

C.S.S.R. = Congregatio Sanctissimae Redemptoris, or Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, or Redemptorists.

C.S.V. = Clerics of St. Viator, or Viatorians.

Cuba, independent republic occupying the largest island of the West Indies, the Isle of Pines, and small adjacent islands; area, 44,164 sq. m.; pop., 3,470,217. It was discovered by Columbus in 1492, and Christianity was introduced by Spanish missionaries in the 16th century. The diocese of all Cuba was established at Baruca in 1518 by Leo X, and transferred to Santiago de Cuba in 1522. In the beginning of the 19th century Spain began confiscation of Church property which in 1837 extended to Cuba, but in return the state paid large sums for the maintenance of the Church. This support was cut off upon American occupation, and the Church reclaimed its property. The matter was referred to a commission in 1902 and settled by the state's agreement to pay rental on the property. Since the evacuation of Cuba by the Spaniards there is freedom of worship, but the majority of the people are Catholic. Church administration is thus divided:

Cubica, name given to the burial chambers in the Roman Catacombs, hewn out of the tufa rock along the passages, open to the right and left. Horizontal tiers of graves (loculi) rise from walls to ceilings. About 2,000,000 of them have been found. The more imposing graves with arched tombs were called arcosolia.

Cubit, the unit of the Hebrew system of measurement. The common cubit is the distance from the elbow to the end of the middle finger; the sacred cubit is a full yard long. Cubits are mentioned in 3 Kings, 7, and 2 Paralipomenon, 3; in the former the two brass columns in Solomon's Temple are said to be 18 cubits high; in the latter, 25. It is said that the cubit which Noe used when he built the ark equalled six common cubits; this is called a geometrical cubit.

Cujus regio, ejus religio (Lat., Whose rule, his religion), a phrase summing up the religious peace in Germany after the Reformation. It means that a ruler has the right to determine the religion of his territory. His subjects have the alternative of moving to a section where their religion is supreme. The principle trampled on all rights of conscience.

Culdees (Gael., ceile, servant; De, of God). Their origin is unknown, but they first appear as holy men who loved solitude and lived by the labor of their hands in Ireland and Scotland. Gradually they came together in community, and, though never attaining the position of a religious order, they replaced the Columban monasticism. St. Maelruan drew up rules for the Culdees of Tallaght, Ireland, but there is no evidence that this rule was widely accepted. In the 8th century secular priests were added, who lived according to monastic rules. At Clonmacnois, Ireland, in the 11th century the Culdees were laymen and married, while those at Monalmichna and Scattery Island gave way to the regular canons (see Canons and Canoneses, Regular). At Armagh regular canons were introduced into the cathedral church and henceforth took precedence over the Culdees; but six of the latter continued a corporate existence, and these Armagh Culdees long outlived their brethren in Ireland, dying out about 1603. Their estates were given to a new Protestant body of 8 members, called "vicars choral," incorporated in 1627 by Charles I, which body, reduced to 2 members, exists at the Protestant cathedral of Armagh today. In 1633 the last mention is made of the Catholic Culdees in the an-announcement of Abp. Hugh O'Reilly, the Catholic primate, that he had incorporated the College of Culdees in the Catholic Cathedral Chapter of Armagh. There was one English establishment at York. Its date of disappearance is unknown, as is that of the single house at Bardsey, Wales. The 300 years dating from 750 may be called the Culdee period of the Church in Scotland. It was this "Culdean Church" which St. Margaret found when she came from England, 1067, to marry King Malcolm Canmore, and while she lived they retained their position fully. The predominant influence they once had in affairs of Church and State steadily decreased from c. 1332 with the advent of newer religious orders and Norman chivalry. The history of the 13 establishments in Scotland is almost identical with that of the Irish houses; gradually all of them converged on St. Andrews (the primatial see) before the Reformation; they finally disappeared in 1616 when their lands were annexed to the See of St. Andrews.—Ritchie, Reflections on Scottish Church History, Edin., 1928.

Cullen, Paul (1802-78), cardinal, Abp. of Dublin, b. Prospect, Ireland; d. Dublin. After a course at the College of Propaganda, Rome, he was ordained and placed in charge of the printing-press of the Sacred Congregation. From 1832 to 1850 he was rector of the Irish College and during the Roman Revolution saved the College of Propaganda from dissolution by placing it under the protection of the United States, on account of the American students. He was consecrated Abp. of Armagh, 1850, transferred to Dublin, 1852, and in 1867 was made the first Irish cardinal. As Apostolic delegate, he convened at Thurles, 1850, the first Irish national synod and presided at the second national synod, at Maynooth, 1875. An energetic opponent of proselytism, he brought about great changes in the government system of national primary education, and promoted institutions of charity and instruction. He erected the diocesan seminary of Holy Cross, Dublin, but was unable to carry out his scheme for the foundation of a Catholic University under the name of St. Paul. He was a zealous supporter of Ireland's political interests, heedless of his own popularity, and opposed the Young Irelanders and the Fenians. In 1867 he obtained a reprieve for the Fenian leader, Gen. Thomas F. Burke. He took a prominent part in the Vatican Council, and helped to formulate the wording of the definition by the council of papal infallibility as an article of faith.—C.E.

Culross, Cistercian monastery founded, 1217, in Perthshire, Scotland, by Malcolm, Earl of Fife, and colonized from the Abbey of Kinloss. Its remains are now used as a Presbyterian parish church.

Cult, Cultus (Lat., colere, to devote care to a person or thing; hence, to venerate), worship. (1) Liturgy is the actual arrangement and execution of the public Divine worship as authorized by the Church. The Sacred Congregation of Rites, established by Sixtus V, 1587, as the authoritative organ of the Holy See, is the supreme arbiter. (2) Part III of the New Code of Canon Law is entitled, “On Divine Cultus.” After giving the law governing worship in general (can. 1255) and public worship (can. 1290-94), the Code gives special laws for the custody and cult of the Blessed Sacrament (can. 1295-75); for the cult of the saints, sacred images, and relics (can. 1276-89); for sacred furniture (can. 1290-95), and for sacred furniture (can. 1296-1306). (3) In Hagiology, we must distinguish between public and private cult of the saints. Privately, cult (dulia) can be paid to any deceased of whose holiness we are certain. Public cult may be shown only to those Servants of God who by the authority of the Church are numbered among the Saints and Beatified” (can. 1277), by the regular processes of canonization and beatification. Canonized saints may receive public cult everywhere and by any act of dulia; the beatified, however, only such acts as in such places as the Holy See permits (can. 1277, § 2). Saints may be chosen with papal confirmation, as patrons of nations, dioceses, provinces, confraternities, and other places and associations.—P.C. Augustine; MacMahon, Liturgical Catechism, Dub., 1926. (A. T. Z.)

Cultural Evolution, the theory of organic evolution extended to social life, religion, law, morality, marriage, the family, ethics, etc. According to this theory (known as that of unilinear cultural evolution) there is a rigid evolutionary development in all man's higher cultural and institutional life, each step presupposing one of a definitely lower type. Among proponents of the theory are Sir John Lubbock, J. F. McLeenan, Herbert Spencer, E. B. Taylor, J. G. Frazer, E. Crowley, L. H. Morgan, and Charles Letrouneau. Their arguments, though still quoted in many text-books of sociology, are rejected by most later students of ethnology and anthropology. In particular the assumptions that the monogamous family developed through a series of "upward stages" out of a condition of promiscuity, and that the property sense grew out of its antithesis, communism, are now generally abandoned. The Evolutionary School is thus gradually being replaced by the better-informed Historical School.—Lowie, Primitive Society, N. Y., 1920; Muntzsch, Evolution and Culture, St. L., 1923. (A. M.)

Cumanes (Cumans), a Turkish tribe who devastated parts of Rumania and Transylvania in the Middle Ages. In 1089 a victory was gained over them by St. Ladislaus. The Cumans in the 13th century were converted through the labors of the Order of Preachers and a "Diocese of the Cumans" was erected by the Abp. of Gran which included Rumania, Bessarabia, and a portion of Transylvania. This district was ravaged by the Tartars in 1241. The title of the see was retained until 1563.

Cumberland Presbyterian Church, religious denomination first organized, 4 Feb., 1810, in Dickson Co., Tenn., under the leadership of the Rev. Finis Ewing, the Rev. Samuel King, and the Rev. Samuel McAdow. A spiritual revival in the Southwest in the early 19th century resulted in the separation of the Cumberland Country (Kentucky and Tennessee) revivalists from the Presbyterian Church. In doctrine they are essentially Calvinistic, protesting against the doctrine of reprobation, but recognizing the sovereignty of God and the doctrine of the perseverance of the saints. In government they are entirely presbyterian. One periodical is published. Foreign missionary work is carried on in China where in 1910 there were: 4 stations; 4 missionaries with 5 native helpers; 6 organized churches, with about 600 members; and 3 schools with 110 pupils. In 1925 in the United States there were: 750 ministers; 1255 churches; and 63,477 communicants.

Cuncolim, Martyrs of, or, five religious of the Society of Jesus, accompanied by some Christians, who were surrounded by pagan villagers of Cuncolim, India, and put to death, 25 July, 1583. They included Frs. Rudolph Acquaviva, Alphonse Pacheco, Peter Berno, and Anthony Francis, also Francis Arana, lay brother. They were buried at Rachol, in 1597 were removed to the College of St. Paul in Goa, and in 1862 to the cathedral of Old Goa. Beatified, 1893. Feast, in Goa, 26 July.—C.E.

Cunegundis, Blessed, virgin (1224-92), Queen of Poland, d. Sandeck, Poland. She was the daughter of King Bela IV, and niece of St. Elizabeth of Hungary. In 1239 she married Boleslaus II, with whom she lived in voluntary chastity, and after his death entered the Poor Clare convent at Sandeck, which she had founded. Patroness of Poland and Lithuania. Canonized, 1696. Feast, O.F.M., 27 July.—C.E.

Cupola, hemispherical ceiling or bowl-shaped vault, rising over any part of a building; the term should be confined to the under side of the dome. The material and method of construction may vary. When of solid construction the support is bypendenties or by a drum. Modern cupolas are generally of wrought iron filled in with some tile formation.—C.E.

Curate (Lat., cura, care), one who has the care or care of souls; parochial assistant of a rector or parish priest. The title has been popularized by Canon Sheehan's novel, "My New Curate."—C.E.

Curator, a steward or manager; in canon law, a person legally appointed to administer the property of one unable to do so owing to age or physical or mental debility.—C.E.

Cure (Lat., cura, care), the care for the spiritual needs of the faithful; more specifically, the office of a parish priest, or the district and people under his care; hence the French term cures, parish priest.

(1st. b.)

Curé d' Ars. See JOHN BAPTIST MARY VIANNEY, SAINT.

Curfew Bell, the signal for the close of day and the cessation of activity. It was first used in Normandy, 1601, to summon the people to prayer, after which they should not again go abroad. In the absence of a town-bell the curfew and the Ave were probably rung upon the same bell at different hours, and this accounts for the connection in some localities, between the curfew and the recital of the three evening Ave Maria or Hail Mary.—Walsh, Curiosities of Popular Customs, Phila., 1897.

Curia Romana, the Roman (Papal) Court.

Curry, John (d. 1780), physician and historian, b. Dublin; d. there. He took a prominent part in the struggle for the repeal of the Irish Penal Laws, and was one of the founders of the Catholic Committee (1760). He defended his coreligionists against Protestant calumnies in his history of the rebellion of 1641, and in reply to a bitter attack on his work Harris published his well-known review of the civil wars in Ireland.—C.E.

Cursal Mass, a Mass, belonging to a set course (cursae) in which certain parts of the liturgy conform in words, accents or phrases to a prescribed rhythm determined by the feast celebrated.—C.E.; Hope and Atchley, English Liturgical Colors, N. Y., 1918.

Cursing, properly speaking, is an imprecation implied or expressed that evil may come upon us or upon others. It is usually a sin against charity. When directed against a person or a thing, like the weather, it has the guilt of blasphemy. In Scripture, God pronounces a curse on the serpent (Gen., 3); Noah curses Chanaan (Gen., 9); in Leviticus and Deuteronomy there are curses against the lawless. Our Lord cursed the barren fig-tree, the scribes and Pharisees.—C.E.

Cursor (Lat., runner), an ecclesiastical herald or pursuivant in the papal court.—C.E.

Cursor Mundi, kōr-sór mōn-dē (THE RUNNER OF THE WORLD), a Middle-English poem of 25,000 lines, mainly in eight-syllable couplets, written by an unknown cleric in northern England, c. 1300 A.D. It is a sort of religious epic, written in honor of the Blessed Virgin, and purports to give a history of the world as derived from the Old and New Testaments, with the Redemption as the central theme. It is a valuable storehouse of medieval legends. An edition was brought out, 1874-93, by Dr. Richard Morris for Early English Text Society.—C.E.

Custodes hominum psallimus Angelos, or ANGEL-GUARDIANS OF MEN, SPIRITS AND POWERS WE SING, hymn for Vespers on 2 Oct., feast of the Holy Guardian Angels. It is ascribed to Card. Bellarmine (1542-1621). There are five translations. The English title given is by A. McDougall.—C.E.

Custodia (Lat., guard), (1) Temporary receptacle for the Blessed Sacrament after removal from the monstrance and before replacement in the tabernacle. (2) A name for the monstrance, also the transparent pyx in the monstrance. (3) Silver vessel in which the Host is kept in the tabernacle.

Custom, in ecclesiastical legislation, is an unwritten law introduced by the long-continued practice of the people with some consent of the competent ecclesiastical legislator. This consent is usually tacit. Custom may be in conformity with the law, when it is said to be the best interpreter of the law (canon 29); or contrary to the law, which it abrogates; or besides and beyond the law, in which case it introduces a new law. To have the force of law a custom must: (1) be reasonable—a custom reprated in the law would be but a corruption of it and unreasonable, but no custom can derogate from the Divine law, whether positive or natural; (2) it must continue uninterruptedly for at least forty years, unless the law forbids a custom, in which case it prescribes against it only after one hundred years. Like laws, so too customs may be abrogated by later contrary laws or customs; but unless the law expressly states so, it does not abrogate old and immemorable customs; neither do general laws abolish particular customs.—C.E.; Woywod. (v. t. s.) Custodes (Lat., guardian; officer in charge of voting-tablets), formerly, the canon of a cathedral or collegiate church, having, by episcopal approbation, care of the souls connected with his church; an under-sacristan, or treasurer; also, in the Franciscan Order, a superior or official presiding over a number of convents collectively called a custodia. According to the ancient legislation approved by Gregory IX in 1230, only one of the several custodes of a province was present at the general chapter for election of a minister general. This custos custodum is still chosen among the Conventuals. In the Capuchin Order there are custodes general and custodes provincial. Among the Friars Minor are also two kinds of custodes: the custos provincial, authorized to represent his provincial in the general chapter; and the custos regimins, ruler of a small province, or custody, including four to eight convents.—C.E.

Cuthbert, SAINT, bishop and confessor (635-687), b. probably Melrose, Scotland; d. Farne Island. In his youth, he tended his father's sheep, until he entered the monastery at Melrose. He became eminent for holiness and learning, and was appointed guest-master at Ripon, but upon the adoption of Roman usages he and a band of monks upholding the customs of Celtic Christianity returned to Melrose. In 664 the Synod of Whitby decided in favor of Roman usage, and Cuthbert, accepting their decision, was made prior of Lindisfarne. In 685. Resigning his see, he returned to Farne Island, where he died. His shrine at Durham was a center of devotion until the time of the Reformation, when it was placed in a hidden recess of the cathedral of Durham. There is evidence to prove that bones unearthed in the cathedral in 1827 are those of St. Cuthbert. Patron of sailors. Relics in St. Cuthbert's College, Ushaw. Feast, 20 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Cyprian, SAINT, confessor (476-546), Bp. of Toulon, b. Marseilles, France. He was the disciple of St. Cresarius of Arles, by whom he was consecrated, 516. Throughout his episcopacy he opposed the Semi- pelagians. Important among his literary works are his life of Cresarius and a letter to Bp. Maximus of Geneva in which the leading theological questions of the day are discussed. Feast, 3 Oct.—C.E.

Cyprian and Justina, SAINTS, martyrs (304), d. Nicomedia. Justina was a Christian whose virginity was threatened by the magician Cyprian, but the grace of God was so strong in her that she was able to rebuke him. Cyprian became converted to the Faith, entered the priesthood, and was made Bp. of Antioch in Pisidia. Justina became a religious. They suffered in the persecution of Diocletian with Theoctistus, a Christian who had been associated with Cyprian. Relics in Vatican Basilica and St. John Lateran, Rome. Feast of both saints, R. Cal., 26 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Cyprian of Carthage (THASCIIUS CECLIUS CYPRIANUS), SAINT, martyr (190-258), Abp. of Carthage, b. Carthage; d. there. Converted to Christianity late in life, he was ordained priest, 247, and consecrated Bp. of Carthage, 250. During the persecution of Decius, begun 250, Cyprian lived in hiding, directing his flock from his place of refuge, and for this reason he was condemned by his enemies. The question of the reconciliation of lapsed Christians with the Church had given rise to the custom of admitting them to Communion if a martyr requested this favor for them. Cyprian at first opposed the practise, but the sincerity of their contrition caused him to relent; this gave rise to the schism of the deacon Felicissimus; returning to Carthage, 251, Cyprian excommunicated the leaders. He supported Pope Cornelius against the antipope Novatian. Exiled to Cursibus, 257, in the persecution of Valerian, he was brought back to Carthage and beheaded. Cyprian's writings are of great importance; following Tertullian, he was the second great Christian Latin writer. His name occurs in the Comunicantes in the Canon of the Mass. Feast, R. Cal., 18 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Cyprian, s-tí-ré-né, chief city in Libya, Africa, between Carthage and Alexandria, famous for commerce and culture; the modern Tripoli. Cyrenaics are mentioned in Scripture: Simon, who bore Our Lord's Cross (Matt., 27); Lucius, from the church at Antioch (Acts, 13); and others who were present at Pentecost (Acts, 2).

Cyriacus, Largus, Smaragdus, and Companions, Saints, martyrs, d. Rome, 303. Cyriacus, a Roman deacon, ministered to the Christian slaves employed at the baths of Diocletian, suffered excommunication, and was beheaded; with him were martyred Largus, Smaragdus, and twenty others. According to his apocryphal legend, Cyriacus exercised devils from Diocletian's daughter, Artemisia, and from Jobias the daughter of Shapur, King of Persia. He is invoked as one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers (q.v.). Relics at S. Maria in Via Lata, Rome, and at Neuhausen. Feast, R. Cal., 8 Aug.

Cyril and Methodius, Saints, bishops, confessors (827-868 and 826-885), apostles of the Slavs, b. Thessalonica. These two brothers renounced secular honors, entered a monastery on the Bosphorus, and became priests. In 858 they went to Constantinople to teach. There they organized the Church and made numerous converts among the Khazars. In 863 they were sent on a mission to Moravia. Cyril invented an alphabet, called the Cyrillic, the basis of the Russian alphabet, and with the help of Methodius translated the necessary liturgical books and Gospels into Slavonic. They journeyed to Rome, were consecrated, and there Cyril died. Methodius was appointed Abp. of Moravia and Pannonia. He encountered countless difficulties with the German bishops who deposed and imprisoned him for three years. Reinstated by Pope John VIII, he devoted himself to evangelizing the Bohemians and Poles in northern Moravia. He died at Constantinople. Cyril and Methodius are usually represented facing each other, supporting a church between them, recalling that they were the founders of the Slavonic Church, also holding the letters of the Slavonic alphabet. Relics in the church of St. Clement, Rome, and in the church of St. Bruno, Moravia. Feast, R. Cal., 6 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Cyrillic Alphabet, the special alphabet accredited to St. Cyril, Apostle of the Slavs, in order to express the sounds of the Slavonic language as spoken by the Bulgars and Moravians of his time. (qqn.)

Cyril of Alexandria, Saint, confessor, Doctor of the Church (378-444), Bp. of Alexandria, b. Alexandria, Egypt; d. there. A nephew of Theophilus, he incurred the enmity of Orestes, prefect of Egypt, by expelling the Jews and suppressing the Novatians. Cyril's chief fame arises from his defense of Catholic teaching against Nestorius. He presided over the General Council at Ephesus, at which Nestorius was condemned. He left many exegetical treatises, and wrote a book against Julian the Apostate. Emblems: the Blessed Virgin holding in her arms the Child Jesus, and a pen. Relics at Alexandria. Feast, R. Cal., 9 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Cyril of Constantinople, Saint, confessor, Doctor of the Church (1126-1235), General of the Carmelites, b. Constantinople. He served as delegate from emperor to pope, but, having favored the union of the Greek and Latin Churches, was persecuted by the Patriarch of Constantinople and retired to Mount Carmel where he was received into the order. He became renowned as a prophet, and a work on the procession of the Holy Ghost is attributed to him. Feast, O.C.C., 6 March.—C.E.

Cyril of Jerusalem, Saint, confessor, Doctor of the Church (315-86), Bp. of Jerusalem. Ordained c. 345, he was made Bp. of Jerusalem, 350. Deposed and exiled in 358 and 360 by Arian synods, he was again exiled by the Emperor Valens, 367. He assisted at the Council of Constantinople, 381, and formally accepted the full Nicene doctrine. His writings consist of valuable catechetical lectures. Emblems: a purse, book. Feast, 18 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Czechoslovakia, independent republic of central Europe comprising Ruthenia and Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, and Slovakia which had prior to 1918 formed part of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy; area, 54,207 sq. m.; estimated pop., 14,356,600, of whom the majority are Catholics. Christianity was probably introduced as early as the 4th century, but disappeared upon the invasions of the Huns and Avars. Sts. Cyril and Methodius were successful in evangelizing the country in the 8th century, and in 846 fourteen Czech princes were baptized at the court of Louis the German at Ratisbon. In the 15th century, internal dissension was caused by the preaching of John Hus and Jerome of Prague, and the controversy between the Utraquists, who insisted upon Communion under two forms, and the Orthodox became a national issue in the Hussite Wars between Czech and German. By the Treaty of St. Germain (1919) freedom of worship is granted to all religions not opposed to public order or morals. Racial and religious minorities enjoy the same rights and protection from the government as the predominant Catholic Slavs. In January, 1920, a small group of the clergy established a national Czechoslovak Church and its adherents were excommunicated by the pope. Confusion in doctrine and discipline ensued and they sought union with the Serbian Orthodox Church. Czechoslovakia is represented at the Holy See by an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, and a nuncio resides at Prague. Church administration is thus divided:

Dablon, CLAUDE (1618-97), Jesuit missionary, b. Dieppe, France; d. Quebec. He went to Canada, and accompanied Chaumonot to the Onondaga territory. In the following year he entered the Oratorian novitiate in Rome. After his return to England, he was stationed at various Oratories, among them South Kensington, London, where he was elected superior, 1863. He was an able preacher, confessor, and defender of the Church against agnostics. His best-known works are: "Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus"; "The Holy Communion"; and "The German Mystics of the Fourteenth Century."—C.E.

Dacca, Diocese of, India, comprises several districts of Bengal and the native state of Hill Tipperah; established, 1886; suffragan of Calcutta; entrusted to the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. Bishops: Augustine Louage (1886-94), Peter Hurth (1894-1909), Francis Linnewborn (1909-15), and Joseph Légrand (1916). Churches, 14; priests, secular, 1; priests, regular, 25; religious women, 40; schools, 29; institutions, 13; Catholics, 17,730.

Dagon, a Semitic deity adopted by the Philistines as their national god. The upper part of his body was human, the lower half fishlike, the foremost deity of such maritime cities as Azotus, Gaza, Ascalon, and Arvad, where temples were built in his honor.—C.E.

Daily Bread (Gr., artos epiousious, translated in the Vulgate as panem nostrum super-substancialem, in Matt., 6, and panem nostrum quotidianum, in Luke, 11), term used in the fourth petition of the Our Father. Among the Hebrews bread was the principal article of food, thus signifying all the physical necessities of life. Therefore it is for these above all we ask God in this petition. Many of the Fathers of the Church (Sts. Cyprian, Hilary, Ambrose, Jerome, Peter Chrysologus, and Augustine) and some later exegetes think the word "bread" refers to the necessities of our spiritual life, e.g., the word of God, all the aids to salvation, and, especially, the Holy Eucharist. The textual rendition may admit two interpretations of "daily": (1) that which must be taken each day; (2) necessary for life, supersubstantial. Both renditions mean "bread needed daily," and "bread necessary for life." (C. J. D.)

Daily, daily, sing to Mary, hymn written by St. Casimir (1458-84) in Latin and translated by Rev. F. W. Faber in the 19th century.

Dalgairns, JOHN DOBREE (Fr. Bernard; 1818-76), b. Island of Guernsey; d. St. George's Retreat, England. He was an ardent follower of Newman and a staunch supporter of the Catholic movement. Influenced by his work and studies, he became a convert, 1845, and was ordained priest, 1846. The following year he entered the Oratorian novitiate in Rome. After his return to England, he was stationed at various Oratories, among them South Kensington, London, where he was elected superior, 1863. He was an able preacher, confessor, and defender of the Church against agnostics. His best-known works are: "Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus"; "The Holy Communion"; and "The German Mystics of the Fourteenth Century."—C.E.

Dallas, Diocese of, Texas, comprises northeast Texas north of Shelby, Nacogdoches, Cherokee, Anderson, Freestone, Limestone, McLennan, Coryell, Lampasas, and the Colorado River, and east of Coke, Nolan, Fisher, Stonewall, King, Cottle, and Childress counties; area, 52,850 sq. m.; established, 1890; suffragan of New Orleans. Bishops: Thomas F. Brennan (1891-92), Edward J. Dunne (1902-1910), Joseph P. Lynch (1911). Churches, 108; schools, 32; religious women, 354; college, 1; academies, 10; primary schools, 32; pupils in parochial schools, 4,687; institutions, 14; Catholics, 48,933.

Dalmatic, outer liturgical vestment of the deacon, worn at Mass and solemn processions; it is a robe with open short sleeves, and an opening for the head; it reaches to the knees. and is open on the sides as far as the shoulders.—C.E.

Damascus, Syria, one of the oldest cities in the world, and a Latin archiepiscopal titular see; also a metropolitans see for the Catholic and non-Catholic Greeks, for the Catholic Syrians, and a Maronite episcopal see. Mentioned in Genesis and on the pylons of Karnak, with the fall of the Kingdom of Syria it seems to have lost its autonomy, and appears occasionally in the history of the Jews, Greeks, and Romans. When Syria became a Roman province, 65 B.C., Damascus was the chief commercial emporium for the nomad Arabs. In the vicinity occurred St. Paul's conversion. In early times Damascus was a metropolis with eleven suffragan sees, subject to the Patriarchate of Antioch. Besides its Greek prelates, numerous Jacobite bishops are known, and many illustrious names are associated with its history, notably St. John Damascene. After its capture by the Arabs, 635, freedom of worship was allowed to the Christians, and from 660 to 753 it was the capital of the Arabian Empire. In the following centuries its history is one of broils and revolutions, unsuccessful sieges of the Crusaders, and invasions of the Tatars, until the French occupation of 1860, following frightful slaughter of the Christians. Churches, 32; religious orders, 3; priests, 96; monks, 130; Catholics of various rites, 41,000.

Damasus I, Saint, Pope (366-384), b. probably Rome, c. 304; d. there. His election was disputed by the anti-pope Ursicinus but Valentinian I recognized him as the legitimate pontiff. As pope he opposed Arianism, and condemned Apollinarism and Macedonianism. At his suggestion St. Jerome completed the Vulgate. He successfully maintained the primacy of the Apostolic See, and welcomed the edict of Theodosius I, which made Catholicism the religion of the Roman state. His interest in the martyrs led him to restore the catacombs, and to compose many beautiful epitaphs and inscriptions on their tombs. Feast, 11 Dec.—C.E.; Butler.

Damasus II (Poppo), Pope (1048), b. Bavaria; d. Rome. Bp. of Brixen, in Tyrol, he was nominated by Henry III, but reigned only 23 days after his election.—C.E.

Damién, Father (Joseph de Veuster; 1840-88), missionary priest, b. Tremelo, Belgium; d. Molokai, Hawaii. Member of the Fathers of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, he was sent to Hawaii where he became resident priest in the leper reserve at Molokai, and for years was the only person to minister to their spiritual and medical wants. Stricken with disease, 1885, he continued his work to the end. His name was attacked by a Presbyterian minister named Hyde, and brilliantly vindicated by Robert Louis Stevenson in a philippic entitled “Father Damien” (Notre Dame, Ind., 1911).—C.E.

Dancing, Eternal, the state of those condemned to Hell, i.e., demons, and men who die in the state of mortal sin. Damnation, because it is the result of a sentence pronounced on the guilty subject. Eternal, because the sentence of God is irrevocable, for it is specifically pronounced to be eternal in its consequences (Matt., 25), and the condemned are no longer in a state of probation, which with man comes to an end at death, but are in a fixed state which admits of no change (Luke 16).—Koch-Preuss. (A. L. F.)

Dan (Heb., to rule or judge). (1) Son of Jacob and Bala (Gen., 30), ancestor of the tribe of the same name. (2) One of the twelve tribes of Israel; its territory lay southwest of Ephraim. Because it was so restricted the tribe moved to Laish, a city in Palestine on the slope of Mt. Hermon, which they destroyed and rebuilt and called Dan (Judges, 18). (3) The city mentioned above, near the modern Danias. The expression “Dan to Bersabee” was used to designate the whole extent of Palestine.—C.E.

Dance of Death, originally a spectacular play which has been traced to the 14th century when the Black Death and other epidemics had impressed the popular imagination. These plays were given in the churchyard; they were opened by a sermon on death, then a series of figures resembling skeletons would appear. The dancing movement was a later development. Traces of these plays are found in Germany, France, England, and Italy. Pictorial representations were made on walls of cemeteries, etc. In engraving the most famous versions are those of Holbein and Dürer.—C.E.

Dancing (O.H.G., dansen, to draw out, as in forming a chain), expression of feeling by rhythmical movement of the body, mentioned in Scripture as expressing joy on the part of the women of Israel, led by Mary, the sister of Moses (Ex., 15), and of David before the Ark (2 Kings). It has been employed often in religious functions, as in places in Spain today, to add splendor to the ceremonial. It may be a means of relaxation and of physical culture if indulged in with moderation and with the proper company, but often an occasion of vulgarity and even of sinfulness when the rhythm and movements are obviously improper, or when, howsoever correct the movement, the partner is not modest.—C.E.
Dandolo, Enrico (d. 1205), Doge of Venice. He became doge in 1192, and in 1201 when nearly a centenarian he assisted in organizing the Fourth Crusade, became a crusader, took part in the capture of Constantinople, and was offered the imperial crown which he refused. Venice owed the establishment of her power in the Orient to his skill and energy. He died after an expedition against the Bulgarians (1205) and was buried in St. Sophia.—C.E.

Daniel (Heb., God is my Judge), the hero and traditional author of the book of the O.T. which bears his name. At an early age he was taken captive by the army of Nabuchodonosor, and carried away into the Babylonian captivity. He was educated for the service of the court. His wonderful wisdom was made manifest to the king when he not only recalled a forgotten dream, but also explained its mysterious meaning. Thus he rose to a position of honor and confidence. In this lofty station he remained under Nabuchodonosor’s successors. In the times of King Baltasar he deciphered the “handwriting on the wall,” and was cast into the lion’s den for the first time. Under the ruler called Darius the Mede in our present text, he received the vision of “the seventy weeks,” announcing the death of the Messiah. In the third year of Cyrus he foretold the course of earthly empires till the end of time. When the 70 years of captivity were over and many of the Jews returned to their fatherland, he remained in the land of exile. The book comprises 14 chapters, among which three languages are represented. A preliminary section (1 to 2, 4) in Hebrew, tells of Daniel’s capture and education. The first part of his prophecies (2, 5, to 7), written in Aramaic, presents those which regard the world power in relation to God’s people; particularly the dream of the great statue and the vision of the four beasts. In this part Daniel also offers the credentials for his ministry, which prove to his contemporaries that God was with him and that his prophecies about later periods were equally reliable. The second part of his prophecies (7 to 12), written in Hebrew, describes the various fortunes of God’s people in relation to the world power. Finally the book is concluded by the so-called deuterocanonical parts (12 to 14), which are wanting in the Hebrew Bible, but are endorsed by the tradition represented in the Septuagint Greek version. Here we find the narratives of the chaste Susanna, the omnivorous idol Bel, the dragon destroyed by Daniel, and a second peril in the lion’s den. Daniel is the man of desires and the prophet of hope. There is little direct exhortation to the people, but much that is descriptive of God’s rule over human empires. In depicting the future he stresses the spaces of time that lie between events. Here prophecy is so precise as to be taken for history. Its place among canonical books is guaranteed by Jewish tradition. Our Lord quotes from it the words: “When therefore you shall see the abomination of desolation which was spoken of by Daniel the prophet” (Matt., 24; Dan., 9). The Church has embodied the full 14 chapters in her list of inspired books. They are used in the Breviary during the whole week beginning with the third Sunday of November until the following Saturday inclusively; in the Missal on the Saturday of ember week in September, on the twentieth Sunday after Pentecost, and on the feasts of many saints.—C.E.; Pope; Seisenberger, tr. Buchanan, Practical Handbook for the Study of the Bible, N.Y., 1911. (J.E.)

Daniel and Companions, Saints, martyrs (1297), d. Ceuta, Morocco. Daniel was the Franciscan provincial of Calabria. He went to preach the Gospel to the infidels of Morocco, accompanied by the monks Agnellus, Samuel, Donulus, Leo, Hugolinus, and Nicholas. At Ceuta they were imprisoned for propagating the Faith, and beheaded. Canonized, 1516. Feast, O.P.M., 13 Oct.—C.E.

Dante Alighieri (1265-1321), poet, b. Florence; d. Ravenna. Elected to the chief magistracy of the republic of Venice by the White or constitutional party, he was permanently exiled in 1302 when the Blacks were restored to power. He had already written his first book, the “Vita Nuova” or “New Life,” a history of his spiritual love for Beatrice, wife of Simone de’ Bardi. In 1309, in anticipation of the visit to Italy of Emperor Henry VII, he wrote his famous treatise on the monastic orders and in 1317, having settled at Ravenna, completed his masterpiece, the “Divina Commedia,” an allegory of human life in the form of a vision of the world beyond the grave, Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise, written with the avowed object of converting a corrupt society. It is the last book of the Middle Ages, epitomizes the knowledge and attainments of the preceding centuries, and gives a picture of Catholicism in 13th-century Italy.—C.E.; Slattery, Dante, N.Y., 1920.

Danzig, free city north of Poland and west of Prussia on the Gulf of Danzig; area, 754 sq. m.; pop., 384,000. Formerly the capital of West Prussia, it was combined with a portion of the surrounding country and declared a free state by the Treaty of Versailles, 1919, and placed under the protection of the League of Nations. In 1922 parts of the dioceses of Chełmno (Culn) in Poland and Ermland in Prussia were formed into the Administration Apostolic of Danzig, raised to a diocese in 1925, with 40 churches, 74 priests, 965 sisters, and 140,797 Catholics.

Darboy, Georges (1813-71), Abp. of Paris, ecclesiastical writer, b. Foyl-Billot, France; d. Paris. He was made Bp. of Nancy, 1859, and transferred to Paris, 1863. His Gallicanism made him unduly subservient to the emperor. He opposed the definition of the Papal Infallibility, and left the Vatican Council before the final vote, but several months later subscribed to the definition, and proved a truepastor during the siege of Paris. Seized by the Communists and shot at Roquette, he died blessing his executors.—C.E.

Dare, VICTORIAN SAINT (5th or 6th century). Her history is obscured by legend. She is said to have been the sister or relative of St. Patrick, and mother of Sts. Mel, Sechnall, Rioc, and other Irish saints. Her miracles and prophecies are renowned. Patroness of Valencia island. Feast, 22 March.—C.E.

Dar-es-Salaam, VICARIATE APOLLOSTIC OF, Tanganyika Territory, established as vicariate Apostolic of Southern Zanzibar, 1902; name changed to Dar-es-Salaam, 1906; entrusted to the Capuchins of Switzerland. Cassianus Spies was the first vicar Apostolic, an office now filled by Mgr. Zeigler; residence at Dar-es-Salaam. Catholics, 6028.

Dark Ages, name once commonly but erroneously applied to the Middle Ages, chiefly by writers and others who sought to create the impression that during those ages, from about 500 to 1500, the Ages of Faith, as they were also called, there was little or no progress in any field of life, government, social organization, craftsmanship, art, learning, or even in religion. As Maitland suggests in his “Dark Ages,” they were dark chiefly because those who spoke of them as such were in the dark about them. As more becomes known about this period, the phrase “Dark Ages” is no longer applied to it. Recently the term dark has been applied only to the first half of this period, as scholars who are not Catholics are establishing facts to prove that the 13th, 12th, and even the 11th centuries were remarkable for enlightenment.

Darwinism, a theory of transformism or evolution, based on natural selection and the survival of the fittest in the struggle for existence; the theory that the universe has been evolved by the chance survival of the fittest; popularly, but inaccurately, the theory of evolution in general.

Darwinism and Catholic Orthodoxy, title of a book by Dorlodot, of Louvain, in which he attempts to prove that several of the Fathers of the Church favored the theory of evolution. He quotes only a few and the quotations are not convincing. The author died before finishing the second volume and was to contain his own views. A refutation of the volume, published so far as St. Augustine’s views are concerned, was written by Henry Woods, S.J., entitled: “Seminal Reasons.” (Ed.)

Daughters of Divine Charity, a religious congregation founded in Vienna, 1862, by Franziska Lechner. The Sisters provide shelter, care, and means of obtaining a position for women who are trying to find employment; they also care for servants no longer able to work, and conduct schools. The congregation has approximately 20 houses, including residences for women and schools, in Austria, Hungary, Germany, Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, Poland, England, the United States, and South America. The mother-house is in Vienna; religious total about 2000.—C.E. Suppl., 262.

Daughters of Jesus, congregation originally founded, 1809, at Verona, Italy, by Pietro Leonardi, and joined by several French congregations in 1820, becoming dependent on the foundation of Kermaria, France. The work of the congregation is the education of youth and the care of the sick poor and orphans. A provincial house for France was established at Three Rivers, 1893. The congregation has over 200 houses, including schools, hospitals, and orphanages, in Canada, the United States, England, France, and elsewhere. The mother-house is still at Kermaria; religious total over 500.—C.E., VIII, 374.

Daughters of the Cross (BELGIAN), a congregation founded at Liège, 1833, by Jeanne Blase (Mother Marie-Thérèse), the cause of whose beatification has been introduced, and Canon Habets, with rules based on those of St. Ignatius. The life of the sisters is both contemplative and active; they undertake all manner of charitable works, especially the education of poor girls. The congregation conducts about 140 establishments, including schools, orphanages, hospitals, homes, and seminaries, in Belgium and the Belgian Congo, England, Ireland, and India. The mother-house is at Liège; the total number of religious is, approximately, 1610.—C.E., XVI, 30; C.E., Suppl., 239.

Daughters of the Cross (FRENCH), congregation of women founded at Roy, Picardy, France, 1625, by Fr. Pierre Guérin, Françoise Unulet, and Marie Fannier, for the Christian education of girls. Madame Marie l’Huillier de Villeneuve established a house for the community near Paris, 1651, where she introduced the obligation of taking vows, hitherto unknown in the society. Opposition to this innovation resulted in the separation of religious and secular branches of the congregation during the Revolution and reorganization, 1837, the institute spread widely. The mother-house is at La Louvière, Belgium. The congregation is dioecesan. It has, approximately, 15 houses in Belgium, France, India, England, and the United States, where they are established in the Diocese of Alexandria, La., numbering 79 religious, and have 6 schools, including St. Vincent’s College and Academy, at Shreveport.—C.E., XVI, 31, Suppl., 239.

Daughters of the Cross and Passion (PASPIONIST NUNS), founded at Corneto in 1771 by St. Paul of the Cross as part of his order of Passionists, with Faustina Costantini as co-foundress. The order is contemplative and strictly enclosed. Their activities, aside from duties of piety, consist of domestic work, needlework, and the making of vestments. The order has 10 houses in Italy, Spain, France, Belgium, and the United States. The provincial mother-house and novitiate for the United States is at Carrick, near Pittsburgh, Pa., where there are 28 religious.—C.E., XI, 524.

Daughters of Wisdom (LES FILLES DE LA SAGESSE), founded by Bl. Louis Marie Grignon de Montfort, 1703, by banding together a number of poor and afflicted girls at the hospital of Poitiers where the founder was temporary chaplain. Since the first establishment at La Rochelle, 1713, the congregation has grown to over 420 houses in France, Belgium, Holland, Denmark, Italy, South Africa, England, Canada, the United States, Haiti, and Colombia; the mother-house is at St.-Laurent-sur-Sèvre, La Vendée, France; the total number of religious is 4912. Since 1715 it has been both hospitaller and teaching, embracing all charitable works in hospitals, prisons, orphanages, asylums, schools, kindergartens, training schools, day-nurseries, institutions for the deaf, dumb, and blind, poor-houses, and homes.—C.E., XV, 668.

Davenport, Diocese of, Iowa, comprises that part of the State of Iowa bounded e. by the Mississippi River, w. by the western boundaries of the counties of Jasper, Marion, Monroe, and Appanoose, s. by the State of Missouri, n. by the southern boundary of the counties of Jasper, Poweshiek, Iowa, Johnson, Cedar, and Clinton; area, 11,438 sq. m.; erected, 1881; suffragan of Dubuque.

Bishops: John McMullen (1881-83), Henry Cosgrove (1884-1906), James Davis (1904-26), Henry P. Rohlman (1927). Churches, 123; priests, secular, 148; priests, regular, 9; religious women, 730; colleges, 4; primary schools, 51; pupils in parochial schools, 8679; institutions, 15; Catholics, 54,105.

David (c. 1085-15 B.C.), prophet and king of Israel, b. Bethlehem; d. Jerusalem. The son of Jesse, and a shepherd-boy, he was anointed by the prophet Samuel in place of Saul, whom God had rejected. When Saul was ill, David was brought to soothe him by playing on his harp; in reward he was made Saul's armor-bearer. During the Philistine war, David, relying on God, slew the giant Goliath and won the friendship of Jonathan, son of Saul. He then received a permanent position at court, and married Michol, daughter of Saul, but Saul's jealousy of his popularity forced him into exile. He married Abigail as his second wife. When Saul and Jonathan fell at Gilboa, David, by God's command, went up to Hebron to claim the throne. He was supported by Juda, but the rest of Israel, led by Abner, was faithful to Isobeth, son of Saul. At Hebron six sons were born to him, including Amnon, Absalom, and Adonias. At Isobeth's death David was acceded by all Israel. By his successful wars David made Israel an independent state, established his capital in Jerusalem, and transported thither the Ark of the Covenant. During the Ammonite war David sinned with Bethsabee, wife of Urias, and married her after indirectly murdering Urias. The intensity of his contrition for this crime brought him God's pardon and made him a model for penitents. His pardon was followed, however, by heavy crosses; Amnon's incest and Absalom's fratricide, rebellion, and death caused him shame and sorrow. The last days of his thirty-three years' reign in Jerusalem were disturbed by the ambition of Adonias to prevent the succession of Solomon, his son by Bethsabee. He was buried on Mt. Sion. His prophecies embodied in the Psalms are literally Messianic, and he himself as a great theocratic king typifies the Messias. Feast, 29 Dec.—C.E.

David (DEWID, DEGUI, or DEWI), Saint, confessor (c. 544-601), Abp. of Menevia, b. probably Cardiganshire, Wales; d. Menevia, Pembroke-shire. Little historical information exists concerning David, although there are many elaborate legends about him. He was present at the synods of Brevi, 519, and Lucus Victoriae, 569. Welshmen wear leeks on St. David's Day, to commemorate a great victory over the Saxons, when, by David's advice, they wore leeks in their headgear to distinguish themselves from the enemy. Patron of Wales. He is usually represented standing on a hill, with a dove on his shoulder. Canonized, 1120. Relics at Glastonbury. Feast, 1 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Day Hours, English for Horae Diurnae (daily hours), the times set for various parts of the Divine office, except the morning hours or Matins. These hours are explained under their names: Prime, first; Terce, third; Sext, sixth; None, ninth; Vespers, evening; and Compline, the completion. Under the title: "The Day Hours of the Church" the Benedictine Nuns of Stanbrook Abbey, England, have published the Latin text, with an English translation, of the psalms, hymns, antiphons, and prayers that make up these hours, together with the proper prayers for each feast and saint's day of the church year.

Day of Indulgences, a certain day designated by the Church on which an indulgence may be gained from the noon of the preceding day to the midnight of the specified day. For instance, the totoque quoties indulgence granted for All Souls' Day may be gained from noon, 1 Nov., to midnight, 2 Nov. (M. F.).

Days in Genesis. See Hexaemeron.

Days of Devotion, days which were formerly holydays of obligation and are now kept with some solemnity. In Great Britain they are: Easter Monday and Tuesday, Whit Monday and Tuesday, Purification of Blessed Virgin Mary (2 Feb.), St. Matthias (24 Feb.), St. Gregory the Great (15 March), St. Joseph (19 March), Annunciation (25 March), St. George (26 April), SS. Philip and James (1 May), Finding of the Cross (3 May), St. Augustine (27 May), Nativity of St. John the Baptist (24 June), St. James, Apostle (25 July), St. Anne (26 July), St. Lawrence (10 Aug.), St. Bartholomew (24 Aug.), Nativity of the Blessed Virgin Mary (8 Sept.), St. Matthew (21 Sept.), St. Michael, Archangel (29 Sept.), SS. Simon and Jude (28 Oct.), St. Andrew, Apostle (30 Nov.), Immaculate Conception (8 Dec.), St. Thomas, Apostle (21 Dec.), St. Stephen (26 Dec.), St. John the Apostle (27 Dec.), Holy Innocents (28 Dec.), St. Thomas of Canterbury (29 Dec.), St. Sil-veter (31 Dec.). They are the same in Ireland, excepting that the Immaculate Conception is a holy-day of obligation.

Day-Star (Heb., Hebzel; Lat., Lucifer), the planet Venus, star which precedes or accompanies the rising of the sun. It is applied to the King of Babylon (Is., 14), to the glory of Heaven by reason of its excellency (Apoc., 2), and finally to Our Lord Himself (2 Peter, 1; Apoc., 22).

Dayton, University of, Dayton, O., founded 1850; conducted by the Society of Mary; preparatory school; colleges of arts, letters, and sciences; commerce and finance; engineering; law; education; evening and Saturday courses; summer school; professional schools; colleges of arts, letters, and sciences; commerce and finance; engineering; law; education; nationalities.

Dean, an ecclesiastical official; the head of a cathedral or collegiate chapter; a vicar-forane or episcopal assistant; the representative officer of a faculty in modern Catholic universities; in English universities, the official in charge of college discipline. Dean of Peculiars is one in charge of a church or district, exempt from the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese in which it is situated.

Death is a cessation of bodily life, caused by the separation of the soul from the body (bodily or physical death). Death is, in general, universal (Heb., 9; Rom., 5). As to the debt (debitum mortis) it extends to all defiled by sin, therefore to all except the God-man and the Immaculate Virgin; as to the act (factum mortis), it certainly extends to all except those who will be living at the second coming of Christ. Concerning these latter, theologians are not agreed (1 Cor., 15; 1 Thess., 4). Death is a punishment for sin. “By one man sin entered into this world, and by sin death” (Rom., 5; cf. Trent, sess. 5, can. 2), and though the character of punishment is wiped away in Baptism (Trent, sess. 5), death itself remains as an effect of sin (penalitatis). Death marks the end of time for merit and demerit (Luke, 23; Council of Florence, “Decretum pro mortalitatis”). Besides bodily death there is spiritual death, i.e., a privation of sanctifying grace (Trent, sess. 5, can. 2; and eternal death, i.e., damnation, called also “second death” (Apoc., 2; 20; 21). Christ by the atonement took away the second death, eternal damnation, but not physical death.

Dee Backer, Augustin (1809-73), bibliographer, b. Antwerp, Belgium; d. Liège. He was educated at the Jesuit colleges of Saint-Nicholas, Beauregard, Saint-Acheul, and Fribourg, and entered the Society of Jesus, 1835. His great work was a compilation of the writings of the members of the society, published in 7 volumes, 1853-61.—C.E., II, 190.

The Two (Luke, 7), parable, spoken by Our Lord in the house of Simon the Pharisee, when the latter was wondering that Jesus should allow the woman to bathe His feet with her tears and wipe them with her hair. Answering the thought of the Pharisee, Jesus proposes the parable of the two debtors, who owed to a money lender, the one 500 denarii (approximately $100), the other 50, but to whom the creditor graciously remits the amount; the former, receiving a greater favor, is naturally bound to greater gratitude. Our Lord makes the application in the following verses, in which He contrasts the cold attitude of Simon, and the conduct of the sinner who has so generously made up for the lack of courtesy of His host. Our Lord then declares that the love shown so clearly by the woman is the reason why her sins are forgiven her. Thus what the woman has done to Him has been done to God, and Jesus is the Divine creditor who may remit the sinner's debt, as indeed the woman, whose faith Jesus praises, had believed that Jesus could do.—Fonck, Parables of the Gospels, N. Y., 1914. (E. A. A.)

Decalogue (Gr., deka, ten; logos, word), an extra-biblical term which is a literal translation of the phrase "ten words" (Exod., 34); it designates the Ten Commandments which God imposed on His people in the desert of Sinai. The Decalogue, which is to be found in two sections (Exod., 20; Deut., 5), is invested with full Divine authority, so that obedience to it is the test of holiness for the Chosen People and the individual. Christ resolves the Decalogue into two great commandments, love of God and of one's neighbor (Matt., 22).—C.E.; Gigot, N. Y. (A. N.)

Decius, Caius Messius Quintus Trajanus Decius, Roman emperor (249-251), b. near Sirmium, Pannonia. He was the first of the great soldiers emperors from the Danubian provinces. His main efforts as ruler were devoted to repelling the Goths from the Balkans, but he was defeated in the marshes of the Dubrudscha where he lost his life. He hoped to solve the pressing internal problems by reviving paganism. This led to his attempting to crush Christianity by a more violent persecution than the Church had yet experienced.

Decora lux aeternitatis, auream, or The Beauteous Light of God's Eternal Majesty, hymn for Vespers on 29 June, feast of Sts. Peter and Paul. It is attributed to Elpis, Bohemius' wife (d. c. 493). Including the original and the Roman Breviary texts, there are at least 12 translations; the English title given is by Mgr. C. Hall.—Britt.

Decorations, Pontifical, honors conferred by the papal court on laymen who are of irreproachable character and who have promoted the welfare of society, the Church, and the Holy See. The titles, which the pope awards as temporal sovereign, embrace those of prince to baron inclusive. The ordinary title is that of count which is either personal or hereditary by right of primogeniture in the male line. The decorations are bestowed either by motu proprio and forwarded by the secretary of state, or upon petition, when they are expedited through the chancery. The proper method of procuring a decoration is by a petition from the bishop of the diocese of the person to be honored. The petition must contain a brief history of the applicant's life, stressing his distinguished labors in science, literature, arts, controversy, or other religious writings, or his generous and self-sacrificing gifts or endowments to society, the Church, or its head, which are deemed worthy of papal recognition and reward. The petition must be endorsed by the Ordinary of the appoin-ee; the endorsement of another than the diocesan bishop will not suffice. The petition on being sent to the Congregation of Rites is examined by the cardinal chancellor of orders, who registers it and the bishop's endorsement, and seeks information from other sources about the applicant's character. The papal orders of knighthood according to their importance are: (1) Supreme Order of Christ; (2) Order of Pius IX; (3) Order of St. Gregory the Great; (4) Order of St. Sylvester; (5) Order of the Golden Militia or Golden Spur; (6) Order of the Holy Sepulcher. Other decorations include the medals: Pro Ecclesia et Pontifice; Benemerenti; and the latter was wondering that Jesus should allow the woman to bathe His feet with her tears and wipe them with her hair. Decorations of Roman Pontiffs and Congregations. These are largely legislative enactments, the former found in papal Constitutions, Apostolic letters, Apostolic epistles, and Motu Proprios; the latter in the decrees proper of the respective Congregations. The word decree is also used by the Church today in a non-legislative sense. It is to be found in two sections (Exod., 20; Deut., 5), is invested with full Divine authority, so that obedience to it is the test of holiness for the Chosen People and the individual. Decisively, de-kis-il, adv., in a decisive manner.

Decisiveness, de-kis-i-ven-sis, n., that which is decisively done or decided.
frain from using the term decree when answering a query and designate the responses given either as dubia or declaratoriation.—C.E., IV, 670; P.C. Augustine.

Decretal, a letter containing an authoritative decision; a decision on a point of discipline; more strictly, a rescript or reply of the pope when he has been appealed to on a matter of discipline; certain collections of documents including pontifical decretals, e.g., “Liber Sextus Decretalium,” compiled under Boniface VIII. See Decretals, False.—C.E., IV, 670; P.C. Augustine.

Decretals, False, a collection of papal letters and canons of councils, published in Gaul by an unknown person, Isidore Mercator, or Pecator, about the middle of the 9th century. The first part contains 60 letters attributed to early popes; 38 of them are forged. The second part is made up of canons of Councils and the third gives letters of Roman pontiffs, 30 of which are forgeries. The Decretals were for a long time received as genuine. In the 17th century they were clearly proved false by Blondel and more completely in the 18th century by the brothers Balderini. The object of the writer was not to increase the power of the popes, but rather the authority and independence of bishops against civil rulers. The authority of the Roman pontiffs was long recognized before the 9th century and is established by facts and arguments independent of this collection of Isidore.—C.E., V, 773. (r. j. l.)

Dedication, Feast of the, instituted by Judas Machabaeus (64 B.C.) to be celebrated yearly in all synagogues the 25th day of the month Casleu and during its octave, in commemoration of the purification of the Temple of Jerusalem, which had been polluted by Antiochus Epiphanes on that day three years previously (1 Mac., 4). It was observed with great joy, without mourning or fasting. It was on this feast that the Jews threatened to stone Our Lord (John, 10).—C.E.

Deeds, actions, as distinct from thoughts, words, or intentions. We speak of a sin of thought, a sin of intention, and a sin of deed, or actual outward commission. Evil deeds are distinct from evil words or thoughts. Christ condemned not only bad outward actions, but also the will or intention to do such deeds. (M. j. S.)

Deer (DHEE), ancient abbey, Aberdeen, Scotland. According to legend it was founded during the last quarter of the 6th century by monks from Iona, under St. Columba and St. Drostan. In 1219 the Earl of Buchan divided the abbey lands between a parochial church and New Deer, a newly founded Cistercian monastery which remained in existence until the Reformation. One of the oldest monuments of Scottish literature is the Book of Deer, now in the Cambridge University Library. It is an illuminated Latin and Gaelic manuscript of the 9th century and later, containing the Apostles’ Creed, parts of the Gospels and of a Scottish office for Communion of the sick, and notes regarding the abbey.—C.E.

Defender of the Faith, a title conferred on Henry VIII by Pope Leo X for his book “Assertio Septem Sacramentorum,” which was a defense of the sacraments and the Sacrifice of the Mass against Luther. The kings of England still retain it on their coinage and among their official titles. (m. p. h.)

Defender of the Tie (Lat., Defensor Vinculi), member of a diocesan matrimonial court whose duty is to uphold the validity of a disputed marriage until sufficient evidence has been adduced to show its nullity. If he is dissatisfied with the ruling of the court, he has the right of appeal to a higher tribunal.—C.E.

Defilement (Lat., de, down; A.-S., ful, foul), a term which connotes the condition of uncleanness. It covers a variety of meanings, such as, to render legally unclean by contact with unclean things and by eating forbidden foods; to profane holy beings and objects; to pollut sexually through adultery; to taint with sin; to soil physically as with filth, etc. (J. F. S.)

Definition, Papal (Lat., definire, to enclose within limits), a solemn and irrevocable decision emanating from the supreme teaching authority of the Church (the pope by his own authority or as presiding over an Ecumenical Council), concerning a matter of faith and morals, and made binding on all the faithful. The object of a definition may be either a doctrine revealed by God, and contained in the deposit of faith, which the Church has the duty to guard and propose authoritatively; or it may be a truth not so revealed but intimately bound up with revealed doctrine. Such definitions demand the unconditional adherence of every member of the Church.—C.E., IV, 675. (A. C. K.)

Definitors (in Religious Orders), generally speaking, the governing council of an order. Definitors, strictly so-called, differ from mere consultors in having a decisive vote in congregation equally with the general or provincial superior.—C.E.

Degradation (Lat., de, from; gradus, rank: deprivation, abasement, reduction), a vindictive canonical punishment by which a cleric is reduced to the lay state. Up to the 12th century, degradation differed little from deposition. The effects of degradation are: deposition; privation of clerical dress; and reduction to the lay state. It cannot deprive one of the character received in Holy Orders; nor does it dispense from clerical obligations, such as observance of celibacy and recitation of the Breviary. Degradation is permanent, but may be remitted by a superior, after complete penance. It can only be inflicted for crimes expressed in the law and on those, who already deprived and deprived of clerical dress, continue to give scandal for a year. It is verbal, if inflicted by judicial sentence; real, if accompanied by formalities prescribed in the Roman Pontifical. Lastly, degradation is always a penalty ferendus sententia. See Sentence.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (F. T. R.)
Deiculus (Dichuil), Saint (c. 530-625), b. Ireland; d. Lure, France. He accompanied St. Columbanus on his missionary journey to Gaul, and later in life founded an abbey under the Rule of Columbanus at Lure where his memory is still revered. Feast, 18 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Del Genetrix (Lat., Mother of God). See Deipara.

Deipara (Lat., Mother of God) or TheoZoros (Gr., bearing God), title of Our Lady officially sanctioned at the Council of Ephesus (431) upon the condemnation of the Nestorian heresy. (St. M. va.)

Deism (Lat., Deus, God), a form of natural religion; a philosophico-religious system in which revelation is replaced by truths deduced by an unaided reason; a belief in the existence of God together with a denial of Divine providence, revelation, and Christianity.—C.E.

Deity (Lat., deus, God), the Divine nature, an attribute of the Deity. (K. B.)

Delacroix, de-là-krwâ, Ferdinand Victor Eugène (1798-1863), painter, b. Charenton-Saint-Maurice, near Paris; d. Paris. He was the founder, with Jean Louis Géricault, of the French Romantic school. His reputation was made with his “Bark of Dante,” 1822, and increased by his “Massacre of Scio” painted two years later, now both in the Louvre. “Christ in the Garden” (1827), in the church of St. Paul, in Paris, shows his power in depicting suffering. His greatest painting is “The Death of the Bishop of Liége” (1831), in the Louvre. He is also well known as a painter of oriental subjects. He decorated the library of the Luxembourg with scenes from the “Tale of the Conqueror,” and was engaged in decorating the church of St. Sulpice when he died.—C.E.

Delaroche, de-là-rash, Hippolyte, known as Paul Delaroche, 1797-1856, painter, b. Paris; d. there. The pupil of Baron Antoine Gros, he leaned rather to the Romantic than the Classic school. He is chiefly known as a popular historical painter. His “Death of Queen Elizabeth” and “Children of Edward IV in the Tower” are in the Louvre, and the “Death of the Duke of Guise” is in the Chantilly Museum. After the death of his wife, a daughter of Horace Vernet, he produced religious paintings of marked sincerity in feeling. These include “The Christian Martyr” of the Louvre, and a “Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane.” His decoration for the hemicycle of the Ecole des Beaux-Arts included portraits of more than seventy artists.—C.E.

De La Salle College, Manila, Philippine Islands; established, 1911; conducted by the Christian Brothers; professors, 16; pupils, 735.

DeLisle, Amioure Lisle March Philips (1806-78), convert and lay apostle, b. Garendon Park, Leicestershire, England; d. there. Brought up in the Church of England, he was converted to Catholicism at the age of sixteen. His self-appointed mission was to restore the Anglican Church to Catholic unity. He founded a Trappist monastery and established several missions. He acted as an unofficial mediator between the Church and the Oxford Movement and his zeal resulted in many conversions. Two of his pamphlets, written during the excitement following the restoration of the hierarchy in 1850, met with great success. He assisted in founding “The Association for promoting the Unity of Christendom," but withdrew from it when it was censured by Rome. He translated several devotional works and in addition to many press articles wrote a remarkable treatise on Mohammedanism and Anti-Christ.—C.E.

Deliver Me (Libera me), the first words, recited aloud or intoned, of the Absolution, the prayer, after a Mass of Requiem, over the remains of the departed: "Deliver me, O Lord, from eternal death on that awful day."

Deliver Us (Libera nos), first words of the prayer in the Mass following the Our Father (Pater Noster). It emphasizes the petition for deliverance from all evil, and leads up to a further petition for the peace of the Lord, to be invoked just after in the Pae Domini. It is called an Emolismus (Gr., emolium, an indemnity, an indemnity)

Deliver Us from Evil (Libera nos a malo), closing petition in the Lord's Prayer, the Our Father; the very words of Our Lord, instead of the Greek substitution adopted in later editions of the Anglican Book of Common Prayer: "For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, for ever and ever."

Delta of the Nile, Vicariate Apostolic of the, Egypt; prefecture, 1884; vicariate, 1909; entrusted to the priests of the African Missions of Lyons. Vicar Apostolic, Jules Gerard, M.A., (1921); resident at Heliope, near Cairo, Catholics, 24,552.

Deluge, The, catastrophe described in the Bible (Gen., 6; 7; 8). The deluge is referred to in several passages of Scripture as a historical fact; the writings of the Fathers consider the event in the same light; and this view is confirmed by the tradition existing in all places and at all times as to occurrence of a similar catastrophe. Early geologists considered the biblical deluge identical with the diluvium at the beginning of the quaternary period, but recent authorities distinguished the two. Till about the 17th century it was commonly held that the entire globe was submerged in the deluge, but this opinion is now rarely held for the following reasons: (1) The sources of the water mentioned in the Bible are not sufficient to cover the entire globe. (2) Aquatic animals would have been killed by the mixture of sea and fresh water in the ark, and feeding of such an enormous number of animals seems impossible. (4) The text does not necessarily imply such a flood, since the words arez and adamah may just as well be translated by "region" and "land." Universal expressions in the Bible are frequently taken in a relatively universal sense. (5) The biblical narrative was written by an eyewitness, or by some one writing not long after the event, and must be understood, not according to our ideas, but according to his, who wrote of things in as far as known to him.

Hence, while most modern expositors deny the geographical universality of the flood, many defend at least its ethnographical universality; others hold that the flood did not extend to the entire human race but is limited by the Bible itself (Gen., 4 and 5) to the descendants of Cain and Seth. To corroborate this opinion they adduce arguments from ethnology, languages, and ancient traditions. It is impossible to fix the time of the deluge, since the dates mentioned in the three available texts of Scripture disagree both as to the year from Adam and as to the year before Christ mentioned in the texts and ancient traditions is 3100, but scientists demand for many reasons that the deluge be placed at a much earlier time.—C.E.

Demetrius, name of several biblical personages. (1) Demetrius Soter, King of the Seleucids, who made war against Judas Macabeus and defeated him in a third campaign, 161 B.C. Demetrius was later defeated and slain by the Syrian pretender, Alexander, and his Jewish allies. (2) Demetrius Nikator, his son, who regained the throne about 146 B.C., but was forced by Jonathan Machabeus to release the Jews from taxation and to increase their territory. He was later captured by the Partisans; on his release, after attacking Egypt he was defeated by Alexander Zabinas, a pretender, and assassinated at Tyre, 128 B.C. (3) Demetrius, a pagan smith, who made shrines for Diana at Ephesus, and opposed St. Paul (Acts, 19). (4) Demetrius, a friend of St. John, and possibly the bearer of his third epistle.—C.E.

Demurrer (Gr., demos, people; ergon, work), originally meaning any craftsman working for the public, was applied by Plato to the architect or maker of the material universe. In the sense of a world-maker, distinct from the Supreme God, Demurrer became a common term in the various systems of Gnosticism. According to Marcion, he was the personification of evil who caused the crucifixion of Christ. Valentius regarded him as the offspring of a union of matter with lower wisdom, a distant emanation from the Supreme God. The earliest traditions is 3100, but scientists demand for many reasons that the deluge be placed at a much earlier time. (M. 8.)

Demon (Gr., daimon, daimonion), a genius: a spirit between the gods and men). In the N.T. the word is synonymous with the evil spirit, and in English versions of the Bible is rendered "devil" and consequently designates a maleficent being, a meaning not necessarily implied in the original word "demon." The original term, daimon, means "name" or "thing" and is used of an evil spirit is a daimoniac, or ergunemon. (A.H.)

Demoniac (Gr., daimonikos, possessed by a demon), a person possessed or controlled by a demon. Among the many miracles mentioned in the Gospels, special prominence is given to the casting-out of devils, or demons (Mark, 5; 7; 9; Matt., 15; 17; Luke, 11), which gave such a striking proof of a power above nature that the disciples seem to have been more impressed by this than by the other powers given them (Luke, 10) —C.E.

Demonology (Gr., daimon, inferior or evil spirit; logos, teaching), the science or doctrine concerning demons. Belief in evil spirits and consequent magic is of remotest antiquity, among both savage and cultured races, varying from extreme to the elaborate systems of the ancient Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Persians. Though prevalent practices surrounding both early and later Christianity were effectively restricted, popular superstition and activity continued. Rationalists believed that the 19th century's materialism meant extermination of demonic belief, yet the old occultism lives revitalized by modern spiritism. The maze of demonology's superstitions presents certain basic beliefs common to all systems. The impress of revealed truth was uncorrupted, supported by reason and experience, stamps the Catholic teaching as distinctive, and as the only effective check for these superstitions. See Demon; Devil.—C.E.

Denés (Indian, men or people), Tinne, or Tinneh, an aboriginal race of North America, also called Athapascons, found throughout the length of the Rockies, east and west. They form three groups: the Southern, composed of the Apaches, the Navajo, and several Mexican tribes; the Pacific Dénés of Washington, Oregon, and California; and the Northern, the most important, to which the Loucheux, Chipeweways, Montagnais, Sekanais, Babines, and Nahanais belong. In all they number over 47,000. Originally, the Dénè tribes lived by hunting and fishing; most of the hard work was done by the women, who had a low place. Polygamy was prevalent and the marriage-tie was loose. The social organization was crude. They gradually adopted the matriarchal system, with clans, chiefs, and totems. They were honest and friendly to the whites. By nature religious, the Dénès listened eagerly to the Catholic missionaries. As early as 1842 Fr. J. B. Thibault preached to the Dénès of the Canadian Rockies. In British Columbia, and east of the Rockies, they are all Catholics. The Loucheux are as a rule Protestants.—C.E.

Deniße, Heinrich Susse (1844-1905), Dominican historian, b. Imst, Austrian Tyrol; d. Munich. By his studies on Tauler, Eckhart, and Suso, he proved early German mysticism to be based on Catholic theology. While assistant to the general of his order, in Rome, he took up the study of the controversy between the Paris University and the mendicant orders, and in 1885 published a history of the medieval universities which put an end to the misrepresentations of Protestant and other historians about the opposition of the Church to higher education. From 1889-97 he undertook the publication of the records of Paris University. While searching the Vatican archives for materials for this celebrated work, the wealth of hitherto unknown material which he found led him to write "Luther and Lutheranism," an exposure of the Reformer which his admirers have not been able to discredit.—C.E.

Denis (Dionysius), Rusticus, and Eleutherius, Saints, martyrs (258), d. Paris. St. Denis, Rusticus, and Eleutherius suffered atrocious tortures, and were beheaded. According to the legend, Denis arose after his execution and carried his head for some distance; for this reason he is usually portrayed carrying his head in his hand. Other emblems: a furnace, and a city. St. Denis is patron of France; invoked as one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers, against headache, and rabies; relics at the monastery of St. Denis. Feast, R. Cal., 9 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

Denmark, independent monarchy of northeastern Europe, on the Baltic Sea; area, 16,588 sq. m.; pop., 3,343,555. Christianity is said to have been introduced by the Frisian Bp. Willibrord (d. 739), and in the 9th century became well established through the efforts of St. Anschar, a Benedictine monk of Corbie. It was supported by many rulers, notably Harald Great, and Knut the Saint (assassinated, 1086) who became the patron of the country. Lutheranism gained the ascendancy c. 1530, and was declared the established religion by Christian III (1534-59). Religious freedom was not regained until the Danish constitution of 1849, but Catholicism is reviving through numerous conversions. The Catholic population is composed of Danish Catholic converts and their descendants, and Polish immigrants. Ecclesiastically Denmark comprises the Vicariate Apostolic of Denmark, founded 1892, and including 33 churches, 83 priests, 680 sisters, and 27,000 Catholics, and the Mission of Bornholm, founded 1915.—C.E.

Denonville, Jacques René de Brisay, Marquis de (1638-1710), governor of New France, b. Denonville, France. He arrived at Quebec in 1685 with the special mission of subduing the Iroquois tribe, and making peace with the other Indians. Owing to the opposition of Governors Dongan of New York and Andros of New England, his efforts were in the main unsuccessful, and he was replaced by De Frontenac in 1689.—C.E.; Wrong, Rise and Fall of New France, N. Y., 1928.

Denver, Diocese of, embraces the State of Colorado; area, 103,645 sq. m.; established as a vicariate apostolic, 1868; erected into a diocese, 1887; suffragan of Santa Fé. Bishops: Joseph P. Machebeuf (1887-97); Nicholas C. Matz (1889-1917); J. Henry Tilen (1917). Churches, 267; priests, secular, 130; priests, regular, 102; religious women, 531; colleges, 2; seminaries, 1; academies, 4; primary schools, 48; pupils in parochial schools, 10,958; institutions, 19; Catholics, 132,171.

Denys the Carthusian or Denys Van Leeuwen (1402-71), the "Ecstatic Doctor," and last of the Schoolmen, b. Ryckel, Limburg (now Belgium); d. Roermond, Dutch Limburg. After studying at Zwolle and Cologne, he entered the Carthusian monastery of Roermond, where he acquired a reputation for great sanctity. Though not infrequently styled Blessed, the cause of his beatification has never been begun. Denys was a prolific writer; his works form a complete summary of medieval scholastic teaching. He was, however, a compiler rather than an original thinker.—C.E.

Denzinger, Heinrich Joseph Dominicus (1819-83), theologian, b. Liege, Belgium; d. Wurzburg, Germany. He taught theology at Wurzburg from 1848, and was one of the pioneers of positive theology in Catholic Germany. His best-known work is his "Enchiridion," or handbook of the chief conciliar decrees, with a list of condemned propositions.—C.E.

Deo Gratias (Thanks be to God), a liturgical formula, found in 1 Corinthians, 15, and 2 Corinthians, 2; used three times in the Mass and frequently in the Breviary and in Catholic prayers.

De Paul University, Chicago, Ill.; founded, 1898; conducted by the Vincentian Fathers; preparatory school; schools of arts and sciences, commerce, music, law, shorthand; graduate, special, and correspondence schools; summer school; professors, 195; students, 4745; degrees conferred in 1929, 350.

Deposing Power, Papal, the exercise of that papal right by which the sovereign pontiff authoritatively decides, from the spiritual standpoint, whether a ruler is so flagrantly in opposition to religion and morality as to entitle his subjects to be released from their allegiance to him. The popes' use of this power is closely intertwined with medieval legislation and outlook on life. Gregory VII deposed Henry IV; Innocent III, John Lackland; Innocent IV, Frederick II; Boniface VIII, Philip the Fair. The sentence of deposition was only pronounced when other means proved ineffectual, often conditionally (in case there was no amendment), and for a time period as each case required. The peculiar conditions reigning in the Middle Ages explain why the popes at times deposed civil rulers. In the Middle Ages all Christians constituted one family with the pope as the common spiritual head, who was likewise recognized as the common father of Christendom by the political constitutions of the time. Fidelity to the Catholic Faith was a condition for holding power in certain hereditary and elective governments as England and Spain, whilst the constitution of the Holy Roman Empire contained the solemn injunction on the chosen ruler to maintain and defend the Christian religion of his subjects. Not a few princes (Stephen of Hungary, 1000, and Roger II of Sicily, 1130) offered their kingdoms as fiefs to the Holy See, acknowledging themselves as its vassals. Bearing these conditions in mind, it is readily seen that when the pope released subjects from their oath of allegiance, he was carrying out the provisions of civil constitutions and exercising a right conceded him by law. Theoretically the deposition of a ruler could only be effected by the combined action of spiritual jurisdiction and civil law; practically, however, the ruler was deposed by the entire relevancy of the subjects to the oath of allegiance, in releasing from which the pope was completely within his sphere as a spiritual judge, for the obligation of an oath is spiritual. The indirect power of the pope in matters temporal in general, and in relation to the dethroning of princes in particular, is not a temporal but a spiritual power. It is exerted in matters temporal only in so far as they intruch upon religion and in this way cease to be purely temporal. This indirect power of the pope has never been defined as an article of faith but it is the common teaching of theologians. Present day popes have no mind to resuscitate their depositing power. As Pius IX said to the deputation of the Academia of the Catholic Religion, 21 July, 1871: "Although certain Popes have at times exercised their depositing power in extreme cases, they did so according to the public law then in force and by the agreement of the Christian nations who were in the Pope the Supreme Judge of Christ extended to passing judgment even civiliter on princes and individual states. But altogether different is the present condition of affairs and only malice can confound things and times so different."—Ryan and Millar, The State and the Church, N. Y., 1922. (H. v.)

Deposit of Faith, the source or fount of revealed truths, namely, Scripture and Tradition, which must be accepted by all true Christians on the authority of God. (L. A. A.)

De Profundis (Out of the depths), first words of the penitential Psalm 129.

Derfel Gadarn (DERVEL THE MIGHTY), SAINT, confessor (6th century). According to legend he was son of a Welsh chieftain, Hywel Mawr, and brother to St. Tudwal, Bp. of Treguier, and St. Arthafel. He followed the profession of arms in his youth, his skill and valor in battle being the theme of contemporary bardic songs. He fought in the battle of Camlan, 537, and later entered the monastery of Llantwit, devoting the remainder of his life to missionary labors. He is held in particular veneration at Llandderfel, in Merionethshire, where his relics were preserved until their destruction by Cromwell. Feast, 5 April.

De Rossi, Giovanni Battista (1822-94), Christian archaeologist, b. Rome; d. Castel Gandolfo. Graduated in law at the Sapienza, he was appointed a scriptor at the Vatican Library, From childhood he had shown interest in antiquities, and in 1841 he began the study of archaeology under the Jesuit, Marchi. As a result of his explorations and researches De Rossi became a famous authority on epigraphy and Roman topography, and stirred up a worldwide interest in Christian antiquities. In addition to more than two hundred archaeological and historical monographs he wrote several comprehensive works on the catacombs, and early Christian Roman inscriptions, the most important being "La Roma sotterranea cristiana" (ed. Northcote and Brownlow, 2 vols., London, 1879).—C.E.

Derry, Diocese of, Ireland, comprises a large part of Derry and Tyrone counties, and part of Donegal; suffragan of Armagh. St. Columba founded a monastery there between 546 and 562. The original abbey-church and the great church erected 1161 were demolished 1600. First bishop, probably Gervase O'Ceirvallen (c. 1230); successors included Redmond O'Gallagher (1669) and Bernard O'Cahan (1683), from whom the succession continues unbroken to the present bishop, Bernard O'Kane (1926). Churches, 80; priests, 114; seminary, 1; high schools, 6; numerous primary schools; institutions, 13; Catholics, 122,528; others, 91,350.

Descartes, dà-kârt', René (1596-1650), philosopher and scientist, b. La Haye, Touraine, France; d. Stockholm, Sweden. He was educated in the Jesuit College of La Flèche. Having spent a few years in military service, he later traveled extensively through Europe and finally, in 1629, settled in Holland, where he devoted himself to the study of philosophy. His philosophical works include the "Discours de la méthode" (1637), "Meditations de Prima Philosophia" (1641), and "Principia Philosophiae" (1644). He is called "The Father of Intellectualism," and his system is universal methodic doubt. Descartes contributed to the advancement of mathematics and physics, being the founder of analytical geometry. The outstanding feature of his system is the separation of the soul and body. Thus Descartes characterized the evidence and certainty of mathematics with the uncertainties and errors of philosophy, he sought to construct a new system of philosophy which would be as evident and convincing as the mathematical sciences. He began by calling into doubt whatever knowledge he had previously acquired, and by seeking a truth so evident that it could not be doubted. This truth he found in the intuition of his own mind. Hence the starting point of his system is the one truth about which he could not doubt: "I think, therefore I am." He laid down the general principle that the clearness of an idea is the criterion of its truth. From the idea of an infinite perfect being he inferred the existence of God, because existence must belong to the Infinite and because only God could cause such an idea. The reliability of man's faculties is deduced from the perfection of God, who cannot deceive. The essence of the soul is thought, and the essence of bodies is extension. The union of body and soul in man is not substantial, but merely mechanical. The soul, located in the pineal gland, moves the organism as a machine, and receives from it external impressions. The doctrines of Descartes have had a profound influence and, together with those of Francis Bacon, have determined the course of the development of modern philosophy. He himself confined his method strictly to matters of philosophy, at no time calling into doubt truths that belong to theology, and striving always to reconcile his doctrines with the dogmas of Catholic Faith. He is a strange instance of a man who, steadfast in faith and devotion to the Church, and correct in morals, could still by error of judgment propagate views which perverted reason and undermine faith and morality unreasonably. Mahony in his "Cartesianism" traces to Descartes among other errors those of: Occasionalism, that disowns free will for man; Ontologism, denying that we perceive ideas within our soul, or objects directly in themselves; Pantheism, as advocated by Spinoza. Maritain says that the sin of Descartes was Angelism, by regarding man as if he were a pure spirit without a body; as if thought must be intuitive, not deductive; innate, not abstracted from reality external to us; and independent of things but evolved from our own consciousness.—C.E.; Mahony, Cartesianism, N.Y., 1925; Maritain, Three Great Reformers, N.Y., 1929.

Descent from the Cross (IN ART), which the masters who have represented this subject are: Barocchio, Bartolommeo, Camaëla, Campi, Canova, Annibale, Caracci, Carducci, Charpentier, Cima da Conegliano, Delacroix, Fra Angelico, Ghirlandajo, Caracci, Carducci, Cima da Conegliano, Delacroix, Fra Angelico, Ghirlandajo, Master of the Life of Mary, Perugino, Rembrandt, Rubens, Sarto, Van der Weyden, Van de Velde, Veronese, etc. —C.E.

Descent of the Holy Ghost. While the Apostles were assembled in prayer ten days after the Ascension of Christ, the Holy Ghost descended upon them, purifying their hearts and enlightening their minds, to enable them to preach the Gospel. Among the masters who have represented this subject in art are: El Greco, Mengs, Rubens, and Van Dyck.

Desecration, profanation; the destruction of the quality of sacredness inherent in places or things solemnly blessed.—C.E.

Desert (IN THE BIBLE), a large, uncultivated tract of land, not necessarily incapable of vegetation or without water or impossible as a human dwelling-place. The chief desert referred to in the Bible is that mentioned in Exodus, in which the Israelites travelled, from their crossing of the Red Sea till their arrival in the Promised Land. Others are the desert of Juda, w. of the Jordan and the Dead Sea; the deserts of Arabia, Moab, and Idumea, n. of Palestine, near the Dead Sea; the desert of Ziph, to which David fled from Saul (1 Kings), s. of the Dead Sea and Ichabene, John the Baptist was born and taught in the desert of Judea, near Jericho. It is thought that the scene of Our Lord's temptation (Matt., 4) was the desert w. of the Jordan.—C.E.

Desertion, the act of abandoning or forsaking; wilful and unjustified abandonment of one's post, wife, or child, or of a state the obligations of which one had freely accepted.—C.E.

Deshayes, Gabriel (1767-1842), founder and reorganizer of religious congregations, b. Beignon, France; d. St. Laurent-sur-Sèvre. Educated at St. Malo, he was ordained during the Revolution, and was later named Vicar-General of Vannes. He founded the Sisters of Christian Teaching and Nursing of St. Gildas (1807) and the Brothers of St. Francis of Assisi, called "farming brothers"
De Smet, Pierre Jean (1801-73), Jesuit missionary, b. Termonde, Belgium; d. St. Louis, Mo. He came to the United States in 1821, became a Jesuit, and was one of the founders of the Missouri Province. In 1838 he established a mission among the Potawatomies at Council Bluffs, and arranged a peace between them and the Sioux; in 1840 he was sent to the Flathead and Pend d'Oreille tribes. In 1846 he visited the Blackfeet on a peace mission and then returned to St. Louis, where his superiors retained him for other work. His association with the Indians, however, never ended. In 1851 and 1858, at the request of the government, he calmed the troubles caused by the advent of the whites into California and Oregon. His most notable peace mission was in 1868, to the Sioux; he was the only white man who could go among this cruel tribe with safety. His interest in the Indians led him to cross the ocean nineteen times and to visit almost every European country, soliciting funds and recruiting missionaries. His numerous writings contain valuable information concerning Indian life.—C.E.; Lavelle, Le Père de Smet, Liége, 1913.

De Moines, Diocese of, Iowa, comprises that part of the State of Iowa bounded E. by the eastern boundaries of the counties of Polk, Warren, Lucas, and Wayne, s. by the State of Missouri, w. by the Missouri River, and n. by the northern boundaries of the counties of Harrison, Shelby, Audubon, Guthrie, Dallas, and Polk; area, 12,446 sq. m.; erected, 1911; suffragan of Dubuque. Bishops: Austin Dowling (1912-19) and Thomas W. Drumm (1919). Churches, 95; priests, secular, 100; priests, regular, 17; religious women, 193; college, 1; academy, 1; primary schools, 28; pupils in parochial schools, 4603; institutions, 3; Catholics, 38,565.

Desolation, a darkening of the mind and disturbance of the will, caused by the evil spirit in order to withdraw the soul from God's service. Marked by sadness, fear, despondency, agitation, scruples, an inclination to aversion; one of the ways of obtaining the effects of Baptism when it is not possible to receive the sacrament, or when one, not knowing of the sacrament or of the obligation to receive it, desires to do everything God wishes as a means of salvation. (ED.)

Despair (Lat., desperare, to lose hope), psychologically, the passion contrary to hope; morally, the abandonment of all hope of salvation or of the means required for it; not merely an anxiety about one's future state, or fear that one may be lost, but a deliberate yielding to the conviction that human nature cannot cooperate with God's grace, that one's sins are unpardonable, or that Almighty God has cast one away. It is an offense against God's goodness and mercy, temptation to which should be resisted not only for moral but for physiological reasons also, since it commonly results in melancholy, or in sinful indulgence.—C.E. (ED.)

Detachment, an ascetical term signifying the withholding of the affection from creatures to fix it on the Creator. Creatures may be the occasion of mortal, or of venial, sin. The first case determines the detachment necessary for salvation; the second, what is required as the foundation of the higher life. Beyond these there are the highest perfection, carried often to renunciation and actual privation, imitating through love the perfect poverty of Jesus Christ.

Detraction (Lat., detrahere, to take away), unjust damaging of another's good name by the revelation of some fault or crime of which that other is guilty or believed to be guilty by the defamer. The detractor's guilt varies with the damage done. He is bound to restitution of the defamed's violated rights. For just reasons one may lawfully divulge another's offenses, but only to prudent persons and for the purpose of preventing evil to the guilty party or others.—C.E.

Determinism, in general, a philosophical doctrine holding that every event inevitably follows some antecedent event or events, that the course of nature is rigidly fixed by what has occurred in the past; in particular, that the human will is not free, all volition being the necessary outcome of inherited tendencies, acquired habits, irresistible impulses, under the influence of present circumstances or mental conditions. The will is determined, mechanically, by the strongest motive; it cannot act otherwise. The doctrine does away with responsibility, merit and demerit, right and wrong, morals of any sort.—C.E.

Detraction (Lat., detrahere, to take away), unjust damaging of another's good name by the revelation of some fault or crime of which that other is guilty or believed to be guilty by the defamer. The detractor's guilt varies with the damage done. He is bound to restitution of the defamed's violated rights. For just reasons one may lawfully divulge another's offenses, but only to prudent persons and for the purpose of preventing evil to the guilty party or others.—C.E.
Gabriel Richard, a Sulpician. His parish included all the present State of Michigan and a large part of Wisconsin. Three years after the fire of 1805, which destroyed nearly the whole town, the church was rebuilt. Richard lectured weekly in the Council House and set up a printing press and founded in 1809 the "Michigan Essay or Impartial Observer," the first Catholic paper in the United States and the first paper of any kind in Michigan. Among the books which he issued was one entitled "Epistles and Gospels for All the Sundays and Festivals of the Year." He was a founder, vice-president, and professor of the University of Michigan. In 1833 he was elected to represent Michigan Territory in the House of Representatives, the only Catholic priest who has ever been a member of Congress. In 1833 the Diocese of Detroit was established. The same year the Poor Clares founded a convent within the council and administration of Detroit during the 19th century has brought large numbers of Catholics of several nationalities, especially Polish. At present the city has 100 Catholic churches with 94 parish schools, including 4 parish high schools; 3 other schools of academic grade; an ecclesiastical seminary; a Catholic university; a college for women; a commercial college; a children's bureau; a day nursery; 9 homes and asylums, including a house of the Good Shepherd; 3 hospitals; and 2 organizations of visiting nurses. There are also 3 churches and 2 schools belonging to the Ukrainian Greek Catholic diocese, and 2 churches and 2 schools of the Diocese of Pittsburgh (Greek Rite). Catholics, 532,000.

Detroit, University of, Detroit, Mich.; founded, 1877; conducted by the Jesuits; preparatory school; schools of arts and sciences, engineering, architecture, commerce, journalism, law, commerce and finance, foreign trade, commercial art; special, evening, and extension schools; professors, 148; students, 3270; degrees conferred 1929, 281.

Deusdedit, Saint. See ADEODATUS.

Deus in adjutorium meum intende (O God, come to my assistance), first words of Psalm 69; the usual beginning of each hour of Divine Office.

Deus tuorum militum, or O God, of those that fought Thy fight, hymn for Vespers for the Common of One Martyr, out of Paschal Time; Ambrosian school, 9th century. There are 16 translations; the English title given above is by A. McDougall.—Britt.

Deuterocanonical, pertaining to the disputed books and passages of the Old and the New Testament. Of the O.T. these are: Tobias, Judith, Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, 1 and 2 Machabees, parts of Esther (10, 4, to 16, 14), and Daniel (3, 24-90; 13, 14). Of the N.T. these are: Hebrews, James, 2 Peter, 2 and 3 John, Apocalypse. Mark (16, 9-20), Luke (22, 43-44), and John (7, 53, to 8, 11). Protestants commonly reject the deuterocanonical books of the O.T. as apocryphal. See CANON OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.—Pope; Schumacher. (B.S.)

Deuteronomy (Gr., deuteros, second; nomos, law), the fifth Book of the Bible. The name is a misnomer, since the book does not contain any new laws, but is a partial repetition of the foregoing legislation, with an urgent exhortation to be faithful to it. It is made up principally of three discourses, the contents of which are as follows: The 1st discourse, comprising chapters 1-4, is a review of the events which followed the promulgation of the Law (1-3), and an exhortation to keep it (4). The 2nd discourse forms the bulk of the book (5-26) and reheases the whole Covenant in two parts: (a) a general discourse concerning the duties of the Hebrews towards God (5-11); (b) a special discourse in which fundamental points of the Law are rehearsed, concerning duties towards God, God's representatives, and the neighbor. The 3rd discourse (27-30) contains new exhortations to keep the Law; chapters 27 and 28 (renewal of the alliance, blessings, and curses) are extremely dramatic. The concluding chapters (31-34) constitute an historical appendix: Moses designates Josue as his successor, recites his magnificent prophetic canticle (32), blesses the twelve tribes, views the Promised Land from the top of Mount Nebo, and dies.—C.E.; Pope.

Devas, Charles Stanton (1848-1906), political economist, b. Woodside, England. He was received into the Church in his youth, and was graduated from Oxford. He treats political economy from a Catholic standpoint, opposing the current teaching in so far as it considers ethics and history irrelevant. His most important works are "A Manual of Political Economy" (London, 1892), and "The Key to the World's Progress" (London, 1906).—C.E.
Development of Doctrine. Understanding by Catholic doctrine the deposit of faith, or the sum total of truths supernaturally revealed to man, we may briefly sketch the Catholic view of this subject. (1) While substantially contained in primitive revelation, the deposit of faith grew from the time of Adam until that of Christ and the Apostles. New truths, hitherto entirely unknown, or understood but imperfectly, were revealed through the ancient prophets, but more especially through Jesus Christ, the only-begotten Son of the Father. (2) Public revelation was completed with the Apostles, so that after the death of the last Apostle no new doctrine was revealed to the Church as such. (3) Revelation as completed in the Apostles will always remain the same, in the sense that its meaning cannot be changed nor can its opposite become true. It is on this proposition that the modernists suffered shipwreck. They would abolish the old dogmas and substitute new ones, evolving them out of their subconsciousness or experience. (4) The deposit of faith may and does develop extrinsically. Thus, owing to the break of a heresy, the Church may propose explicitly what was contained in a certain doctrine only implicitly; what was heretofore believed more or less confusedly may be stated clearly and distinctly; the theological principle underlying a certain practice may be brought out and defined; owing to special needs, certain doctrines may be preached with greater frequency and emphasis. The right to proclaim such “new dogmas” is clearly contained in the nature of the magisterium of the Church. Being a living magisterium, it has the right and the duty really to teach. It is the duty of a live teacher to explain his own teachings, to emphasize certain points, to settle doubts, to correct errors. Hence the Church is not tied down to a repetition of ancient formulas (as the Greek schismatics imagine), nor can such new dogmas be rightly called corruptions of Christ’s doctrine (as many Protestants consider them). What Newman meant to say in his famous “Essay on Development” need not be urged beyond the limits assigned here. (A. C. C.)

De Vere, Aubrey Thomas Hunt (1814-1902), poet, b. Co. Limerick, Ireland; d. there. A personal disciple of Wordsworth, he wrote poems based on the legends of Greece and Ireland. He was graduated from Trinity College, Dublin. Later he visited Cambridge, Oxford, and Rome, and came under the influence of Newman. Largely through his study of Coleridge, and the conversion of Cardinal Manning, he became a Catholic, 1857. His chief works are: "Devotion," written by St. Francis de Sales, intended to lead the soul living in the world, into the paths of devotion. It consists of five books. In the first the author helps the soul to free itself from all inclination to sin; in the second he teaches it how to be united to God by prayer and the sacraments; in the third he exercises it in the practise of virtue; in the fourth he strengthens it against temptation; and in the fifth the benefits of the Redemption. Yet he remains a rational spirit, possessed of the knowledge he had before the fall, and in the administration of the universe is permitted, for God’s own purposes, to exercise some influence upon animate and inanimate creatures. Cases of diabolic obsession, possession, and infestation are numerous. Christ drove out devils, and empowered the Apostles to do so. In the Church the institution of the order of exorcists testifies to belief in a personal devil—C. E.; L’Epicier, The Unseen World, N. Y., 1906; Raupert, Dangers of Spiritualism, N. Y., 1906. (A. H.)

Devil’s Advocate, popular name for the Promoter of the Faith.

Devil-Worshippers, those who practise the worship or cult of the devil, an aspect of heathen worship in its worst and most degraded form. Among many barbarous peoples, offerings were made to evil and malignant gods, in order to placate them and avert their anger. As each nation had its own gods, racial rivalry led them to consider the protecting divinities of an enemy as evil demons, hence those who worshipped what they considered good beings were devil-worshippers. The cult of Satanship was not confined to heathens, for accounts of magical practises and occultation appear in the history of heretical sects in medieval Europe, and under the guise of various esoteric cults of today there are numerous devil-worshippers.—C.E.

Devolution, the passing to an ecclesiastical superior of the right to provide for a benefice, when the patron has neglected to do so; the passing of power from one body to another.—C.E.

Devotion (Lat., deovere, to vow), the prompt surrender of the will to every demand of God’s service; called sensible devotion when it affects the feelings. It belongs to the virtue of religion, springs from meditation, and results in spiritual joy. “Devotions” are pious practises in honor of the Blessed Trinity, Our Lord, the Blessed Virgin, angels, and saints. (E. D.)

Devoftions, Popular, various prayers and pious practises, whether in common at Church or in private, in honor of: the Blessed Trinity; Our Divine Lord, His Holy Name, His Five Wounds, His Passion, His Sacred Heart, His Presence in the Holy Eucharist; the Holy Ghost; the Angels Guardian, St. Michael; the Blessed Virgin, under her various titles as Help of Christians, Mediatrix of Divine Grace, Queen of the Holy Rosary; and of certain saints, Joseph, Anne, Monica, Benedict, Francis of Assisi, Anthony of Padua, Dominic, Francis Xavier, Aloysius, Rita, Teresa of Jesus, each treated in the article under these several titles; for the souls in Purgatory and for a Happy Death (Bona Mors). (E. D.)

Devout Life, An Introduction to the work written by St. Francis de Sales, intended to lead "Philoteus" (philos, loving; Theos, God), the soul living in the world, into the paths of devotion. It consists of five books. In the first the author helps the soul to free itself from all inclination to sin; in the second he teaches it how to be united to God by prayer and the sacraments; in the third he exercises it in the practise of virtue; in the fourth he strengthens it against temptation; and in the fifth he teaches it how to form resolutions and persevere.

D.G. = Dei gratia (by the grace of God); Deo gratias (thanks be to God).

Diabolism (Lat., diabolum, the devil). The term includes all kinds of intercourse or attempts to deal with the evil spirit by witchcraft, incantations, magic, spiritualism, and other occult practices. The possibility of consulting and securing the help of the devil is sufficiently attested by Scripture: God forbids consultation of soothsayers (Deut., 18); to “go aside after wizards” is unlawful (Lev., 19).

Witchcraft, real or alleged, has brought misfortune and cruelty into the world; many phenomena of witchcraft, incantations, magic, spiritism, and other occult practices. The Church as well as the Bible warrants the belief in evil spirits, or devils, and in their power, as far as God will permit, to do harm, but forbids dealing with them, since, by reason of the perversion of their wills, they endeavor to turn men from God. Hence, the use of the planchette, the ouija board, etc., is forbidden. What is known as white magic is merely sleight-of-hand, or prestidigitation, and involves no offense against the moral law.—Raupert, Christ and the Powers of Darkness, N. Y., 1914; Harris, Essays on Occultism, Spiritism and Demonology, St. L., 1919.

Diaciconium, in the Greek Church, connotes:

1. The annex to a basilica where altar-supplies are kept.
2. A liturgical book specifying the deacon’s functions.
3. Prayers for peace, said by the deacon before the people.—C.E.

Diario Romano, book published annually at Rome, giving routine of the feasts and fasts to be observed in Rome, and the ecclesiastical functions to be performed.—C.E.

Diarmuid, Saint (d. c. 832), Abp. of Armagh, b. Ireland. Expelled from his see by the usurper Foraunn, 835, he returned, 836, but in 841 the see was destroyed by Scandinavian invaders. He was renowned for his learning. Feast, 24 April.—C.E.

Diarmaid, Saint, confessor (d. 542), abbot and founder of Inisclothran, Loughrea, Ireland. His fame as a teacher, writer, and preacher attracted numerous disciples to him, among them St. Ciaran of Clonmacnoise. He is said to have erected his first Irish church. His life is known from a work called “Gospel of the Mixed” because the four Gospels were combined into one continuous narrative. It had great popularity and was practically the only text used in Syria during the 3rd and 4th centuries. —Seisenberger, tr. Buchanan, Practical Handbook for the Study of the Bible, N. Y., 1911. (R. F. S.)

Diaz, Juan, martyr, celebrated the first Mass in the City of Mexico, on his arrival there with the expedition of Hernando Cortes, in (c. 1492), who was one of the earliest missionaries among the Zapotecas and was martyred by the natives in Quechula for having overthrown their idols.

Diaz, Pedro (1546-1618), Jesuit missionary, b. Lupia, Spain; d. Mexico. Sent to Mexico by St. Francis Borgia, with the first band of Jesuits assigned to that country, he founded the colleges of Oaxaca, Guadalajara, and Merida, and started the Jesuit missions among the Indians of New Spain.—C.E.

Dichu, Saint, confessor (4th and 5th century), d. Saul, Ireland. The son of an Ulster chieftain, Dichu was St. Patrick’s first convert in Ireland, and he presented St. Patrick with ground at Saul for his first Irish church. He became a model of sanctity. Feast, 29 April.—C.E.

Didache, did’a-ké (DOCTRINE OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES), a short treatise which some of the Fathers accounted as next to Holy Scripture, supposed to have been written A.D. 65-80. It was rediscovered in 1883 by Bryennios, Greek Orthodox Metropolitan of Nicomedia. In 1875, he had published the full text of the Epistles of St. Clement. It may be divided into three parts: first, the “Two Ways,” the Way of Life and the Way of Death; second, a ritual dealing with Baptism, fasting, and Holy Communion; third, a treatise on the ministry. Doctrinal teaching is presupposed, and none is given. The Way of Life is the love of God and of our neighbor; the Way of Death is a mere list of vices to be avoided. The second part begins with an instruction on Baptism; the third speaks of teachers or doctors in general, and the last chapter exhorts to watching and tells the signs of the end of the world.—C.E.

Didacus, Saint, confessor (d. 1463), b. San Nicolas del Puerto, Spain; d. Alcalá. He was educated under the direction of a hermit and followed the austere life practised by his master. Received as a lay-brother of the Franciscan Order he was sent in 1445, with a priest of the order to the Canary islands, and was made warden of the Fortaventura monastery. Recalled to Spain, 1449, he went to Rome the following year for the canonization of St. Bernadine of Siena. While there he served as infirmary in the convent of Ara Coeli, and many were miraculously cured through his intercession. He returned to Spain and spent the remaining years of his life in solitude and prayer at Alcalá. Emblems: a cross, and lily. Canonized, 1588. Feast, R. Cal., 13 Nov.; O.F.M., 12 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.
Didascalia Apostolorum (Instructions of the Apostles), a Greek treatise on discipline and doctrine traditionally attributed to the Apostles, but probably written by a bishop of the 3rd century, in Syria. It was first printed in 1854, in Syriac. It forms the basis of the first eight books of the Apostolic Constitutions, a 4th-century collection regarded as a valuable historical document, revealing the moral and religious conditions and liturgical observances of the 3rd and 4th centuries. It deals with the treatment of penitents, the duties of the laity and clergy, and the defense against heresy. The O.T., the Gospels, and Epistles are frequently quoted. Often called the earliest attempt to compile a corpus (body) of canon law, it never had a great vogue and was superseded by the Apostolic Constitutions.—C.E.

Didon, Henre (1840-1900), Dominican preacher and writer, b. Touvet; d. Toulouse. For over ten years he preached at Paris with great success. He was at his best when dealing with social problems, and, 1879, was bitterly attacked by the secular press for his defense of the indissolubility of marriage. He wrote a life of Christ and a study of German universities.—C.E.

Didymus, Saint, martyr (304), d. Alexandria, Egypt. He was put to death with St. Theodora whose virtue he had protected. Feast, 28 April.—Butler.

Didymus, a name for St. Thomas the Apostle (q.v.).

Diego (Didacus), Blessed, confessor (1743-1801), Capuchin missionary, b. Cadiz. He was received into the Capuchin Order in Seville, 1759, and labored as a missionary throughout Spain, but chiefly in Andalusia. Known as “the Apostle of the Blessed Trinity and of Our Lady, the Mother of the Good Shepherd,” he spent most of his time in the confessional. Beatiifed, 1894. Feast, 24 March.

Dies irae, dies illa, or That Day of Wrath, That Dreadful Day, sequence in Requiem Masses.

Dillon, John (1851-1927), political leader, b. Dublin; d. London. Son of John Blake Dillon, educated at University College, Dublin, and member of the Royal College of Surgeons, he entered politics as a Parnellite and was elected to Parliament from Tipperary, 1880. He was arrested and imprisoned the following year for instigating a boycott, and in 1883 his health forced him to retire to a ranch in the United States, but returning, 1885, he was re-elected to Parliament. An ardent supporter of Home Rule, he travelled in Australia, New Zealand, and the United States, collecting funds for the Irish cause, at the same time avoiding a term of imprisonment which he later served. Upon the retirement of Parnell he supported Justin McCarthy and later John Redmond, whom he succeeded for a short period as chairman of the Irish Party. He was strongly opposed to the violent activities of the Sinn Fein, and ardently loyal to the Allies during the World War, but an opponent of compulsory service in Ireland. After Parnell, he is chiefly credited with the solution of the land problem in Ireland.

Dimissorial letters (Lat., dimittere, to send out), testimonial letters given by a bishop or by a competent religious superior to his subjects in order that they may be ordained by another bishop. Such letters testify that the subject has all the qualities demanded by canon law for the reception of the order in question, and request the bishop to whom they are addressed to ordain him.—C.E. (A.C.E.)

Dinajpur, dé-nâj-púr’, Diocese of, India, comprises Dinajpur, Rajshahi, Bogra, Rangpur, Jalpaiguri, in Bengal, and the native state of Kuch Behar; established, 1927, from part of the Diocese of Krishnagar; suffragan of Calcutta; entrusted to the Society of Foreign Missions of Milan. Catholics, 11,800.

Dinooth (Dinothiis, Dunawb, or Dunob), Saint, confessor (6th century), abbot and founder of Bangor on the Dee, Flintshire, Wales. He was a North British chieflain, driven into Wales, where he embraced the religious life, and founded the monastery of Bangor on the Dee. It was of great size, housing about 2400 monks, and was destroyed, c. 603. Dinooth assisted at the second synod of Welsh bishops convened by St. Augustine, 602. Feast, 7 Sept.—C.E.

Diocese, the territory or the churches under a bishop’s jurisdiction.

Dioecletian or Valerius Diocletianus (245-313), Emperor of Rome (284-305), b. near Salona, Dalmatia; d. Salona. He distinguished himself in the Persian War and was chosen emperor by the army. As the empire was unwieldy and exposed to attack, he associated with him two other Emperors: Constantius, whom he celebrated the last triumph in Rome, 20 Nov., 303, and further distributed his power by granting the inferior title of Caesar to two generals, Galerius and Constantius Chlorus. During the greater portion of Dioecletian's reign the Christians enjoyed peace and prosperity, but under the influence of Galerius he inaugurated, 303, the last and most terrible of the ten persecutions of the early Church, which was waged with greatest severity in the East.—C.E.

Dionysius, Saint, Pope (259-268), confessor, probably a Greek; d. Rome. During the Decian persecution the Holy See was vacant for nearly a year. When the persecution ceased through the edict of Gallienus, Dionysius was elected pope and the Church was given a legal existence. He organized the administration of the Church, called a synod at Rome to settle doctrinal matters, and issued a letter condemning the Sabellian heresy. Feast, 30 Dec.—C.E.; Butler.

Dionysius Exiguus (d. c. 544), monk and writer. Much of his life was spent in Rome, where he was abbot of a monastery. He translated standard works from Greek into Latin and the beginnings of canon law in Western Christendom are due to him. In a work on the calculation of Easter he introduced the use of the Christian Era fixing the date of Our Lord's birth as 753 years after the foundation of Rome, a date now known to be too late by four to seven years. His surname, "the Little," is believed to have been adopted in self-deprecation.—C.E.

Dionysius of Alexandria (b. c. 190), called "the Great," Bp. of Alexandria. He studied under Origen, and eventually became the head of the catechetical school. In 250 there was a severe persecution under Decius in Alexandria, which Dionysius attempted to flee, but was taken into custody. He was rescued by Christians and remained in hiding in the Libyan desert until the persecution ceased, 251. At this juncture the Novatian schism occurred in which Dionysius supported Cornelius, the rightful pope, and it was largely through his influence that the whole East was unified. During the persecution of Valerian, he was banished, 257, to the desert of Mareotis, returning to Alexandria when toleration was decreed, 260, by Gallienus. Dionysius dealt leniently with the Christians who had lapsed during the persecutions and refused forgiveness to none at the hour of death. He wrote a work on the Apocalypse, which ranks high as biblical criticism.—C.E.

Dionysius the Areopagite, a name applied to:
1. St. Denis or Dionysius of Athens (1st century), bishop and martyr, and an assessor of the Areopagus. He was converted by St. Paul, c. A.D. 50 (Acts, 17), and has been erroneously identified with St. Denis of Paris, patron saint of France, the error persisting in various lists of the Saints, such as "Les Petits Bollandistes." Feast, 9 Oct. (2) Dionysius, the pseudo-Areopagite, the reputed author of the "Celestial Hierarchy" and other works, erroneously identified with the above.—C.E.; Butler.

Dioscorus, antipope (530), b. Alexandria, Egypt. Originally a deacon of Alexandria, he became a member of the Roman clergy, and the leader of the Byzantine party in Rome, opposing the Gothic party which Pope Felix IV favored. The latter with a view to averting a contest for the papacy, had taken the unprecedented step of appointing his successor, upon whose accession as Boniface II the majority of the Roman clergy elected the antipope Dioscorus. Fortunately the schism was of short duration, for Dioscorus died the same year, and his supporters submitted to Boniface.—C.E.

Diplomatics, Papal (Gr., diploma, an ancient writing; literally, an instrument), the science of ancient official documents; it arose during the Middle Ages in the necessity for safeguarding from forgery papal Bulls and other instruments. The procedure includes the study of the text of the document; manner of dating; signatures; attestations of witnesses; seals, and the attachment thereof; the material and the manner of folding; and handwriting. The cross, as a signature or the equivalent thereof, has been always important, as are such details as the Tironian or shorthand notes. Famous examples of spurious documents discovered by this means include the Forged Decretals and the Donation of Constantine. The true science of diplomacy was defined by Jean Mabillon (q.v.) in his celebrated work, "De re diplomatica" (1681).—C.E.

Diptych (Gr., diptychon, a pair of tablets), two-leaved hinged tablet of metal, ivory, or wood, the inner surface of which was covered with wax upon which characters were scratched with a stylus. Between the two tablets others were sometimes inserted, thus giving rise to the names, triptych, polyptych, etc. They were in use among the Greeks in the 6th century, A.D. In the early Church the names of the members, living or dead, were inscribed on diptychs. St. Cyprian mentions them in the 3rd century and they were in use until the 12th in the West, and the 14th in the East. The “diptychs of the living” contained the names of the pope, the bishops, illustrious persons, lay and ecclesiastical, and benefactors. From them came the first ecclesiastical calendars and martyrologies. The “diptychs of the dead” contained the names of those otherwise qualified for inscription on the diptychs of the living. Thus originated the later necrologies. Exclusion from these lists was a grave ecclesiastical penalty. The contents of the diptychs were read aloud from the ambo or altar, and traces of the fixed usage of the Church in the 5th century may still be found in the Canon of the Mass. The long passage after the Sanctus corresponds to the ancient recital of the diptych of the living, and the recitation of that of the dead is recalled by the Memento which follows the consecration. Diptychs were also sculptured as devotional panels for altars and church walls.—C.E.

Direction, Spiritual St. Ignatius says that the devil attacks those in the way of perfection, not by solicitations to evil, but by snares and deceits, presenting evil under the guise of good. In all such spiritual masters agree, and it is the foundation of spiritual direction. This is not something abnormal. Spiritual therapeutics are a necessary reality, because even in those seeking perfection spiritual diseases occur. To assume that all direction is medicinal, though not infrequent, is an error. Normally the spiritual director is not a physician, but a guide, and he must guard against two extremes, credulity and scepticism. The former would make the guide open to deception as the one seeking guidance. The latter would make him incapable. The soul coming to him would discover in itself a knowledge of the higher way far superior to his. “Believe not every spirit; but try the spirits, if they be of God.” (1 John, 4). He should accept unreservedly as the foundation of his ministry the fact of the good spirit working in the soul for its destruction. The soul qualified for inscription on the list for its destruction. The soul qualified for serious direction will, ordinarily speaking, be going forward earnestly in perfection. If not actually in the way, it will, at least, be moving toward it. Each individual case will demand individual care according to its actual state. To discern whether an impulse in the soul comes from the good spirit or the evil one by disturbance, and a more or less perfect act of prudence, more or less perfect, when based on reflection and experience. In well disposed souls the action of the good spirit is recognized by the effect of tranquillity and a consistent tendency toward good, that of the evil one by disturbance, and a more or less hidden tendency towards evil. An opposite course is adopted by both spirits towards sinners.—C.E.

Diptych (Lat., dirigo, direct), song, hymn of mourning sung at funerals or services in memory of the dead. So named from the first word of the antiphon in the office for the dead, Dirige Domine, Deus Meus (Guide, O Lord my God).

Dirige Domine, Deus Meus (Guide, O Lord my God).

Diriment Impediment (Lat., dirimentem, take apart; impedire, impede), one that renders a marriage altogether invalid unless a dispensation be granted by the Church, which is possible only in certain cases. Under the present Code of Canon Law these impediments are: defect of age, impotence, difference of worship (baptized and unbaptized), Sacred Orders, solemn vows, abduction, crime (adultery, homicide, or both), relationship, or affinity, within proscribed degrees, spiritual relationship, legal relationship (adoption when State forbids marriage between adopter and adopted), clandestinity, public decency.—Ayrinhac, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919.

Discalced (Lat., dis, without; calceus, shoe.), a term applied to religious congregations of men and women who go unshod or wear sandals, as a form of austerity. The custom of going barefoot was introduced into the West by St. Francis of Assisi for men, and St. Clare for women. The Observantines, Minims, Capuchins, and Alcantarines followed the primitive custom, but most of the orders have returned to the use of sandals and even shoes. Both men and women of the Carmelite reform are discalced.—C.E.

Both men and women of the Carmelite reform are discalced.—C.E.

Discernment of Spirits, a judgment whereby to discern whether an impulse in the soul comes from the good spirit (God or angel), or from the evil one; a free gift of God and infallibly certain, when resting on a special supernatural illumination; an act of prudence, more or less perfect, when based on reflection and experience. In well disposed souls the action of the good spirit is recognized by the effect of tranquillity and a consistent tendency toward good, that of the evil one by disturbance, and a more or less hidden tendency towards evil. An opposite course is adopted by both spirits towards sinners.—C.E.

Disciple (Lat., discipulus, a student), a term used in the New Testament to designate a Christian follower, either a personal adherent of Our Lord or the Apostles; the disciples, strictly so called, are to be distinguished from the Apostles. The Apostles were chosen especially by Christ from the disciples and were the depositories of His most secret mysteries and the principal ministers of His religion.
The Latin Church gives the number of disciples of Our Lord as either 72 or 70.—C.E. (E. F. D.)

Disciples of Christ, Protestant sect, organized, 1832, at Lexington, Ky., as the result of the union of the followers of Barton W. Stone and of Alexander Campbell. When a name was to be adopted Stone favored Christians, and Campbell Disciples, but no definite action was taken, both names being used until the International Convention adopted the name of Disciples of Christ. Their doctrine teaches belief in the New Testament, emphasizes "the Divine Son-ship of Jesus, as the fundamental fact of Holy Scriptures, the essential creed of Christianity, and the one article of faith in order to baptism and union with the Church." They celebrate the Lord's Supper every Sunday "as a memorial feast." The Disciplies of Christ are congregational in their government. Forty-one periodsicals are published by them.
Their foreign mission work is carried on through the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, in India, China, Japan, Africa, Porto Rico, Cuba, South America, New Zealand, Tibet, Philippine Islands, Mexico, Canada, and Jamaica. In 1916 there were: 72 mission stations; 278 missionaries, with 1019 native helpers; 239 organized churches, with 21,825 members; and 159 schools, with 7569 pupils. In the United States, in which there were: 6845 ministers, 87,091 churches, and 1,441,462 communicants. Churches of Christ are a group of separatists from the Disciples of Christ, who opposed establishing missionary societies, though interested in missionary work, carried on by them in Japan, India, and Africa. According to the last census there were in the United States: 2607 ministers; 5570 churches; and 317,937 communicants.—C.E.

Discipline, systematic mental, moral, and physical training under authority; order maintained by persons under control, e.g., soldiers, pupils; an instrument of penance, such as a whip or scourge; self-flagellation, a private means of penance and atonement; punishment administered with a vigilance and according to the will of the Church superiors; discipline administered with a view to correction; the exercise by the Church of its power of spiritual punishment; the laws and directions laid down and formulated by church authority for the guidance of the faithful.—C.E.

Discipline, Congregation of, founded, 18 July, 1875, by Pius XII as the Congregation for the Discipline and Reformation of Regulars, to replace the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. Its work consisted chiefly in designating in Italy and the adjacent islands monasteries and convents of men as novitiates or houses of study, granting permission for the admission of novices, seeing to the observance of a perfect community life, and dispensing from rules in regard to the internal discipline of a religious house. Regarding the regulars in other parts of the world, its duty was to offer the pope suggestions for the promotion of regular discipline.
It had its own cardinal-prefect until Pius IX, 12

March, 1856, placed it under the cardinal-prefect of the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. Pius X, 26 May, 1906, suppressed it, transferring its powers to the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars.

Discipline of the Secret, a modern term describing a practise of the ancient Church, by which knowledge of the more intimate mysteries of the Christian Religion, such as the Trinity and the discipline of some of the Sacraments, were kept from the laity and, at least in the earlier stages of their instruction, from catechumens. It was a custom intended to shield the doctrines and mysteries of Christianity from ridicule or misconception.—C.E. (M. P. H.)

Discretion, Age of, see Age of Reason.

Disestablishment of the Anglican Church, specifically, the depriving the church of its right, privileges, or position as the Established Church of the United Kingdom. As such it received the support, through taxation, of British subjects regardless of creed; and many, in order to exercise freedom of conscience, were forced to support it in addition to the Court of its convictions. The system was manifestly unfair and movements to disestablish the Anglican Church resulted in the Irish Church Act, 1869, granting autonomous powers to the Irish Protestant Episcopal Church and making it dependent upon its adherents alone; and the Welsh Church Act, 1914, which, owing to the War required further legislation, 1920, to complete the disestablishment of the Anglican Church in Wales. The movement in England itself had been strengthened by controversies resulting from the book, "Foundations," 1912, which displayed a trend towards doctrinal indifference; the Disibod, Saint, confessor (c. 619-700), Bp. of Disenberg, Germany, b. Ireland. He settled on the continent near Bingen, and founded the monastery of Mt. Disibod, from which the name Disenberg is derived. He governed there under the Irish rule, as abbot-bishop. His life by St. Hildegard was written from visions and is wholly unhistorical. Patron of Disenberg. Feast, 8 July, and 8 Sept.—

Dismissal ipso facto (Lat., ipso facto, by the fact itself) signifies that a religious who has been guilty of certain overt acts is thereby considered to be lawfully cut off from membership in his or her religious society or institute. As opposed to dismissal after a trial, dismissal ipso facto is automatic. The major superior with his chapter or council has only to make a declaration of the fact of guilt in the manner prescribed by the constitution of the religious society in question, and, as a measure of prudence, preserve the proofs of guilt in the archives of the said society. The following, committed by a religious of either sex, effect dismissal ipso facto: public apostasy from the Catholic Faith; flight with a person of the opposite sex (even without intention to marry); attempted marriage, even civil. These acts are incompatible with the religious state and the religious institution as such. Dismissal ipso facto is, therefore, only a legitimate means used by a religious society to protect itself by expelling the unfit.—Papi, Religious in Church Law, N. Y., 1924.

Dispersion of Worship (Lat., disparsitas cultus) is a diriment impediment to matrimony which occurs when one party is a Catholic and the other is unbaptized. Unless by dispensation, such a marriage is null; and for the granting of the said dispensation the signing of certain promises is required, pledging non-interference with the religion of the Catholic party and with the Catholic baptism and training of the children, and also that no ceremony will take place except that before a Catholic priest.

Dispensation (Lat., dispensatio, originally distribution or management), a relaxation of the law in a particular case. It is not an abrogation of the law nor an excuse from it but a release from its observance, granted by competent authority for good reasons. The pope can dispense from all purely ecclesiastical laws no matter by whom they were passed; other authorities in the Church can dispense from the laws they themselves or their predecessors established. From laws passed by a higher superior only those can dispense who are granted the power either by provisions in the general law of the Church or by a special delegation. Those who dispense from their own law can do so validly even without a proportionate cause, though they, too, usually demand one; but inferiors cannot validly dispense from a law of their superiors except for a just reason. As long as this reason continues, at least probably, the dispensation retains its force (can. 80-86). Dispensations are granted from fasting, abstinence, from vows in certain cases, reading the Divine Office, etc. Dispensation, in matrimony, is the removal of an impediment by the Church.—C.E.; Woywod.

Dispersion of the Apostles, Feast of the 15 July, in commemoration of the missionary work of the Twelve Apostles. It was first mentioned in the 11th century and was celebrated in the northern countries of Europe during the Middle Ages. It is now observed in Germany, Poland, and some dioceses of England and France, and in the United States in the ecclesiastical provinces of St. Louis, Chicago, Milwaukee, Dubuque, and Santa Fe.—C.E.

Disputa, La (II., the discussion), a fresco by Raphael, in the Vatican. Representing the Church, militant and triumphant, it portrays saints, doctors and laymen engaged in theological discussion, and above, the heavens opened and Our Lord, overshadowed by the Holy Ghost, and blessed by the Father, offering Himself as a sacrifice for sin. The theme is believed to have been set by some prominent humanist, and as depicted by the artist is stamped with theological dignity, and in warmth of feeling is unequalled by any of Raphael's other works in Rome.

Dissenters (Lat., dissentio, disagree), a more or less contemptuous term restricted to Protestants, (also to Catholics at one time, 1791) who disagree or dissent in matters of doctrine and usage accepted by the Established Church of England. Since the middle of the 19th century they have been included under the title Nonconformists (q.v.).

Dissolution of a Marriage. If a valid Christian marriage has taken place and has been followed with marital intercourse, the union is lifelong; it cannot be dissolved except by death. But if, after a valid Christian marriage, there has been no intercourse (in Latin, matrimonium ratum sed non consummatum, a marriage made but not consummated), such a marriage may be entirely dissolved by a special act of the pope at the request of one or both of the parties, or because one or both intend to make a solemn vow of religious profession.—Ayrinhac, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919.

Distraction (Lat., distractio, draw away), a drawing away of the mind from one point or course to another or others. Here we consider distraction as it is wont to happen in prayer and in the administration of the sacraments. Distraction is voluntary, when the want of attention is due directly or indirectly to an act of will; involuntary when it occurs through no fault on the part of the one distracted. Involuntary distractions at prayer are venially sinful, because they are a manifestation of irreverence toward God. Involuntary distractions are not sinful. Distractions, it need hardly be noted, are destructive of mental prayer, which consists in the fixing of the mind and the heart upon some sacred truth. Distractions do not completely vitiate vocal prayer, though they diminish its perfection, provided always that the original intention of praying was present. Prayer has a threefold effect: it is meritorious, and occasional distractions do not destroy this quality; it has imperative power, and this too it retains in spite of distractions; it refreshes the mind spiritually, and for this effect attention is a necessary condition. Distraction and mind-wandering, on the part of the minister of a sacrament, do not invalidate the sacrament. Provided he has the right intention, and fulfills the essentials of the external rite proper to each sacrament, no matter how much his attention may wander, his act is a human one, and the sacrament is valid. Koeh-Preuss. (J. P. D.)

District of Columbia, the seat of the federal government, ceded to the United States for that purpose by Maryland, and established, 1790-91; area, about 69 1/4 sq. m.; pop., (1927), 540,000; Catholics (1928), 75,000. Its early Catholic history coincides with that of Maryland. Georgetown University, the oldest Catholic institution of higher education in the United States, was founded in 1789, two years before the selection of the site of Washington (q. v.). The first church in Georgetown was that of Holy Trinity, built in 1792; and the first church in Washington was St. Patrick's, built soon after 1794 by Rev. Anthony Caffrey. The District of Columbia is included within the Archdiocese of Baltimore (q. v.). Catholic influence on place-names within the District is limited to one: St. Elizabeth. The U. S. Religious Census of 1916 gave the following statistics for church membership in the District of Columbia:

Dives (Lat., rich). The word has come to be employed as the name of the rich man in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus (Luke, 16) although it is not used in the Bible as a proper noun. —C.E.

Divina Commedia, La (It., The Divine Comedy), an allegory of human life in the form of a vision of the world beyond the grave written, c. 1311-21, by Dante Alighieri with the avowed purpose of converting a corrupt world to righteousness. The poem, 100 cantos in length, written in the measure known as terra rima, is the greatest classic of the Middle Ages and gives a comprehensive picture of Catholic Italy in the 13th century. The poet, writing in the vernacular, shows his knowledge of the literature of antiquity, the philosophy of Aristotle and St. Thomas, the theology of the Fathers, and the mysticism of Sts. Augustine and Bernard. First printing by Johann Numeister, Folignano, 1472.

Divination (Lat., divinare, to foretell), seeking after the knowledge of future or hidden things through means inadequate by nature and unlawful. By natural means some effects can be foreseen with physical certainty; others surmised as probable; others are contingent upon future, free causes and knowable only to God. Divination implies the direct or indirect solicitation of a preternatural evil agency to supplement a natural deficiency. Its practise or patronage is sinful, varying with circumstances. As old as humanity, it existed in every age and country, and nowhere is it completely abandoned. Christianity undermined its power, and after the Apostolic age to the pontificate of Gregory I (6th century) witnesses the formation of the fundamental parts. From Apostolic days, the Church dedicated certain fixed hours to public prayer. These hours were comprised in the vigils extending from evening to dawn. From these vigils which previously had been hours of private prayer, had become a public fixed custom. The hour of Prime (6 a.m.) was instituted in the same century and the hour of Compline, in the 6th century. From the earliest days it was the Book of Psalms that furnished the groundwork of this public prayer. In the West St. Benedict (6th century) rearranged the canonical hours and in other ways regulated the structure and content of the Office. During the second period (6th to 16th century) the Roman Office as celebrated in the Roman basilicas spread into France, England, and Germany. To it were signs, including geomancy by lines or pebbles; drawing of straws; dice; cards, etc.—C.E.; Thome, History of Magic and Experimental Science, N. Y., 1923; Slater, Moral Theology, N. Y., 1908.

Divine Nature, PARTAKERS OF (Lat., consortes divinae naturae), phrase found in 2 Peter, 1, by which St. Peter expresses the excellence of the state of grace. Christian grace imparts to us a sublime share in God’s own life. It makes us children of God, it deifies us, and gives us a supernatural resemblance to Our Heavenly Father by impressing on our souls the image of Christ, His Incarnate Son. This marvelous life of grace is the prelude and means of the eternal life of glory where the blessed see God face to face and love Him in bliss. Thus men are enabled to share in God’s ineffable beatitude by the beatific vision and love of the Triune God. —Divine, Manual of Ascetical Theology, N. Y., 1902.

Divine Office, as contained in approved Breviaries, the group of psalms, hymns, prayers, readings from the Old and New Testaments, patristic homilies, and lives of saints, arranged and formulated by the Church, whereby daily public or liturgical prayer is offered to God. It is also called Cursus, Canonical Hours, or Opus Dei. It is the public and official prayer by which the Church, as a visible society and as the Mystical Body of Christ, offers in union with her Divine Founder, adoration and supplication to God. In consequence, the regulation of this official prayer depends upon the supreme authority in the Church who deems certain representatives (the priesthood) to fulfill this obligation in the name of the universal Church. “It is the common prayer which is offered to God by the minister of the Church in the person of all the faithful” (St. Thomas). It follows from these dogmatic principles that all the faithful habitually pray in the recitation of the Office and that a priest, even though he recite the Office privately, prays in the name of the entire Church.

The history of the Divine Office may be divided into three periods. The first period extending from the Apostolic age to the pontificate of Gregory I (6th century) witnesses the formation of the fundamental parts. From Apostolic days, the Church dedicated certain fixed hours to public prayer. These hours were comprised in the vigils extending from evening to dawn. From these vigils which were daily celebrated in the 4th century emerged the major hours of the Office, Vespers, Matins, and Lauds. In the same century the day hours of Terce (6 a.m.), Sext (12 m.), and None (3 p.m.), which previously had been hours of private prayer, had become a public fixed custom. The hour of Prime (6 a.m.) was instituted in the same century and the hour of Compline, in the 6th century. From the earliest days it was the Book of Psalms that furnished the groundwork of this public prayer. In the West St. Benedict (6th century) rearranged the canonical hours and in other ways regulated the structure and content of the Office. During the second period (6th to 16th century) the Roman Office as celebrated in the Roman basilicas spread into France, England, and Germany. To it were added the festivals of many saints. Through monastic influences, principally Franciscan, it received periodic additions; e.g., hymns (12th century), gradual psalms, suffrages, offices of the B.V.M., and of the Dead, final antiphons.

The third period, from the 16th century to our own day, is characterized by the simplification of the Office and a rearrangement of the psalms to restore the traditional ideal of the recitation of the entire Psalter within the compass of a week. Each complete daily Office requires 33 psalms which are divided among the canonical hours; the longer psalms are divided into two or more parts. The Divine Office is intimately connected with the sacrifice of the Mass which regulates the Office of the day. Within the compass of the annual ecclesiastical cycle, the Church commemorates and renews the mysteries of the life of Christ and the work of the Redemption and honors the saints of God. This fundamental idea determines the structural contents of the Office as assigned to the various canonical hours. As contained in the breviary, the Office is divided into: rubrics or directions for the recitation of the Office; the ordinary, or the normal framework of the Office; the Psalter, or the psalms assigned to each hour of each day; the proper of the season, or the prayers and current scriptural reading and patristic homilies; the proper of the saints, or the prayers and historical lessons for the Office of the Saints; the common of the Saints, or certain variable parts of the Office which may be used for many saints according to their classification; a supplement, containing the office of B.V.M., the office of the Dead, penitential psalms, litanies, etc.—C.E., XI, 219; Batiffol, Histoire du breviaire roman, Paris, 1893.

Divine Praises. The praises recited after benediction of the Blessed Sacrament, beginning "Blessed be God."

Divine Promise. (1) A promise made by God to man, especially the promise of the Redeemer, the promised land. (2) A promise made by man to God in the form of vows.

Divine Right of Kings, the claim of civil rulers to an authority, absolute and inalienable, in temporal and even in spiritual matters, without any responsibility for their use of such power to those whom they govern. It reached its highest pretensions under Henry VIII and James I, and appeared in later times under the Hohenzollern emperors and the czars. Such claim was approved by Luther and Melanchthon, but never by the Catholic Church. Theologians like Aquinas, Bellarmine, and Suarez have refuted it. Authority has its origin from God. It resides directly in the people who transfer or entrust it, not as its source, but as its channel, to those who exercise it for the good of the people and with responsibility to them.

Divinity (Lat., divus, divine), an abstract name for the nature of God; a term much used by Protestants instead of theology, or study of God. (Rd.)

Divinity of Christ. The testimony of Christ concerning Himself clearly reveals Him as the Divine Son of God, and it is proved that Christ's testimony is worthy of credence, and that the Gospels are authentic historical documents. In the Synoptics Christ declares Himself in the first place, as superior to all created beings. He is greater than Solomon and Jonas, greater than Moses and Elias, greater than John the Baptist whom He declared to be the greatest among the sons of men, greater, finally, than the angels of heaven. Secondly, Christ claims for Himself an authority and power which in the O.T. belonged to Yahweh (God) alone: He performs miracles in His own name and confers the same power upon His Apostles; He teaches in His own name and as one having supreme authority; He forgives sin as if committed against Himself; He requires faith and love of Himself as conditions of salvation; He promises to His disciples His perpetual presence and assistance; He promises eternal beatitude for works done on account of Himself; and represents Himself as the final judge of the living and the dead. Thirdly, Christ calls Himself or allows Himself to be called Son of God in the strict sense of the word (Matt., 11; 16; 26; 27). When speaking in the same breath of God's relation to Himself and to His disciples He never says "Our Father" but "My Father" and "Your Father," thereby indicating that the claims of the two are not of the same order. Finally, in confirmation of the prophecies which He pronounced when the Jews sought from Him a sign of His Divine power, Christ rose from the dead on the third day. In St. John's Gospel Christ likewise represents Himself as the "only-begotten Son of God" (3); as consubstantial with the Father: "I and the Father are essentially one with the Father: "My Father worketh until now; and I work" (5); as essentially one with the Father: "I and the Father are one" (10), "I am in the Father and the Father is in me" (14). He approves St. Thomas's confession, "My Lord, and my God" (20). In St. Paul's Epistles Christ is frequently called Kyrios (Lord), a title which in the O.T. was reserved to God alone. He is described as preexisting in the "form of God" (Phil., 2), as the "image of the invisible God," as one in whom "dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead corporeally" (Col., 1; 2), as the "great God" (Tit., 2), and "God blessed forever" (Rom., 9). The early liturgy invokes Christ by the title of Kyrios, acknowledging His most high deification in His honor, and inserts His name in the development of the numerous testimonies of the Fathers echo the clear teaching of the Scriptures.—Arendzen, Whom do you say.—St. L., 1927; Pohle-Preuss, Christology, St. L., 1922.

Divisch, Procopius (1698-1765), Premonstratensian physicien, b. Sonftenberg, Bohemia; d. Prenzitz, Moravia. He constructed the instruments necessary for his experiments in hydraulics and electricity; was among the first to apply electricity to the treatment of disease; and erected a lightning-rod at Prenzitz, 1754, before Franklin's suggestions on the subject were known.—C.E.

Divorce, a legal separation of married persons. It is of three kinds: from the bond of matrimony, which is called an absolute divorce; from the bed, which makes lawful the denial of the marriage debt; from bed and board, which denies the rights of cohabitation. The last two do not cause the cessation of the bond of marriage, and are self-explanatory. For a release from the bond of matrimony in the case of a non-consummated Christian marriage, see Dissolution of a Marriage; and for the dissolving of the bond of a marriage contracted validly by unbaptized persons, one of whom afterwards was baptized in the Catholic Church, see Pauline Privilege. Except in these special cases, the matrimonial bond, once validly contracted, is indissoluble except by death. The State, the civil power, has no right whatever to grant divorces. It has the power to regulate marriages by license, registration, etc., but it has no authority to annul a valid marriage. Statistics prove that the number of divorces is increasing. Those recorded in the United States for 1927 totaled 192,037, an excess of 6 per cent over 1926. Figures in other English-speaking countries (1927) were as follows: England and Wales, 3,190; Scotland, 474; Canada, 748.—C.E.; Ayrinbae, Marriage Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1919.

Divorce in the New Testament. God’s will in regard to the important matter of indissolubility of marriage was first revealed to man in Paradise, when God created man and woman and united them in marriage so that “they shall be two in one flesh” (Gen., 2). God did not withdraw His will by permitting divorce in the Law of Moses, for divorce was merely tolerated. A husband could divorce his wife (not vice versa) because of some indecent deed by giving her a “bill of divorce.” The rabbis and their schools disputed as to what constituted an indecent act, whether adultery or something less evil. “And there came to him [Christ] the Pharisees tempting him, and saying: Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for every cause? Who answering, said to them: Have ye not read, that he who made man from the beginning, made them male and female? And he said: For this cause shall a man leave father and mother, and shall marry another, committeth adultery; and he that shall marry her that is put away, committeth adultery” (Matt., 19).

Among its most famous opponents were St. Ignatius of Antioch, St. Polycarp, St. Hippolytus of Rome, and Dionysius, the author of an “Introduction to the Sacred Scriptures,” long in use in Catholic seminaries.—C.E.

Dixon, Joseph (1806-66), Abp. of Armagh, b. Coalisland, Ireland; d. Armagh. His incumbency and never can concede divorce.—C.E.

D.N., DNS = Dominus (Lord).
D.N.J.C. = Dominus Noster Jesus Christus (Our Lord Jesus Christ).

Docetism is a Christian heresy at all, since it did not arise from its context together with the parallel texts, it is hard to imagine how Protestant moralists could have based their doctrine of divorce upon it. A principle of such important matter must be sought where it is expressed without danger of it misleading the reader. We find it in Mark, 10, Luke, 16, and I Corinthians, 7. Here the clause, “except it be for fornication,” is entirely omitted and no one can explain away the truth of the indissolubility of marriage from these texts. The clause would not have been omitted by the inspired writers, if it were meant to regulate the relations of man and wife, married in the Church of Christ. In Matthew it is added as though in parentheses, for the Pharisees only. They, in Matthew, question Our Lord regarding the causes that would permit divorce. Our Lord lays down the absolute principle of indissolubility for His disciples and for the Church, but at the same time He incidentally elucidates the Old Law to the Pharisees, using the clause as an answer to them, explaining through it that divorce is permitted to them as Jews, but only in case of adultery. Mark narrates Christ’s later private explanation of this matter to His disciples, and omits the clause as Christ Himself did, because it was meant for the Jews and not for His disciples and His Church. Luke in omitting the clause from his Gospel is altogether in concordance with Paul, whose companion and disciple he was. The Church, however, takes the clause of Matthew into consideration and, interpreting it according to the intention of Our Lord, permits in certain cases separation, but at the same time, basing itself on the clear texts of the two other Evangelists and Paul, maintains Christ’s absolute principle of higher perfection and never can concede divorce.—C.E.

Doctor (Gr., dokesis, semblance, appearance), a group of heretics who date back to Apostolic times. Their teaching, that Christ only “seemed” to be a man, to have been born, to have lived and suffered, sought to destroy the meaning and purpose of the doctrine of the Incarnation. Docetism, so far as is known, was always an accompaniment of Gnosticism, and later of Manicheism. Strictly, it is not a Christian heresy at all, since it did not arise from a misconception of dogma by the doctrine of the principle of antagonism between matter and spirit, which also formed the basis for Gnosticism. Among its most famous opponents were St. Ignatius of Antioch, St. Polycarp, St. Hippolytus of Rome, and Tertullian.—C.E.

Docility (Lat., docere, to teach), a readiness to learn from others. Children are docile naturally. When one so perfects nature as to learn willingly from the more experienced, docility becomes part of prudence. In man’s relations with God all are as children, docile by grace to His revelation received through Holy Church. (H. J. W.)

ogy or law. In medieval times, this title was given at first only to professors of civil law, was later applied also to canonists by a decretal of Innocent III (1198-1216), and in the 13th century some universities granted it to students of grammar, medicine, logic, and philosophy. Three degrees were generally recognized, the baccalaureate and the licentiate being mere steps to the degree of doctor, usually synonymous with that of “master.” The doctorate implied the prerogative jus ubique docendi, or the privilege of teaching everywhere without undergoing further examination. The curriculum, the examination, and the length of the course of study differed in the various universities, Bologna requiring six years for the doctorate in canon law, and Paris five years, according to the statutes of 1215. The essential meaning of the doctorate, implying the ability to teach, is preserved in modern academic usage but the degree is now often conferred as an honorary title. S.T.D. (Sacrorum Theologie Doctor, Doctor of Sacred Theology) and D.D. (Doctor Divinitatis, Doctor of Divinity) can be conferred only by theological faculties approved by the pope, and the candidate must make the profession of faith drawn up by Pius IV.

Doctors of the Church, writers who received this title from the Church, owing to their eminence in theology and holiness. They are extolled by the Church not primarily as witnesses of her faith (as are the Fathers), but on account of their brilliant exposition and skilful defense of Catholic doctrine. Unlike the titles of Doctor aubitatis, Doctor resolutissimus, Doctor irrefragabilis, which enthusiastic scholars of the Middle Ages bestowed on renowned professors, this title is official. The first to confer it was Pope Boniface VIII, who in 1255 declared four Fathers the great Doctors of the Latin Church: St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, St. Jerome, St. Gregory the Great. The next to be declared a Doctor was St. Thomas Aquinas in 1567. Since then more than 20 renowned theologians, all of them canonized saints, have received the same seal of approval, either from some pope or from the Sacred Congregation of Rites; the latest are St. Peter Canisius and St. John of the Cross, who received this honor from Pius XI. Owing to their title, the Doctors of the Church enjoy a special authority in the Church, though not all in the same degree nor in the same manner. As a rule, the range and degree of their authority are set forth in the decree by which the title is conferred. Thus St. Alphonsus of Liguori is recommended to theologians as master of moral theology, St. Jerome as biblical scholar, St. Bonaventure as eminent in scholastic theology. Still, their writings are not thereby pronounced infallible throughout, but they are proposed as safe guides, so that their doctrines are to be preferred unless solid reasons favor the opposite.

Doctrine of the Twelve Apostles. See DIOCLESIA.

Document, written or printed paper containing an authoritative record or statement of any kind, usually a source of evidence or information on a particular subject; or anything bearing a legible or significant inscription or legend. It is called authentic if its contents are invested with special authority; genuine if it really emanates from the author. Ecclesiastical documents are attested or witnessed by the chancellor, or clerk of court, or prothonotary apostolic. In order to be valid, they require essential formalities as dates, signatures, qualifications of persons, accurate names of witnesses, etc. The beginning of written documents is at the end of the time of the Judges, for the people at that time were generally acquainted with the art of writing, reading, and were settled in prosperity.—P.C. Augustine.

Dog, representation in art associated with St. Roch, St. Hubert, and St. Tobias as companion.

Dogma (Gr., opinion, decree), an opinion or belief authoritatively stated, a truth appertaining to faith or morals, revealed by God, transmitted by the Apostles in the Scriptures or tradition, and proposed by the Church as an article of faith, to be accepted by the faithful. In the sense that a dogma is an idea, it follows that dogmatism is necessary for religion, since a religion without ideas is meaningless. The dogmas of the Church, being the intellectual conception and verbal express of Divine truth, naturally take on the characteristic of truth, viz., unchangeableness or immutability.
Mathematics has certain dogmas which are permanent and fixed because they are grounded in the very nature of reason itself, e.g., the principle that the whole is greater than any of its parts. The dogmas of the Church, on the other hand, are true because grounded on the authority of the Divine Reason who reveals them. The term dogma is also used in an odious sense of a statement made arbitrarily or arrogantly.—C.E.; Otten, Manual of the History of Dogmas, St. L., 1917.

Dogmatic Facts are certain truths which, though not revealed by God, come nevertheless under the teaching authority of the Church because of their close connection with revealed doctrines. They are involved, for instance, in such questions as these:
Was the election of Pius XI canonical, so that he is the rightful successor of St. Peter? Are the Saints canonized by the Church really in heaven? Is this or that condemned teaching really contained in a certain book? If the Church did not enjoy infallible authority to determine such matters, it would be practically impossible for her to carry out her Divine mission.—C.E.; Hunter, Outlines of Dogmatic Theology, N. Y., 1894.

(D. A. A.)

Dogmatic Theology concerns itself with the truths which come from God, explaining them, tracing them to Scripture and tradition, answering difficulties, and objections brought against them, and pointing out how they fit in with our rational knowledge and spiritual life. See THEOLOGY.—Pohle-Preuss.

(D. A. A.)

Dolbeau, Jean (1586-1652), missionary, b.
Province of Anjou, France; d. Orleans. He was one of the first band of Recollect missionaries to Canada.
He celebrated the first Mass said in Quebec and built the first Recollect monastery there.—C.E.

Dolci, dol'-che, Carlo (1616-86), painter, b.
Florence; d. there. He was one of the last of the Florentine school and painted exclusively religious pictures. They were notable for perfection of finish and were popular in his day and since, though critics consider them over-sentimental. His masterpiece is "St. Andrew Praying before his Crucifixion," now in the Pitti Palace. His "Mater Dolorosa" has been reproduced numberless times. The "Madonna and Child" of the Corsini Gallery, in Rome, is also well known, as is the "Magdalen" of the Uffizi.—C.E.

Döllinger, Johann Joseph Ignaz von (1799-1889), historian and theologian, b. Bamberg, Bavaria; d. Munich. Shortly after his ordination in 1822 he became professor of canon law and church history at the University of Munich. One of the foremost scholars of his day, he was advanced, but from ranking as a vigorous defender of Catholic interests he came by degrees to believe in a nationalized form of Catholicism.
In 1871 he refused to accept the dogma of papal infallibility and was thereupon excommunicated.

The "Old Catholics" (q.v.) regarded him as a member, but Döllinger never submitted to their schis-matic bishop. He died outside the communion of the Church. His principal works are histories of the document of the Holy Eucharist, of the Reformation, and of Catholic theology.—C.E.

Dolman, Charles (1807-63), publisher and published "The Catholic Magazine," and later "Dol-man's Magazine and Monthly Miscellany of Criticism" which became "The Weekly Register." His constant aim was to raise the standard of the Catholic press.—C.E.

Dolores Mission (Mission San Francisco de Asis de los Dolores), a Californian mission founded, 1776, by the Franciscans, Frs. Francisco Palou and Pedro Benito Cambon. The first secular priest took charge, 1816. The corner-stone of the precent church, the oldest in San Francisco, was laid, 1782. The mission building laid out in the form of a squirre was the center of great industrial and agricultural activity. The school was opened, 1818.

Dolphin, Christian symbol signifying the swiftness with which Christians should seek Christ; also tenderness of conugal love. The favorite representation is two dolphins tending towards some emblem of Christ, such as an anchor and cross. It is usually the emblem of the disciple rather than Christ.—C.E.

Dom, title of the religious of the Benedictine and Cistercian orders; an abbreviation of "Dominus," originally applied to the popes, later to bishops, and finally to monks. "Don" is used in Italy for all declers except Mendicant Friars and Regular Clerks.
The form "Dan" was employed in medieval English, and "Monsieur" has always been used in France.

D.O.M. = Deo Optimo Maximo (To God, the Best and Greatest).

Dom = Dominica (Sunday).

Domare cordis impetus Elisabeth, or To RULE THEY HEART, ELIZABETH, hymn for Vespers and Matins on feast of St. Elizabeth of Portugal, 8 July.
It was written by Pope Urban VIII (d. 1644). There are four translations. The English title given is by D. Donahoe.—Britt.

Dome (Lat., domus, house), architectural term, often used synonymously with cupola. Strictly speaking it is the external part of the raised covering of which the cupola is the inner; in general it is applied to the entire covering. It is sometimes used, as in the Italian Duomo, to designate a cathedral. A dome day be of any material and of varied construction.
It is called circular, elliptical, or polygonal according to the figure of the base. The dome in its primitive form is of great antiquity, but was developed by the Romans and carried to Constantinople, where it became the dominant factor in church architecture. The Roman dome, of which the Pantheon is the finest example, is a hemisphere supported by a curtural wall. Byzantine domes were placed over square apartments and had no outer covering.
Medieval builders rarely used it except in Spain and Italy. In English Gothic it became the lantern.
The Saracens use flattened cupolas; the Arabs, a pointed dome.—C.E.

Domenichino, DÔ-mä- nâ-kô'-mô, or DOMENICO ZAMPIERI (1581-1641), painter, b. Bologna, Italy; d. Naples. After studying in the Carracci Academy, Bologna, he went early to Rome where he was employed in decorating many of the churches and was honored by Gregory XV. He excelled in portraiture and in the landscapes introduced into his religious pictures. His masterpiece, “The Communion of St. Jerome,” now in the Vatican collection, is considered one of the great pictures of the world.—C.E.

Domestic Prelate. See Prelate.

Domicile (Lat., domicilium, habitation, dwelling), a person’s stable residence in virtue of which he becomes subject to local authority and is entitled to certain rights. It can be acquired in two ways.

For one way two things are necessary: that he actually take up his residence in a given place; and that he intend to remain there permanently (can. 92, § 1). This intention does not deprive him of his freedom to change his residence, but it requires that at present he have no intention of leaving it. The moment both those conditions are verified, domicile is acquired. It is also acquired by an actual residence for a full 10 years even without the intention of establishing a permanent residence in the place (can. 92, § 1). He can have two or more domiciles by establishing distinct permanent residences, e.g., for summer and for winter.

Voluntary domicile can be acquired by an adult who is not juridically dependent upon another. A wife who is not legitimately separated from her husband retains the domicile of her husband, minor children that of their father (or widowed mother), and the insane that of their guardian, wherefore this is called necessary domicile. A wife not legitimately separated from her husband and minor children above the age of seven years can acquire only a quasi-domicile (can. 93). Of itself, absence from his domicile, no matter how long protracted, does not deprive a person of that domicile. He loses it only if he leaves it with the intention of not continuing his residence in the same place (can. 95). By domicile one obtains a proper parish and a proper diocese (can. 94). He thereby becomes subject to a certain pastor and bishop and is entitled, and with some exceptions obliged, to ask certain ministrations of them. Thus he is bound to obey the bishop of his domicile and the particular laws of the diocese (except when abroad), and can be sued only in the court of that diocese. Similarly he is entitled to seek the usual ministrations from his proper pastor and must ordinarily receive those strictly reserved to the latter from him.

Quasi-Domicile is similar to domicile. It is acquired by actual residence in a place with the intention of remaining there for the greater part of the year or by actually staying there so long. It is lost in the same manner as domicile and produces the same effects as domicile in all respects except that quasi-domicile does not suffice for lawful ordination.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine. (v. t. s.)

Dominations, those angels who compose the highest choir of the second or intermediate order of angels. It is difficult to distinguish their special duties from those of the Powers and Virtues, with whom they are associated in this order of the angelic hierarchy. To the Dominations, however, is generally attributed authority to direct the other two in the performance of their allotted tasks. (A. J. s.)

Domine, Non Sum Dignus (Lat., Lord, I am not worthy), words of the centurion to Our Lord when He offered to go to his house to cure his daughter; repeated by the priest at Mass thrice before he communicates and thrice also before giving Communion to the people. (Ed.)

Domine Quo Vadis, a church situated on the Appian Way near Rome, on the traditional spot where, according to St. Ambrose, St. Peter was vouchsafed a vision of Christ. At the urgent request of the Christians, Peter was fleeing the persecution of Nero, when, seeing Christ, he fell at His feet crying “Lord, wister guest Thou?” Christ’s reply that He was going to Rome to be crucified anew was interpreted by Peter as a sign to return to Rome, and he therefore retraced his steps to the city.—Chandlery, Pilgrim Walks in Rome, St. L., 1927.

Dominic, Saint, confessor (1170-1221), founder of the Dominican Order, b. Calaroga, Old Castile; d. Bologna, Italy. After a brilliant career at the University of Palencia, where he studied philosophy and theology, he was ordained priest and appointed canon in the cathedral of Osma. He was instrumental in effecting ecclesiastical reforms, and in 1203 accompanied his bishop to southern France where he devoted himself to combating the Albigenian heresy. At Toulouse, according to tradition, the devotion of the Rosary was revealed to him. His preaching and reputation for sanctity drew many to him. He founded the first house of his order at Toulouse, 1215, the purpose of the community being to propagate the true doctrine and to combat heresy. He traveled extensively, personally supervising the establishment of houses in Spain, Italy, and France. He is credited with numerous extraordinary mir-

Dominica, dependency of the British Empire, in the British West Indies, with an elective system of government; area, 305 sq. m.; pop., 37,059. Ecclesiastically the island belongs to the Diocese of Roseau (q.v.), on the island of Dominica, B. W. I., and has 16 churches, 18 priests, 1 college, 17 primary schools, and 5000 Catholics.

Dominical Letter, device of old chronologers to find the day of the week corresponding to any given date.—C.E.

Dominican Republic or SANTO DOMINGO, republic occupying the eastern pa't of the island of Haiti, in the West Indies; est. area, 19,332 sq. mi.; est. pop., 897,405. The island was discovered in 1492 by Columbus who named it Hispaniola, and in 1513 the See of Santo Domingo, the oldest bishopric in the New World, was established by Leo X, and erected into an archdiocese, 1547. The island remained under Spanish rule until 1844, when the natives of the eastern part established an independent republic. Catholicism is the state religion though others are permitted. The Archdiocese of Santo Domingo, comprising the republic, has 55 churches, 64 priests, 29 sisters, and 600,000 Catholics.—C.E.

Dominic of Silos, Saint, abbot (d. 1073), b. Cañas, Navarra, Spain; d. Silos. He entered the Benedictine Order, was prior of San Millan de Cogolla, reformed the monastery of Cañas, and was prior of Caldas, 1034. In 1041 he was made prior of the monastery of Silos which he reformed and restored. Patron of captives and of pregnant women, Bl. Jane of Guzman having obtained through his intercession the conception of St. Dominic. To this day his staff is brought by the Abbot of Silos to the bedside of the Queen of Spain where it remains during the birth of the royal children. Feast, 20 Dec.

Dominic of the Mother of God or DOMENICO BARBERI (1792-1849), Passionist theologian, b. near Viterbo, Italy; d. near Reading, England. He established the Passionist Order in England, and received into the Church a number of remarkable converts of the Oxford Movement, among them John Dobree Dal-matia and John Henry Newman. His writings include works on philosophy and theology, several devotional books, and a letter on Anglican difficulties.—C.E.

Dominus, MARCO ANTONIO DE (1560-1624), ecle-siastic, scientist, and apostate, b. island of Arbe, off Dalmatia; d. Rome. Having left the Jesuit Order, he was made Bp. of Zengg and Modrus and later transferred to Spalato. After becoming involved in the quarrels between the Holy See and Venice, he apostatized, and was welcomed to England by James I. He wrote a number of violent anti-Roman works, but eventually alienated his English friends and returned to Rome. Having recanted all that he had written against the papacy, he attacked the Anglican Church with equal violence. He finally came into conflict with the Inquisition, was declared a relapsed heretic, and was confined in the Castle of Sant' Angelo, where he died. The case having been continued, his body was burned, together with his works. According to Newton he was the first to develop the theory of the rainbow, a claim which is disputed in favor of Descartes.—C.E.

Donatello (Donato de' Bardi), sculptor, b. Florence; d. there. He is the founder of modern sculpture, his work being the first to combine realism with classic excellence. Among his earliest statues were those for the exterior of the church of Or San Michele in Florence, including the well-known "St. George," now in the Bargello, where a hall is given up to his work. In 1434 he executed the bronze "David," also in the Bargello, for Cosimo de' Medici. With Michelozzo he designed the Campanile of Florence. For the Duomo he did the choir-loft with the beautiful reliefs of singing and dancing boys, a favorite subject with him. In Padua is his bronze equestrian statue of Gattamelata.—C.E.

Donation, a gift; a gratuitous transfer of a thing to another. Donatio causa mortis is a gift made in contemplation of death, but which becomes irrevocable and valid only after the death of the giver.—C.E.; P. C. Augustine.

Donation of Constantine (Lat., Donatio Constantini), a forged document containing concessions of great privileges and rich possessions, supposedly made by Constantine the Great to the pope and the Church. In many manuscripts the document bears the title "Constitutum domini Constantini Imperatoris" (Ordinance of lord Constantine Emperor).
It is divided into two parts. The first, entitled the "Confessio," sets forth how the emperor was instructed in the faith by Pope Sylvester I (314-335), baptized by him, and cured of leprosy. In the second part, entitled "Donatio," the emperor is made to recognize the primacy of the Church, and to grant to the Bp. of Rome certain marks and insignia of honor, e.g., the tiara and the imperial robes. In addition the emperor transfers to the pope and his successors, as their property, the city of Rome as well as the castles, towns, and provinces of all Italy and the West. The account of the baptism, cure, and donation are entirely legendary, the last being built up, no doubt, on the contributions of Constantine to the Patrimony of St. Peter. The origin of this document is much disputed. It was composed by an unknown author, between 750-850, most probably in France, although many hold it was composed in Rome. It is sometimes attributed to the author of the False Decretals (but without sufficient reason), sometimes to some Roman ecclesiastic. Laurentius Valla proved it to be a forgery, 1440. Various opinions exist as to the purpose of the document. Some hold it was intended to support the claims of the popes to secular power in Italy; others, to exalt the power of the popes over the emperors. Most probably it was composed to establish the legitimacy of the foundation of the Western Roman Empire against the emperors of Constantinople. At any rate the popes never considered this "Donation" as the basis of their power, nor placed upon entirely different grounds the foundation of the papal prerogatives and the powers exercised by the Holy See.—C.E. (M. E. D.)

Donatists, a heretical and schismatical sect (311-411) who claimed that the validity of the sacraments depended on the moral character of the minister, and that sinners could not be members of the Church and could not be tolerated by a true Church unless their sins were secret. The sect came into existence in Africa during the disorders following the persecution under Diocletian (303-305). The leader was Donatus, Bp. of Carthage, in opposition to Majorinus, whom he accused of being invalidly consecrated because his predecessor had been consecrated by a traditor. The claims of the sect were opposed by Pope Miliades, 313; the Council of Arles, 314; the Emperor Constantine the Great, 316; and by St. Augustine, 391-411, when a conference was held at Carthage in which the Donatists were confounded. Their churches were seized, and they were exiled. They disappeared from history after the Saracenic invasion of Africa.—C.E.

Donatus, SAINT, martyr (362), Bp. of Arezzo, b. Nicomedia; d. Rome. He was educated at Rome, fled to Arezzo during the persecution of Diocletian, and was elected bishop in 346. He suffered torments and was put to death. Relics at Ostia. Feast, R. Cal., 7 Aug.—Butler.

Dongan, Thomas (1634-1715), second Earl of Limerick, colonial governor of New York, b. Co. Kil­ dare, Ireland; d. London. Under his supervision the representative assembly of New York Province passed an act, 1683, entitled "A Charter of Lib­ erties," which developed into the present state government and was subsequently adopted by Eng­ land as the framework of her colonial policy. He established in New York City a college under the direction of the Jesuit Fathers.—C.E.

Donus (or Domnus), Pope (676-678), b. and d. Rome. He restored and repaired many Roman churches during his pontificate; opposed the Mono­ thelite heresy, and received the substance of Reparatus, Abp. of Ravenna, to the papacy.—C.E.; Mann.

Door. In John, 10, Our Lord, explaining the parable of the sheepfold, calls Himself "the door" through which the true shepherds must pass. The meaning is that teachers of religion must have a mission from Him. This is the inter­ pretation given by St. John Chrysostom, Fr. Rickaby, Fr. Lagrange, and other com­ mentators. Others, with St. August­ ine, think that Our Lord refers to the sheep rather than to the shepherds in these verses; He would affirm that to be saved one must come under His influence. Abp. Ma­ Roney holds that He compares himself to a door with reference both to the sheep and to the shepherds; "I am the door of the sheep. All others . . . are thieves and robbers . . . By me, if any man enter in, he shall be saved: and he shall go in, and go out, and shall find pastures" (John, 10, 7-9).

Dorchester, Abbey of, near Oxford, England, founded, 1140, by Alexander, Bp. of Lincoln, for canons of the Order of St. Augustine (Black Canons). Henry VIII reserved most of the property for a college which was later suppressed; no register of Dorch­ ester Abbey now exists. The church as it stands today was built by the Augustinian Canons.—C.E.

Doria, Andrea (1468-1560), admiral and states­ man, b. Oneglia, Italy; d. Genoa. Of a powerful Geno­ ese family, Doria served (1487-92) in the guards of Pope Innocent VIII, and later joined the Knights of St. John of Jerusalem. In 1503 he reorganized the Genoese fleet and commanded successively the galleys of France, of Pope Clement VII (1525), and of Austria (1532), directing the warfare against the Turks and Barbary pirates. The church of San­ Matteo, Genoa, which contains his tomb, was re­ stored by him from plans by Fra Montorsoli.—C.E.
Doric Order, in architecture, name given to the earliest Greek order characterized by extreme simplicity. The columns are without base and the capitals simple; friezes have alternate triglyphs and metopes.

Dorothea (Gr., gift of God), Saint, virgin, martyr (c. 311), d. Caesarea, Cappadocia. According to the legend the pagan, Theophilus, mocked her on her way to execution, “Bride of Christ, send me some fruits from your bridgroom’s garden.” Before she was put to death she sent him her headdress filled with heavenly fragrance of roses and fruits. He, confessing his newly-found faith, was also martyred. Patroness of gardeners. Emblems: crown of flowers and fruit. Relics in church of St. Dorothea, Rome. Feast, 6 Feb.—C.E. Butler.

Dossal or Dosserl. (Lat., dorsum, back), curtain at the back of the altar.

Dorsey, Anne Hanson (1815-96), novelist, b. Georgetown, D. C., d. Washington. She was the daughter of a minister, was converted to the Catholic Faith, and thenceforth devoted herself to writing Catholic fiction. Among her best-known novels are “Tangled Paths,” “The Old House at Glenarra,” “Adrift,” “Warp and Woof,” “The Palms.”—C.E.

Dositheans, followers of Dositheus, a Samaritan who is said to have formed a Gnostic-Judaic sect previous to Simon Magus; Dositheus is often classed as the first heretic. Nothing certain is known of his life or activities. He is considered more as the founder of a Jewish sect than an anti-Christian heretic.—C.E.

Douai, d.o., town, department of Nord, France, on the Scarpe River. It was strongly fortified in the Middle Ages and was the seat of Douai University. To the English college founded there by Card. Allen, 1568, is largely due the religious training of the English clergy in penal times, and the preservation and antiquity, a symbol and simulation, produced in a spirit of opposition to many doctrines of the Catholic Church. This work was begun at the English College, Douai, Flanders. The college was subsequently moved to Reims, where the translation of the N.T. was completed and published; hence it is called the “Reims Testament.” The translation of the O.T. was published several years later, after the college had returned to Douai. The greater part was translated by Gregory Martin; his text was revised by Thomas Worthington, Richard Bristowe, John Reynolds, and Card. Allen. The translation was made directly from the Latin Vulgate, carefully compared with the Hebrew and Greek texts. It aimed at accuracy rather than beauty of style, and was, therefore, somewhat stilted and abounded in Latinisms. In the 18th century it was revised by Bp. Challoner, who introduced extensive changes. His revision of the Douay Version is the Bible now commonly used by Catholics in English-speaking countries.—C.E.; Pope; Grannan. (N. T.)

Double Feast (Lat., festum duplex), a rank given to the more important festivals of the year. The most solemn are called doubles of the first class, e.g., Christmas and the Epiphany; next come doubles of the second class, the feasts of some of the Apostles; then major doubles (duplicita majora); and ordinary doubles. The term “double” is used for all of these because in the Sacred Office the antiphon of each psalm is given in full before the psalm as well as after, i.e., it is doubled for each psalm, except for the Little Hours when it is repeated after the three psalms for each. (J. F. S.)

Doubt, a mental attitude opposed to certitude and error, in which the mind fluctuates between two contradictory propositions, suspending judgment because of fear of error. The term includes all states intermediate between ignorance and certitude. If the judgment is suspended because the regions on either side are equally balanced, the doubt is positive; if this be due to the fact that valid reasons are absent on both sides, the doubt is negative.—C.E. (L. c.)

Douglas, Gavin (c. 1474-1522), Bp. of Dunkeld and poet; d. London. A son of the fifth Earl of Angus, his participation in the political turmoil of his time interfered with his literary career. He was deprived of his see and fled to England. While still a country rector he wrote his fine allegory “The Palice of Honour.” His best-known work is a translation of the “Eneid.”—C.E.

Dove, in Christian antiquity, a symbol and a Eucharistic vessel. (1) A symbol of the Holy Spirit it is specially connected with Baptism (Matt. 3). In pictures of the Annunciation it signifies the Incarnation of Our Saviour by the power of the Holy Ghost. It also symbolizes martyrdom and the Church. The dove with an olive branch was used on a sarcophagus to signify peace and hope of Resurrection; in flight, it represents the Ascension of Christ or the entrance of saints into glory. (2) Since early medieval times the Holy Eucharist was reserved for the sick in a dove-shaped vessel suspended to the baldachino over the altar; later the dove was enclosed in a tower upon the altar. A vessel of like form was hung over the early baptisteries.——C.E.

Dowdall, George (1487-1558), Abp. of Armagh, b. Drogheda, Co. Louth, Ireland; d. London. He was prior of the monastery of Crutched Friars at Ardee at the time of its suppression, 1539, was pensioned, and became the schismatical Abp. of Armagh. Under Queen Mary he led the Catholic party, endeavored to repair the injuries to religion, suffered during the preceding reigns, and having renounced the schism, was appointed by the pope to his original see.——C.E.

Dower, a widow’s life portion, granted by law, in the estate of her deceased husband, usually one-third interest in all the real estate which he possessed at any time during their married life; the term is sometimes erroneously confounded with dowry.——C.E.

Down and Connor, Diocese of, Ireland, comprises Antrim, the greater part of Down, and the Liberties of Coleraine, in Derry Co.; area, c. 576 sq. m.; suffragan of Armagh. St. Fergus (d. 583) was probably the first Bp. of Down; St. Macnisse, founded the See of Connor, 480, and St. Malachy was bishop there (1124). Although several times united in their early history, the dioceses were not permanently joined until 1451. Bishops of the united dioceses include the martyrs Cornelius O’Devanny and Heber MacMahon (17th century); episcopal residence, Belfast. The ancient cathedral of Down and Connor is in ruins. Churches, 116; priests, secular, 170; priests, regular, 35; religious women, 250; seminary, 1; high schools, 11; numerous primary schools; institutions, 27; Catholics, 165,256; others, 545,778.

Downpatrick, capital of Co. Down, Ireland, oldest town in Ulster, once the residence of the Irish kings. A see was founded here, c. 446, by St. Patrick. The priory of the Austin Canons was established by St. Malachy in the 12th century. Downpatrick is the burial place of Sts. Patrick, Columba, and Brigid.

Downside Abbey, Somersetshire, England, founded, 1685, at Douai, Flanders, by English Benedictines of the Spanish Congregation. In 1611 a monastery was erected by Philippe de Coverel. Abbot of St. Vaast at Arras, who is hence regarded as the founder. During the French Revolution the monks were imprisoned until 1795, when they were allowed to leave for England where they were harbored by a former pupil, Sir Edward Smythe, at Acton Burnell, Shropshire. In 1814 they moved to Mount Pleasant, Downside. Their priory was constituted an abbey by Leo XIII, 1899. Their school for sons of the Catholic English gentry is modeled on the English public school. The abbey grounds contain the monastery, school-buildings, guest-house, and abbey-church, one of the handsomest modern Gothic buildings in England. The monks also conduct schools in Ealing, London, in Gorey, Ireland, and houses of studies at Cambridge and London. They are engaged also in missions and parishes dependent on the abbey. Publications include the “Downside Review,” concerning monastic and liturgical interests, and “Downside Masses” and “Downside Motets,” devoted to polyphonic music.——C.E.

Dowry, a definite sum of money, or its equivalent, the income derived from the property of a woman who, by her profession, has become a member of her community. The dowry is transferred to the community before the candidate receives the religious habit, and becomes the property of the community when the religious makes her profession, but with certain restrictions. It may not be disposed of, e.g., to provide for a dependent one of the religious family, and but it must be carefully invested, the income to be used for the support of the religious in question. Only after the death of the religious does it become the absolute property of the community, and then it may be disposed of in any manner whatever. Should a religious leave the order or congregation for any reason, the capital which constituted her dowry must be returned to her without interest; the term is also applied to the property which a wife brings to her husband in marriage.—C.E., V, 146; P.C. Augustine.

Doxology (Gr., doce, praise; logos, word), tribute of praise, as in the Gloria in Excelsis (Glory in the highest), hymn of the angels at the Birth of Our Saviour, repeated at every Mass, except at votive and requiem Masses; and in the Gloria Patri (Glory be to the Father), the short doxology.—C.E.

Doyle, James Warren (1786-1834), Bp. of Killarney and Leighlin, b. near New Ross, Ireland; d. Carlow. As bishop he published many pamphlets and letters repelling the attacks of Protestant sentine and describing the evils of the state of Ireland. Summoned for examination before two Parliamentary committees, it was remarked that it was he who examined them. He vigorously supported O'Connell, though after the passage of the Catholic Emancipation Act the two men frequently disagreed.

Doyle, John (1797-1868), portrait painter and caricaturist, b. Dublin; d. London. He came to London, 1821, as a portrait painter, but began his clever and good-humoried caricatures in 1827. About 600 of these are in the British Museum and constitute a graphic history of contemporary events. He concealed his identity under his double signature disguised as H.B.—C.E.

Richard (1824-83), painter, illustrator, and caricaturist, son of preceding, b. London; d. there. He began his career at 15 with "The Eglinton Tournament, or the Days of Chivalry Revived." The next year he commenced his "Journal," now preserved in the British Museum, and reproduced in facsimile, 1885. In 1843 he became a regular contributor to the newly established "Punch." His clever cover design, signed with his monogram, a letter D with a little "dickey-bird," is still used. He resigned from the staff, 1850, as a loyal Catholic unwilling to support the periodical in its bigoted opposition to the restoration of the Catholic hierarchy. He afterwards illustrated "The Newcomers," "The King of the Golden River," "An Old Fairy Tale," and other Dreams, interpretation of. Though there is Scriptural warrant for preternatural origin and purpose of dreams, e.g., Jacob's ladder dream (Gen., 28) and that of St. Joseph on the flight of the Holy Family into Egypt (Matt., 2), still dreams generally arise from the mind's own knowledge beyond what could be obtained from other natural sources. Dreams may at times profitably be the subject of psychological investigation, but even here their value can be exaggerated or abused, as in Freudian systems.—C.E.; Ladd, Doctrine of Sacred Scripture, N. Y., 1883.

Drexel, Francis Anthony (1824-85), banker and philanthropist, b. Philadelphia; d. there. As head of the banking house of Drexel and Co. he was one of America's foremost financiers. He was most generous in aiding charities and left a great part of his estate to the Church.—C.E.

Drogheda, seaport in Louth, Ireland, on the Boyne. Here in 1152 the papal legate condemned the famous "Poynings Laws." The town was besieged by Cromwell in 1649 and was the scene of a massacre. It surrendered to William III after the battle of the Boyne. St. Peter's chapel served as the cathedral of the Archbishops of Armagh. There are ruins of the Dominican monastery (1224), and of the Augustinian abbey (1204). Pop., 12,888.

Dromore, Diocese of, in Ireland, comprises parts of Down, Armagh, and Antrim counties; suffragan of Armagh; founded 6th century by St. Colman, first bishop. The ancient cathedral, taken by the Protestants, was burnt in 1641 by Irish insurgents, and later rebuilt. The list of its bishops includes: Michael Blake (1533-90), John Leahy (1860-90), Henry McGivern (1860-90), Henry O'Neill (1901-15), Edward Mulhern (1916); residence at Newry. Churches, 2; high schools, 7; numerous primary schools; institutions, 4; Catholics, 43,069; others, 69,905.

Drostan (DUSTAN or THROSTAN), Saint, abbot fl. c. 600. Of the royal house of Scæmuad, he was educated by St. Columba and embraced the monastic life under the Benedictine Rule. He accompanied St. Columba to Aberdeen, Feast, 11 July.—C.E.; Butler.

Druidism, a secret cult which dealt with the magic arts practised in ancient Gaul and the British Isles. The Druids as priests, diviners, judges, teachers, physicians, astronomers, and philosophers, formed a class apart from and above the people whom they kept in subjection. Their chief duties were to teach and by means of a system of oral education, and to preside over the traditional religious ceremonies. They had special regard for the El Hakim, whom he proclaimed to be an incarnation to the Maronite Catholics dwelling on the slopes of Lebanon. Their name is derived from their leader, Dorazy, a Persian at the Egyptian court. He was superseded by El Hady, the real founder of the sect and author of its books. Copies of these sacred books of the Druzes, hidden from the world for eight centuries, are now in European libraries.—C.E.

Druzes, a Mohammedan sect in Syria opposed to the Maronite Catholics dwelling on the slopes of the Lebanon. Their name is derived from their leader, Dorazy, a Persian at the Egyptian court. He was superseded by El Hady, the real founder of the sect and author of its books. Copies of these sacred books of the Druzes, hidden from the world for eight centuries, are now in European libraries.—C.E.

Dryden, John (1631-1700), poet and dramatist. He left Azizus to marry Claudius Felix, governor of Judea. It was before them that St. Paul appeared to give testimony of the religion of Christ. He was superseded by El Hady, the real founder of the sect and author of its books. Copies of these sacred books of the Druzes, hidden from the world for eight centuries, are now in European libraries.—C.E.

Dryburgh, Abbey of, Melrose, Scotland, founded, 1150, by Hugo de Morville, Constable of Scotland. It belonged to the Premonstratensian Canons. Burnt by Edward II, 1322, it was restored under Robert I. The tomb of Sir Walter Scott attracts many visitors. —C.E.

Drumgoole, John (1816-88), priest and philanthropist. His critical writings were numerous and various. Dryden's position in English literature is of great importance as a poet, dramatist, critic, and translator. His poems include "Annus Mirabilis" and "Alexander's Feast." Among his plays is "All for Love."—C.E.; Maher, Psychology, N. Y., 1912.
Ferns, and Ossory; founded as an archiepiscopal see, 1155, the archbishop receiving the title of Primate of Ireland. Part of the Diocese of Glendalough, formerly erected in 1118, was at this time united with Dublin. In Glendalough was the famous monastic establishment of St. Kevin, founded in the 6th century, ruins of which may still be seen. The Cathedral of the Holy Trinity, Dublin, founded, 1038, by King Sitric II, has been the Protestant Christ Church since the Reformation. The transepts and a bay of the choir date from the 12th century. Early figures in British Catholic literature. Among them were mentioned the Society of the Sacred Heart. In 1818 she was sent with the community into the United States in 1801, the first bishop having been the Spaniard, Rt. Rev. Louis Peftalver. In 1812 he was appointed as its first president. In 1818, at the suggestion of St. Madeleine Sophie Barat, she incorporated her community into the Society of the Sacred Heart. In 1818 she was sent with the Southern states of the United States.
four companions to establish the order in America. She settled at St. Charles, and continued her work despite the countless difficulties which confronted her, founding houses at Florissant, Grand Côteau, New Orleans, St. Louis, and St. Michael. She journeyed to Sugar Creek, Kan., and labored there among the Potawatome Indians. Declared Venerable, 1900. —C.E.; Erskine, Mother Philippine Duchesne, N. Y., 1926.

Duchesne College of the Sacred Heart, Omaha, Neb., founded, 1915; conducted by the Religious of the Society of the Sacred Heart of Jesus; preparatory school; college of arts and sciences; graduate and extension courses; professors, 16; students, 120; degrees conferred in 1929, 12.

Duel (Lat., duellum, old form of bellum, war), a contest with deadly weapons between two persons to settle a private quarrel, usually over an insult or wounded honor. It is of heathen origin but was so deeply rooted in the habits of converted nations that the Church had to use most severe measures to stop it. As governments became more civilized and as the evil grew they too had to do their utmost to suppress it. It is a rare practise today, as both the civil and religious authorities have impressed on men how contrary it is to common sense. It involves the double crime of murder and of suicide, victor and victim each intending the death of the other and each imperiling life without due reason. —C.E.

Dukhobors (Spirit Wrestlers), Russian sect founded at Kharkov, c. 1740. They spread rapidly but because of their resistance to authority were persecuted by the government, deported to Transcaucasia, 1837, and finally allowed to migrate to Canada, 1898. They deny the Holy Ghost, place minor importance on the Scriptures, and consider the Church an assembly of the righteous on earth. Their number over 9000.

Du Lhut (DULUTH), DANIEL GREYSOLDN, SIEUR (1640-1710), pioneer ranger, b. St. Germain-en-Laye, France; d. Montreal; an officer in the French army, he went to Canada and took possession of the Sioux country in the name of the King of France. He was the first Canadian to explore the West and for 50 years succeeded in keeping the region west of the Great Lakes under French control. In 1668 he laid the foundation of the post of Detroit. The city of Duluth, Minn., takes its name from him. Du Lhut visited the countries around the Great Lakes, 1679-80. It was during these journeys that he met the Recollect Fr. Louis Hennepin and his two companions Michel Arnauld and Antoine Auguette and rescued them from their captivity among the Sioux Indians. —C.E.

Dulia, dů-li'a (Gr., douleia, service), veneration or homage paid to the saints. See Veneration of the Saints.

Duluth, Diocese of, Minnesota, embraces Aitkin, Carlton, Cass, Cook, Crow Wing, Itasca, Lake, Pine, Koochiching, and St. Louis counties; area, 22,354 sq. m.; established, 1889; suffragan of St. Paul, 1890; bishops: James McGolrick (1889-1918), John T. McNicholas, O.P. (1918-25), Thomas A. Welch (1926), Churches, 135; priests, secular, 88; priests, regular, 16; religious women, 371; college, 1; high schools, 5; primary schools, 10; pupils in parochial schools, 6,498; institutions, 3; Catholics, 60,898.

Dumas, Jean Baptiste (1800-84), chemist and senator, b. Alais, France; d. Cannes. Alone or with others he carried on brilliant investigations which brought him into the front rank among chemists of the 19th century. His lectures at the Sorbonne brought him further renown. In 1849 he turned his attention to politics, eventually being made a senator. He became a member of the French Academy in 1878. A list of his papers was published in the "Catalogue of Scientific Papers of the Royal Society, London." He was a consistent Catholic. —C.E.

Dum nocte pulsa lucifer, or THE GOLDEN STAR OF MORN, hymn for Lauds on 18 May, feast of St. Venantius. It is not known who the author was, but it was written during the 12th century. It was translated into several languages. The English title given is by E. Chisholm, —Britt.

Dunblane, ancient diocese in Scotland founded c. 1155 by King David I; first bishop, Lawrence, 1160; it comprised territory bounded on the N. by the bishopric of Dunkeld, S. by Glasgow and St. Andrews, E. by Dunkeld and Glasgow, W. by St. Andrews. The last pre-Reformation bishop was William Chisholm, 1564, later Bp. of Vaison, France. The cathedral of Dunblane was erected by David I, 1141, on the site of St. Blane's monastery. In style of architecture it is Early Pointed excepting its tower which is Early Norman. At present it is used as the Presbyterian parish church.

Dundalk, seaport, Co. Louth, Ireland, on the Castletown River. It contains the ruins of a Franciscan priory. Here Edward Bruce, invading Ireland from Scotland, proclaimed himself king and was defeated and killed by the English in 1318. It is a municipal parish of the Archdiocese of Armagh. The Marist Fathers came here to conduct a college in 1861.

Dundee, city and seaport, Forfarshire, Scotland on Firth of Tay. It was erected into a royal burgh by William the Lion, c. 1200, shared prominently in the War of Scottish Independence, and was captured by the English under John of Gaunt, 1385. From its activity in propagating the doctrines of the Reformation it was called the Scottish Geneva. During the Civil War it was sacked several times by Monro, 1645, and by General Monk, 1651. In 1889 it became a city and now sends two members to Parliament. Among its many churches, five of which are Catholic, the most interesting is "Town Churches," consisting of St. Mary's, St. Paul's, and St. Clement's, the three under one roof, surrounded by a square tower called the "Old Steeple," once the belfry of a church erected in the 12th century. This belfry was restored by Sir Gilbert Scott, 1873. St. Andrew's Catholic Cathedral, of the Diocese of Dunkeld, is a modern building, in early English style.

Dundrennan (Celt., fort of the thorn-bushes), a Cistercian abbey in Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland, founded, 1142, by King David I and Fergus, Lord of Galloway, for monks from Rievaulx, Yorkshire. Mary Queen of Scots spent her last night in Scotland here. For centuries after the suppression the buildings were used as a stone-quarry for houses in the vicinity; since 1842 they have been carefully preserved. The remains include the chapter-house, with a fine arched doorway and octagonal columns, tombs of many abbots and priors, and of Alan, Lord of Galway (c. 1250).—C.E.

Dunedin, Diocese of, New Zealand, comprises Otago, Southland, and Stewart Island; established, 1869; suffragan of Wellington. Early missionaries: Frs. John Pompallier, Comte, Pezant, Petitjean, and Moreau. Bishops: Patrick Moran (1869-85); Michael Verdon (1890-1915), James Whyte (1920). Churches: 67; priests, secular, 43; priests, regular, 38; religious women, 225; seminary, 1; primary schools, 25; other schools, 22; Catholics, 24,000.—C.E.

Dunfermline Abbey, Fife, Scotland; founded by King Malcolm Canmore and his queen, Margaret, c. 1070; remodelled as a Benedictine abbey by David I, Burnt by Edward I of England, 1304, and afterwards restored, it became the burial place of the kings; destroyed, 1500, by the Reformers; the ruins are now Crown property. Birthplace of Andrew Carnegie.—C.E.

Dunghill (A. c. 820), Irish monk, teacher, astronomer and poet. He addressed a letter to Charlemagne explaining an eclipse of the sun in which he displays a knowledge of astronomy far beyond his time. In 815 he was appointed master of the imperial school at Pavia, and several years later he appeared against Claudius, Bp. of Turin, in a work defending the veneration of images. A number of poems are ascribed to him. He is supposed to have died at the monastery of Bobbio, to which he bequeathed his books.—C.E.

Dungannon, market town in Co. Tyrone, Ireland, the ancient seat of the O'Neill's. Here the independence of the Irish Parliament was proclaimed in 1782. The town was formerly a parliamentary borough, returning one member to the Imperial Parliament until 1885. It contains a parish church with an octagonal spire and a royal school founded in 1614.

Dunkeld, Diocese of, Scotland, comprises the counties of Angus, Clackmannan, northern part of Fife (left bank of the Eden), Kinross, and Perth; suffragan of St Andrews and Edinburgh; established, c. 1115. Bishops included James Kennedy (1438-40), Gavin Douglas (1516-21), and John Hamilton (1545-47); and after the restoration of the Scottish hierarchy, George Rigg (1578-87), James Smith (1580-1600), Angus MacFarlane (1601-12), Robert Fraser (1613-14), and John Toner (1614); residence at Dundee. A portion of the ancient cathedral at Dunkeld is used by the Presbyterians. Churches, chapels, and stations, 35; priests, 41; day schools, 12; institutions, 9; Catholics, 35,000.

Dumfries, market town in Dumfries, England, incorporated from the 16th century to 1886, containing the church of St. Mary. Two miles east is Little Dumfies, formerly the seat of a priory where Robert Fitzwalter in 1224 instituted the custom of presenting a flitch of bacon to any couple who spent the first year of their married life in harmony and never regretting their union. Two hundred years later the flitch was claimed for the first time. The custom still exists; in 1925 it was won by the London manager of the Catholic Encyclopedia, and his amiable consort.—Walsh, Curiosities of Popular Customs, Phila., 1897.

Duns Scotus, John (c. 1270-1308), founder and leader of the Scotch School of philosophy, d. Cologne, Germany. It is not known whether he was of Irish or Scottish origin or whether Duns was a family or a place name. He became a Franciscan, c. 1290, taught at Oxford, and distinguished himself for his learning at the universities of Paris and Cologne. Of his numerous works the principal is his commentary on the "Sentences" of Peter Lombard, from which nearly his whole work on philosophy, in which the genuine spirit of scholasticism is pronounced, can be derived. His chief followers were among the Franciscans. He was called "Doctor subtilis."—C.E.

Dunstable, town, Bedfordshire, England, founded on the site of a Romano-British village (Durocobriva) on Watling Street by Henry I who also endowed the Augustinian priory (1131). Here Cranmer held the court which in 1533 pronounced the marriage of Henry VIII and Catherine of Aragon invalid.

years of his episcopate showed remarkable activity. At the Vatican Council he was the leader of the minority which considered the definition of the Dogma of infallibility inopportune, but once it was defined he made unreserved submission. He was the author of a number of important works on catechetical and historical subjects.—C.E.

Duplex (Lat., double), grade of feast (see DOUBLE).

Durham Rite, ANGLO-SAXON RITE that came into use in England about the 7th century. It was introduced into the Abbey of Durham and spread into the entire diocese and, by the middle of the 13th century, elsewhere in the north of England. The earliest document giving an account of the liturgical uses and services in the Diocese of Durham is the so-called Rituale ecclesiae Dunelmensis, also known as the "Ritual of King Ælfthryth" (685). It contains chants and collects from the Epiphany to Easter, a Proper of the Saints, a Common of the Saints, the calendar, etc. This book, the most complete medieval treatise of its kind, is still the standard authority for 13th-century ritual and for the symbolism of rites and vestments. In the third book, vestments are allegorically explained as signifying virtues or the garments worn by Our Lord in the Saints, the calendar, etc. This book, the most important document of this kind, written in 1593, is the volume of the liturgical process of the Durham Rite, an Anglo-Saxon rite that came into use in England about the 7th century. It was introduced into the Abbey of Durham and spread into the entire diocese and, by the middle of the 13th century, elsewhere in the north of England. It contains chants and collects from the Epiphany to Easter, a Proper of the Saints, a Common of the Saints, and many forms of blessings. The most important document of this kind, written in 1593, is the volume called "The Ancient Monuments, Rites and Customs of the Monastical Church of Durham before the Suppression." It contains a detailed description of the various rites and ceremonies and special customs carried out by the monks. The services were conducted with splendor and solemnity.—C.E.

DUPANLOUP 315 DUTCH EAST INDIES

DUPANLOUP, FREDERICK, author of "The History of the Netherlands," etc.

Dutch East Indies, islands in the Pacific Ocean, sq. of Asia, between 0° N. and 11° S. lat. and 95° and 141° E. long. They are a colony of the Netherlands, consisting of land under direct government and subject native states; area, 733,642 sq. m.; pop. (1925), 51,013,878. As early as the 16th century Catholicism was introduced into Java by the Portuguese, but after the Dutch conquest in 1596 Catholic missionaries were expelled. Priests were forbidden to enter the colony until early in the 19th century when, during the reign of Louis Bonaparte, missionaries returned under protection of the Dutch government. At present the E. is under the authority of the same lawgiver and the same religion as the rest of the kingdom. The ecclesiastical administration is thus divided:

Duty, moral obligation to do or to omit certain things. It is consequent upon law. Whenever laws conflict, there arises a seeming conflict of duty. In the sense, however, that duty is moral obligation, i.e., an act imposed or prohibited under a Divine sanction, there can be no real conflict. Conscience (reason) must, in the premises, extend its inquiry beyond the conflicting laws to discover wherein duty lies. If there is question of different lawgivers, the higher in authority prevails, e.g., God before men; if from the same lawgiver but about different matters, the more important and necessary matter prevails, e.g., self-preservation as to life before health; if there is question of the same lawgiver and the same matter, the hierarchy of persons is decisive, e.g., dependents before strangers.—C.E.

Dziennik Chicagowski, a Catholic newspaper published daily, except Sunday, at Chicago, Ill., in the Polish language; founded, 1890; circulation, 28,105.
Eagle, emblem of Our Lord, who could gaze undazzled upon the glory of God, the Father, as an eagle at the sun, associated in art with Sts. John the Evangelist, Augustine, John of the Cross. In Sts. Augustine, John of the Cross it is a symbol of inspiration; in St. John the Evangelist it symbolizes inspiration or the Holy Ghost. It was used by early Christians as the sign of Baptism.

Easter (A.S., Eastre, from Eastre, Teutonic goddess of dawn and spring), feast commemorating Christ's Resurrection from the dead. After the introduction of Christianity among Germanic nations the name Easter, denoting spring, was retained to designate the festival of the Resurrection. With other nations the term commonly used is the Greco-Latin word pascha, derived from the Hebrew pasch (passover). In this way, the Christian feast is connected with the ancient Hebrew festival of the Passover, not arbitrarily, since the Death and Resurrection of Christ coincided with a particular Jewish Pasch, and because in the designs of God there was a connection between the two incidents (see PASCH). Because of the fact which the feast commemorates, the Church has ever regarded Easter as the greatest of her festivals, and from Apostolic times, has assigned to it the central place in her liturgical year. All the movable feasts, from that of the Prayer of Jesus in the Garden (Tuesday after Septuagesima) to the feast of the Sacred Heart (Friday after the octave of Corpus Christi), as also the order of Sundays from Septuagesima to the last Sunday after Pentecost, are made to depend upon the Easter date. Its celebration is preceded by 40 days of prayer and fasting and followed till Trinity Sunday by some 50 days of festivity. The joyous antiphon of the Vidi Aquam takes the place of the Asperses before High Mass, and the exultant Alleluia is constantly repeated in the Mass itself and in the Divine Office. Up to the 12th century, every day within the Easter octave (the eight days immediately following the feast) was a holy day of obligation. Today, however, in most countries even Easter Monday and Tuesday as days of obligation have been abolished.—C.E.; Guéranger, tr. Shepherd, Paschal Time, Dublin, 1871. (1, 2.)

Easter Controversy, name given to a long drawn-out dispute in the early Church over the exact date for the celebration of Easter. The dispute originated between the West and East, about the middle of the 2nd century, over the practice followed in the Eastern Church of terminating the Lenten Fast and beginning the Easter celebration on the 14th day of the Jewish month, Nisan, regardless of the day on which this date might fall. This was the day on which the Jews celebrated the Passover, and hence, as the Easterners maintained, the day on which Christ had kept the Pasch and instituted the Blessed Eucharist. Therefore, to their way of thinking, since the two great festivals, Hebrew and Christian, were so intimately linked in the relation of type and reality, it was only fitting that the Christian Pasch be celebrated on the same day. Although they claimed to have received this practice from the Apostles, John and Philip, they were called by the Westerners "Quarto-decimans" (quartus decimus, fourteenth) and "Ob­servants," since, while they did not keep the fes­tival of the Jewish Pasch, still they "observed" the day.

The Western Church, on the other hand, always celebrated the Christian Pasch on the Sunday following the 14th day of the full moon of the vernal equinox, because that day was regarded as the exact date on which Christ arose from the dead, finished the work of redemption and accomplished our deliverance from the Egyptian bondage of death and hell. In support of this practise the Westerners appealed to the au­thority of Sts. Peter and Paul. Discussion waxed hot and a schism was probably averted through the energetic, if some­what harsh measures of Pope Victor I (A.D. 189­199), who terminated the quartodeciman controversy by threatening with excommunication all those who failed to comply with the Roman custom. The East accordingly adopted the Sunday celebration. The Church of Antioch, however, instead of computing this Sunday as the first after the 14th day of the full moon of the vernal equinox, began to compute it as the first after the 14th of Nisan. This made a difference, and gave a new turn to the controversy. The Christians of Rome and Alexan­dria charged that the Jews had adopted very arbi­trary methods in determining their year and had become neglectful of the law that the 14th of Nisan must never precede the equinox. The charge seems to have been well-founded, as discrepancies soon appeared between the Easter celebration at Antioch and in the rest of the Christian world. The General Council of Nice (325) paved the way to a final settlement of the difficulty by ruling: that Easter must be celebrated by all throughout the world on the same Sunday; that this Sunday must follow the 14th day of the paschal moon; that that moon was to be accounted the paschal moon whose 14th day followed the spring equinox; and that some provisions should be made for determining the proper date of Easter and communicating it to the universal Church. Long after the Roman Church had adopted the cycle of 95 years for determining the date of Easter, the Celtic Church still followed a cycle of 532 years and celebrated the feast on a Sunday differing from the rest of Christendom. By the 9th century the Easter question was settled in all parts of the Celtic Church, and the cycle of 95 years followed everywhere.—C.E., V, 228; Kellner, Heortology, A History of the Christian Festivals, St. L., 1908. (i. n.)

Easter Duty, the obligation of members of the Catholic Church to approach the Sacrament of Eucharist, as a mark of fidelity to membership, and under penalty of exclusion from it and all rights as a Catholic. The prescribed time for fulfilling the Easter duty extends: from the first Sunday of Lent to Trinity Sunday, in the United States; from Ash Wednesday to Low Sunday, in England; from Ash Wednesday to the octave of Sts. Peter and Paul (6 July), in Ireland; from the first Sunday of Lent to the octave of the Ascension, in Scotland, or in some places to Low Sunday. One may follow the direction of his priest judging it proper for him to abstain for some time, but the precept binds even after the time has expired and is not fulfilled by an unworthy communion. It is recommended that the Paschal communion be received in one's own rite and in one's parish church and if received elsewhere one's pastor should be informed of the fact.

Eastern Churches, all ancient churches which were originally under the jurisdiction of one of the four great Eastern patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, and Jerusalem. They comprise numerous bodies in eastern Europe and Asia and a few divisions, the result of immigration, in America, Africa, and other parts of the world. They are divided into Uniates (q.v.) of which there are nine groups, all united to Rome, and non-Uniates (q.v.) consisting of eight groups of churches which have long been separated from Rome as a result of the Eastern schisms and heresies.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Orthodox Eastern Churches, Lond., 1907; Duchesne, tr. Mathews, The Churches Separated from Rome, Lond., 1908; Scott, The Eastern Churches and the Papacy, Lond., 1928.

Eastern New Guinea, Vicariate Apostolic of, Melanesia, Pacific Ocean, comprises the eastern part of the mandated territory of New Guinea mainland and adjacent islands; formed 1922 from the former Prefecture Apostolic of East Kaiserwilhelmsland, established 1813 by the division of the Prefecture Apostolic of Kaiserwilhelmsland, dating from 1896, founded by Fr. Eberhard Limbrock; entrusted to the Missionaries of the Society of the Divine Word. Vicar Apostolic, Francis Wolf (1922); residence at Tunleoo. Churches and chapels, 49; priests, 20; religious women, 36; elementary schools, 22; Catholics, 1,293.

Eastern Nigeria, Prefecture Apostolic of, Nigeria, Africa (British possession); entrusted to the Priests of the African Missions of Lyons; established, 1911. Prefect Apostolic: Oswald Waller, M.A.L. (1911); residence at Kano. Churches and chapels, 4; stations, 7; school, 1; pupils, 40; Catholics, 1,024.

Easter Water, one of the varieties of holy water, so called because it is blessed with special ceremonies and distributed to the people on Holy Saturday Eve of Easter. (J. P. E.)

Ebba the Elder (Tabbs), Saint, virgin (d. 683), abbess. She was the daughter of King Ethelfrith and sister of St. Oswald and Oswy, King of the Northumbrians. She founded the convent of Ebchester, and the monastery for men and women at Coldingham, Berwickshire, where, as abbess, she became the spiritual guide of St. Etheldreda. The promontory of St. Abb's Head, Berwickshire, is named after her. Feast, 25 Aug.—Butler.

Ebba the Younger, Saint, virgin, martyr (c. 870), Abbess of Coldingham. During the Danish invasion she and her nuns mutilated their faces to preserve their chastity, and were burned alive, when the barbarians set fire to the monastery. Feast, 2 April.—Butler.

Ebionites (possibly Aramean, ebionin, poor men), term used to designate two early Christian sects infected with Judaistic and Gnostic errors. (1) Judaistic Ebionites upheld the observance of the Jewish Law; denied the Divinity and virgin birth of Christ; considered St. Paul an apostate; and used only a Gospel according to St. Matthew.
EBIONITES 319  ECCLESIASTICUS

(2) Ebionite Gnostics taught that matter is external, and an emanation of the Deity, that it constitutes, as it were, God's body. Creation, therefore, is but the transformation of preexisting material. God thus "creates" the Universe by the instrumentality of His wisdom. They also held that the universe is divided into two realms, that of good and that of evil. The Son of God rules over the former, and the Prince of Evil over the latter. Both teachings were confined to the East and made no definite impression upon the philosophy of their time. Nothing is known of their founders.—C.E.

Ecce Homo (Lat., Behold the Man), the words used by Pilate when exhibiting Jesus to the multitude, crowned with thorns and holding a reed for a scepter. It is a favorite subject in art; famous examples include Guido Reni's in the Corsini Gallery, Rome, Van Dyck's in the Frederick Museum, Berlin, and representations by Bartolommeo, Borgognone, Caracci, Correggio, Dolve, Guercino, Heinz, Ludovico, Mantegna, Montagna, Morales, Multscher, Murillo, Palma, Rembrandt, Solarlo, and Titian.

Ecce jam noctis tenentur umbra, or Lo THE DIM SHADOWS OF THE NIGHT ARE WAINING, hymn for Lands from the 3rd Sunday after Pentecost until the Sunday nearest 1 Oct. It was written by Pope St. Gregory the Great (540–604). There are 15 translations. The English title given is by M. Blacker, whose translation is based on the original text, but has been partly changed to suit the text of the Roman Breviary.—Britt.

Ecclesiastes (Gr., ekklesiastes, member of the assembly), the protocanonical book of the O.T., called in Hebrew Q (ק) הֶכְלִיסָסָה, in Latin, Concionator (St. Jerome). The phrase "He who compileth this book follows Proverbs and was formerly almost unquestioned as the work of Solomon. Now even Catholic scholars admit the theory of an unknown author presenting the teachings of Solomon at a later age. Although no Catholic will admit the modernistic view ascribing it to the period of Herod the Great (40 n.c.), some place it in the 3rd century before the Christian era. Its Palestinian origin is certain. It is rather short, comprising 12 chapters and 223 verses. The theme may be stated as the transient character of earthly goods and pleasures compared with true wisdom which is the fear of the Lord and in which alone may be found true contentment and happiness. The manner of development is oriental and specifically ancient; it is Semitic, i.e., by aphorisms and proverbs rather than by logical analysis. Notwithstanding its somber tone, it is not pessimistic since hope for happiness is held out to those who direct their lives according to reason and the will of God. It is divided into: the prologue (1, 1–11), which shows the vanity of the search for human happiness; part I (1, 12 to 7, 1), which emphasizes the vanity of all things apart from God; and part II (7, 2 to 12, 8), which comprises the precepts of true wisdom. The style varies between pithy sententiousness and soliloquy, and is at times rhetorical, depicting evil in glaring colors, which are not exaggerated in the light of our knowledge of the moral depravity of the Orient in pre-Christian times. The teaching of the book is not at variance with Christian belief. It is not true that the author inveighs against God. He does speak against sinful men. Immortality is not denied in 3, 19 sqq., because this passage should be regarded as a rhetorical question expressive of the author's grief that so few men realize the difference between themselves and animals. Besides God did not reveal much of the future state before the Incarnation, and Heaven was not opened till after the death of Christ. Hence we should not expect the same precision in expressions concerning the life to come in the O.T. that is found in the new. Its canonicality as divine is accepted from the beginning in the Synagogue as well as the Christian Church. Striking passages are: 1, 1–11, the vanity of earthly striving; 3, 10–15, how to rejoice in the gifts of God; 4, 17, obedience; and 12, 1–7, correct training of youth. Many sentences are apt maxims for our daily lives and the author of the "imitation" has utilised them, especially in Book I. Breviary lessons for the second week of August are taken from Ecclesiastes. The abbreviation Ecclesiastici distinguishes this book from Ecclesiastes (Eclesius).—C.E.; Seissenerger, tr. Buchanan, Practical Handbook for the Study of the Bible, N. Y., 1911. (T. McL.)

Ecclesiastical Review, a monthly publication for the clergy, founded in Philadelphia, 1889. It contains articles treating chiefly upon topics of interest to ecclesiastics, on which it is accepted as an authority.

Ecclesiastical Titles Act, a bill passed in England, 1851, making the assumption by Catholics of episcopal titles, in the United Kingdom, a penal offense. It declared all acts performed, and all gifts made under such titles, null and void, and property bequeathed to such persons, forfeited to the crown. If made under such titles, null and void, and property bequeathed to such persons, forfeited to the crown. The act contains articles treating chiefly upon topics of interest to ecclesiastics, on which it is accepted as an authority.

Ecclesiasticus, deuterocanonical book of the O.T. From its inscription in Greek and Syriac versions it is also known as "The Wisdom of Jesus, the Son of Sirach," a title connected with and possibly derived from the subscription occurring in recently discovered (1886–1900) Hebrew fragments of "The Wisdom (Hōkîmâ) of Simeon, the son of Yeshû (Jesus), the son of Eleazar, the son of Sirā." The name Ecclesiasticus (Liber), i.e., a church reading-book, is significant of the special esteem in which this book was held for the public instruction of the faithful. It is now evident that the work was written originally in Hebrew, to which reference had been made in ancient times (Talmud, St. Jerome). From the prologue to the Greek version composed by a nephew of the author we learn that the latter was Jesus or Josua (Yeshua), son of Sirach of Jerusalem, who seems to have been a contemporary of Simon II, son of Onias the high priest between 220 B.C. The translation seems to have been made about 116 n.c., i.e., after the death of Ptolemy Euergetes Philopator II. Catholic editions are derived from the Vulgate which was prepared by St. Jerome from the Old Latin compared with the Septuagint text of the book. Scholars are divided as to the book's nature. One group regards it as the work of the author whose name it bears having for its purpose an exposition of the practical value of Hebrew teaching (wisdom) concerning fundamental verities: God, law, wisdom. The material may have been derived from oral tradition or older collections of maxims. According to the other theory, the book as we have it in the Greek is a compilation, the final redaction of which was made by the translator though in its major portion it may represent an original composed by the son of Sirach. This is the longest of the didactic books of the O.T., 51 chapters, and is usually divided into two unequal parts: 1 to 42, 14; and 43 to 51. A speech oration in the form of a dialogue it presents a series of practical precepts for life after the manner of the Proverbs of Solomon. The transition 42, 15 to 43, 28, is a sublime hymn ex­ tolling God's work in nature and contains a beau­tiful description of creatures. In the second part God is praised in the lives of the heroes of Israel. The conchordance 50, 24 to 51, 38, is an exhortation to seek wisdom.

Highly prized by the Jews particularly of the Dispersion and the early Christians after the Psalms and the Gospels, it is the most utilized portion of Scripture in the Office and Mass. Besides being used for the Nocturnes of the fourth and fifth weeks of August, lessons are taken from it for the common of doctors, confessors, virgins, non-virgins; likewise the chapters of these offices as well as those of the Blessed Virgin Mary and epistles (Mass for the Propagation of the Faith). It embodies clear statements on the nature of God and His attributes, life, eternity, greatness, mercy (43, 29-37). Noteworthy is chapter 24, introducing a dialogue wisdom speaking as a divine person although the idea of distinct subsistence is not expressed. Talmudic and rabbinical literature placed it in the same category as the Ketubim (Sacred Writings) like Psalms and Proverbs. N.T. references indicative of its divine origin are very numerous, e.g., John, 14, 20 to Ecclus., 2, 18.—C.E.; Seiss, Johannes, tr. Buchanen, L. Handbuch für den Studium of the Bible, N. Y., 1911. (T. Mcl.)

Echard, Jacques (1644-1724), historian of the Dominicans, b. Rouen, France; d. Paris. On the death of Jacques Quétif, who had planned and gathered nearly one-fourth of the material for a literary history of the Dominican Order, Echard was commissioned to complete the work, which was published in 1721. A new and revised edition was prepared in 1908 by Római Coulon, O.P.—C.E.

Echternach (Éternach), Abbey of, a Benedi­ctine monastery in the town of that name, in the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg. Founded in 698 by St. Willibrord, an English monk, it had many benefactors, including Pepin and Charlemagne, and during the Middle Ages it was one of the most important monasteries in northern Europe. Sup­pressed during the French Revolution, the conven­tional buildings were converted into barracks but the church, taken over by the townspeople in 1861, has since then undergone restoration as a parish church. It is Romanesque in style with Gothic addi­tions and alterations. The abbey, in modern times, owes much of its fame to the “dancing procession” of Whit Tuesday in honor of St. Willibrord.—C.E.

Eck (Eckius; family name Maier), Johann (1486-1543), theologian, b. Eck, Swabia, Germany; d. Ingolstadt. After a brilliant career as student and professor he became rector of the University of Ingolstadt. He had been ordained in 1508, and re­ceived the degree of Doctor of Theology at twenty­four. With clear insight into the meaning of Lutheranism, he was the first to champion the cause of Catholic teaching against Protestantism and became Luther's ablest opponent. He wrote against Luther's theses, and in the public debate at Leipzig in 1519 he was victorious. With two others he was made papal legate for the execution in Germany of the provisions of the Bull against Luther. He had a considerable share in organizing the Catholic Federation and headed the Catholic champions at the Diet of Augsburg (1530). He likewise combated the heresy in his other works, the most important of which is “Loi communis adversus Lutherum et alios hostes ecclesiae” (arguments against Luther and other enemies of the Church). He published a German version of the Scriptures, of which he translated the Old Testament from the original.—C.E.

Eckhart (Eckhard, Eckard), Johann Meister (c. 1260-1327), Dominican preacher, theologian, and mystic; b. Hochheim, near Gotha, Germany; d. Cologne. He held many professorial and adminis­ttrative posts in his Order. He was an effectively simple preacher and has left in his sermons specimens of beautiful German prose. As theologian he followed the teaching of the great Scholastics but departed from their method and form. He is the father of German mysticism, of which he is held by many to be the greatest exponent. Investigations of his moral conduct and theological teaching re­sulted in his entire vindication. The papal Bull which condemned a number of his propositions de­clared also his profession of faith, repudiation of error, and submission to the Holy See.—C.E.

Eckhel, Joseph Hilarius (1737-98), numismatist, b. Prague, Lomthia; d. Vienna. As a Jesuit he taught poetry and rhetoric in colleges of his So­ciety, and also turned his at­tention to numismatics; and on the suppression of the Society of Jesus he became director of the imperial cabinet of ancient coins at Vienna. He published a catalogue of the collection (1779), for which he devised a new method of arrangement. By his “Doctrina nummorum veterum” (Science of Ancient Coins), published in eight volumes (1792-98), he became the founder of the scientific numismatics of classical antiquity.—C.E.

Economics, the science of the application of the principles of justice to social life. From the time of the Apostles this application has been a subject of thought and of regulation among the Fathers and Doctors of the Church, the great Schoolmen of the Middle Ages, popes, bishops, and lay as well as clerical leaders in social reform and advancement. In the time of the Apostles many of the new groups of Christians held their goods in common. Owners of property or wealth acted on the principle that but One had absolute right of ownership, God, and that all human owners are His stewards. The obligations to give alms was assumed as a matter of course. The Fathers accepted the right of property as lawful, but they considered it as a means to an end, which was partly to use it for the benefit of others in need. This duty they deduced from the fact that Christians are brothers in Christ. Lactantius was the first Christian sociologist. He opposed economic teaching that ignored ethics; piety, i.e., properly regulated human affection, and equity, are for him essentials of justice; the only solid basis of justice is the Fatherhood of God; almsgiving is of obligation because of brotherly love and brotherly equality. Augustine looked upon private ownership as the determination by civil authority of the Divine or natural right of the individual. Some of the Fathers of the 4th century regarded private ownership as the result of sin, as a means of avoiding violence and confusion, and almsgiving obligatory, because charity is part of justice.

The principle of private ownership is a concept of the Middle Ages, derived from a study of the Law of Nations, which gradually came to be regarded as the Law of Nature. As an institution it became fixed in Christian usage by the experiences of monasticism and feudalism. The Law of Nations, the common element in the laws of all nations foreign to Rome, an element recognized by Roman Law as expressive of the common consent of peoples generally, was looked upon as the Law of Nature. Monasticism fixed forever in men’s minds a sense of the dignity of labor, and of the consequent necessity of ownership of the soil so as to cultivate and dispense its fruits. Feudalism depended essentially on land tenure. St. Thomas considered ownership as a consequence of man’s dominion over creatures, and, with other Schoolmen, believed that whatever is above one’s necessary outlay should be given in alms. With the development of trade by the Crusades on a large scale in Europe new questions came up for discussion concerning particularly the lawfulness of barter and the worth of an article in trade. Because trade is for the common good, it should not benefit one to the disadvantage of another, and it must therefore be controlled by some principle to determine value, or, as it was termed, the just price. This, of course, depended on two elements, the value of the thing in itself, and its value to the owner and purchaser. The principles then enunciated are those which prevail still, however difficult they may be of application. The guilds which then had become the arbiters of good workmanship, values, and prices, had much to do with working out in practise what the experts submitted to them in theory.

The development of capital injected new subjects into the study of economics, chiefly that of usury, first of the justice of requiring any interest at all for borrowed money and then of excessive interest.

It is difficult for us at this day to appreciate the views of the economists at that time on this subject, though even today there are laws in every country fixing the rate of legal interest. The evils then were so great on the part of the reckless borrower and of the exacting usurer that the Church authorities had to intervene to check both. Even Luther stood for the position of the Church in this matter, and he believed in the control of business by religious principles; but Calvin was different. For him the pursuit of wealth was a sign of the elect. To him and his followers are due the abuses of modern capitalism, starting with the Huguenots and Puritans of Holland, England, and America. The seizure of the monasteries in England, the sale and pledge of the lands as a basis of trade by purchase and credit, was one of the principal factors in creating what Belloc calls “The Slave State.” It was this situation which, affecting as it did economic conditions in every European country, particularly in England, France, Germany, and Austria, occasioned the sociological labors of men like Hefele and Comte de Mun, and resulted in the Encyclical of Leo XIII, “Rerum Novarum,” the expression of the principles governing economic conditions at the present day, and particularly the matter of just wage.—McDowell, The Church and Economics, Londo., 1928; Great Encyclicals of Leo XIII, ed. Wyne, N. Y., 1903. (120.)

Ecstasy (Gr., ek, out; histenti, place). Supernatural ecstasy may be defined as a state which, while it lasts, includes two elements: the one, interior and invisible, when the mind rivets its attention on a religious subject; the other, corporeal and visible, when the activity of the senses is suspended, so that not only are external sensations incapable of influencing the soul, but considerable difficulty is experienced in awakening such sensations, and this difficulty is experienced whether the ecstatic himself desires to do so, or others attempt to quicken the organs into action. A large number of saints have been granted ecstasies from the spirit of God.—C.E. (x. j. w.)

Ecuador, independent republic in the northwestern part of South America; est. area, 109,978 sq. m.; est. pop., 1,500,000. The kingdom of the Quitos had existed for perhaps a thousand years when conquered by the Peruvians in 1460. It was seized by Spain in 1533. Soon after the discovery of Ecuador in 1525, Dominican missionaries arrived, and the See of Quito was erected in 1545. The Jesuits later joined in the labors, and Christianity spread through the country, but after the expulsion of the Jesuits in 1767 and the subsequent revolution, the natives relapsed into paganism. Independence from Spain was achieved in 1822, and Ecuador was separated from New Granada and Venezuela and established as a republic in 1830. Freedom of worship is granted to all and there is no official religion. Ecclesiastical administration is thus divided:

Eden, Garden of, also called Terrestrial Paradise (Gen., 2), home of Adam and Eve, located by tradition in the valley of the Euphrates.—C.E., XIV, 519.

Edgeworth, Henry Essex, better known as Lord Edgeworth de Firmont (1745-1807), confessor of Louis XVI, b. Edgeworthstown, Co. Longford, Ireland; d. Mittle, Russia. The title Edgeworth de Firmont was derived from Firmount, the ancestral patrimony of his family. He left Ireland at the age of four with his father, who had resigned his Protestant living to become a Catholic. After ordination he was selected to be confessor to Madame Elizabeth, professor of Louis XVI, and thenceforward he was a devoted friend to the royal family, through the disasters of the Revolution. When the Archbishop of Paris was obliged to flee he made Edgeworth his vicar-general and vested him with all his powers. He accompanied Louis XVI to the scaffold and consoled him with the famous words “Son of St. Louis, ascend to heaven.” Disguised, he remained in France until 1796, when he escaped to London. He became chaplain to the exiled Louis XVIII, whom he accompanied to Russia.—C.E.

Edict of Milan, an edict issued, A.D. 313, by the Emperors Constantine and Licinius, granting toleration to the Christians. Coming after more than two centuries of almost intermittent persecutions many of which were marked with special cruelty and ferocity, and in which the issue was between the Church and the absolute State, the edict meant much more than toleration; it was really an authoritative recognition of Christianity. It has come to be recognized as such in history. Though issued conjointly with Licinius it was really the work of Constantine. Out of gratitude to the God of the Christians, Who, he believed, gave him the unexpected victory over the tyrant Maxentius at the Milvian Bridge (A.D. 312), and because, no doubt, he recognized in Christianity the moral force to save the civilization of the empire, Constantine bestowed full freedom on the Church. (M. P. B.)

Edict of Nantes, term applied to an order issued, 1598, by Henry IV of France, which provided for the reestablishment of the Catholic religion in that country, the restoration of church property and rights, and for the free exercise of their religion by the Huguenots, eligibility to public office, state subsidies for their schools and churches, and representation in the Parliament of Paris. The religious peace which resulted came to an end after the death of Henry, 1610, when the Huguenots abused their political power and attempted a revolution which was subdued chiefly through the efforts of Card. Richelieu. In the early part of the reign of Louis XIV, persecution of both Catholics and Huguenots began, but the latter were treated more severely. The edict was revoked, 1685, and they were persecuted and forbidden to emigrate. The results were disastrous for France as they could not be held back. Commerce was ruined, wealth and population decreased. Nevertheless, they were officially persecuted until the middle of the 18th century, and only received religious freedom again by the Edict of Toleration, 1787.—C.E., VII, 352.

Edification (Lat., adifico, to build up), St. Paul’s expression for the manner in which Christians, by giving good example to one another, should build up the mystical body of Christ, the Church. (Ed.)

Edinburgh, Archdiocese of, Alberta, Canada, comprises the part of Central Alberta bounded N. by the 55th degree of latitude, S. by the line dividing the 30th and 31st townships, W. by the Province of Saskatchewan, and E. by the mountains of the Rocky Mts.; established as St. Albert, 1871; transferred to Edmonton and raised to archdiocese, 1912; suffragans: Diocese of Calgary and Vicariates of Grouard and Mackenzie. Bishop: Vital Justin Grandin, O.M.I. (1871-1902). Archbishops: Emil Legal, O.M.I. (1902-20); Henry Joseph O’Leary (1920). Churches, 182; stations, 85; priests, secular, 94; priests, regular, 64; religious women, 695; seminary, 1; colleges, 6; convent schools and academies, 14; Indian schools, 3; institutions, 22; Catholics, 73,000.

Edmund Campion, Blessed, martyr (1540-81), b. London; d. Tyburn. After a brilliant career at Oxford, he was favored by Elizabeth, and, although a Catholic, took the oath of supremacy and deacon’s orders according to the new rite. Unable to acquiesce fully to the doctrines of the Reformation, he left Oxford and entered the seminary at Douai, 1573. He later joined the Society of Jesus at Rome. He was sent to England to reclaim wavering or temporizing Catholics. An alarm was raised against him, and he was obliged to seek refuge in the north. While in hiding he wrote his famous tract “Ten Reasons.” He was captured, subjected to examination under tor-tore, and finally granted his request for a public disputation in which he was victorious, although denied opportunity for preparation. A farcical trial resulted in his condemnation and execution. Historians agree that the charges of treason made against him were fictitious. Beatitude, 1886. Relics at Prague, London, Oxford, Stonyhurst, and Roehampton. Feast, 28 Nov.—C.E.; Simpson, Edmund Campion, Jesuit Protomartyr of England, Lond., Hu.7.

Edmund Rich, Saint, confessor (1180-1240). Abp. of Canterbury, b. Abingdon, England; d. Soissey, France. He taught with great success at Oxford and Paris, and in 1227 was commissioned to preach the Sixth Crusade in England. In 1234 he became Abp. of Canterbury and firmly defended the rights of Church and State against Henry III. Any appeals were carried to Rome over his head and Henry adroitly managed by the authority of the legate to nullify Edmund’s power. The archbishop then withdrew to France and died shortly afterwards. He practised severe penance throughout his life, and was remarkable for his gentleness and charity. Represented embracing the Child Jesus, and receiving a lamb from the Virgin Mary. Canonized, 1249. Relics at Pontigny, Feast, 16 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Edmund the Martyr, Saint (c. 840-70), King of East Anglia, b. probably Nuremberg, Germany; d. Hoxne, England. He was crowned King of East Anglia, 855. Refusing, because of his faith, to accept the terms of the Danish invaders, Hingvar and Hubba, he was beaten with cudgels, pierced with arrows, and beheaded. Emblems: an arrow, and sword. His relics were preserved at Abbey of St. Edmundsbury. Feast, 20 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Education consists in developing intelligence, acquiring knowledge, and forming character. This is done by the three agencies most competent to do it, the home, the school, and the Church. Its object is to train the child or immature mind for life here and hereafter, for the destiny allotted to each, and for the relations which each one has to God, to the neighbor, and to the world at large. Literature, art, science, and moral, social, and religious principle are the means of this training, and no education is complete without some knowledge and practise in all of them. Practise is the special element which Christianity introduced in education. Besides a new conception of life, and new sources of knowledge, it brought new principles of action and incultated the necessity of reducing its ideals and principles into action. Christ taught truth as a way of life; the new things He insisted on, by denial, love of neighbor, civic fidelity, were not matters of speculation merely, but of conduct. What He taught He bade His Apostles and their followers to teach all nations, even to the consummation of the world. All this was wholly different from the speculative and uncertain maxims of morality taught by paganism. He laid stress on the work and worth of the individual, and gave men a new sense of personality. He brought about respect for womanhood, for the sanctity of marriage, and for the ties of home life. He spoke with authority and with finality on the truths which had perplexed the pagan world, the existence of God, the moral order, immortality, the value of the present and of the future life.

The Apostles were real teachers; witness the Acts. Their followers imitated them and made use of the literatures, the philosophy, history, and science of the day when instructing catechumens or candidates for the priesthood, preaching, writing, and setting forth for the world the reasonableness of Christianity. The ritual of the Church, by its ceremonial and symbolism, appealed to sense, imagination, memory, and feeling. It too is knowledge in action since the faithful actually take part in it. So also is the study of history, of the types and ideals in the Old and New Testament, of the leaders and heroes of Christianity and its saints. The Church gave civilization and culture to the rude people from the North. It was the chief education agency during the Middle Ages, and the home and the State cooperated with it in this function. With barbarism invading and the old civilization disappearing, the work of the Church in education had to be creative as well as constructive. The monasteries first were its centers, preserving ancient texts, and forming an organized body of organized men dedicated to their tasks. The schools followed, developing into the universities. In them Greek culture was harmonized with Christianity. Popes and secular rulers chartered and helped in many instances to found them. They aimed at maintaining complete faculties for the study of religion and science.

With the Reformation came the rupture between the two, the separation of morals and religion from philosophy and science generally. Then followed the sequestration of the universities, the confiscation of the monasteries, the opposition of governments, the ostracism of Catholics in many countries, in a word, the devastation of the work of the Church for centuries. It is only within the last 25 years that scholars, led by men like Denife, Rashdall, and by Haskins and Rand, in the United States, and the Mediaeval Society, have begun to show what the Church had done to save and promote learning and develop civilization and culture.

The story of the gradual recovery, by the Church, of its production in science, and its mission, will some day read like an epic of education. Beginning with the establishment of seminaries after the plan of the Council of Trent, of the academies and colleges of the religious orders, notably of the Jesuits and Benedictines, of the elementary schools in parishes and other centers, the Church today has a vast system of education in almost every country. This it maintains not only for teaching religion, but for teaching the entire cycle of human science, and for restoring the union which should exist between both. Gradually the schools founded under the control of various Protestant sects have become secularized. Religion has little or no place in them. On the contrary, besides being excluded, it is made little of, if not dismissed as a superstition. Leaders of the various churches are becoming alive to this situation and attempting to remedy it. Religion, not speculation only, but practical also, is more and more recognized as an essential of any education that prepares men and women for life. On Edward VI (1537-53), King of England and Ireland, b. Greenwich; d. there. He was the only son of Henry VIII by Jane Seymour. Crowned at the age of nine, he died when he was but sixteen, and was buried four years after his death at Henry VII's Chapel in Westminster Abbey. Edward's death was caused through the influence of the old religious order. The two Elizabethans, Edward VI and Queen Mary, were but the partial restoration of the chantry and monastery schools disbanded under Henry; the necessity for "temperance" and "poor" laws was the result of the disappearance of the moral and material influence of the old religious order.

Edward the Confessor, Saint (1003-66), King of England. He was the son of Ethelred II and Queen Emma and half-brother to Kings Edmund Ironside and Hardicanute. Upon the election of Canute to the throne of England, when Edward was only ten years of age, he went with his brother Alfred and his mother to live at the court of his uncle, the Duke of Normandy. There he received a pious education, his chief interests being ecclesiastical. After Canute's death, 1035, Edward and his brother were persuaded to return to England in order to secure the crown. However, the expedition was not successful, for Canute's illegitimate son Harold had already seized control. Alfred was killed and Edward was forced to return to Normandy. He returned to England again, 1042, after the death of Hardicanute, and by popular acclaim, ascended the throne. His reign was remarkable only as a period of peace. He was completely under the control of Earl Godwin of Wessex, and in 1045, married Edith, the earl's daughter, but, having taken a vow of chastity, he did not live with her. His only warlike enterprises were the repulsion of a Welsh invasion and the assistance which he gave to Malcolm III of Scotland against Macbeth. He remitted the burdensome tax, "Dane-gelt," because he was slain by the irreligious party, he obtained the title of martyr. Represented on horseback, drinking mead, while the assassins advance toward him. Feast, 18 March. —C.E.; Butler.

Edwin (c. 585-633), first Christian King of Northumbria, d. Hatfield Chase, England. He was the son of Ethelfrith, King of Northumbria, but the usurper Ethelfrith kept him from his throne until his thirtieth year. He married as his second wife Ethelflata, sister of Eadbald, the Christian King of Kent. He was baptized at York, 627, by St. Paulinus, and thenceforward showed himself zealous for the conversion of his people. The title of martyr has been given to him because he was slain by the irreligious party, he obtained the title of martyr. Represented on horseback, drinking mead, while the assassins advance toward him. Feast, 10 April. —C.E.; Butler.

Efficacious Grace, a special grant of Almighty God by which a soul incapable by its own natural resources of placing a certain action positively conducive to eternal salvation, is endowed with new powers, becomes an adequate principle for eliciting the act in question, and without being forced by the pressure of God's grace, freely but infallibly performs the salutary action which God by His help prompted and made possible. —Phile-Preuss, Grace, Actual and Habitual, St. L., 1921.

Egbert (c. 770), Abp. of York, England. He was son of Eata and brother of Eadbert, King of Westphalia. Having received deacon's Orders at York, 627, by St. Paulinus, and thenceforth showed himself zealous for the conversion of his people. The title of martyr has been given to him because he was slain by the irreligious party, he obtained the title of martyr. Represented on horseback, drinking mead, while the assassins advance toward him. Feast, 18 March. —C.E.; Butler.

Edward the Martyr, Saint (c. 960-78), King of England, d. Wareham. He was the son of Edgar the Peaceful and succeeded his father, 975. During his brief reign he followed the counsel of St. Dunstan, winning the affection of his people through his many virtues. He was murdered at the instigation of his step-mother, Elfrida, who desired to secure the crown for her son Ethelred. As a defender of the Church and because he was slain by the irreligious party, he obtained the title of martyr. Represented on horseback, drinking mead, while the assassins advance toward him. 735, thus becoming second Abp. of York, the title having been lost to that church since the flight of St. Paulinus to Kent. He was thus placed in a position to carry out many needed reforms in which he proved himself a strict disciplinarian, but was at the same time remarkable for sweetness and gentleness. One of his greatest works was the foundation of the famous School of York and its celebrated library. Alcuin was among his pupils. Egbert resigned his throne to enter the monastery, and the two men spent their last years in retirement and prayer. Egbert's best known work is a collection of canonical regulations.—C.E.

Egbert (Teut., formidable bright), Saint, bishop, confessor (c. 639-729), d. Iona. He was a Norumbrian monk who received his habit at Lindisfarne and studied at Rathmelsigi (Melifont), Ireland. He was instrumental in sending missionaries to the pagan tribes of Friesland. He went to Iona where he spent the last 13 years of his life, reforming the monasteries of St. Columba, and persuading the monks to relinquish their erroneous mode of computing Easter.—C.E.

Egloffstein, Frederick von (1824-85), engraver, b. Altdorf, near Nuremberg, Bavaria; d. New York. He has been called the father of half-tone engraving in the United States, and he enginered the engraving of bank notes and thus circumvented counterfeiting. He was commissioned a colonel in the Union army during the Civil War.—C.E.

Egoism (Lat., ego, I, self), in philosophy, the doctrine that all elements of knowledge are in the ego, and in the relations which the ego implies or provides for. The designation is given to those ethical systems which consider self-love the source of all rational action and the determining factor of moral conduct. Any system might be called egoistic which makes the good of the ego the end and motive of action.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss. (M. P.)

Egregie Doctor Paule, mores instrue, or Our souls' great Teacher Paul, our guide in Wisdom's ways, hymn for Vespers and Matins on 25 Jan., feast of the Conversion of St. Paul; for Matins on 30 June, feast of the Commemoration of St. Paul; and for Lauds on 29 June, feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, when the hymns, "Beate Pastor Petre, Clemens accipe" and "Egregie Doctor Paule, mores instrue," are combined into one hymn. It is attributed to Elpis, Boethius's wife, who died c. 490. The English title given is by T. Potter.—Britt.

Egwin, Saint, confessor (d. c. 717), Bp. of Worcester, founder of the Abbey of Evesham. A prince of the royal house of Mercia, he was forced from the seclusion of the religious life and made Bp. of Worcester by popular acclaim, 692. He aroused resentment by his zeal for ecclesiastical discipline and accusations having been made against him at Rome, he undertook a pilgrimage there in order to vindicate himself with the pope. According to the legend he locked shackles on his feet and threw the key into the River Avon and on his arrival in Rome the key was found in a fish caught in the Tiber. Reinstated by the pope, he returned to England and founded the abbey. He participated in the first Council of Clovesho, Feast, 30 Dec., and 11 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Egypt, independent monarchy of northeastern Africa; est. area, 383,000 sq. m.; pop., 14,168,756, about 90% Mohammedan. According to tradition St. Mark the Evangelist introduced the Catholic Faith into Alexandria which became the center of Christianity in Egypt. Until the Second Ecumenical Council (381) the Patriarch of Alexandria was recognized as next in rank to the Bishop of Rome, and the patriarchate reached its most flourishing period under St. Athanasius (d. 373), champion of the Faith against Arianism, and St. Cyril (412-44), defender of the Divinity of Christ. In the 5th century the patriarchate fell prey to the Monophysite heresy, and the Catholic succession was twice interrupted for long periods. The Saracen invasions wrought disaster for both uniats and schismatics, and both Churches further declined in the persecutions of the 14th century. Organization of the Uniat Coptic Church dates from 1721 when Benedict XIV gave to Amba Athanasius, Coptic Bishop of Jerusalem, jurisdiction over all Catholics of the Coptic Rite in Egypt and elsewhere, and in 1895 Leo XIII restored the Patriarchate of Alexandria. The Catholic Church comprises the following ecclesiastical divisions:

Egypt (in the Bible). In Semitic languages Egypt was known under the names of Mısır, Miṣr, the Hebrew form being Miṣrayim, of which the termination is regarded by some as the regular dual ending used to designate at the same time both parts, Upper and Lower, of the country. Genesis, 10, is commonly understood to enumerate the various peoples who made up the population of Egypt: Ludim, Anamim, Laabim, Nephthuim, Peθrusim, Chasluim, and Capthorim. Some of these names have not yet been satisfactorily identified. The Anamim (Anu of the Egyptian texts) appear to be the remnant of early settlers who, driven back by newcomers, roamed in the desert above the second cataract; the Petruim (southerners) inhabited the neighborhood of Thebes; the Capthorim and Chasluim are late invaders established on the Mediterranean shore. Egypt first appears in the Bible as a land of plenty, whither Abraham resorts at a time of famine (Gen., 12), and whither Jacob, in similar circumstances, sends his sons for buying wheat (Gen., 37-50). The whole family soon moved there at the bidding of Joseph. Historians usually date this migration at the time of the Hyksos rule. There, in the "land of Gessen," located by some near the mouth of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, by others half-way up that same channel, by others still south of Memphis, in the Fayum district, they increased and multiplied; and from there, after a long period of persecution which is supposed to have taken place following the overthrow of the Hyksos by native princes, they left at God's bidding, under the leadership of Moses, for the Promised Land. The disaster which overcame Pharaoh's army at the Red Sea apparently affected only a relatively small corps of Egyptian troops; texts need not be pressed to mean the whole military force of Egypt.

For many centuries decadent Egypt claimed possession of Palestine. This overlordship, however, was merely nominal, so that the Hebrews were fortunate in having only local Chanaanite chiefs with whom to contend. A long and hard struggle at last won for them independence under the strong hand of David. The city of Gazer, however, remained, in the hands of the Phererezites (Jos., 16); its capture, in the beginning of the reign of Solomon, by Psibkhannu II, whose daughter became Solomon's wife, brings back the Egyptians into direct contact with Israel. Gazer was given to Solomon as his wife's dowry. Obviously the prince of Tanis considered Palestine as part of his kingdom, and the Hebrew king as a vassal. With the latter he maintained friendly commercial relations (3 Kings, 10); yet the Egyptian ruler had given shelter and a bride of the blood royal to the young Edomite prince, Adad, and did not discontinue the latter's attempt to wrest his kingdom from Solomon's hand (3 Kings, 11). To Psibkhannu's successor, Sheshenkh I (Sesac of the Bible), the first Egyptian king whose proper name is given in Scripture (Pharao, Egypt., per da, the great house, is a generic title), Jeroboam fled from the wrath of Solomon (3 Kings, 11), and, according to the Greek text, was later on married to the queen's own sister. Five years after Jeroboam fled from the wrath of Solomon (3 Kings, 11), his successor, Sesac, who probably wished to profit by the political division of Israel, in order to assert his suzerainty, invaded Palestine and sacked Jerusalem (3 Kings, 14; Inscription of Karnak). Whether "Zara the Ethiopian," whose attempt against Palestine is recorded only in 2 Par., 14, was an Egyptian king (Osorkon I or Osorkon II) is still a moot question.

Save for an obscure allusion to an alliance between Joram, king of Israel (851-842), and the reigning Pharao, Egypt does not appear again on the scene of Biblical history until the last years of the Northern Kingdom, when Osee, the last king of Israel, in order to prevent being engulfed in the ever-growing torrent of Assyrian invasion, called on the help of Sua, probably the future Shabaka, founder of the XXVth Dynasty, then a high officer in the Egyptian Empire (4 Kings, 17). But leashing on Egypt was leashing on a broken reed; and after the fall of Samaria, despite the oft-repeated warnings of the prophets, there existed in Jerusalem for more than a century a strong party favoring an Egyptian alliance. King Josias, who opposed this policy, was mortally wounded on the battlefield of Megiddo, whilst endeavoring to block, it appears, the advance of Necho II against the young Babylonian Empire, just risen (609 n.c.) on the ruins of the vanquished Assyrian Kingdom (4 Kings, 20), Neither did this calamity, nor the conqueror's meddling with the internal affairs of Jerusalem and the heavy tribute levied by him on Jerusalem (4 Kings, 23), not even Necho's subsequent defeat by Nabuchodonosor (Jer., 48), prevent the stubborn pro-Egyptian politicians of Jerusalem from reckoning on the help of Egypt when the Babylonians laid siege to the Holy City.

True, Hophra (589-570) made a military demonstration in the neighborhood of Gaza (Jer., 47); but his troops were defeated, and Jerusalem, left to its plight, succumbed in 586. Many Judeans then and thereafter sought a new country in Egypt (4 Kings, 25) and even compelled Jeremiah to follow them (Jer., 43). After the collapse of the Chaldean Empire Egypt, now but a shadow of its former greatness, fell into the hands of the Persian king Cambyses (525) and, two centuries later (332), of Alexander the Great. Palestine was a dependency of the kingdom of the Ptolemies, first from 320 to 222; it suffered much in the hostilities between Antiochus III the Great and Ptolemy IV Philopator who plundered the Temple; but in consequence of the defeat of the king of Syria, Antiochus IV (217), Egypt recovered, and in 200 B.C. regained the Egyptian districts north of the Nile. Under the Ptolemies Egypt shared in the policy of the Seleucid Empire.
ing and piety. Its pilgrimages in honor of the miraculous statue of Our Lady set up by St. Meinrad, attract from 150,000 to 200,000 annually. In 1854 a colony was sent to America and from its first settlement, St. Meinrad's Abbey, Indiana, the Swiss-American congregation was founded.—C.E.

Eirenicon (Gr., peaceable), work of Edward B. Pusey published, 1864, written to promote reunion of the Catholic and Anglican churches by raising a friendly discussion on certain points of Catholic practice which caused difficulty to Anglicans of the writer's party.

Eithne or Ethinea, styled "of the golden hair," Saint, virgin (d. c. 433). She was the daughter of King Leoghaire of Ireland. She and her sister Fedelasia, encountering St. Patrick near the fountain of Cleunch, were instructed by him in the doctrines of Christianity, were baptized, received their First Communion, and died in an ecstasy of love. Relics in the cathedral of Armagh. Feast, 11 Jan. —C.E.

Elamites, natives of Elam, a Persian province named after one of the sons of Sem (Gen., 10), s. of Media and X. of the Persian Gulf, seat of a mighty empire of which Susa was the capital, and the scene of wars between the Assyrians and the Babylonians; it was conquered by the Assyrians 640 B.C. Elamites were present at Pentecost (Acts, 2).

Elders, church officers; in the early part of the O.T. the term designated the chiefs of tribes and later the men of special influence and dignity and the lay element in the Sanhedrin. In the N.T. the term includes the clergy, called the "teaching elders" but in ordinary language it is restricted to the "lay" or "ruling elders" who are chosen in each congregation to assist the minister in the management of church affairs. In the Methodist Church the term designates a minister entitled to preach and administer the sacraments.

Eleanor, Duchess of Aquitaine, Queen of France, and Queen of England (c. 1122-1204), d. Fontevrault, Maine-et-Loire, France. She was a daughter of William X of Aquitaine and Elinor of Châtellerault, and in 1137 was married to Louis VII of France, thus adding the whole of southwestern Gaul from the borders of Brittany and Anjou to the Pyrenees, to the French kingdom. In 1146, moved by the eloquence of St. Bernard, she accompanied the king on the Crusade, after receiving the pope's blessing at St. Denis. In 1152 at Beaucancy their marriage was annulled on the plea of consanguinity by a church council under the presidency of Samson, Abp. of Reims, and that same year Eleanor married Henry, who had just succeeded his father as Count of Anjou and Duke of Normandy. In 1154 he became King of England as Henry II and was crowned with his wife by Archb. Theobald. Eleanor abetted her children in the great rebellion of 1173 for which she was imprisoned by her husband until his death, 1189. She then reigned as regent until the arrival of her son, Richard the Lion-hearted, from France and again held this position during his absence in the Holy Land. She continued to be prominent in public affairs until her retirement to the Abbey of Fontevrault. By Louis VII she had two daughters; by Henry, five sons and three daughters. Two of her sons, Richard and John, became kings of England and two of her daughters, queens, one of Castile and the other of Sicily.

Elect (Lat., eligere, to choose), in general, one chosen or set apart; in theological usage, one chosen or set apart for eternal life. In the O.T. the term is applied only to the Israelites in as far as they were called to be the chosen people of God. The N.T. (excepting perhaps Acts, 13) transfers the meaning of the term from its connection with the Israelites to the members of Christ's Church, either militant on earth or triumphant in heaven. St. Paul (Rom., 8) describes the five degrees of election as follows: the elect are foreknown, predestined, called, justified, and glorified. The reference to the saved or elect as predestined always implies God's prevision of their merit.—C.E.

Elect (c. v.)

- Election (Lat., eligere, to choose), selection of a person for a post by the votes of those authorized to fill the vacancy. In canon law, its ordinary meaning is the appointment, by legitimate electors, of a fit person to an ecclesiastical office. In Scripture, the calling or selection by God of chosen servants, like St. Paul, "a vessel of election" (Acts, 9); and all Christians: "knowing, brethren beloved of God, your election" (1 Thess., 1).—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

- Eleutherius, Saint, Pope, of Rome, b. Nicopolis (Epirus), Greece; d. Rome. As pope he is said to have declared against the Montanists. The statement which makes him the recipient of a letter from Lucius, a British king, expressing a desire to become a Christian, is rejected by recent historians as improbable. A more plausible theory is that the letter was from Lucius Abgar IX, King of Edessa (Britium), 179-214. Feast, R. Cal., 26 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Elevation of the Host, the ceremony in the Mass according to the Roman Rite wherein, immediately after the Consecration of the Host, the celebrant raises It high enough to be seen and adored by the congregation. The most ancient mention of the Elevation is found in the synodal statutes of the period of the Revival of learning (1311), the papal ceremonial of Pope Clement V. A bell is rung at each Elevation to call the attention of the faithful, Pius X granted an indulgence of seven years and seven quarantines (40 days) to all who look with piety, faith, and love upon the elevated Species.—C.E.

Elias (Heb., Yahweh is God), prophet of the O.T. He announced to Achab, King of Israel, who under the influence of Jezebel had erected a temple to Baal, that Jehovah had determined to avenge the apostasy of Israel by bringing a long drought on the land. During the drought which lasted three years, Elias withdrew to the vicinity of the brook Carith, where he was fed by the ravens. After the brook had dried up he crossed over to Sarepta, where he was hospitably received by a poor widow, whose charity he rewarded by increasing her store of meal and oil and by raising her child to life. At length he once more confronted the king and challenged the prophets of Baal to a contest on Mount Carmel, when Elias’s oblation was consumed by fire from heaven, and the false prophets were slain by the people at his command. He was obliged to flee from the wrath of Jezebel and while on Mount Horeb was commissioned by Jehovah to anoint Hazael to be King of Syria, Jehu to be King of Israel, and Elisha to be his own successor. Subsequently he denounced Achab for the murder of Naboth and reprimanded Ochoyas and Joram, King of Judah. While conversing with Elisha on the hills of Moab he was translated to heaven in a fiery chariot. The Carmelite Order traces its origin to him. An apocryphal Apocalypse of Elias was partly recovered by Maspéro in a Coptic translation.—C.E.; Smith, The Prophets of Israel, Lond., 1895.

Elia de Beaumont, Jean Baptiste Armand Louis Léonce (1790-1874), geologist, b. Caron, near Caen, France; d. there. With Dufrénoy he published a geological map of France which required 18 years for its completion and was an important event in the development of geology in that country. He became general inspector of mines and received many honors in recognition of his scientific achievements. His work on the age and origin of mountain systems was of great value.—C.E.

Elyéw (Elyth), Saint, virgin, martyr (fl. c. 490). She is said to have been the daughter of Bragan (Brychan), a British prince, after whom the present county of Brecknock is named. Rejecting marriage with a mortal prince, she espoused herself to God, and was martyred. She is the Luned of the “Mahignon” and the Lynette of Tennyson’s “Gareth and Lynette.” Feast, 1 Aug.—C.E.

Elyeus (Elisha), a prophet of Israel. In obedience to Divine command Elias designated him as his successor by casting his mantle over his shoulders. He accompanied Elias until the latter was translated and his prophetic power was confirmed by many miracles, among them the raising of a child to life and the cure of the Syrian general Naaman of leprosy.—C.E.

Elizabeth (Heb., worshiper of God), Saint, wife of Zachary, mother of St. John the Baptist. According to the Gospel of St. Luke she was “of the daughters of Aaron,” and a kinswoman of the Blessed Virgin Mary, although their actual relationship is unknown. She had reached an advanced age, but still remained childless, when the Angel Gabriel announced that she would bear a son and that he would be called John. Five months later when Elizabeth was visited in her home by Mary, not only was her son sanctified in her womb, but she herself was distincly inspired to salute her cousin as “Mother of my Lord.” No further mention of her occurs in the Scriptures. Feast, 5 Nov.—C.E.

Elizabeth (1533-1603), Queen of England and Ireland, b. Greenwich, England; d. Richmond. The daughter of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn, she was educated in the Catholic Faith and displayed great mental qualities under her tutors, William Grindal and Roger Ascham. Although fond of ritual like her father, she was, however, devoid of religious temperament. During the reign of Mary, daughter of Catherine of Aragon, she conferred scrupulously on the Roman ritual, attending Mass with her sister and even opening a chapel of her own. On Mary's a worthy husband and encouraged her in her exemplary life; they had three children. Instructed by Brother Rodger of the Order of St. Francis and later by Master Conrad of Marburg, Elizabeth increased her spiritual practices. After the death of her husband, 1227, she was driven from court by her brother-in-law, Henry Raspe, according to the older records; more recent accounts, however, state that she left voluntarily. In 1228, she renounced the world and became a tertiary of St. Francis, and in the same year built the Franciscan hospital at Marburg and devoted herself to the care of the sick. Many miracles occurred at her grave. Patroness of Louis proved gian court to be educated. In 1221 she was married to the second son, Louis, the eldest having died in led an austerely simple life, practised penance, and devoted herself to works of charity. Louis proved dead. In 1325, at his death, she retired to a convent of Poor Clares, where she became a Franciscan Tertiary. She was called the "Peacemaker," because of her intervention in the armed hostility between her son and husband. Canonized, 1025. Relics at Coimbra. Feast, R. Cal., 8 July.—C.E.; Butler.

St. Elizabeth of Hungary

Elizabeth of Hungary, SAINT, queen, widow (1207-1336). She was the daughter of King Pedro II of Aragon, and grandniece of St. Elizabeth of Hungary. Her husband, Diniz, King of Portugal, was extremely immoral, but Elizabeth pursued her strict religious practices, and won him to repentance by her prayers and goodness. In 1325, at his death, she retired to a convent of Poor Clares, where she became a Franciscan Tertiary. Her husband, Diniz, King of Portugal, was extremely immoral, but Elizabeth pursued her strict religious practices, and won him to repentance by her prayers and goodness. In 1325, at his death, she retired to a convent of Poor Clares, where she became a Franciscan Tertiary. She was called the "Peacemaker," because of her intervention in the armed hostility between her son and husband. Canonized, 1025. Relics at Coimbra. Feast, R. Cal., 8 July.—C.E.; Butler.

consecrated Bp. of Ross, and of Aberdeen c. 1488. In the same year he was appointed Lord High Chancellor and later Keeper of the Privy Seal. He opposed the unfriendly policy toward England which terminated in the defeat of Flodden. Although a great statesman, Elphinstone was also a zealous bishop, reforming the services of the cathedral, rebuilding the choir, and building the great steeple at the east end. He is famous as the real founder of Aberdeen University (q.v.); he gave salaries to the professors of theology, canon law, civil law, medicine, languages, and philosophy, and pensions to several poor students. Printing in Scotland was practically introduced by him in 1607; one of the first uses he made of it was to have the Aberdeen Breviary (q.v.) printed. He was buried in the college chapel.

Ely, ancient diocese, England, established 1108 around the monastery (later the cathedral), founded by St. Etheldreda or Audrey in 673. The last Catholic bishop, Thomas Thirlby, was imprisoned by Elizabeth, when the diocese became the present Anglican cathedral, rebuilding the choir, and building the great steeple at the east end. Emanation (Lat., emano, to flow from), the act of a thing issuing out of its source as a property or accident of that source. Philosophical emanation or emanationism, variously conceived and applied, is commonly accepted as meaning the derivation of all things from the First Reality by emanation as by a necessity of nature, some immediately, other mediately. It is a process of descent from the First Source remaining unchanged. It is condemned by the Council of the Vatican as opposed to the Divine Nature especially in its simplicity and infinity. The Church affirms that God by an act of His will created all things out of nothing.—C.E.

Emancipation. Catholic. To abolish the practice of the Catholic religion in Great Britain a series of penal laws was enacted, beginning with the sanguinary measures of Elizabeth which were supplemented by less stringent but more effective acts until the time of George III. Catholic priests were ipso facto guilty of high treason; it was treason to become recusant or to assist the Church of Rome; children were denied education in the Catholic religion and were disqualified from owning or acquiring property in any way if sent abroad to Catholic schools by their parents, who were fined for the offense; failure to attend the Established Church incurred a fine for recusancy, and a convicted recusant was outlawed; members of both houses of Parliament were obliged before taking their seats to denounce Transubstantiation, the Mass, and invocation of the saints as idolatrous. Catholics were denied not only freedom of worship but all civil rights as well, and their property and even lives were at the mercy of any informer. Finally in 1778 a Catholic committee was appointed Lord High Chancellor, and later Keeper of the Privy Seal. He opposed the unfriendly policy toward England which terminated in the defeat of Flodden. In Ireland, war between Catholics and Protestants after the fall of the Stuarts had been concluded by the Treaty of Limerick, 1691. An oath of allegiance was substituted for the Oath of Supremacy, Catholics could practise their religion unmolested, sit in Parliament, vote for its members, hold any civil or military post, and own land, but the treaty was broken and a penal code enforced by the Protestant Parliament in Dublin. With the rise of national feeling among Irish Protestants, however, Catholics were favored, and the first step toward emancipation was taken in 1771 with the passage of an act permitting Catholics to hold under lease for sixty-one years fifty acres of bog, and in 1774 the Oath of Allegiance replaced that of supremacy. Similar minor concessions were made in the 18th century. An oath to support the Protestant Succession, which was recalled and sectarian hatred revived, resulting in the rebellion of 1798. After its suppression Pitt's plan for a legislative union by which all Catholics were to become reconciled to the Church of Rome; children were denied education in the Catholic religion and were disqualified from owning or acquiring property in any way if sent abroad to Catholic schools by their parents, who were fined for the offense; failure to attend the Established Church incurred a fine for recusancy, and a convicted recusant was outlawed; members of both houses of Parliament were obliged before taking their seats to denounce Transubstantiation, the Mass, and invocation of the saints as idolatrous. In Christian art various emblems are used expressive of the characteristic virtues or actions of saints, e.g., the eagle for St. John the Baptist because of the sublime flight of his inspiration. The dove is used as an emblem of the Holy Spirit; a lamb, for Our Lord. Badges, banners, or signs distinctive of a society or rank, exhibited at burials, are also called emblems. If these emblems portray any mark of hostility to the faith or discipline of the Catholic Church, they should be removed from the church or at the grave, before the exequies allowed by the Church may be performed (Can., 1233, 2).—Henry, Catholic Customs and Symbols, N. Y., 1925.

Embroidery, Ecclesiastical. From many notices it is known that embroidery was used to ornament vestments or civil war times. No specimen has been preserved earlier than the 10th century. Up to the 13th century gold thread embroidery was the prevalent form of decoration. The fullest development was reached in this and the two succeeding centuries. Figure embroidery was most used and the work materials were thread of gold, silver, and precious stones, etc. In the 11th and 12th centuries Sicily was famous, in the 13th and 14th, England, France, Italy, and Germany also produced splendid work. At the close of the Middle Ages raised embroidery was substituted for the flat stitch and the art degenerated. With the influence of secular embroidery purely ornamental designs were used and pictorial needlework was abandoned. The art does not differ from secular embroidery and no regulations have been made as to material, color, or design of ecclesiastical vestments.—C.E.

Emerentiana, Saint, virgin, martyr (Rome, 365). According to the acts of St. Agnes she was a foster-sister to that saint; while praying at St. Agnes's grave she was stoned to death by the pagan mob, thus receiving the baptism of blood. Relics in Church of St. Agnes, Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 22 Jan.—C.E.; Butler, ed. Thurston.

Emery, Jacques André (1732-1811), superior of the Society of St. Sulpice, b. Gex, France; d. Paris. He taught with distinction in various seminaries and became the Archbishop of Paris and superior general of the Society of St. Sulpice. He kept a cool head during the storms of the French Revolution and while ready for the good of religion to go as far as the rights of the Church permitted he was staunch in his opposition to the Civil Constitution of the Clergy. It was he who at Bp. Carroll's request sent the first Sulpicians to the United States. Under Napoleon he reestablished the seminary of St. Sulpice, but his defense of the pope against the emperor resulted in the expulsion of the Sulpicians from the seminary. He left many writings, which have been published by Migne in his collection of theological works.—C.E.

Emigrant Aid Societies, organizations which minister to the material or spiritual needs of emigrants. Their services are usually rendered gratuitously, although in some cases a nominal fee is exacted from those who can afford it. They are supported for the most part by voluntary contributions and membership dues. Association for the Protection of Belgian and Dutch Immigrants, founded, 4 June, 1807, at Chicago, Ill., by Catholic clergy throughout the United States, ministers to the spiritual and material needs of Catholic immigrants from Belgium and Holland. Its services are mainly gratuitous. Charitable Irish Society, founded, 17 March, 1877, in Boston, is the earliest American emigrant aid society. Originally it was anti-Catholic, but at present it is preponderantly Catholic in membership and in those to whom it ministers. Emigrant Assistance Society of New York, founded, 1825, aids and secures employment for Irish immigrants. Hibernian Society for the Relief of Emigrants from Ireland was established, 3 March, 1796, in Philadelphia, and a similar organization was founded in Savannah, Ga., March, 1812. Irish Emigrant Society was founded in New York, 1841, through the instrumentality of Bp. Hughes, and resulted in the establishment of the Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank. Jeanne d'Arc Home was founded in New York, 1885, under the patronage of the Fathers of Mercy and through the kindness of Miss C. T. Smith, for the protection of immigrant women. It is managed by the Sisters of Divine Providence. Mission of Our Lady of the Rosary, founded, 1881, through the instrumentality of Charlotte G. O'Brien, to assist Irish immigrant girls. Its services are entirely gratuitous. St. Joseph's Society, established, 1893, by Polish priests, renders assistance gratis to Polish immigrants, and maintains a hospice as an adjunct in charge of the Felician Sisters. Society for Italian Immigrants, organized, 1901, cares for Italian immigrants, in which connection it maintains homes and schools in labor camps. It is affiliated with no religious denomination. Society of Saint Raphael, founded, 1871, ministers to the spiritual and temporal needs of German emigrants. In 1883 at the instigation of Peter Paul Cahensly a New York branch was established, and in 1889 a place of shelter called the Leo House was founded to supplement its work. It eventually extended its protection to emigrants of other nations. Society of Saint Raphael for Italian Immigrants was founded in New York, 1891, by the members of the Congregation of St. Charles Borromeo. It maintains a home conducted by the Sisters of Charity (Pallottines) for the shelter of women and children; men, while permitted to eat there, sleep elsewhere. A branch of the society was founded in Boston in 1892.—C.E.

Emigrés, è-mè-grâ (Fr., émigrer, to emigrate), French noblemen who, from the very beginning of the Revolution, "migrated" to Germany, Piedmont, and England, to escape persecution and in the hope of starting a counter-revolutionary movement with the help of foreign rulers. Undoubtedly they made a costly blunder in proclaiming their intention of calling upon foreign intervention to stop the course of the Revolution and save the throne, but impartial history proves that they intended to fight the Revolution alone and that they never dreamt of surrendering any French territory. Their headquarters were at Coblenz and at Turin, and their leaders the Count of Provence (the future Charles X.) and the Count of Artois (the future Charles X.). In the beginning they suffered severely, but after they were organized, they displayed a frivolity which discredited their cause abroad as well as at home. Louis XVI protested against the deeds and avowed plans of these compromising allies. Bishops and priests after refusing to take the oath of "Liberty and Equality," took refuge in England and Spain, being far better received in the former country, since Spain feared the influence of many of the lower French clergy who had shown a strong leaning towards the "New Ideas." These "Emigrés Priests" created everywhere a most favorable impression by their courage and the dignity of their lives. Sidney Dark, in the Dublin Review, April, 1929, says that their presence greatly lessened anti-Catholic prejudices in England, thus helping to prepare the way for Catholic Emancipation.—Daudet, Histoire de l'Emigration, Paris, 1905-07; Sicard, Le Clergé de France pendant la Révolution, Paris, 1893-1912. Eminence, title of cardinal, first bestowed by Urban VII in a decree of 10 June, 1630; formerly title of German ecclesiastical prince-electors and still of Grand Master of the Knights of St. John. (Ed.)

Emmanuel, or Emmanuel. (Heb., God with us), a title of the Messias in a series of prophecies (Is., 7, 1 to 9, 7) delivered during the reign of King Achaz of Juda (735-727 B.C.). Achaz seeks salvation from the danger presented by the war with Rasin, King of Syria, and Phæe, King of Northern Israel, in an alliance with the Assyrians. Isaiah in a first oracle indicates the doctrine that in Jehovah, but in Him alone, salvation is to be found, and declares that lack of trust in Him will involve disaster: "If you will not believe, you shall not continue." In another oracle, the Prophet offers to give any sign of God's protection that Achaz may ask. The king, who is an idolater, does not deny Jehovah's power to work a miracle, but is doubtless equally convinced of the power of the gods of Assyria; he hypocritically refuses to "tempt the Lord." Then God, through His prophet, gives a sign, which is not, as many have thought, the birth of Emmanuel, but the devastation of Juda. When the House of David sees the country overrun, first by the Syri ans and the Israelites of the north and then by those very Assyrians in whom they place their trust, then they will be reminded of Isaiah's teaching that "salvation is in Jehovah." With the prediction of the enemy's invasion, Isaiah connects the prediction of the salvation which shall come through Emmanuel; he is not, however, enlightened as regards the date of the birth of Emmanuel. He has a vision of the Virgin "conceiving and bringing forth a son"; he sees Him growing up in the midst of the poverty brought on by Achaz's wicked course, but he does not say that He will be born in the near future. In Is., 8, the name of Emmanuel evokes the assurance of final victory for His land; in Is., 9, He is given names which are really applicable only to a king who is at the same time God. Here at least Isaiah seems to have a glimpse of the truth of the Incarnation. —C.E.

Emmanuel, the official organ of the Priests' Eucharistic League in the United States, published monthly in English in New York City by the Fathers of the Blessed Sacrament; founded, 1895; circulation, 11,142.

Emmanuel College, Boston, Mass., founded, 1918; conducted by the Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur; College of Arts and Sciences; professors, 37; students, 302; degrees conferred in 1929, 77.

Emmaus, ém-mà’ús (Heb., a people rejected), town in Palestine "sixty furlongs from Jerusalem" (Luke, 24), exact location uncertain, where Our Lord manifested Himself to Cleophas and another disciple after His Resurrection.—C.E.

Emmerich, Anne Catherine (1774-1824), Augustinian nun, stigmatic and ecstatic, b. Flamsche, near Coesfeld, Westphalia; d. Dülmen. Her piety was manifested at an early age and aroused some antipathy among the sisters in her convent, which she was obliged to leave when it was closed by order of Jerome Bonaparte in 1812. In 1813 she became bedridden. The supernatural favors accorded her were investigated by an episcopal and a governmental commission (1819). When she was visited by the famous Klemens Brentano she recognized him as the man who was to enable her to fulfill God's command of writing down her revelations. In 1833 appeared the first work he had written at her dictation, "The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ." "The Life of the Blessed Virgin Mary" did not appear until 1852, and in 1881 was published "The Life of Our Lord," which Brentano had left in manuscript. —C.E.

Emser, Hieronymus (1477-1527), opponent of Luther; b. Ulm, Germany; d. Dresden. He ranks as one of the pioneers of classical humanism in Germany. At first he admired Luther, but broke with him in 1519 on hearing him express Hussite opinions. He was plunged into controversy with the heresiarchs. His defense of the Church was masterly and he never descended to scurrility. He made a German translation of the New Testament.—C.E.

Emus. —Eminensiusius (Most Eminent).

En clara vox redarguit, or HARK, A HERALD VOICE IS CALLING, hymn for Lauds on Sundays and week-days in Advent; Ambrosian school, 6th century. The 27 translations, seven are written from the original text; the English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Enclosure. See Cloister.

Encyclical, a circular letter; now almost exclusively a papal document, differing in technical form from a Bull or Brief, treating of matters affecting the general welfare of the Church and addressed explicitly to the patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops of the Universal Church in communion with the Apostolic See.—C.E.; Great Encyclical of Leo XIII, tr. Wynne, N. Y., 1903; Encyclicals of Pius XI, tr. Ryan, St. L., 1927.

Encyclopedia, term used to designate an abridgment of human knowledge in general or a considerable department thereof, treated from a uniform point of view, or in a systematized summary. The technical use of the word dates only from the 16th century, although encyclopedic treatment of human science reaches back to antiquity. Systematic encyclopedias are divided into two classes: (1) those which present all branches of knowledge, arranged uniformly and organically according to some fixed system of connection; (2) the lexicographical encyclopedias, which treat of the same matter arranged alphabetically. Aristotle (384-322 B.C.) was the first in ancient times to attempt a summary of human knowledge in encyclopedic form. The most important compilers in the Christian era were Isidore of Seville (c. 560-636), Suidas (b. c. 950), and Vincent of Beauvais (d. c. 1264). Among works of this nature founded on philosophy and the interpretation of sciences were: Francis Bacon, "Instauratio Magna" (1620); Pierre Bayle, "Dictionnaire historique et critique" (1693-1706); Diderot and d'Alembert, "Encyclopédie, ou dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts et des métiers" (1772). One of the most scientific of the German works is the "Allgemeine Encyclopädie der Wissenschaften und Künste" (1813-50), of Ersch, Hüfeland, Gruber, Meier, Brockhaus, Müller, and Hoffmann. The encyclopedias devoted to theology have reached a high degree of merit. The most important Catholic works are: "Dizionario di erudizione storico-ecclesiastica" (1840-79), of Gaetano Moroni; "Kirchenlexikon" (1847-60), of Wetzer and Welte; "Dictionnaire de théologie catholique" (1903- ), of Vacant and Mangenot; The Catholic Encyclopedia (1906-22), by Pace, Pallen, Shahah, Walsh, and Wynne. Two famous Catholic biblical encyclopedias are: "Dictionnaire de la bible" (1895-1912), of F. Vigouroux; and "Lexicon biblicum" (1905-10), of M. Hagen. Of general encyclopedias under Catholic redaction there are: "Konsversations-Lexikon" (1902-22), by Herder; and Universal Knowledge (1927- ), by Pace, Pallen, Shahah, Walsh, and Wynne. The 19th century saw the publication of various encyclopedias dealing with such varied topics as philology, jurisprudence, theology, pedagogy, forestry, physics, chemistry, history, geography, Christian archeology, hagiography, sociology, medicine, biography, etc. At the present time nearly every country has a representative encyclopedia, in addition to various technical works of the same nature.—C.E.

Encyclopedists, term used to designate: (1) a group of French intellectuals of the 18th century who contributed articles to the "Encyclopédie"; (2) especially, many writers, known as "philosophers," who belonged to their group and helped promote the views set forth in the "Encyclopédie." The Encyclopedists instigated a movement, founded on rationalism, materialism, naturalism, and deism, which sought to do away with revealed religion. The leaders, Denis Diderot (1713-84) and Jean d'Alembert (1717-83), were aided by Voltaire, Rousseau, De Jaucourt, Turquet, Quesnay, Borden, Daubenton, D'Holbach, and others. Their official organ was the "Encyclopédie, ou Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts et des métiers" (Paris, 1751-65), which was based on John Mills's French translation of Chambers's "Cyclopædia," in regard to the publication of which difficulties had arisen in 1745. Diderot and D'Alembert took over the disputed work and converted it into a vehicle for the propagation of rationalism and scientific progress. The Church sought in vain to stop the resulting increase of irreligion. The atheistic "philosophers" were secretly aided by government officials who secured the expulsion of the Jesuits from France, 1762, and who secured the legislation necessary for publication of the anarchistic "Encyclopédie." The evils attendant upon this movement are exemplified by the French Revolution (1789-99) and the anticlerical legislation in France which survives until the present.—C.E.

End. The Final Cause, that for the sake of which the effect or result of an action is produced. There are many distinctions and divisions, of which only two are necessary for our purpose: the effect or result to which the agent is directed by the efficient cause; and the intention, or that which he principally and ultimately intends by his operation. The first is passive, the second is active. We are more concerned with the question of intention, as synonymous with end, especially in morality. In moral theology an intention may be actual, virtual, or habitual. It is actual if it is elicited immediately before the act is performed, and with reference to the same. It is virtual if its force is borrowed from a previous act of the will, which is accounted as continuing the effect (in virtue of the previous act). In the habitual, it is habitual if it once existed and has never been retracted. To be morally good (see Morality) an act must be inspired by an actual, or at least a virtual, good intention. A merely habitual intention (except in the application of the fruits of a Mass) is not sufficient for this purpose, because it may exist in an unconscious subject and is strictly speaking non-existent while the action is being performed. In moral theology there is also considered the last end of man. This last end is a final something, to the attainment of which all other actions are to be subordinated. According to moral theology the last end of man is the external glory of God, with the resuscitation of his people whose religious life he strove to uplift. In 1222 he crowned at Aachen the youthful Henry VII, whose guardian he was and in whose name he governed the empire. Urged by the pope and the emperor to protect the nuns of Essen against their secular administrator, his cousin Frederick of Isenberg, he incurred the enmity of the count, who caused him to be attacked and killed. He was considered to have made amends by his martyrdom for his human weakness, but was never formally canonized. Represented blessing his executioners. Feast, 7 Nov.—C.E.

Engelbert of Cologne, SAINT, MARTYR (1185-1216), abp. of Cologne, b. Berg, Germany; d. near Schwelm. His father was Engelbert, Count of Berg. While still a boy he was given a provostship in three churches, but he led a worldly life and was finally excommunicated with his cousin Adolf, Abp. of Cologne, whom he succeeded in 1216, after having submitted and sought to make atonement. As archbishop he gained the universal veneration of his people whose religious life he strove to uplift. England, Southern Part of Great Britain; area, 50,574 sq. m.; pop., 55,881,019. Christianity was introduced into England by St. Augustine in 597; it spread rapidly in southern Britain, and was brought to Northumbria by Paulinus, Felix, a Burgundian monk, converted East Anglia; and Birinus began in 634 the evangelization of Wessex. St. Aidan, founder of the monastery of Lindisfarne, spread the Faith in the north, and St. Wilfrid, who besides converting the South Saxons, reconciled the Christians of Northumberland to the Roman Easter and other institutions sanctioned by the Holy See. Monasteries were established and made famous by Cadmon, Bede, and Alcuin. During the Danish invasions in the 8th and 9th centuries, church and monastic property was destroyed and the work of evangelization was interrupted. Reorganization of the clergy and restoration of the damaged property were effected by St. Dunstan, Abp. of Canterbury, 960-988. Papal authority was recognized with increased respect during the Anglo-Saxon rule, and at the close of the period there were 17 bishoprics. The 10th century is marked by the great monastic reform of Cluny and by the names of such saints as Ethelwold, Ulric, and Dunstan. After the Norman Conquest in 1066, the Church was in complete submission to the papacy, and the State was the vassal of the Church. St. Anselm fought against royal investiture and allowed himself to be banished rather than receive it from the king. In the reign of Henry II occurred the martyrdom of his archbishop, Thomas Becket, in 1170. Englishmen played their part in the Crusades, and among those who lost their lives for the cause was Baldwin, Abp. of Canterbury. The disturbing force in the ecclesiastical life of England during the 14th century was the rise and spread of Lollardy. This affected a certain portion of the country, but even after the Wyclif movement the position of the Church remained as secure as ever.

The Protestant Reformation, which reached its climax in 1535, by the passing of the Act of Supremacy declaring the king Supreme Head of the Church of England, severed England from the unity of Christendom. While upholding Catholic doctrine in its own fashion, Henry VIII appropriated ecclesiastical property by the suppression of religious houses. After his death the direction of ecclesiastical affairs passed to Thomas Cranmer, who legalized the marriage of the clergy, advocated the substitution of tables for altars, and took part in the compilation of the second Prayer-book of Edward VI. Hope revived among Catholics on Mary's accession to the throne (1553), but her indefatigable zeal failed to undo the harm wrought by her predecessors. When Elizabeth succeeded her sister (1558) she revived all the Acts against the pope and passed the Act of Uniformity, ordering the use in churches of the second Prayer-book of Edward VI, and the attendance of the laity at the parish church for the new service. This was the definite establishment of the new religion in England. Thenceforth Catholic rites could be performed only in secret, and with severe punishment if discovered. In 1558 William Allen founded a seminary at Douai to perpetuate the Faith in England by training new priests and keeping up the spirits of the faithful. After 1570 when the pope deprived Elizabeth and released her Catholic subjects from their allegiance, the severity of the penal laws was increased. In four months in 1558, twenty-one priests, eleven laymen, and one woman were martyred for their faith, and during the remainder of Elizabeth's rule Catholics were incessantly persecuted. The ancient Catholic hierarchy ended in 1585 with the death of Thomas Goldwell, Bp. of St. Asaph, but despite the cruelty of Elizabeth the clergy of the English missions continued their labors, and in 1598 Catholics were placed in charge of archpriests.

The persecuted Catholics looked hopefully to James I (1603) but he chose to follow the policy of Elizabeth. Under him twenty priests and eight Catholic laymen suffered, but in the majority of instances he fined rather than tortured them. In 1623 William Bishop became Vicar Apostolic over all England. In the reign of Charles I (1625-49) punishment was suspended and the number of English Catholic clergy was considerably increased. When war broke out between Charles I and Parliament, Catholics supported the king unanimously. After their opposition during the Commonwealth, with the Restoration of Charles II in 1660 they looked forward to a recompense for their services, but the king, recognizing the strong anti-Catholic feeling throughout the nation, kept the penal laws on the statute book and at intervals issued proclamations banishing Jesuits and other priests from the kingdom. In 1629 eight Jesuits, two Franciscans, five secular priests, and seven laymen were put to death, and many more died in prison for their faith. The following year Lord Stafford was murdered, and in 1651 Blessed Oliver Plunket, Abp. of Armagh, was executed at Tyburn. Under James II (1685-88) Catholics were admitted to civil and military positions, members of religious orders wore their habits on the streets of London, a Jesuit school was opened, the Anglican clergy were forbidden to preach against popery, and Magdalen College was converted into a Catholic society. Pope Innocent XI in 1688 created the four districts or vicariates of London, Midland, Northern, and Western. When William and Mary succeeded (1689), new penalties and disqualifications for Catholics were added. In 1778 the first Catholic Relief Act was passed, repealing the worst features of the statute of 1699, and defining a new oath of allegiance which a Catholic could take without denying his religion. A declaration was published in 1826 by all the vicars Apostolic of England explaining various articles of the Catholic Faith; this helped to remove prejudice, and in 1829 the Emancipation Act became law. The Oxford Movement (1833-45) brought many converts into the Catholic Church. In 1840 Pope Gregory XVI created the eight districts or vicariates of London, Western, Eastern, Central, Welsh, Lancashire, Yorkshire, and Northern. Pius IX restored the Catholic hierarchy in England in 1850, establishing Westminster as an archdiocese with fifteen suffragan sees. Card. Wise- man, Abp. of Westminster, 1850-65, organized the Catholic Church as it exists in England today. His successor, Card. Manning (1865-92), placed the Catholics on an equal footing with their countrymen, while Card. Newman put an end to the old error that a loyal Catholic cannot be a loyal Englishman and raised the Church to what had previously seemed an impossible rank in Protestant England. Since that time the position of the Church has been gradually strengthened. By letters Apostolic in 1911 Pope Pius X divided England and Wales into the three ecclesiastical provinces of Westminster, Birmingham, and Liverpool. On 17 Feb., 1916, a fourth province, Cardiff, was added. Catholic societies and activities have expanded, the laity have demonstrated their interest in all Catholic affairs, and the Catholic population has increased enormously through natural causes and the continual influx of converts. The Catholic vote has grown, due to the extension of the franchise, particularly by the inclusion of women voters, and the social and political influence of Catholics has been extended owing to the increase of Catholic pupils in Catholic secondary schools. The Catholic Relief Act of 1927 has revoked various minor statutes and removed the tax on charitable bequests and endowments formerly required from Catholics. Owing to the propaganda of Hilaire Belloc and G. K. Chesterton the attitude of the secular press toward the Catholic Church has changed to such a degree that Catholic events and ceremonies are now included in the daily news.

The ecclesiastical organization of England in 1929 comprised: the province of Westminster, which consists of the Archdiocese of Westminster, with the five suffragan sees of Brentwood, Northampton, Nottingham, Portsmouth, and Southwark; the province of Birmingham, which consists of the Archdiocese of Birmingham, with the three suffragan sees of Clifton, Plymouth, and Shrewsbury; the province of Cardiff, which consists of the Archdiocese of Cardiff, with the suffragan see of Menevia; the province of Liverpool, which consists of the Archdiocese of Liverpool, with the five suffragan sees of Hexham and Newcastle, Lancaster, Leeds, Middlesbrough, and Salford. For diocesan statistics, see articles on the various dioceses. Total: churches, 2,034; priests, regular, 1,416; universities and colleges, 45; seminaries, 6; high schools, 472; primary schools, 1,217; charitable institutions, 217; Catholica, 2,058,201. England, John (1786-1842), first Bp. of Charleston, S. C., b. Cork, Ireland; d. Charleston. Educated in the schools of Cork, he studied law for two years, entered Carlow College, 1803, and was ordained, 1808, having begun earlier to give religious instruction and to organize charitable enterprises, among them a reformatory for women, and schools for poor children. In 1819 he was made president of the Diocesan College of St. Mary, where he taught theology. He was as ardent as Daniel O'Connell in the cause of Catholic Emancipation, founding "The Chronicle" with that end in view. Having expressed a desire for missionary life in America, he was named Bp. of Charleston and consecrated in Cork, 21 Sept., 1820. He refused to take the oath of allegiance customary in Ireland, declaring his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States. His diocese, which included North and South Carolina, and Georgia (qq.v.), contained but three churches. By indomitable energy and constant visitations to all its settlements he had rallied Catholics to the number of 12,000 by 1832. A pioneer in intellectual activities as well as in religion, he organized in 1823 a Book Society, designed to have branches in each congregation, founded the same year the "United States Catholic Miscellany," the first Catholic newspaper in the United States, and established a seminary and college called "The Philosophical and Classical Seminary of Charleston," of which he was president and chief teacher. His eloquence made him a popular lecturer in the great cities of the country and in 1826 he was invited to address Congress. He was the chief factor in bringing about the first Provincial Council of Baltimore, 1829. The churches in his diocese had increased to 17 at the time of his death. A new edition of his collected writings, in five volumes, was published in Cleveland, in 1908.—C.E.; Guilday, Life and Times of John England, NewYork, 1927.

of Rome, but was revived, 1818, and placed under English secular clergy. With Douai and the other continental seminaries, the college helped to keep the faith alive in England during the days of persecution and supplied priests for the English mission. It is immediately subject to the Holy See, which is represented by a cardinal protector. The immediate superiors are the rector, appointed by the pope on the recommendation of the English hierarchy, and the vice-rector appointed by the rector. The college does not exercise its faculty of conferring degrees, the students taking degrees in philosophy and theology at the Roman College. Among its illustrious students have been Robert Southwell, S.J., Thomas Tichborne, S.J., and Card. Wiseman.—C.E.

English in English Bibles, THE, title of a book by J. F. Sheahan, in which the words of the first 14 chapters of the Gospel of St. Matthew are given in three different versions: the Catholic "Rheumes" of 1582 (commonly called the Douay); the Protestant "Authorized," of 1611; and the Protestant "Revised," of 1881. The three versions are interlined with each other, which shows the variations at a glance. Attention is also called to the many plain English words that were put in the Bible by Rheumes, but which the Authorised never used (e.g., sunset, daylight). This is a good answer to Protestant critics of Rheumes, who comment on the large number of unusual words of Latin derivation therein. The Catholic translators of Rheumes were by no means ignorant of good English; and they expressly state in their preface their reason for these Latinisms, which was, to reflect the intent and meaning of the Vulgate. The majority of these Latinisms were anglicized by Bp. Challoner in the 18th century, making the Bible which English-speaking Catholics now use.—Sheahan, The English in English Bibles, Poughkeepsie.

Enoch, SAINT (d. c. 580), popularized in the name of an Established Presbyterian church, public square, and important railroad terminal in Glasgow, Scotland, is rightly Thenc or Theneu, the mother of St. Kentigern (q.v.); she was baptized by St. Serf. Feast, 18 July.—Holweck, sv.

Enos, the son of Seth (Gen., 4, 5). He was 90 years old at the birth of his son Cainan, and lived 905 years. With Henoch and Lamech, Enos is the only one of the antediluvian patriarchs, of whom Genesis gives something besides his age and his name. (W. J. L.)

Entablature, a superstructure which lies upon the columns in classic architecture. Its three parts are: the architrave (supporting member); the frieze (decorative); and cornice (projecting member). Each of the orders has its appropriate entablature.—C.E.

Enthronization, a ceremony occurring at the end of the consecration of a bishop, and of the solemn benediction of an abbot or abbess. The new bishop, robed in pontifical vestments, and holding the crosser in his left hand, is conducted by the consecrating bishop and the first coconsecrator to the throne (or if the ceremony take place outside the cathedral of the new bishop, to the faldstool), where he takes his seat. The new abbot is conducted by the officiating bishop to the throne, or faldstool, where he receives the obeisance from his monks. Likewise the new abbess is conducted to her place in choir, where she receives the reverences of her nuns.—C.E. (z.c.w.)

Entombment of Christ (IN ART). Among the many masters who have represented this subject are: Fra Angelico, Francia, Gaddi, Grünewald, Overbeck, Palmerazzo, Perugino, Raphael, Rembrandt, Titian, Van Dyck, and Verochio.

En ut superba crinimum, or Lo, how the Savage Crew, hymn for Matins on the feast of the Sacred Heart. It was written by an unknown author in the 16th century. There are six translations; the English title given is by E. Caswall.—Britt.

Envoy (Lat., in, in; via, way), a diplomatic agent of the second rank; anyone sent on a mission; a person deputed by a ruler or government to negotiate a treaty, or to transact other business with a foreign ruler or government. Papal envoys are those sent to another ruler by the pope.

Envy is sadness on account of another's good, inasmuch as the latter is, or at least is regarded as, lessening one's own excellence; one of the seven deadly vices. (W. J. R.)

Eoghan, Ó'íon (Eugens), SAINT (d. c. 618), first Bp. of Ardstaw, b. Leinster, Ireland. As a boy he was carried off to Britain and subsequently to Brittany by pirates. Returning to Ireland, he presided over the Abbey of Kilnamanagh, County Wicklow. Among his disciples was St. Kevin of Glendalough. He was consecrated Bp. of Ardstaw, c. 581. The see was transferred to Derry in the 13th century, and Eoghan is today the tutelary guardian of the See of Derry. Feast, 23 Aug.—C.E.

EP., Episc. = episcopus (bishop).

Epact (Gr., epi, upon; ago, lead), term given to the surplus days of the solar year over the year of 12 lunar months, or the moon's age in days on the first day of a year. The system of epacts is based on the Metonic Lunar Cycle, and it is employed to determine the time of the ecclesiastical lunar moon.—C.E.

Epéé, Charles Michel de l' (1712-89), priest, inventor of the sign alphabet for the instruction of the deaf and dumb. b. Versailles, France; d. Paris. His success with two deaf and dumb pupils led him to found at his own expense a school for the education of others so afflicted. His sign system laid the foundation of all systematic instruction of the deaf and dumb.—C.E.

Ephesians, Epistle to the, the name of one of the didactic books of the N.T., written from Rome by St. Paul sometime during his first Roman captivity (A.D. 61-63). The right of this epistle to a place in the canon of inspired books has never been contested, while its Pauline authorship is proclaimed both by its style and contents, and by the universal testimony of antiquity. The explicit statement of three chapters are taken up with moral precepts in keeping with the dogma just explained. The words “to reestablish all things in Christ” (1, 10) were the battle-cry of the pontificate of Pius X. The description of the Church in 4, 4-17, helped to convert Card. Manning. In 5, 32, the Council of Trent assures us, Paul hints at the sacramental character of matrimony. A section of the third chapter forms part of the Mass of the Sacred Heart, while a passage from the fifth chapter is read as the epistle of the Nuptial Mass.—C.E.; Prat, tr. Stoddard, The Ephesus, city, Lydia, Asia Minor, capital of Proconsular Asia; one of the seven churches to addressed his letter “to the Ephesians.” It became an archiepiscopal and is now a titular see. There

1. 1. would seem to indicate that the letter was written to the Christians who dwelt at Ephesus, but the absence of any allusion to time or place or definite persons, together with the omission of the words “at Ephesus” from some manuscripts, have led many even conservative scholars to regard the work as a circular letter rather than a message to a particular church. These same reasons make it difficult to determine the precise purpose for which the letter was written. The subject of the letter is “the union of all the faithful, both Jew and Gentile, with Christ and in Christ, as members of the one mystical Body of which Christ is the Head.” In the first three chapters, this theme is presented under a three-fold aspect; viz., the union of all men in Christ is a plan of God, conceived with infinite love from all eternity, carried out in fact by the establishment of the Church, the Body of Christ, and revealed to the Gentiles by the preaching of Paul. The remaining three chapters are taken up with moral precepts in instructed in Christian precepts by St. James, Bp. of Nisibis, whom he assisted in renewing the moral life of the citizens of that city. In 363, when Nisibis was retroceded to Persia, Ephraem fled with the Christian population to escape persecution, and settled at Edessa, where he was probably one of the chief founders of the “School of the Persians.” The great liturgical poet of the Orient, his works comprise exegetical writings, homilies, and hymns. He was called the “Sun of the Syrians” by the Syrian Christians, among whom he had great influence.

Epikeia (Gr., epieikes, reasonable), an indulgent and benign interpretation of law, which regards a law not as applying in a particular case because of circumstances unforeseen by the lawmaker. The lawmaker cannot foresee all possible cases that may come under the law, and it is therefore reasonably presumed that were the present circumstances known to the legislator he would permit the act, e.g., a mother presumes that she may miss Mass on Sunday when there is no one present to care for her baby. Epidekte is not permitted, however, no matter how grave the inconvenience, if violation of the law would render an act null and void, e.g., to presume that marriage may be contracted because of grave inconvenience in spite of an existing diriment impediment.—Slater, Manual of Moral Theology, N. Y., 1925. (J. J. McK.)

Epikeia (Gr., invocation), prayer to the Holy Ghost said by the celebrant after the words of Consecration in the Mass, occurring in all the liturgies of the East and considered essential to the validity of the Eucharistic sacrifice.—C.E.

Epiphany (Gr., epi, upon; phaino, show), Feast of the, 6 Jan., commemorates the manifestation of the glory of Christ to the Gentiles in the person of the Magi, as well as His Baptism and first miracle at Cana. Originating in the Eastern Church in the 3rd century, it soon spread to the West, where it is now commemorated especially for the apparition to the Magi. In England and many European countries it is popularly known as Twelfth Night (after Christmas) and is the occasion for the revival of numerous quaint customs. The feast is a holy day of obligation in England, Scotland, and Ireland. The office of the day is one of special beauty. —C.E.; Kellner, Heortology, A History of the Christian Festivals, St. L., 1908.

Episcopacy is a true sacrament, in which by the Sacrament of Orders, i.e., by consecration, there is conferred the fullness of the priesthood. It therefore completes and perfects the sacrificial power, and thus is an order distinct from the priesthood; it confers power to ordain and consecrate, to administer confirmation, to consecrate things destined for Divine worship, and with legitimate jurisdiction to rule a portion of the Church—called a diocese under the Roman pontiff.—Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, IV, St. L., 1920. Episcopalian (Gr., episkopos, bishop), a member of a Church ruled by bishops, without serious concern about belief or doctrines; a member of the Church of England, of the Anglican Church in the United States, Canada, Africa, and other countries. (ed.)

Epistemology (Gr., episteme, knowledge; logos, science), the science of the acquisition of knowledge (q.v.).—C.E.; Mivart, The Groundwork of Science: A Study of Epistemology, N. Y., 1898. (ed.)

Epistle, in Liturgy, selection most frequently from one of the letters, or Epistles of the Apostles read at Mass after the Collects, at the (priest's) right-hand side of the altar and therefore called the Epistle side. It is also called Lesson. As a rule there is only one, but on some days in Lent, ember-days, there are several. At High Mass the Epistle is read aloud in one tone by the subdeacon. (ed.)

Epistle Side of Altar, the right side of the altar as one faces it, so called because, very frequently, parts of the Bible taken from the epistles of the Apostles are read there during Mass as lessons. (J. C. T.)

Epistolary, a liturgical book containing the Epistles of the Mass. In the Middle Ages the book was called Apostolorum (Ordo Romanus, I, ii, ed. Mabillon) or Lectionarium in contrast to the Evangelium or Gospel Book. In France as early as the 9th century the Epistles and Gospels appeared in one book. The Pontificale Romanum orders that the candidate for the subdiaconate must touch the Liber Epistolarum or Epistolary. (R. U.)

Epping, Joseph (1835-94), astronomer and Astronomiet, b. Neuenkirchen, Westphalia; d. Exeter, Holland. He was a band of Jesuits who went to Ecuador at the request of Garcia Moreno, and became professor of mathematics at the Polytechnicum of Quito. After Moreno's assassination he went to Holland, where he taught astronomy and mathematics. In 1882 appeared "Der Kreislauf im Kosmos," a refutation of Kant and Laplace. He discovered the key to the Babylonian astronomical tables, publishing the results of his investigations in 1899.—C.E.

Equatorial Nile, Prefecture Apostolic of, Central Africa; established 1923; entrusted to the Sons of the Sacred Heart of Verona. Prefect Apostolic: Antoine Vignato (1923), residence at Gulu.

Equivoque (Lat., aequus, equal; vocare, to call), the use of a word, or phrase, having more than one meaning, with a view to concealing from one's questioner information which he has no right to seek, or to give which might unjustly embarrass or compromise the one interrogated. This is wrong when the information is due by any obligation of justice or charity, but permissible if it is advisable when the interrogation is impertinent or unjust; it is practised universally in such cases even by those who affect to deem it wrong. Excuses for not admitting visitors when inconvenient and evasive and misleading answers of professional men who are obliged to protect secrets, are examples of justifiable equivocation. A classic instance and discussion of this subject is given by Newman in Note C in the appendix to his "Apologia," that of St. Athanasius when asked by his pursuing persecutors, "Have you seen Athanasius?" "Yes," he replied, "he is close to you," and they, misled, continued on their course.—C.E.; Slater, Manual of Moral Theology, N. Y., 1908. (ed.)

Era, an epoch, a period, or a series of years, having some distinctive historical character, e.g., the Christian era, introduced by a Scythian monk (c. 527) who calculated the birth of Christ in 753 A.U.C. (Lat., ab urbe condita, from the foundation of the city) and fixed the following year 754 A.U.C. as year 1 of the "years of the Lord."—C.E.

Erasmus (Gr., amiable), Saint, martyr (303), Bp. of Syria. Tradition holds that he was transported by an angel from Mt. Lebanon whence he had fled from the persecution, to Lake Lucrino in Italy, but was seized there and taken to Campania, where he was tortured and put to death. Patron of sailors; invoked, as one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers, against intestinal trouble. Represented with an angel. Relics at Gaeta. His cult was widespread in the Middle Ages. Feast, 2 June.—Butler.

Erasmus, Desiderius (probably 1466-1536), the most important leader of German humanism, b. Rotterdam, Holland; d. Basel, Switzerland. He was the illegitimate son of a citizen of Gouda who afterwards became a priest. In 1486 Erasmus was forced through poverty to enter the monastery of Canons Regular at Emaus near Gouda, a step for which he felt no vocation. Being left free to pursue his studies, he devoted himself to the classics. He was ordained, 1492, by the Bp. of Cambrai, who chose him as his secretary and sent him to Paris to complete his studies. The remainder of his life was spent in wandering from place to place and included two sojourns in England, during which he made the acquaintance of the foremost English scholars, including Sir Thomas More. He has been called the intellectual father of the Reformation, a title justified by such works as his “Praise of Folly” (1509), his notes for his edition of the Greek New Testament (1516), and his “Colloquia Familia­ria” (1518). With regard to Luther himself he strove to maintain a strictly neutral attitude which amounted at times to double dealing. At degrees the Reformers withdrew from him and finally he acceded to the appeals of Adrian VI and Henry VIII and wrote an open attack on Luther, “Diatribe de libero arbitro” (1524), in reply to which Luther wrote his denial of free will, which was thenceforth the official programme of the new movement. Erasmus's religious ideal was entirely humanistic: reform of the Church through the introduction of humanistic “enlightenment” into her doctrine without, however, breaking with Rome. He was a potent factor in the educational movement of the time, published many editions of the classics and Fathers of the Church, and wrote movement of the time, published many editions of the classics and Fathers of the Church, and wrote

Erastianism, a system based on an analogy between the Christian and Jewish dispensations, founded in the 16th century by Erastus, a follower of Zwingli, whose real name was Thomas Lieber. The term is used to denote an undue subservience of the Church to the State; the supremacy of civil rulers in matters of religion, as in Great Britain and Germany.—C.E.

Erdington Abbey, Birmingham, England, founded, 1876, by the Benedictine, Dom Placid Walter, arch-abbot of the Beuron Congregation, and a party of monks driven from Germany; raised to an abbey, 1896. The community, severely depleted by the World War, disbanded, 1922, and the abbey passed to the Redemptorists. Priests, 13.—C.E.

Erie, Diocese of, Pennsylvania, embraces the following counties: Erie, Crawford, Mercer, Venango, Forest, Clarion, Jefferson, Clearfield, Cameron, Elk, McKean, Potter, and Warren; area, 9936 sq. m.; established, 1853; suffragan of Philadelphia. Bishops: Michael O'Connor (1853-54); Josue M. Young (1854-66); Tobias Mullen (1868-91); John E. FitzMaurice (1899-1920); John M. Gannon (1920). Churches, 163; priests, secular, 154; priests, regular, 54; religious women, 725; colleges, 5; academies, 4; high schools, 15; primary schools, 44; pupils in parochial schools, 15,409; institutions, 4; Catholics, 118,658.

Erigena, John Scotus (9th century), Irish teacher, theologian, philosopher, and poet. He was head of the palace school under Charles the Bald (c. 847), and acquired prominence in the world of letters through his translation of the works of Pseudo-Dionysius. In addition he wrote commentaries on the Gospel of St. John and on the works of Pseudo-Dionysius, a work on predestination and probably one on the Eucharist, a philosophical work on the division of nature, a treatise on the soul, and some poems. Although the errors into which he fell were many and serious, there can be no doubt that he abhorred heresy and that he always regarded himself as a loyal son of the Church.—C.E.

Ernakulam, Archdiocese of, India, comprises all the churches of the Syrian Rite of Malabar between the Chalakudy River and the Vempanad Lake, and includes in its territory the native states of Travancore and Cochin in British Cochin; area, 2450 sq. m.; established, 1923; suffragan sees, Changanacherry, Kottayam, and Trichur. St. Thomas brought Christianity to the people of Malabar in the 1st century. Augustine Kandathil was appointed archbishop, 1923. Churches and chapels, 151; priests, 185; religious women, 261; seminary, 1; high schools, 3; elementary schools, 241; institutions, 7; Catholics, 147,710.

Error, a false judgment; a discrepancy between the mental judgment and the object of this judgment. Error is different from ignorance, although it implies ignorance and proceeds from it. Ignorance implies lack of knowledge without the formation of a judgment; error can occur only in the presence of some knowledge, and expresses a mistaken judgment. If the error concerns the existence of some particular fact, it is factual; if it regards a precept of law, it is legal. It may affect either the substance of a thing or its quality. A substantial error exists in the case of one marrying other than the intended person, or, where slavery is legal, of a freeman marrying a slave. Error in such cases is a diriment impediment to matrimony. Such a substantial error, if proven, nullifies any ecclesiastical act. An error of quality or accidental nature may, on the other hand, be void only if not expressly stated in the law (Can. 1052, 1083). The law protects common error concerning jurisdiction (Can. 209).—C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Esau (Heb., hairy), the eldest son of Isaac and Rebecca and twin-brother of Jacob. The life-long opposition between the two brothers was foreshadowed by their struggle when still in their mother's womb. Esau became a skilful hunter, beloved of his father. In a moment of hunger he exchanged his birthright for a mess of pottage which Jacob had prepared. His choice of Chanaanite wives was grievously offensive to Rebecca. Preparatory to giving his parting blessing to his son, Isaac bade him procure with his hunting the meat for a savory dish; during Esau's absence Jacob, on the advice of his mother, impersonated his brother by covering his neck and hands with the hide of kids. In this manner he obtained the blessing intended for the first-born, after which he fled from his brother's wrath and they met only after 20 years. Esau settled in the land of Seir and his descendants were called Edomites.—C.E.

Eschatology (Gr., eschatos, uttermost; logos, discourse on), the branch of systematic theology which treats of the last things. These are, for the individual, death, judgment (particular), heaven or hell (purgatory, as a transitory state), the so-called "four last things," since they constitute the end of man's mortal life, and the immediate and final retribution of that life in another world. For the human race the last things embrace the resurrection from the dead and the general judgment. To these must be added the end and fate of the physical world or cosmic eschatology.—C.E.; Pohle-Peuss, Eschatology, St. Louis, 1920. (A. C. K.)

Escobar, MARINA DE (1554-1633), VENERABLE, mystic and religious foundress, b. Valladolid, Spain; d. there. Under the spiritual guidance of Luis de Ponte, she advanced steadily in perfection and bore with joy the bodily afflictions which resulted in her being bedridden at the age of fifty. She was Divinely commissioned to establish a branch of the Brigitine Order with rules modified to suit her times and country. Her revelations, written down by her and arranged by her confessor, were published after her death.—C.E.

Escobar y Mendoza, ANTONIO (1589-1669), Jesuit theologian, b. Valladolid, Spain; d. there. The orthodoxy of his writings is above criticism, hence Pascal's efforts to casten the charge of laxism on Escobar's "Manual of Cases of Conscience" do not merit serious consideration.—C.E.

Escorial, famous building, Spain, about 27 m. NW. of Madrid, known as El real Monasterio de San Lorenzo del Escorial, comprising a monastery, church, mausoleum, palace, college, library, and art-galleries. It was begun by Philip II in 1563 to commemorate the victory of St.-Quentin, 10 Aug., 1557. The plan of the building, in the shape of a gridiron, is thought to have been suggested by the fate of St. Lawrence, on whose feast the battle was fought. The architect was Juan Bautista de Toledo; after his death it was completed by Juan de Herrera. The finest building is the Doric church; under the altar is the royal mausoleum of the kings of Spain. The convent is occupied by Augustinian monks, who serve the church and conduct the college. The palace is a treasure-house of art and learning, containing MSS., tapestries, and paintings.—C.E.

Esdras, priest and scribe who left Babylon in the 7th year of Artaxerxes (458 B.C.), with a caravan of 1800 Jewish exiles, to return to Jerusalem. The Persian king had given Esdras a letter ordering the satraps beyond the Euphrates to aid him to enforce observance of the Mosaic Law in Judea. Esdras brought with him an exemption from taxation for the temple officials, and gifts from Artaxerxes and the Jews of Babylon. With these the temple worship was to be enhanced and subsidized. Within a year married marriages, of which even priests had been guilty, were dissolved. In 444 B.C., after the walls of Jerusalem had been rebuilt, the Law was read to the assembled multitude, whereupon the Feast of Tabernacles and the Day of Atonement were observed. There followed the renewal of the Covenant, which all solemnly agreed to keep. By Esdras and Nehemias (q.v.) the restoration of the Law was effected. The measures which Esdras himself effected determined in great part the organization and practice of later Judaism. The Talmud assigns to him the compilation of the Books of Paralipomenon. He is also credited with the collection of the canonical books of the Old Testament extant in his time. Jewish tradition regards him as the author of the Books of Esdras.—C.E.; Schumacher. (H. J. G.)

Esquimaux (eaters of raw flesh), a race occupying the entire Arctic Coast, and the outlying islands of America from below Cook Inlet in Alaska around to the mouth of the St. Lawrence. The Eskimo have been scattered over this vast territory are practically homogeneous. They call themselves Innuitt (people). They depend entirely upon hunting and fishing live in tents in summer and snow houses in winter, and dress in the skins of animals. Their religion is a form of animism. Their first contact with the Scandinavians was about the year 1000. Towards the end of the 14th century a war broke out between them and the Scandinavian colony of Greenland, resulting in the destruction of the latter. Most of the Greenland Eskimo have been civilized and Christianized under Lutheran and Moravian auspices. The Russian Orthodox Church began mission work in Alaska, in 1794, with great success. The great Oblate Fr. Petitot visited the Eskimo in 1865, reaching Alaska in 1870, and the Jesuits established their first Alaska mission in 1886. They have a number of flourishing stations, and are assisted by the Sisters of St. Anne, and the Brothers of Christian Instruction.—C.E.

Espejo, ANTONIO (16th century), explorer, b. probably Cordoba, Spain. He was a wealthy mining proprietor in Mexico, when he conducted a notable expedition into New Mexico and Arizona, 1582-83, to verify the reported deaths of some Franciscan missionaries, accomplishing without bloodshed and with a handful of men as great results as had been obtained by Coronado with a whole army and at the cost of an exterminating warfare. He reached a point some 50 m. N. of Prescott, visiting In... dian pueblos and noting rich silver deposits.—C.E.

Espen (Espenius), Zezer Bernhard van (1646-1728), canonist; b. Louvain, Belgium; d. Amersfoort, Netherlands. While teaching at the University of Louvain, he wrote his famous work "Jus canonicum universum." He pronounced in favor of the ordination of the Jansenist Bp. of Utrecht, which with his Jansenist doctrines brought about his suspension by the Bp. of Mechlin; on his condemnation by the university he fled to the Jansenists in Holland. The Augustinian Declan, professor at the university, is accused of having fabricated false documents in the controversy; this is known as the "Forgery of Louvain." Désirant was condemned and banished. All of Van Espen's works are on the Index.—C.E.

Espinosa, Alonso de (16th century), Spanish Dominican and historian. He was led to write his important work, "Guances de Tenerife," through his interest in Our Lady of Candelaria, an image of the Virgin and Child which had been among these people long before their conversion to Christianity. The work is the best account of this lost race.—C.E.

Espousals (Lat., spondere, to promise), a formal contract of future marriage between two persons who are thereby affianced. See Betrothal.

Espousals, Spiritual, the name given by mystical writers to designate that mystical union of love between God and some loved souls elevated to the ninth degree of contemplation. During the prayer of rapture God reveals His greatness to these particular spousals, adorns them with graces and gifts, unites Himself to them as a sign or pledge of future spiritual marriage. This union, which is called espousal, is spiritual, for the soul is united to the Divine Spirit.—Devine, Manual of Mystical Theology, N. Y., 1903.

(M. J. W.)

Espousals of the Blessed Virgin Mary, formerly a feast celebrated on 29 Jan., in honor of the Immaculate Virgin's espousal to St. Joseph. It dates from 1517 when it was granted to the nuns of the Annunciation by Leo X with nine other Masses in honor of Our Lady. Adopted by many religious orders and dioceses, it was observed for a time by nearly the whole Church, but is no longer in the Calendar. It is the subject of a famous painting by Raphael and Viterbo.—C.E.

Essence (Lat., esse, to be), that which a thing is, or that by which a thing is what it is. It is also called the quality of a thing because it tells what a thing is. It is the combination of all the notes or intelligible qualities and only those without which the thing in question cannot be conceived. In regard to finite things, when the term is used without modification, the specific and metaphysical essence is usually understood, viz., that by which it is the kind of thing it is and different from every other kind of thing. The specific essence is the complete essence which is found common to all the individuals of any species. It comprises the generic note in which it is similar to other species, e.g., the note of animality in the essence of man which is found also in the essence of brute, and the specific difference, namely the perfection which is found only in the members of the particular species, e.g., the perfection of rationality which is peculiar to the species man alone. Neither of these two notes taken alone can be the expression of a complete essence. The union of two things may be defined as the combination of all that is necessarily required for a thing actually to exist, and therefore includes existence and all those perfections which are necessarily connected with a specific essence.—C.E.; Rickaby, General Metaphysics, N. Y., 1909. (F. A. M.)

Essenes, the pre-Christian Jewish monastic order, not mentioned in the Bible. They first appear in history, c. 150 B.C., but it seems certain that their origin is more ancient. Their severe separatist character renders difficult the investigation of their origin and tenets. The chief sources of their history are: Philo (Quod omnis probus liber, II); Pliny the Elder (Natural History, VIII, XIV); Josephus (Jewish War, II, V; Antiquities, XIII, XV, XVII, XVIII). In his youth Josephus became a member of the sect, but his membership was too brief for an initiation into the inner mysteries of the order. Pliny may have taken his data from Alexander Polyhistor, a contemporary of Sulla. Philo and Josephus estimate that the Essenes at 4000. They were an exclusive society, affecting severe asceticism and benevolence to all men. Agriculture was their chief occupation. In general they renounced marriage, and recruited their ranks by adopting very young children. There is no evidence that they rejected the ethics of marriage. In fact a few of them entered marriage with a view to preserving the race. The Essenes estimate that they rejected the ethics of marriage. In fact a few of them entered marriage with a view to preserving the race. The strictest communism of possessions reigned among them, and also a very rigorous system of caste. There were four grades, between which all intercourse, even by touch, was forbidden. Much exotic superstitious idolatry was mingled with their belief in Yahweh and in immortality. In the various vicissitudes through which the Jews have passed the Essenes have generally dropped out of history.—C.E.

(A. E. B.)

Esser, Thomas (baptismal name, Herman Joseph; 1850-1926), bishop, b. Burtscheid, Germany; d. Rome. After a classical course at Aix-la-Chapelle he studied at the University of Bonn and from there went to Wurzburg. In 1871 he entered the theological seminary of Cologne, where he was ordained priest 1873, and appointed curate at Euskirchen. He was imprisoned three times for not producing the document of his appointment and for fulfilling his "official clerical duties." Unable to continue as a priest in his own country, he moved to Rome to complete his studies. In 1877 he went to Vienna and received the Dominican habit as Fr. Thomas. Appointed to the chair for the study of St. Thomas at Maynooth College, he was recalled, 1891, to lecture on canon law at the University of Freiburg, Switzerland. Summoned to Rome, 1894, to edit the new Index Librorum Prohibitorum, he became professor of canon law at the University of St. Thomas. He was subsequently appointed a member of the Roman Curia, and in 1917 was created titular Bp. of Sinide. He contributed to over 30 German, Italian, and English publications, and preached retreats in many lands, including the United States.
Est (Estius), Willem Hersels van (1542-1613), scriptural commentator and theologian, b. Gorkum, Holland; d. Douai, France. He was for many years professor at Louvain where he participated in the controversy concerning the opinions of Baüus, and after he had become professor of theology at Douai, 1582, in that involving Lessius. Est's greatest work is his commentary on the Epistle of St. Paul, which no serious student of the Epistles can afford to neglect. His uncle, Nicholas Pieck, O.S.F., was one of the martyrs of Gorkum (canonized, 1867), and Est is the author of what is considered the best history of their martyrdom.—C.E.

Establishment, name for the Church of England as a state creation and institution.

Esther (Heb., star, happiness), Queen of Persia and wife of Assuerus, who is identified with Xerxes (485-465 B.C.). She was a daughter of Abihail, the tribe of Benjamin, her Jewish name being Edissa. She had been adopted by her father's brother, Mardochai, and her beauty caused Assuerus to choose her as his queen instead of his divorced wife Vasthi. In this position she was able to protect her people against the plots of Aman, a royal favorite, the feast of Purim being observed by the Jews in commemoration of their delivery.—C.E.

Esther, Book of, a book of the Bible, relating the history of a Jewish orphan girl named Edissa, later Esther (q.v.), written probably not later than the time of Esdras, by an unknown author. Catholic scholars regard it as true history. It portrays Persian court life with great exactness of detail and apparently is based upon court annals and written Jewish sources. The Jews read it on the feast of Purim. The text of Esther has come down to us in two recensions. The Hebrew is shorter than the Greek. The Latin Bible follows the Hebrew, but the missing passages are supplied from the Greek version, as an appendix (10-16); they are necessary to complete the narrative. These so-called “deutero-canonical parts” were originally in Hebrew. Theodotion translated them from that language.—C.E.; Pope.

Esthonia, republic in northern Europe on the eastern shore of the Baltic Sea; area, 18,362 sq. m.; pop., 1,177,270. The Estonians had been independent for about a thousand years when conquered and Christianized in the 13th century by the Danes and the Brothers of the Sword. In the 17th century the country passed to Sweden, and was completely Lutheran when ceded to Russia in 1721. The czar granted religious freedom and introduced the Greek Orthodox religion which competed with Lutheranism for the allegiance of the people, but the majority remained Lutheran. There was continual struggle between German and Russian elements, until in 1917 the autonomy of Esthonia was declared by the Russian Provisional Government, and in 1920 the country became an independent republic. The few Catholic inhabitants are under the ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the Archdiocese of Riga in Latvia.—C.E. Suppl.

Eternal Creation, Faith clearly teaches that this world did not exist from all eternity, but was created in time, i.e., a measurable span of time has elapsed since the world came into being. St. Thomas and Suarez deny that we can prove from reason that eternal creation was impossible, that this world could not have existed from all eternity. Many modern philosophers think we can prove it. The difference is only apparent. The former spoke of a priori arguments, of which there are none; the latter speak of arguments drawn from experience, e.g., the transformation of energy, or radioactivity. (A. C. C.)

Eternity, attribute of God expressing that He had no beginning and will have no end, i.e., He always was and always will be. The very essence of God demands His existence, and that there never was a possibility of His not being. Boetius defines eternity as the perennial, interminable, perfect possession of life in its fullest totality, always without beginning and without end. There is no succession of anything, succession belongs to time. God alone is eternal, there is in Him no past, no future, everything is in the beginning and never ending present.—C.E.; Pohle.

Ester, God: His Knowability, Essence, and Attributes, St. L., 1921.

Ethelbert, Saint, confessor (560-616), King of Kent. He married Bertha, daughter of the Frankish King, Charibert, and afforded her every opportunity for the exercise of her religion. When he was baptized by St. Augustine, 597, his supremacy in southern Britain led to the baptism of 10,000 of his countrymen within a few months. Thenceforth he was the watchful father of the Anglo-Saxon Church. Among others he founded at Canterbury the church which was afterwards to be the primatial cathedral of England. He was canonized 1061. The Irish Saints, in turn, wrote a life of him. He was popularly called St. Albert, and is known under this name as titular saint of numerous churches in England. His relics were preserved at Canterbury. Feast, 24 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Ethelbert, Saint, martyr (d. 793), King of the East Angles. Although preferring a life of celibacy, he agreed to woo Alftrida (Alfrida) daughter of Offa, King of the Mercians, and, undeterred by portents, repaired to Offa's court, where he was murdered. His ignominious burial place was revealed by a heavenly light, and the body having been translated to Hereford Cathedral, his sanctity was attested by the many miracles at his tomb. His head was enshrined at Westminster Abbey. The cathedral at Hereford, of which he is patron, and 13 other churches in England are named in his honor. Feast, 20 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Etheldreda (Audry), Saint, virgin (q. 630-79), Queen of Northumbria. She founded the minster of Ely, built on an estate which had been given to her by her first husband Tonbert, with whom she had never lived in wedlock. Her second husband, Egfrid, King of Northumbria, at first respected her desire to lead a religious life, but later he insisted on his rights, and fear of being carried off by him drove her to Ely. Certain lands at Hexham which were the king's gift to her she gave through St. Wilfrid of York to found the minster of St. Andrew. Represented with a crown at her feet. Her hand is venerated in England. Her relics were translated to Hereford Cathedral, his sanctity was attested by the many miracles at his tomb. His head was enshrined at Westminster Abbey. The cathedral at Hereford, of which he is patron, and 13 other churches in England are named in his honor. Feast, 23 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Ethelhard (d. 805), fourteenth Abp. of Canterbury. He was elected to the see at a time when Offa, King of the Mercians, was attempting to weaken Canterbury's influence and had succeeded in securing the pallium for the incumbent of the See of Lichfield. Ethelhard encountered many difficulties, being for a time obliged to flee from his see, but when Cenwulf succeeded in Mercia, they worked together for the restoration of the rights of Canterbury, the dispute being ended by Ethelhard's visit to Rome in 801. The success of Offa's policy would have impeded the attainment of national unity, and its defeat by Ethelhard is an event of the greatest importance in the history of the making of the English nation.

—C.E.

Ethics (Gr., ethos, character), the natural science of the morality of human acts, which considers the moral actions or conduct of man primarily in the light of human reason rather than in the light of supernatural revealed truth. Moral theology is sometimes termed Christian Ethics. The deliberate free actions of man in their relation to right rational nature and the Divine Reason form its subject matter. The liberty of the human will and the existence of God, the Creator, End, and Rewarder of man, constitute its two most important fundamental postulates. God is the surety for morality, and without free will man could perform no ethical acts either good or bad; there would be no responsibility, no imputability, no virtues or vices, merit nor guilt, no eternal reward for a life of self-sacrifice and virtue. Ethics is preeminently a practical and directive science, setting before man not only the absolute obligation of doing good and avoiding evil, but indicating as well how he is to act if he wishes to be morally good and attain the end of his being. The establishment of the right rules of human conduct and their embodiment in everyday life then forms the primary purpose of ethics, which is generally classified as general or theoretical ethics, dealing with the nature of morality, the end of conduct, its norm, laws, etc., and special or applied ethics, dealing with the relation of such principles and rules to man's personal everyday activities whether individual or social. Every phase of free human activity, personal, social, economic, political, and international, comes within the scope of ethics, and is regulated by the moral law and made to harmonize with right rational nature or the moral order as Divinely constituted.—C.E.; Hill, Ethics: General and Special, N.Y., 1920.

Ethiopia (Gr., aitho, burn; ops, face), in ancient geography a country s. of Egypt and closely connected with it; all the land bounded by the upper Nile on the w., and the Red Sea and Arabian Gulf on the e. A eunuch, minister of Candace, Queen of Ethiopia, was converted to Christianity by the deacon Philip (Acts 8).—C.E.

Ethiopic Liturgy, that used in the Church of Abyssinia. The normal and original Ethiopic use is the Liturgy of the Twelve Apostles, which was translated from the Coptic by St. Cyril. There are also a number of other anaphoras which, on occasion, are joined to the first part of the liturgy, in place of its own canon. The basic text is that of Egypt, but numerous additions were made from time to time till the 16th century, fewer till the 20th century. It has its own liturgical year. (M. E. B.)

Ethnology (Gr., ethnos, race; logos, science), the study of the human race (see HUMAN RACE).
Eucharist, Symbols of the. The ears of wheat and clusters of grapes are often used as ornaments on altars and vestments. They are emblems of the Blessed Sacrament, the Body and Blood of Christ under the appearance of bread and wine. A chalice, often surmounted by a Host, is another symbol of the Eucharist.—C.E. (J. P. S.)

Eucharistic Congress, an international assembly of Catholics, lay and clerical, summoned from time to time as a religious demonstration against secularization. It accomplishes this purpose by exciting to charity, and as Christ explicitly promised is the pledge of a glorious resurrection and eternal happiness. See various titles under COMMUNION.—C.E.; DalgaInns, Holy Communion, Its Philosophy, Theology and Practice, N. Y., 1912; Stone, History of the Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist, N. Y., 1920. (L. P. F.)

EUCHARIST

EUGENE IV

Eucharius, Saint (3rd century), first Bishop of Trier. According to an ancient legend he was one of the 72 disciples of Christ and with his companions, Maternus and Valerius, was sent as bishop to Gaul. When they arrived at Alsace, Maternus died, whereupon the survivors hastened back to St. Peter who sent Eucharius his pastoral staff, with which he raised the dead man to life. For this reason the staff has become the distinctive mark of an envoy, especially a missionary. Eucharius subsequently founded the See of Trier, becoming its first bishop. At present it is believed that the first missionaries came to Trier not earlier than 290. A basilica was built over his tomb in the catacomb of St. Matthias. Feast, 8 Dec.—C.E.

Eugene I, Saint, Pope (564-657), b. Rome; d. there. He was elected pontiff during the compulsory exile of Martin I, who would not submit to Byzantine direction in the matter of Monothelitism, and his election was subsequently approved by Martin. As pope he demanded a profession of faith from Emperor Constans II, a defender of Monothelitism; the emperor however answered with a request that the pope should enter into communion with the Patriarch of Constantinople. Eugene refused this invitation as there seemed no prospect of an acceptance of the Catholic doctrine in regard to the heresy. Feast, 2 June.—C.E.; Mann.

Eugene II, Pope (824-827), b. Rome; d. there. The archbishop of Santa Sabina, his election was a triumph for the Roman nobility and the Franks whose power his predecessor, Paschal I, had attempted to curb. The Frankish influence was strengthened politically but lessened ecclesiastically when Louis the Pious sent his son to Rome and a constitution was agreed upon between the emperor and the pope. In 826 he advanced the cause of learning by decrees promulgated at a council in Rome.—C.E.; Mann.

Eugene III (Bernardo Prinatelli of Paganeli), Blessed, Pope (1145-53), confessor, b. Montemagno, Italy; d. Tivoli. A Cistercian, Abbot of Tre Fontane, he was elected pope to end his days in peace. Feast, 8 Dec.—C.E.

Eugene IV (Gabriello ConduImaro or Conbulmerio), Pope (1431-47), b. Venice, Italy, 1833; d. Rome. When a youth he distributed his wealth to the poor and became an Augustinian hermit, then...
EUGENE IV

Bp. of Siena, and Card.-priest of St. Clement. As pope, hatred of nepotism brought him into conflict with the Colonna family. Believing the Council of Basel unsuccessful, he ordered it to dissolve. The prelates refused, insisted that a council was superior to the pope, and ordered him to appear with the cardinals at its meetings. Refusing, he was exiled by his enemies and resided at Florence for nearly 10 years. When the Basel schismatics decided on union with the Greeks he convened a council at Ferrara which resulted in the Decree of Union, 1439. The schismatics elected the antipope Amadeus of Savoy, but the Christian nations reinstated the legitimate pontiff. On the eve of his death he signed the Frankfort Concordat, in respect to which he declared that it was not his intention to diminish the rights of the papacy.—C.E.; Pastor.

Eugenics (Gr., eugenèes, well-born), the study of hereditary and environmental influences, for the purpose of improving the physical and mental qualities of future generations. The term was first used by Sir Francis Galton in his “Inquiries into Human Faculty” in 1883. Eugenists fall into two classes: extreme eugenists, who advocate the compulsory breeding of the select, birth control among the poor, and sterilization and euthanasia of the unfit; moderate eugenists, who advocate little more than the segregation of the feeble-minded in order to prevent their increase. The proposals of the extreme eugenist are morally untenable, as they are based on the vicious principle that a good result justifies the use of immoral means. The proposals of the moderate eugenist, however, are generally commendable and worthy of support. In the last analysis, the great task of eugenics is the reduction of the number of the feeble-minded. The only morally sound and socially adequate method of obtaining this result is the segregation of feeble-minded men and women in separate hospitals or colonies in order to prevent them from reproducing their kind.—C.E., XVI, 38; Bruehl, Birth Control and Eugenics, N. Y., 1928; Gerrard, The Church and Eugenics, St. L., 1921. (f. J. H.)

Euginie, Marie de Montijo de Guzman (1826-1920), Empress of the French, b. Granada, Spain; d. Madrid. The daughter of Count di Montijo and Maria Kirkpatrick, she married Napoleon III in 1851. In 1856 the Prince Imperial was born and baptized by Card. Patrizi, legate a latere, who was deputed at the same time to present the Golden Rose to the empress. Of great social and political influence, Eugenie discouraged any tendency to diminish papal temporal power. On the collapse of the empire she fled to England, where she established her residence. After Napoleon’s death she was permitted to visit France.

Eulalia of Barcelona, Saint, virgin, martyr (Barcelona, 304). This Spanish martyr of the persecution of Diocletian is often identified with Eulalia of Merida, although there is sufficient evidence of separate identities. Numerous villages of Guenne and Languedoc are named for her, and she is known under various titles, St. Eulalie, St. Olaire, St. Olacie, St. Ocaille, St. Ollaire, and St. Auzalle. Patroness of Barcelona and of sailors; invoked against drought. Emblems: a palm, and croos in hand. Canonized, 615. Her relics were preserved at Barcelona. Feast, 12 Feb.—C.E.; Butler. Eulalia of Merida, Saint, virgin (c. 291-304), martyred at an early age under Diocletian at Merida. At her death a white dove is said to have issued from her mouth and over her ashes, cast into a field, fell a pall of snow. She is very popular in Spain and is patroness of Merida and of Oviedo where her relics are preserved. Feast, 10 Dec.—Butler.

Eulalius, antipope (418-419), d. 423. An archdeacon, he was elected by the minor clergy in opposition to Boniface I after the death of Pope Zosimus. Both claimants proceeded to rule in Rome. The Eulalian Prefect of Rome secured the imperial confirmation for the antipope, but the adherents of Boniface secured a hearing before Emperor Honorius, who summoned a synod at Ravonna, 419, to settle the claims. Pope and antipope were exiled until the synod had come to a decision. Eulalius declined to abide by the ruling and seized the Lateran Basilica. Honorius refused to consider his claim at all and recognized Boniface as the legitimate pontiff. Eulalius was exiled by his enemies and resided at Florence. Feast, 16 Sept.—Butler.

Euphemia (Gr., of good report), Saint, virgin (380-c. 410). She was the daughter of a senator of Constantinople and distributed her fortune in charity, giving herself up to the practice of Christian perfection in an Egyptian convent. Feast, 13 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Euphrasia (Gr., of good cheer), or Euphraxia, Saint, virgin (380-c. 410). She was the daughter of a wealthy citizen of Alexandria, who, in order to keep her vow of chastity, retired in male attire to a monastery of men near Alexandria where, under the name of Smeragdus, she lived for over 30 years, only making known her sex when she was dying. Represented with masculine apparel at her feet. Relics originally at Beauvais, lost in the French Revolution. Feast, 16 Sept.—Butler.

Euphrosyne (Gr., mirth), Saint, virgin (413-70), b. Alexandria. According to legend she was the daughter of a wealthy citizen of Alexandria, who, in order to keep her vow of chastity, retired in male attire to a monastery of men near Alexandria where, under the name of Smaragdus, she lived for over 30 years, only making known her sex when she was dying. Represented with masculine apparel at her feet. Relics originally at Beauvais, lost in the French Revolution. Feast, 16 Sept.—Butler.

Eusebius, Saint, confessor (d. 357), Roman patrician and priest, d. Rome. When Pope Liberius, having subscribed to the Arian formula of Sirmium, was permitted by the Emperor Constantius to return to Rome, Eusebius, an ardent defender of the Nicene Creed, publicly denounced the pope and emperor. He was arrested and imprisoned, and died seven months later. Relics in church of S. Eusebio, Rome. Feast, R. Cal., 14 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Eusebius (Gr., eusebes, pious), Saint, Pope (309). A Greek, d. Sicily. His reign of four months embraced the dissension over the treatment of those who had apostatized during the persecution of Diocletian. The pope maintained that they should be admitted into communion after they had undergone a proper penance. He was opposed by Heraclius, and both were banished by the Emperor Maxentius. He was buried in the cemetery of St. Callistus. Feast, 26 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Eusebius, Saint (d. 379 or 380), Bp. of Samosate. In 361 he assisted in the election of St. Melietus to the Patriarchate of Antioch and, notwithstanding the threats of the Emperor Constantius, refused to deliver to the Arians the synodal acts which proved its lawfulness. He was a close friend of St. Basil of Cesarea and exhibited untiring zeal during the Arian persecution under Valens who banished him to Thrace. At the emperor's death he returned, and was slain by a tile thrown by an Arian woman from the roof of her house. His relics were preserved in church of St. John the Baptist, Constantinople. Feast, 21 June.—C.E.; Butler.

Eusebius, Saint, martyr (282-371), Bp. of Vercelli, b. Sardinia; d. Vercelli. Elected Bp. of Vercelli, 340, he was consecrated by Pope Julius I. In 354 Pope Liberius sent Eusebius and Bp. Lucifer of Cagliari to the Emperor Constantius to induce him to convocate a council to end the dissensions between the Arians and the orthodox. The synod was held at Milan in 355. A document condemning the Arian heresy was drawn up, and Eusebius, because he protested this and refused to sign it, was exiled, first to Scythopolis in Syria, later to Cappadocia, and finally to the Thebaid. At the accession of Emperor Julian, 362, the exiled bishops were allowed to return to their sees, but Eusebius remained in the East during the Arian persecution under Valens who refused to deliver to the Arians the synodal acts he had availed himself of opportunities for original work and recorded his anatomical investigations in a series of plates with text attached, Clement XI de-fraying the expense of publishing those which had been deposited in the Vatican Library. With Vesalius and Columbus he established the modern science of anatomy, and it has been said that there is not a part of the body upon which he did not shed light. Among his most notable contributions are descriptions of the stria vascularis of the ear and canal connecting ear and mouth, since called by his name, and the discovery of the circulatory function of what is known as the Eustachian valve.—C.E.

Eustachius, Eustathian, and Companions (Gr., eustathios, steadfast, firm), Saint, martyrs (118). A Roman general under Trajan, Eustachius embraced the Christian faith and was martyred with his fellow soldiers between the antlers of a deer which was revealed to him one day while hunting. By his conversion he forfeited rank and fortune and was put to death by fire for refusing to sacrifice to idols. His wife Theopista and his two sons Agapius and Theopistus were martyred with him. Patron of huntsmen; invoked as one of the Fourteen Holy Helpers. Emblems: a crucifix, a stag, an oven. Feast, R. Cal., 20 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Euthanasia

Euthanasia in the second sense is immoral, because a human being, no matter how deformed or diseased, possesses intrinsic inviolability before God; furthermore, the proposed system would unsettle society by making life uncertain.—O’Malley, Ethics of Medical Homicide and Mutilation, N. Y., 1919. (P. J. H.)
EUTHANASIA

Eutychianus, Saint, Pope (275-283), b. Italy; d. Rome. No trustworthy account of his pontificate has yet been discovered. Feast, 8 Dec.—C.E.

Evang. = Evangelium (Gospel (Breviary)).

Evangel (Gr. eu, well; angelos, messenger), a term rarely used denoting: good news, the Gospel; a book containing good news, one of the four Gospels; a bearer of good news, an evangelist or preacher.

Evangelium, liturgical books containing portions of the Gospels read during Mass and in public offices of the Church.—C.E.

Evangelical Church (General Conference), or Evangelical Associations, a religious movement of the German community in Pennsylvania which was organized in 1803 under the leadership of Jacob Albright. Arminian in doctrine, they closely adhere to the articles of faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Their government is congregational. Foreign missionary work is carried on in Japan, China, Germany, Switzerland, Russia, and Canada. In the U. S. in 1925 there were: 1949 ministers, 2076 churches, and 202,992 communicants.

Evangelical Protestant Association of Congregational Churches, formerly Evangelical Protestant Churches of North America, a religious denomination formed in 1911 at Cincinnati by consolidation of the German Evangelical Protestant Ministers’ Association, and the German Evangelical Ministers’ Conference. Since 20 Oct., 1925, the Association has been regularly affiliated with the National Council of the Congregational Churches (q.v.) of the United States. These beliefs are held in the Gospel of Jesus Christ, protesting against any compulsion in matters of faith and conscience, and granting to everyone the privilege of individual examination and research. According to the last census there were 25 ministers, 29 churches, and 15,000 communicants.

Evangelical, (Gr. evangelikos, pertaining to the Gospel), designation originally claimed by all Protestants on the ground that their tenets were derived solely from the Bible, later attached to those congregations which teach the total depravity of human nature, the necessity of human conversion, the justification of the sinner by faith alone, the free offer of the Gospel to all, and the inspiration and authority of the Bible. These beliefs are held largely by the Presbyterians in Scotland, the Non-conformists in England, and the corresponding churches in America. In the Anglican Church they form the great body of the “Low Church.” In Germany it is the special designation of the United Church as distinguished from the old Lutheran and Reformed churches. The term is also applied by the orthodox sects of Protestantism to distinguish themselves from the liberal bodies.

Evangelical Alliance, association of Protestants of different countries and speaking different tongues united for the avowal and promotion of Christian union and the advocacy of religious liberty; founded, London, 1846.—C.E.

Evangelical Union, a religious body organized in Scotland, 1843, by Rev. James Morison (1816-93) and three other ministers with their congregations. Their ecclesiastical system is a modern indenpendency, expressed in the “Doctrinal Declaration” of 1885. They were incorporated with the Congregational Union of Scotland, 1896.

Evangelistic Associations, various church organizations which have one general characteristic, the conduct of evangelistic or missionary work. There are 14 bodies grouped under this head: Apostolic Christian Church, Apostolic Faith Movement, Christian Congregation, Church of Daniel’s Band, Church of God as Organized by Christ, Church Transcendent, Hephzibah Faith Missionary Association (Inc.), Lumber River Missions, Metropolitan Church Association, Missionary Church Association, Peniel Missions, The Missionary Bands of the World, Pillar of Fire, and Voluntary Missionary Society in America. According to the 1916 census in the U. S. there were 444 ministers, 207 churches, and 12,933 members.

Evangelists, Symbols of the. The Evangelists are symbolized in art by emblematic figures, usually winged: a human head, a lion, an ox, and an eagle. These are described in the vision of Ezechiel in his prophecy, and in that of St. John in his Apocalypse. The human head indicates St. Matthew; because he begins his Gospel with the human ancestry of our Saviour. The lion, the dweller in the desert, is emblematic of St. Mark, who opens his narrative with the mission of St. John the Baptist, “the voice of one crying in the wilderness.” The sacrificial ox is the symbol of St. Luke, for his Gospel begins with the story of the priest Zachary. The eagle, soaring far into the heavens, is the emblem of St. John, who, in the opening words of his Gospel, carries us to Heaven itself: “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God.”

Evvaristus, Saint, Pope (99-107), d. Rome. He was the son of a Hellenist Jew of Bethlehem. Little is known of his reign; his martyrdom is traditional. Feast, R. Cal., 26 Oct.—C. E.

Eve (Heb., haieh, living, life), the name of the first woman, the wife of Adam, the mother of Cain, Abel, and Seth (see ADAM).—C.E.

Eve (A.S., eaf), or Vigil (Lat., vigilia, watch), day of preparation before a great feast. In the early ages the evening and night before a feast were spent in prayer, fasting, Scripture-reading, and preaching. Since the 11th century the observance, beginning in the morning, consists of special Mass and Office and fasting. In the Roman calendar, besides Holy Saturday, there are 17 vigils: the eves of Christmas, Epiphany, Ascension, Pentecost, Immaculate Conception, Assumption, eight relics of the Apostles, and feasts of St. John the Baptist, St. Lawrence, and All Saints. Some dioceses and religious orders have special vigils. Those of Christmas, the Epiphany, and Pentecost are major vigils and have a proper office, the vigil of Christmas being a double feast; the others are minor vigils and have a ferial office. If a vigil falls on Sunday it is kept on the preceding Saturday, if it falls on a double or semi-double feast it is limited to a commemoration at Lauds and in the Mass. In the United States, England, Scotland, and Ireland the vigils of Christmas, Pentecost, the Assumption, and All Saints are fast days.—C.E.

Everard Hasee, Blessed, martyr (1581), b. Northamptonshire, England; d. Tyburn. He was educated at Cambridge, and after exercising the Anglican ministry was converted and ordained at Reims. Shortly afterward he was captured in the Marshalsea prison while visiting Catholic prisoners. He was found guilty of "persuading" others to join the Catholic faith, and executed.

Everyman, an English morality play translated from a 15th-century Dutch version attributed to Peter Dorland; a dramatization of the "Ars moriendi," depicting the importance of a good preparation for death. Everyman, summoned to appear before God, is abandoned by all except his neglected Good Works who alone may accompany him through the valley of death.

Evesham Abbey, Benedictine house founded by St. Edwin, c. 701, in Worcestershire, England, and dedicated to Our Lady. Secular canons were installed, 941; the monks were restored by St. Dunstan and St. Ethelwold, 960. Exemption from episcopal jurisdiction was confirmed by Rome, 1260, and the abbey became one of the largest in England; it had two dependent cells (q.v.) in England and one in Denmark. Surrendered to Henry VIII, 1539, its demolition began, and only a few isolated fragments remain, including the great bell tower built by Abbot Clement Lichfield, c. 1533.—C.E.

Evidence Guild, an organization in England in which priests and laymen, women as well as men, study how to make known the Catholic Faith to the multitude, and lecture and answer questions in public parks and other centers. (Ed.)

Evidences, Christian, time-honored name for advanced courses in Christian doctrine, giving proofs from Scripture, tradition, history, and reason of the truth of the Christian religion. (Ed.)

Evidences of Religion, reasons or proofs for the truth of God's revelation. Internal evidences are: the reasonableness, beauty, and majesty of Divinely revealed truths; the beneficial influence they have on man's moral life. External evidences are: holy teachers, preeminently Christ, the Incarnate Word of God; prophecies and miracles attesting to the truth of their teachings.—Stoddard, Rebuilding of a Lost Faith, N.Y., 1906; Sheehan, Apologetics and Catholic Doctrine, Dub., 1926. (A. J. M.)

Evil is a condition resulting from some imperfection, which may be structural (constitutinal) or functional. Structural looks to the possession and integrity of being; functional to fitting and well-ordered action. To possess being in imperfection is the lot of the created natures; in this sense all created natures are evil, when considered in relation to God, Who is absolute perfection of being. Integrity of being looks chiefly to the absence of any substantive or accidental defect of constitution. Such integrity is wanting in congenital feeble-mindedness, in traumatic insanity, in the deformed, the malformed and the maimed. Functional imperfection is found in non-traumatic insanity, in ignorance and error, in the diseased, the perverted, and in those who are anti-socially disposed. It will be seen from this analysis of what is admittedly evil in fact, that evil is of its nature a negative entity—an absence, a want, a defect, a perversion—a denial of good. Moral evil is properly a functional defect, a free and deliberate defection from a known standard of moral goodness. In this proper sense it applies only to action, and is called sin. In a wider sense it means any condition that tends to evoke sinful action.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss.

Evil Counsel, Mount of, one of the high hills to the south of Jerusalem, forms the eastern boundary of the plain of Raphaim. Tradition of the 12th century says that Caiphas here owned a house in which the Jews held their first meeting to take counsel against Jesus and "prophesied that Jesus should die for the nation" (John, 11).

Evolution (Lat., evolvere, to unfold), any process of nature by which a rudimentary condition develops into a more highly organized result, as a seed into a plant. In a more specific sense, and as now commonly understood, evolution denotes the general and particular theories professing to account for cosmic processes of orderly change over a long period of time.

Evolution as a Science, Inorganic Evolution. (1) Cosmogony (kosmos, universe; gignomai, become), theories about the formation of the universe in general; as the development of the present heavy bodies out of a previous nebular condition. In particular, for the formation of our planetary system there is the theory elaborated by Chamberlain and Moulton (and subsequently by Jeans), according to which the planets and their motion are the result of a near encounter between the original mass of the sun and another large heavenly body which has long since passed on its way. (2) Geology (geos, earth; gignomai, become), theories concerning the processes which have brought the earth to its present condition. Abundant data for this study are furnished by the sciences of geology, geophysics and seismology. For this reason, and also because many processes indicated in the earth's strata are observable as still going on, geognosy is on a better footing than any other branch of the natural sciences. In general, modern cosmoologies, based as they are on well-known laws, have not met with the same friendly reception with Catholic philosophers. St. Thomas even forecast the discovery of the Copernican system (1, De Celo, 17), and held that the earth was formerly in a potential state, ... its parts varied” (ibid.). Scientific Evolution has to do with organisms, i.e., living bodies. The scientific theories are not concerned with the origin of life itself but take organic life as a datum; nor are they concerned with the growth of individual organisms but with the development of successive species of animals and plants from other species known to have existed in previous geological ages. Every such theory favors mutability as opposed to the fixity of species. In ancient times Hesiod, Anaximander, the Pythagoreans, Stoics, and others held mutability, while Plato and Aristotle argued for substantial fixity. In modern times, to mention but a few names, Vanini (1586-1619) taught the descent of man from the ape, and Buffon (1707-88) held that the primitive stocks were few. These men were opposed by Linne (1707-78) and Cuvier (1719-1832). Lamarck (1744-1829) maintained that organic species are only relatively stable, so that certain groups of species may be but branches of the same genealogical tree. Darwin (1809-92), accepting the tenet of slight variations and that of progressive betterment, thought he found the secret of the latter in natural selection. But neither Darwin's key to progress nor any other formula for evolutionary processes is now widely accepted by scientists. "Lamarckism and Darwinism ... are now insufficient," says Maurice Caullery, "we do not know at present what have been the essential factors of evolution" (Report of the Smithsonian Institution, 1920). Likewise Bateson confesses that "When students of other sciences ask us what is now currently believed about the origin of species we have no clear answer to give. We cannot see how the differentiation of species came about" (Evolutionary Faith and Modern Doubts, Science, LV, 55). The same absence of any convincing theory to account for evolution is stressed by Osborn (The Origin of Evolution and Life, p. ix).

In forming a judgment about evolution it is necessary to distinguish between fact and hypothesis. It is a fact that the geological record reveals a succession of species with the simpler forms occurring as a rule earlier than the more highly organized. The statement that the latter developed out of the former under the influence of purely natural agencies is hypothesis. In support of this hypothesis we have such phenomena as the closely allied species of marine fauna on opposite sides of the Isthmus of Panama, and many other variant forms of life which diverge in proportion to the time at which their habitats were separated. The strength of the hypothesis lies in the absence of any other plausible explanation, and in certain observed changes, as in the case of the Basset sheep, the evening primrose, and the Dro sophila or fruit flies. But such variations are quite limited. If the hypothesis be extended to include genera, families, etc., it is the only being extant and has evolved itself into all its stages of perfection including the human soul. Such monistic philosophy is certainly opposed to religion which requires an adequate distinction between Creator and creature. Many proponents of this philosophy pretend that their only opponent is revealed religion, whereas in all honesty both unbiased reason and empirical science are implaceable foes of monistic evolution.—C.E.: More, The Dogma of Evolution, Princeton, 1925; Chetwood, God and Creation, N. Y., 1928.

Ewald (Hewald), Saints, martyrs (c. 695), two priests, natives of Northumbria, England, who bore the same name, were disposed of these as the Black and the Fair. They went as missionaries to Saxony where they were the guests of the steward of a Saxon earl. The pagans, recognizing them as Christian priests, and fearing the earl's conversion, murdered them and threw their bodies into the Rhine, whence they were miraculously retrieved. Their relics were given in 855 to St. Cunibert, Cologne. Feast, 3 Oct.—C.E.; Butler.

Ewing, Thomas (1789-1871), jurist and statesman, b. West Liberty, Va.; d. Lancaster, Ohio. In 1831 he was elected U. S. senator from Ohio, under President Harrison was appointed secretary of the treasury (1841), and under President Taylor secretary of the interior. During the Civil War he unreservedly supported the government and sent to Lincoln the telegram "There can be no contraband of war between neutral points," which secured the freeing of the English envoys Mason and Slidell, and averted war between England and the United States. Stricken while arguing a case (1869) he was baptised in the court room, and received into the Catholic Church in the following year. His law partner and main support in political life was his eldest son Philomen (1820-96). His other sons, Hugh Boyle (1826-1905) and Charles (1835-83), rendered distinguished service with the Union Army during the Civil War. His daughter Eleanore Boyle (1824-88), married William Tecumseh Sherman, subsequently the famous general, who had been adopted in childhood by her father. Friendship with Father De Smet led her to take a special interest in the Catholic Indians.—C.E.

Exaltation of the Holy Cross, Feast of the, 14 Sept., was celebrated in Rome before the end of the 7th century. Its purpose is to commemorate the recovering of that portion of the Holy Cross, which was preserved at Jerusalem, and which had fallen into the hands of the Persians. Emperor Heraclius recovered this precious relic and brought it back to Jerusalem, 3 May, 629. (A. B.)

Examination of Self or Examination of Conscience is one of the fundamental means of furthering personal sanctification. Christ has clearly indicated the possibility of formalism and self-deception in devout sentiments unless one consciously holds oneself to a practical performance of the will of God (e.g., Matt., 7). This supposes self-reflection. In its commonest form an examination of conscience is used as a preparation for confession and deals with actions distinctly sinful. Persons striving for Christian perfection put it to a further use in searching out minor sins and imperfections of act and of motive, and in keeping account of conscious acts of virtue. Especially adapted to this purpose is the so-called particular examination which segregates a certain failing and concentrates effort on it for the purpose of reducing the number of daily failures until it is eliminated entirely. Each morning a special resolution is made for the day. At noon and at night account is taken of the progress made and the resolution is renewed. The process is also adaptable to the acquisition of virtuous habits. St. Ignatius in his Spiritual Exercises suggests five points for the examination of conscience. (1) An act of gratitude to God for all His benefits. This will dispose the soul for contrition based largely on the loftier motives. (2) A petition for grace to know and detest one’s sins. (3) An accurate examination of one’s thoughts, words and actions throughout the hours of the day or according to the activities in which one has been occupied. (4) An act of contrition and an appeal for pardon, the principal point of the whole exercise. (5) A resolution to amend, a petition for God’s assisting grace, and finally an Our Father.—C.E., V, 675; St. Francis de Sales, Introduction to a Devout Life, N. Y., 1925. (E. D.)

Examiners, Apostolic, officials chosen by the pope to examine all candidates in Rome for the reception of Orders and for permission to hear confessions, first constituted by Pius V, 1570.—C.E.

Examiners, Synodal, priests proposed by a bishop and approved by the diocesan synod. Their duties are to examine in trials, and for appointment of pastors, and to assist in examination of candidates for Holy Orders, and priests to be approved for confessions and preaching. Not less than four, nor more than 12 are allowed in a diocese. Time of office is 10 years, or less if another synod is held before that time. If an examiner dies or otherwise vacates his office between synods, the bishop may appoint a pro-synodal examiner with the advice of the Cathedral Chapter or his diocesan consultors. The same method is in use whenever no synod is held. Removal from office is permitted only for grave reasons.—C.E.; P. C. Augustine. (D. R.)

Exclusion, Right of, a right, now explicitly recognized by both civil and ecclesiastical rulers. In the civil administration of the Roman Empire, the exarch was the governor of any important province, as the Exarch of Italy at Ravenna (552-751). In ecclesiastical language an exarch was at first a metropolitan with jurisdiction beyond his own province. The term came gradually to be restricted to the metropolitans of Ephesus, Casarea, and Heraclea. In the West the title of exarch has disappeared, being replaced by “vicar Apostolic” and “primate.” In the East the title is given to a bishop who holds a place between that of patriarch and of ordinary metropolitan. The most famous of those bearing the title now is the Bulgarian exarch at Constantinople.—C.E.

Excommunication, the absolute and perpetual release of a cleric from the diocese in which he has heretofore been incarcerated. Excommunication is not effective unless the cleric receives absolute and perpetual letters affiliating him with another diocese, vicariate, or prefecture Apostolic. This release must, for validity, be signed by the Ordinary of the place. A cleric is likewise excommunicated if he receives the written expression of his primary ordination a residential benefice in another diocese, or written permission to leave the diocese perpetually, having received such a residential benefice in another diocese. A religious who makes perpetual profession is likewise excommunicated from his diocese.—Ayrinhac, General Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1923. (W. L.)

Ex Cathedra (Lat., from the chair). The chair, or cathedra, occupied by a teacher or a bishop, came in time to be a term used to denote the authority of the person teaching from the chair. The term “ex cathedra” is applied today in a very technical sense to the exercise of papal infallibility (q.v.). Its present meaning is defined by the Vatican Council as follows: “The Pope, when in discharge of the office of pastor and doctor of all Christians, by virtue of his supreme Apostolic authority, he defines a doctrine regarding faith or morals, and that therefore such definitions of the Roman Pontiff are of them selves, and not from the consent of the Church, irreformable.”—C.E.

Excellency, title of patriarchs by a decree of the Congregation of Ceremonies, 3 June, 1893, instead of “His Beatitude,” which is reserved for the sovereign pontiff. The patriarchs had wrongly assumed the latter address, and in practise continue to both use and receive it.

Exclusion, Right of, a right, now explicitly rejected by the Church but in former times claimed by France, Austria, Spain, and Germany, to veto the election of a particular cardinal as pope. It was last exercised at the conclave in 1903 when Austria excluded Card. Rampolla.—C.E.

Excommunication (Lat., ex, out of; communicatio, communion), a spiritual censure by which one is excluded from the communion of the faithful and suffers consequences inseparably attached by canon law to such exclusion. It is also called anathema, especially when inflicted with solemnities described in the Roman Ritual. While not vindictive, excommunication is the Church's most serious penalty, its chief purpose being the correction of the guilty. This correction takes the form of exclusion from the spiritual benefits of the Church as a society and Mystical Body of Christ. Excommunication directly affects only the individual, who does not cease thereby to be a Christian, owing to the indelible character of Baptism. A secondary purpose of excommunication may be said to be the spiritual protection of the faithful. This is evidenced in the classification of the excommunicated as the vitandus (vitare, to avoid) and the tolerati (tolerare, to tolerate). Both these classes are equally cut off from the faithful as regards religious communication; but, in addition, the former are to be carefully shunned even in profane as well as religious matters. The vitandus on account of the notorious nature of his fault is one stigmatized by name, publicly, and through judicial sentence. Opposed to these classes, the earlier and classic division of excommunication was: major excommunication, effective, complete exclusion from the communion of the faithful; minor excommunication, a deprivation of certain of the Church's benefits, e.g., reception of the Sacraments and public prayer. The rational rights of the Church as an autonomous society to excommunicate from membership is as evident as her right to admit to same. The examples of the Old and New Testament, and the practise of the Apostles furnish proof of this. In the O.T. we have exclusion from the Synagogue (1 Esd., 10). In the N.T. the Apostle delivers "such a one to Satan for the destruction of the flesh" (1 Cor., 5). The "power of the keys" embraces not only power to remit sin, but all penal and coercive power necessary to the end of the Church (Matt., 18: 16).

The adequate and general effect of excommunication is sufficiently evident thus far, from the explanation of the definition. In particular, the definitely classified canonical effects follow: exclusion from divine services of the Church, deprivation of the Sacraments (and sometimes sacramentals); exclusion from the public prayers of the Church, either by way of satisfaction or imprisonment; loss of the right to participate in legal acts of the Church; loss of income from ecclesiastical office; and loss of right to social intercourse in case of vitandus. Canon law distinguishes two fora or courts: the sacramental, or the tribunal of Penance, and the non-sacramental, either public or private. When the penitent appears in the sacramental forum, the ecclesiastical Court of Rome, Roman Ritual prescribes the same formula for absolution from excommunication as that used for remission of sin. In the non-sacramental forum, since absolution is a jurisdictional act, any formula expressing the effect intended may be employed. Following the general law of jurisdiction as it applies to censures, excommunication may be taken away by the one who had inflicted it, his superior, delegate, or successor.—C.E.; Ayrinhac, Penal Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1920; Hyland, Excommunication, Wash., 1928. (F. T. R.)

Exeat. See EXCARDINATION.

Exegesis (Gr., a leading out, explanation), the art and science of expressing the sense of the Sacred Scriptures. To accomplish its purpose, exegesis applies the science of hermeneutics (q.v.). Apart from the fact that all ancient literatures are difficult to understand and can be approached successfully by the trained mind alone, the Bible has peculiar difficulties of its own. It is God's written revelation to man and as such expresses Divine mysteries and all that is related to them. The history of Catholic exegesis in the patristic period contains no instance of continued explanations of the Sacred Text prior to Hippolytus. The Fathers of the first centuries in their apologetic writings did, however, make frequent use of proofs based upon Bible texts. The two schools of catechetics founded at Alexandria and Antioch soon devoted themselves to the exegesis of the Sacred Books. At Alexandria, Pan­tanus, Clement, and especially Origen, established a system of interpretation. Origen admitted a literal, moral, and spiritual sense in the Scriptures, but not always all three in each passage. He erred by stressing the allegorical and mystical interpretation to the neglect and at times the exclusion of the literal sense. At Antioch more correct principles were applied since the grammatical-historical sense was given due prominence. St. John Chrysostom and Theodoret are the chief glories of this school. Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 429) went to the extreme of practically rejecting the typical sense and denying that allegories could be inspired. The Syrian School of Edessa produced the great scholars Aphraates and St. Ephraem. The Latin Church glories chiefly in St. Augustine and the greatest of all biblical scholars, St. Jerome. The post-patristic period in the Greek Church was famous chiefly for its compilations of excerpts from the Greek Fathers. These are called catena because they are linked together in a continuous commentary. Among the Latins Bede followed a similar method. Walafred Strabo is the author of the "Glossa Ordinaria" and Anselm of Laon of the "Glossa Interlinearis." The scholastics devoted their attention to theological explanations of Holy Writ and the sequence of ideas. Philological studies began extensively to influence exegesis after Clement V had established chairs of oriental languages in the principal universities. The results of this enactment may be seen in the celebrated "Postilla" of Nicholas of Lyra (d. 1349), a work which received notable additions by Paul of Burgos (d. 1453). After the Council of Trent the Golden Age of Catholic exegesis produced important commentaries of more than 350 exegetes. Estius, Luke Wadding, F. Maldonado, Menochius, Maldonado and Benfrère may be explicitly mentioned. The 18th century saw the introduction into exegesis of more critical methods. Calmet was perhaps the greatest light of this century. Modern Catholic commentaries are numerous and marked by sane scholarship. The French commentaries of the Dominican Biblical School and the Latin "Cursus S. Scripturae" of the Jesuits merit special mention. Scriptural periodicals of importance are: "Biblica" (Pontifical Biblical Institute); "Revue biblique," and "Biblishe Zeitschrift." These list and review new publications and make accessible to the reader the results of recent research. (E. Grimm).

Exemption (Lat., ex, out; emere, to take; release or freedom), in canon law, the withdrawal of a physical or moral person or of a place from the jurisdiction of an inferior authority and the immediate subjection of the same to some higher power. The most important example is the freedom of certain religious from the jurisdiction of local Ordinary in all matters save the few expressly mentioned in the law (canon 500); such religious come under the immediate and exclusive jurisdiction of the pope. This privilege is enjoyed by all regulars, i.e., religious with solemn vows; by nuns only when subject to a regular superior (canon 615). Some congregations with simple vows only, e.g., the Passionists, have obtained the privilege of exemption by special papal indulg.—C.E.; P.C. Augustine; Melo, De Exemptione Regularium, Wash., 1921. (V. T. S.)

Exequatur (Lat., let him perform), official recognition of a consult or commercial agent by the government of the country where he is to exercise his activities; approbation given by certain civil rulers to Bulls, papal Briefs, or other ecclesiastical enactments to give them binding force in their territories; if the enactment is made by a subject of the ruler the term Regium Placet (royal consent) is used instead of Exequatur.—C.E.

Exequies (Lat., censequi, to follow to the end), the funerary service in the church, from bringing the corpse thither to the Absolution or "Libera."—P.C. Augustine.

Existence (Lat., ex, out of; stare, stand), is that by which a thing is actually constituted in the physical order, i.e., in the order of actuality as distinct from the order of mere possibility. It corresponds to the concept of being taken in the participal sense of the term. Existence has been called the actuality of essences, namely that by which a being has its place in the order of actuality, as distinct from the metaphysical order or order of essences. So simple a concept does not admit of strict definition or even of explanation in terms simpler than itself. We arrive at the idea of existence first from our own internal experience by which we perceive ourselves and our own subjective states to be actualities. The etymological derivation of the term is illuminating provided we restrict the application of it in this root sense to the order of finite, produced reality. For, an efficient cause or agent, before it actually produces an effect, virtually contains that effect, i.e., has the power to produce the effect not yet existing; but when it has exercised that power, then the effect produced is rightly said to stand (or be constituted) outside its cause.—C.E.; V, 543; Rickaby, General Metaphysics, N. Y., 1900. (J. A. M.)

Ex more docti mystico, or The Fast, As Taught by Holy Lore, hymn for Matins on Sundays and weekdays in Lent. It is attributed to Pope St. Gregory the Great (540-604). There are 12 translations; the English title given is by J. Neale.—Britt.

Exodus (Gr., ex, out; odos, way), the second book of the Bible, thus named because it relates the departure of the Jews from Egypt and a part of their wanderings through the wilderness, as far as Mount Sinai. The most convenient division is the following: events preceding the going out of Egypt (1-12); the going out of Egypt and the journey to Mount Sinai (13-18); the promulgation of the first instaments of the Mosaic Law (19-31); the apostasy of the Jews (the golden calf), reconciliation, and renewal of the Covenant (32-34); construction of the Tabernacle (35-40).—C.E., XI, 648; Pope. (P. P. D.)

Exorcism (Gr., ex, out; horkizo, solemnly command), the act or ceremony of driving out demons from possessed persons, places, or things, or of protecting them from the influence of evil spirits. The practice is based on teachings of the Bible. Certain things are exorcised in blessing them, as holy water. In the prayer used in blessing holy water, God is besought to protect those who use it against the influence of the devil. Exorcism is part of the ceremonies of baptism. The Roman Ritual contains the ceremony of Exorcism proper.—C.E. (J. C. T.)

Exorcist, the third minor order in the Latin Church. This office confers on the recipient the spiritual power of expelling demons from persons possessed, whether the persons are baptized or catechumens, by the imposition of hands. According to present usage the solemn exercise of this power is restricted to priests alone with the express consent of the bishop.—C.E.; Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1918.

Expectation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, formerly a feast observed 18 Dec. It originated in Spain, when the feast of the Annunciation (25 March) was transferred to 18 Dec. because of the regulation forbidding feasts in Lent, and remained on this date after the Annunciation was again celebrated on its original date. It impressed on the faithful the sentiments of the Blessed Virgin as the time of her delivery approached.—C.E.; Coleridge, The Nine Months, Lond., 1885.

Expendors, Apostolic, official agents of bishops and others requesting favors or dispensations from the Datary and Apostolic Chancery. They draw up and sign the necessary documents, and receive and forward the answers given.—C.E.

Exposition of the Blessed Sacrament, the ceremony in which the priest removes the Sacred Host from the tabernacle and places it on the altar for the adoration of the faithful. It may be public or private, differing only in rite. In public exposition the Sacred Host, having been removed from the tabernacle, is placed in a monstrance and elevated above the altar-table, usually in a niche above the tabernacle proper. In private exposition the priest merely opens the tabernacle and draws to its door the eiborium containing the Hosts for Holy Communion. For public exposition there is required some public cause. The days on which this exposition may take place are defined and outlined in the Code of Canon Law and the respective folios of faculties granted by bishops to their priests. For days other than those thus outlined a special permission of the Ordinary of the diocese is required. For the private exposition any good and reasonable cause is sufficient. The ceremony was properly introduced in the 14th century, under the influence of the newly established feast of Corpus Christi, and its frequency in the 15th century caused the development of the present code of rules.—C.E.

Extreme Unction, a Sacrament of the New Law, instituted by Jesus Christ, in which the sick who are seriously ill, by the anointing with holy oil, and by the prayer of the priest, receive the grace of God for the good of their souls and often also for the good of their bodies. Its minister is a priest; the recipient must be ill from sickness, and in a state of grace, though from its secondary end it can also act as a sacrament of the dead and remit mortal sin. Its purpose is to heal the soul and wipe out the remains of sin and thus prepare it for entrance into glory. Restoration to health through the sacrament is of frequent occurrence. The Apostle James (5) writes: "Is any man sick among you? Let him bring in the priests of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."—C.E.; Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, IV, St. L., 1920.

Ex voto, Latin term for a thing offered because of a binding promise or vow, usually an ornament for the altar, sanctuary, or other part of a church, expressive of thanksgiving or petition for some favor. Votive candles are lit as an expression of faith in the intercession of the one at whose shrine or altar they are lit.—Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1918.

Eyck, b. Matthew van (c. 1365-1426), painter. a. Maastricht, Belgium; b. Ghent. He was the elder of two brothers who settled in Flanders and were founders of the Flemish school of painting. They are sometimes wrongly credited with the invention of oil-paint; in reality they perfected its use. Hubert’s authenticated works are few; his masterpiece, finished by his brother, is the altar-piece of the cathedral of St. Bavon in Ghent. This polyptych “The Adoration of the Lamb,” consisting of central panels with double shutters painted on both sides, has been called a pictorial epic of religion. Its 300 figures, charming landscapes, astonishing architectural background, and naïve details give a complete idea of the revolution in art worked by the technical skill and new naturalism of the famous brothers. The side panels have been detached and are in the museums of Berlin and Brussels.

Ezechiel, prophet, son of Buzi exiled to Babylon about 598 B.C. He began to prophesy five years later and continued for over twenty years. His prophecies form one of the books of the O. T. and are given in forty-eight chapters. After a vision of the glory of the Lord, under various symbols, he foretells the fall of Jerusalem, its transgression, and the prophecies the restoration of Theocracy. God will demand penance, triumph over Gog and Magog, and establish a new kingdom of His own in which the city will be called, “The Lord is there” (Ezech., 48). He is often quoted by St. John in the Apocalypse; indeed there are many points of similarity between the writings of the Prophet and of the Apostle. Passages from the prophecy are read in the Divine Office during the first weeks of November.

Faber, Frederick William (1814-63), Oratorian and devotional writer, b. Calverley, Yorkshire, England; d. London. Educated at Harrow and Oxford, he received Anglican Orders, 1839, and was appointed rector of Elton in Northamptonshire, 1843. Two Continental tours had filled him with enthusiasm for Catholic rites and devotion, and in 1844 he introduced Catholic practises in his parish and openly advocated the Roman claims. He became a Catholic, 1845. In 1846 he established a religious community, the Brothers of the Will of God, or Willfridians, and in 1847 was ordained priest. When in 1849 Newman began the Congregation of the Oratory at Birmingham, Faber and some of his community entered as novices. Newman sent him, 1849, to London to found the Oratory at King William Street, which was removed to South Kensington in 1854. In 1847 he had begun the series of "Lives of Modern Saints." His hymns, now the staple of congregational singing, were composed especially for the evening services. His works on the spiritual life show him to have been a master of mystical theology. They are: "All for Jesus"; "Growth in Holiness"; "The Blessed Sacrament"; "The Creator and the Creature"; "The Foot of the Cross"; "Spiritual Conferences"; "The Precious Blood"; "Bethlehem"; "Notes on Doctrinal Subjects." -C.E.

Fabiola, fä'bi-lä, Saint, matron (d. 399). She was a Roman woman of rank, who, having divorced her first husband, a man of vicious life, and married a second time, later repented her sin, and did public penance. She denounced the world and devoted her immense wealth to the needs of the poor and sick. In 395 she went to Bethlehem, where she lived in the hospice of the convent directed by St. Paula, and under the direction of St. Jerome applied herself to the study of Scripture and to ascetic exercises. She eventually returned to Rome, where she assisted in the erection of a hospice for pilgrims. She collaborated with St. Pammachius in founding another hospice at Porto Romano. Card. Wiseman has immortalised her in his novel, "Fabiola." Feast, 27 Dec.—C.E.

Fabi, fä'br, Jean Henri (1823-1915), entomologist, b. St-Leons, Aveyron, France; d. Serignan, Vaucluse. He first taught school and then became professor of natural sciences at Ajaccio and Avignon. Numerous text-books were written to supplement his meager salary. The last 35 years of his life were spent at Serignan where he devoted all his time to the study of insects. It was only toward the end of his life that he obtained the recognition he deserved. His fame rests chiefly on his "Souvenirs Entomologiques," which comprise "The Life of the Fly," "The Mason Bees," "The Hunting Wasps," and "Adventures in Insect Life."—Faber, Life of Jean Henri Fabre, tr. Miall, N. Y., 1921.

Fabric, Ecclesiastical (Lat., fabrica ecclesiae, construction of a church), usually the funds necessary for the construction, repair, or maintenance of a church. During the first centuries these temporalities belonged to the cathedral church as a common fund; later each church held its separate patrimony. It also means the persons charged with church-property administration, usually laymen, though in most European countries such affairs are under state regulation. A special congregation is in charge of the fabric of St. Peter's, Rome.—C.E.

Fabricius, Hieronymus, surnamed Ab Aquapendente (1537-1619), anatomist and surgeon, b. Aquapendente, Italy; d. Padua. When 25 years old, he was chosen to succeed Fallopio as professor of anatomy at the University of Padua, and later he became professor of surgery, occupying both chairs for nearly 50 years. In appreciation of his ability the Senate of Venice erected an anatomical theater bearing his name, and a statue was erected in Padua after his death. In English medical literature Fabricius is best known as the teacher of Harvey, who attributes the discovery of the valves in the veins to him. His work on surgery has gone through 29 editions in many languages. All his works were reprinted at Leipzig, 1657.—C.E.

Facade, the face or front of any building, in ecclesiastical architecture; usually the west front, sometimes the transept fronts. The façades of the baskilian churches were very simple with either a central gable or a screen facade. Often the surface was covered with mosaics. Over the lower portion was a projecting portico. Byzantine facades consisted of the narthex with sometimes a gallery above, lighted with narrow windows. The central door was called the Beautiful Gate. In Lombardic churches by using the continuous shape of the gables the false facade was introduced higher than the roof of the church which became a characteristic of Italian architecture. Romanesque facades have buttresses of slight projection, a rose window over the central door, and circular moldings on doors and windows. In Gothic a satisfactory design was hardly ever realized. As a rule the facades, though beautiful, disguise the character of the church. In English churches the portals are generally insignificant. There was a fondness in Germany for acute open gables over the portals and towers with spires. Flatness is the predominating feature of Italian facades. They have a large central window and are often decorated with colored marbles. Spanish Gothic, when not showing French influence, favored openwork spires and extreme decorations. Sometimes they are very simple. The style adopted in the Renaissance shows the influence of classic models.—C.E.

Faculties (Lat., facultates, powers), Canonical, powers which an ecclesiastical superior with jurisdiction, grants to his priests for either the external or the internal forum, or for both, in order that the latter may act, validly or licitly or with safety. These faculties concern chiefly the Sacrament of Penance. As a rule, faculties from the Holy See are understood. The custom of giving extensive faculties arose about the 16th century when new lands were discovered. Missionary bishops, vicars, and prefects Apostolic receive ample powers, which vary according as those who use them are distant motives from Rome or have difficulty in communicating with the Holy See. These faculties are granted to the missionary Ordinaries by the Congregation of Propaganda according to locality. When other bishops apply for faculties, they receive them from the various departments of the Roman Curia. Faculties are very often granted for a definite period of years. They are given to the Ordinaries, and therefore they may be used by their successors or by the vicar-general, unless otherwise stated, or the exercise of the faculty demands the use of episcopal power, which the executor of the faculty does not enjoy. Habitual faculties, i.e., those that are given either in perpetuity or for a definite time or for a certain number of cases, are reckoned as privileges above the law, therefore they are to be interpreted according to the rules governing the interpretation of such privileges. A faculty always carries with it the powers that are necessary for its use.—C.E.; Ayrinhac, General Legislation in the New Code of Canon Law, N. Y., 1923.

Faculties of the Soul (Lat., facere, to do), qualities by which the human soul is able to act or proximate principles of human activity, the remote principle being the soul itself, the faculties being the imagination, memory, understanding, will. Hence the order is soul, one or other faculty, act. All human acts are ultimately attributed to the person, the ego. Some moderns, considering faculties as a "bundle of detached powers" (Sully), independent autonomous entities existing apart from the soul and shattering its unity, have denied their existence. Faculties of the soul are merely qualities or properties, modes through which the soul acts. Faculties explain well the changes of consciousness, the essentially different kinds of consciousness, and the variations in capacities or powers, all proceeding from the same soul.—C.E., Maher, Psychology, N. Y., 1909.

Fairs (Lat., feria, holiday) owe their origin to religious festivals, on which the people assembled for purposes of devotion. Such occasions as the patronal feasts or the dedication of a Church were utilized for mercantile enterprise and were advantageous both to the merchants and the Church. Fairs were common in England, France, and Germany in medieval times and many modern market gatherings owe their origin to them.—Walsh, Curiosities of Popular Customs, Phila., 1897.

Faith, in general, is an assent of the mind to the truth of some proposition on the word of another, God or man. It differs from assent in matters of science in that the latter is based solely on the word of another. Divine faith is therefore the holding of some truth as absolutely certain because God, Who can neither deceive nor be deceived, has spoken it. It is not merely a feeling or a suspicion or an opinion, but a firm, unshakeable adherence of the mind to a truth revealed by God. The possibility of Divine faith, or the reason why we believe, is God's authority, His unerring knowledge and truthfulness.

We believe the truths of faith not because our minds understand them, can see them, but because the infinitely Wise and Truthful God has revealed them. This motive of faith must not be confused with motives of credibility. These latter are the signs, and among them the surest are miracles and prophecies, by which we can conclude with full certitude that God has revealed and that therefore there is a strict obligation to accept the truths He has made known. It is these motives of credibility which precede the act of faith and which make it essentially reasonable to assent to the truths of faith, for once it is certain that God has spoken, it is unreasonable to withhold assent to His truths. All that God has revealed and nothing else is the object of Divine faith, for it is that and that alone which can be accepted on the word of God. Though a man may be able by his own resources to learn the main truths revealed by God, the normal and usual way is through the Church which has been commissioned by Christ to teach in His name and with His authority. Divine faith is a supernatural act and therefore requires the grace of God. This grace is given to all adults who do not place any obstacle in its way. Without faith no man can be saved. For infants the virtue of faith received at the time of Baptism suffices, but for adults an act of supernatural faith that God exists and rewards the good and punishes the evil is necessary for salvation.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss; Scott, Things Catholics Are Asked About, N. Y., 1927.

Faith, Act of an acceptance of a doctrine as true which we do not see or cannot prove of ourselves, because God says it is true. It is holding this doctrine as certain, and not as a mere opinion more or less probable. Hence faith excludes all doubt as well as private judgment.—Newman, Mixed Congregations, N. Y., 1929; Bainvel, Faith and the Act of Faith, St. L., 1926.

Faith, Rule of, the authority or standard by which we can know the truths of Christian revelation. Protestantism claims that the Bible alone as interpreted by each individual is the rule of faith. On the other hand: provides a norm for reason, which safeguards it from error or releases it from error's thraldom; corroborates certain truths naturally known, e.g., principles of morality and natural law; opens the way to reason for the discovery of new truths, e.g., with regard to the origin of man and human life.—C.E., V, 758; Sheen, God and Intelligence, N. Y., 1925.

Faith and Reason. Faith here signifies both the complex of revealed truths, and the subjective assent given to these truths, because of the Divine authority revealing them. Reason signifies the natural faculty of understanding, human reason, as distinct from its product, science or knowledge. The Traditionalists teach that there can be no certainty with regard to natural religious truths except from Revelation. Rationalists, on the other hand, deny that any truth can be known with certainty from Revelation. The Semi-Rationalists, while admitting Revelation, teach that natural reason can understand and demonstrate all the truths of faith after they have been revealed; and that reason and faith are perfectly independent of each other. The Church, in opposition to these assertions, teaches that reason has a place in preparing the soil in which the seed of faith will be planted. (1) Human reason of its own natural strength can know with certainty the existence of God, many of His attributes, and the fact of Revelation. Reason must precede the exercise of faith and lead us to it. For, unless we possessed natural certainty of the existence of God, of His wisdom and veracity, and of the fact of Revelation, we could not reasonably give the certain assent of faith to revealed truths. (2) There are some truths, the strict mysteries, e.g., the Blessed Trinity, which cannot be understood and demonstrated by reason even after their revelation, except in so far as God has revealed them. This is not surprising, when we consider the vast mysteries that present themselves to our limited intelligences in the realm of the visible universe. Man can do little more than by exhaustive patience and industry catalogue the forces that govern nature. Gravitation, magnetic attraction, electrical force, life, the nature of substance in its varieties of the natural order, which should teach natural reason to avoid dogmatism in speaking of the Divine mind and its manifestations.

(3) Faith and reason are of mutual assistance to each other. (a) Reason demonstrates with certitude the preamble of faith down to the speculative-practical judgment: “all men must believe in the Christian Faith.” This judgment, however, is only a disposition for faith, and not the motive principle of the act of faith. The formal motive is the authority of God revealing, who can neither deceive nor be deceived. The assent of faith, when it follows this judgment, is perfectly reasonable. (b) Reason gathers the truths of faith into a unified body of doctrine; it proposes analogies to illustrate them, and indicates the harmony existing between them and natural truths. (e) Reason defends the truths of faith against adversaries, at least to the extent of uncovering their errors. Faith, on the other hand: provides a norm for reason, which safeguards it from error or releases it from error's thraldom; corroborates certain truths naturally known, e.g., principles of morality and natural law; opens the way to reason for the discovery of new truths, e.g., with regard to the origin of man and human life.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914.

Faithful Steward, parable in Luke, 12, included in a discourse concerning watchfulness. Matthew, 24, has a similar parable as part of the eschatological instruction. In both it is preceded by the parable of the thief in the night (q.v.). Matthew uses “servant” for “steward” and other variations, and his phraseology is used in the Mass of the Faithful was the part which followed the dismissal of the catechumens or beginners.—C.E.; Fortescue, The Mass, N. Y., 1914.

Faithful Witness, title of Christ in Apocalypse, 1, 5. The glorified Christ in heaven fulfills the function of witness of what God the Father wills, as He fulfilled it on earth. St. John's Gospel, 18, 37, teaches that Christ gives witness of the truth which He had seen in the bosom of the Father; the Apocalypse represents Him as giving witness of God's designs regarding the future. In Apocalypse, 3, 14, He is called "the faithful and true witness," i.e., who may be trusted and whose testimony never falls short of the truth.—Swete, The Apocypel, 4th century, falsely attributed to St. John the Evan­

Faith, Hope, and Charity, SAINTS, martyrs (2nd century). In the reign of Hadrian a Roman matron named Sophia (Gr., Wisdom) with her three daughters, Pistis, Elpis, and Agape (Gr., Faith, Hope, and Charity), were martyred for the Faith, and buried on the Aurelian Way. At a later date Sapiencia (Gr., Wisdom) and her three companions, Speo, Fides, and Caritas (Lat., Faith, Hope, and Charity), were put to death and were buried in the cemetery of St. Callistus on the Appian Way. Feast, 1 Aug.—C.E.;

Faith of our Fathers! Living still, hymn written in the 19th century by Rev. F. W. Faber.
The last two lines of each verse read:

Faith of our Fathers! Holy Faith!
We will be true to thee till death.

The Faldstool, movable folding chair used in pontifical functions by a bishop outside his cathedral or within it if he is not at his throne. It is used when conferring Baptism and Holy Orders, at the consecration of the oils on Maundy Thursday, and at the ceremonies on Good Friday. It is prescribed as a genuflexorium at the doors of the church at the solemn reception of a bishop, at the altar of the Blessed Sacrament, and before the high altar. Other prelates enjoying the privilege of full pontificals may also use it, and red, green, and violet cloths are used as coverings, corresponding to the season and the dig­ ity of the occasion.

Falkland Islands, crown colony of the British Empire, in the South Atlantic, about 300 m. E. of the Strait of Magellan, administered by a governor assisted by an executive and a legislative council; area, 4618 sq. m.; est. pop., 2271. Missions have been established here by the Salesian Fathers, and ecclesiastically the islands belong to the Prefecture Apostolic of Southern Patagonia (q.v.).

Falling Asleep of Mary or Dormitio, a title in the Greek Church for the feast of the Assumption. St. John Damascene entitles his homily on the Assumption "In Dormitionem Marie" (On the Falling Asleep of Mary). It was also the title of an early apocryphal work, "Transitus Marie," c. 4th century, falsely attributed to St. John the Evangelist, and describing the death of the Blessed Virgin. A work of this title was condemned by Pope Gelasius, 494. (N. M. W.)

Fall of Adam. Since by the grace of original justice Adam was elevated to a supernatural state, his loss of that grace is termed his fall.

Fallopio, Gabriele (1523-62), anatomist, b.
Modena, Italy; d. Padua. He was professor of anatomy first at Ferrara and then at Pisa, and despite his early death left his mark on anatomy for all time. The tube leading from the ovary to the uterus, and the canal through which the facial nerve passes from the auditory, are both called by his name. His contributions to practical medicine are likewise important.—C.E.

Fall River, Diocese of, Massachusetts, embraces Bristol, Barnstable, Dukes, and Nantucket counties and the towns of Marion, Mattapoisett, and Wareham in Plymouth County; area, 1194 sq. m.; established, 1904; suffragan of Boston. Bishops: William Stang (1864-07); Daniel F. Feehan (1907).
Churches, 113; priests, secular, 166; priests, regular, 33; religious women, 571; academies, 4; primary schools, 38; pupils in parochial schools, 16,436; institutions, 9; Catholics, 195,000.

Family (Lat., familia, household), the basic society of husband, wife, and children; by extension used for all of the same kin. Man's nature and God's appointment (Gen., 1 and 3) make family life normal and necessary. Man and woman are complementary, and enjoy life in its fulness only by combining their physical, spiritual, moral, social, and economic capacities. The family ordinarily is for the procreation and proper rearing of children, thus perpetuating the human race. The perfect equivalence of family life, in its permanence (divorce), sure methods, in logic and in practise, of injuring both Church and State.—C.E.; Devas, Studies in Family Life, Lond., 1886.

Fanaticism, a state of mind which drives one to extreme and unreasonable speech or conduct. A fanatic is ordinarily unbalanced in mind with regard to the subject of his fanaticism. A religious fanatic is apt to be the most extreme because noth­ing so deeply affects the mind as religion. It was doubtless fanaticism that impelled the Jewish leadgers to such unreasonable action against Christ, causing them to override the laws of judicial procedure in their fell purpose of destroying Him.
The same fanaticism against Christ is seen today in Russia, recently in Mexico, and among certain sects in almost every country. (M. J. S.)

Fanon, shoulder cape worn by the pope alone, consisting of two pieces of white silk ornamented with narrow woven stripes of red and gold. It is nearly circular in shape with a round hole in the middle for the head to pass through, and with a small gold cross embroidered in front. It is worn over the alb, and only at solemn pontifical Mass.
Mentioned in the oldest known Roman Ordinal, it was used in the 8th century, called anaholologium, and wore by ecclesiastics. It was not reserved exclusively for the pope until the 12th century, when it was called the oracle. Its present collar-like form dates from about the 10th century.—C.E.
Fargo, Diocese of, North Dakota, embraces the counties of Cass, Richland, Sargent, Dickey, Lamoure, Barnes, McIntosh, Logan, Kidder, Stutsman, Sheridan, Wells, Foster, Griggs, Steele, Traill, Grand Forks, Nelson, Eddy, Benson, Pierce, Rolette, Towner, Ramsey, McHenry, Bottineau, Cavalier, Walsh, and Pembina; area, 34,899 sq. m.; established, 1889; suffragan of St. Paul. Bishops: John Shanley (1889-1909); James O'Reilly (1910). Churches, 188; stations, 55; priests, secular, 120; priests, regular, 8; religious women, 279; academies, 11; primary schools, 23; pupils in parochial schools, 2759; institutions, 7; Catholics, 68,871.

Faribault, George Barthélemy (1789-1866), archeologist, b. Quebec, Canada; d. there. He was admitted to the Bar in 1811, and served as militia during the American invasion of 1812. In 1822 he entered civil service, and was assistant clerk of the Legislative Assembly, 1822-55. His splendid collection of rare books and original manuscripts, inspired by his love of Canada, burned with Montreal Parliament House, 1849; his second collection was bequeathed to Laval University. His "Catalogue of Works," relating to the history of America, ranks among the best of its kind.—C.E.

Farley, John Murphy (1842-1918), cardinal, Abp. of New York, b. Newtown, Ireland; d. New York. He was educated at St. Macartan's College, Monaghan, St. John's College, Fordham, N. Y., St. Joseph's Seminary, Troy, and the American College, Rome, where he was ordained priest, 1870. He was assistant rector of St. Peter's church, New Brighton, Staten Island, was created domestic prelate by Pope Leo XIII, with the title of Monsignor, 1894, and vicar-general of the Archdiocese of New York, 1891. He became titular Bp. of Zeugma and auxiliary Bp. of New York, 1895, and succeeded Abp. Corrigan to the archiepiscopal see, 1902, being created cardinal, 1911. During his administration the archdiocese made extraordinary progress in the erection of parishes and opening of Catholic schools. He was a decisive force in the taking of only one complete meal in a day, in addition to a small quantity of food or drink in the morning and evening. The black fast was a fast in which not only flesh meat but milk, cheese, butter, or eggs were forbidden. The fast prescribed for the worthy reception of the Holy Eucharist is the total abstinence from food and drink from midnight. Midnight may be reckoned by any accepted time, legal, natural, or regional. Nothing having the nature of food or drink is permitted which is taken after the manner of eating or drinking, i.e., introduced into the mouth from without after midnight and swallowed. Whatever is digestible, strictly speaking, has the nature of food or drink, yet the matter partly depends on the common estimation of men. A small amount, if inhaled or accidentally swallowed as mixed with saliva, does not break the fast. The law of fasting does not hold for communion received in the probable danger of death or to save the Sacrament from irreverence. It is relaxed for the sick (see Communion of the Sick).—C.E.; The Bishops, Handbook of Christian Religion, St. L., 1925.

Fast Days, days when the law of fasting is in force, namely: ember-days, the vigils of Pentecost, the Assumption, All Saints, and Christmas, and all days of Lent up to noon of Easter Saturday. The law never binds, however, on Sundays nor on feast-days second class (except feast-days in Lent).

Fate, Fatalism. Fate is an assumed power that rules the destinies of men; destiny. The ancient goddesses, Atropos, Clotho, and Lachesis, are called the Fates. Fatalism is the theory that an unknown force rigidly predetermines all events in history and in particular all the actions and incidents of each human life, so that no one by any effort of the will can resist it; it is also called determinism.—C.E.; Rickaby, God and His Creatures, Lond., 1905.

Father, a title originally given to bishops, and later to priests as the ministers of the Sacrament of Penance, because the administration of the sacraments creates a paternal relationship. Today it is the form of address given to priests in English-speaking countries.

Father or God the Father, the First Person of the Blessed Trinity. He is truly Father as He begets a coeternal and coequal Son, to whom He imparts the plenitude of His Nature and in Whom He contemplates His own perfect image. By nature God is Our Creator and Lord, and we are His creatures and subjects. By sin we are His enemies and deserve His chastisements. By grace, however, He lovingly pardons us, adopts us as sons, and destines us to share in the life and beatitude of His only-begotten Son, Jesus Christ. Thus by Divine adoption God is Our Father and we are His children. This adoption is effected through sanctifying grace, a Divine quality or supernatural habit infused into the soul by God, which blossoms into the vision of glory in life eternal.—Pohle-Preuss, The Divine Trinity, St. L., 1922; Marmion, Christ the Life of the Soul, St. L., 1923.

Father of Light, title of God (James, 1, 17) as author of every best and perfect gift.

Father of The World to Come, title of Our Lord in Isaias, 9, 6. (Ed.)

Fathers, Apostolic, Christian writers of the 1st and 2nd centuries who are known, or are considered, to have had personal relations with some of the Apostles, or to have been so influenced by them that their writings may be held as echoes of genuine Apostolic teaching. The term virtually embraces all the remains of primitive Christian literature Fathers antedating the great apologies of the 2nd century and forming the link of tradition which binds these latter writings to those of the N.T. Chief in importance among the Apostolic Fathers are the three 1st-century bishops: St. Clement of Rome, St. Ignatius of Antioch, and St. Polycarp of Smyrna. There are also the two 1st-century writers, the author of the Didache and the author of the "Epistle of Barnabas." By extension of the term to comprise the extant extra-canonical literature of the sub-Apostolic age, it is made to include the "Shepherd" of Hermas, the New Testament prophet who was probably a brother of Pope Pius I (c. 140-150); fragments of the "Expositions of the Discourses of the Lord," by Papias; and the "Letter to Diognetus," by an unknown author. The period of time covered by these writings extends from the last two decades of the 1st century through the first half of the 2nd century. They are generally epistolary in form and were written for the greater part for the guidance of individuals or local churches in some passing need.—C.E., I, 637; Holland, The Apostolic Fathers, Lond., 1887.

Fathers of a Good Death, a religious order founded at Rome, 1582, by St. Camillus de Lellis, to tend the plague-stricken and to minister to the sick in their homes. It was approved by Sixtus V in 1586 and erected into an order by Gregory XIV in 1591. Statistics: 6 provinces, 55 monasteries, 471 religious (265 priests), 69 novices, 71 oblates, and 416 aspirants.—C.E., Ill, 217.

Fathers of Mercy, See Society of the Priests of Mercy of the Immaculate Conception.

Fathers of the Church, saintly writers of the first centuries of the Christian era, whom the Catholic Church acknowledges as witnesses of her faith. To be numbered among the Fathers of the Church, four qualities are required of a writer. First, he must have lived when the Church was in her youth; hence St. Gregory the Great (d. 604) is generally regarded as the last Father in the West, St. John Damascene (d. 754), in the East. Secondly, he must have had a saintly life. Thirdly, his writings must not only be free from heresies but also excel in the explanation and defense of Catholic doctrine. Lastly, his writings must bear the seal of the Church's approval. Though the majority of the Fathers were bishops, yet this is not true of all of them. St. Jerome was a simple priest to the end of his days, St. Ephraem a deacon, St. Justin a layman. All Fathers have not been proclaimed Doctors of the Church. In matters of faith and morals, the consent of the Fathers has always been held in high esteem by the Church. What they unanimously teach to be of faith, is of faith; what they unanimously reject as heretical, is heretical. Even the logical conclusions which they unanimously draw from the articles of faith, furnish us with a certain theological argument. Their authority is due not only to the fact that they were saints or bishops or eminent scholars and lived at a time when Christ's revelation was still fresh in the minds of men, but primarily to the approbation of the Church. What Christ said of the Apostles, "He that heareth you heareth me," the Church says in a manner of the Fathers. They are the mouthpiece of the infallible teaching body of the Church, and the Church acknowledges them as witnesses of her own faith. Hence, when anathematizing new heresies or defining new dogmas, the Councils appeal to the consent of the Fathers. The Council of Ephesus (431) declared in its first session that it would define nothing save what had been held unanimously by the ancient and holy Fathers. This approbation of the Church gives added authority even to the Fathers, considered singly, though in varying degrees. A general approbation given to a saintly writer of the first centuries implies that his doctrine in general is orthodox and worthy of recommendation. Sometimes, however, a certain Father's doctrine or writing is condemned by the Church. The period of time covered by these writings extends from the last two decades of the 1st century through the first half of the 2nd century. They are generally epistolary in form and were written for the greater part for the guidance of individuals or local churches in some passing need.—C.E.; Agius, Tradition and the Church. (A. c. c.)

Faustinus and Jovita, Saints, martyrs (c. 120), d. Brescia, Italy. They were brothers, Faustinus a priest, and Jovita a deacon; and were beheaded for the Faith. Relics at Brescia, Rome, Bologna, and Verona. Feast, R. Cal., 15 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Faversham Abbey, a former Benedictine monastery of the Cluniac Congregation near Canterbury, founded by King Stephen and Queen Matilda. The church was completed, c. 1251. In 1538 the abbey was surrendered to the crown and rented by Henry VIII to John Wheler, subsequently passing through the hands of several owners. At the present day only portions of the outer walls remain.—C.E.

Faye, Hervé Auguste Etienne Albans (1814-1902), astronomer, b. St.-Benoit-du-Sault, France; d. Paris. In 1843 he discovered the comet bearing his name, and later lectured on astronomy at the Ecole Polytechnique (1879-93). He improved the method of astronomical measurements, invented the zenithal collimator, and suggested and applied photography and electricity to astronomy.—C.E.

Fear, a purely painful emotion aroused on the apprehension of danger. Though commonly a self-regarding emotion, fear may be aroused in behalf of others. Fear serves for the protection of the individual, but, when excessive, may become injurious because it is physically depressing and mentally exciting, tending through undue excitement of the imagination to impair the power of reasoning and judgment. When the use of reason is completely removed, there is rather a state of terror. From a moral standpoint, slight fear must be ignored; grave fear must not be allowed to deter us from duty, yet there is lessened responsibility for evil done out of fear. Fear, if of death or grave injury, is a diriment impediment to matrimony, rendering it invalid, for a contract under such conditions is no contract at all, because of lack of free consent.—C.E.; Koch-Preuss. (J. V. C.)
Feast of Fools, celebration of the later Middle Ages which took place in many parts of Europe, particularly in France, and occurred near the feast of the Circumcision, 1 Jan. It marked the brief supremacy of those ordinarily in subordinate positions and was attended by great buffoonery and license, which probably originated in ancient pagan customs. It was forbidden under severe penalties by the Council of Basel, 1435.—C.E., VI, 132; Walsh, Curiosities of Popular Customs, Phila., 1897.

Feasts or Festivals, days designated for giving special honor to God, to the Saviour, to saints, and to holy things. Some are fixed festivals, each having a certain day of the year assigned to it. Others are movable, occurring earlier or later in different years. Festivals are also divided into holy days of obligation and ordinary festivals: on the former the faithful are required to assist at Mass and abstain from unnecessary servile work; on ordinary festivals the Church merely observes the Philip's Office and Mass (see Holy Days of Obligation). Festivals are also arranged in three classes, according to their importance: doubles, semidoubles, and simples. Certain days when the Church does not honor any saint are called ferials (femia, a weekday). Some great festivals have octaves, which extend the solemnity of the feast through eight days; and some have vigils, in which the observance of the feast is begun on the preceding day. Each of the above is described under its own title. —C.E.; Kellner, Heortology, A History of the Christian Festivals, St. L., 1908. (J.F.S.)

Febronianism, the politico-ecclesiastical system outlined by Johann Nikolaus von Honthem (1701-90), Auxiliary Bp. of Trier, under the pseudonym Justinus Febronius, in his book on the position of the Church and the power of the Pope, written with a view to uniting discordant religious elements. Influenced by Gallican principles, Honthem advocates an ecclesiastical organization subversive of the Church's constitution. By diminution of papal power, he attempts a reconciliation of Protestants in the bodies with the Church. Christ, he claims, invested the power of the keys in the Church as a body only, and her prelates, including the pope, exercise this power subordinate to the Church body. While infallibility is denied, the primacy is conceded but can be attached to another see than that of Rome. The pope's power should be confined to administration of the universal Church and the people. Many historians consider his position uncanonical. —C.E.; Butler.

Felicitas, Saint, martyr (2nd century), d. Rome. She was a holy Roman widow martyred during the reign of Emperor Antoninus, with seven sons (Januarius, Felix, Philip Pius, Silvanus, Alexander, Vitalis, and Martialis), because of their defense of Christianity. St. Felicitas was buried with St. Silvanus in the cemetery of Maximus on the Salarian Way. Patrons of women who wish to obtain children. Emblems: palm, sword, seven children grouped behind their mother. Relics in Cas- pulpichian church, Tuscany. Feast, R. Cal., 23 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Felicitas and Perpetua, Saints, martyrs (203), d. Carthage. Vibia Perpetua, a noble matron, and Felicitas, her slave, were arrested and put to death for the Faith along with Revocatus, Saturus, Saturninus, and Secundulus. They were thrown to the wild beasts in the arena, and then slain by the sword. The names of Felicitas and Perpetua occur in the prayer, "Nobis quoque pecatoribus" in the Canon of the Mass. Feast, 7 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Felix I (Lat., happy), Saint, Pope (269-274), martyr, b. Rome; d. there. The records are uncertain as to the events of his reign. Felix sent a letter containing dogmatic exposition of the Catholic doctrine on the subject of the Trinity to the Synod of Antioch which had deposed Paul of Samosata, 269, a follower of Apollinaris, for his heretical teaching on the subject. Feast, 30 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Felix II, Pope (more properly, antipope; 355-358), b. Rome; d. Porto, Italy, 365. An archdeacon, he was recognized as pope only by the Eastern Church and the people. Many historians consider his election uncanonical.—C.E.

Felix III, Saint, Pope (483-492), confessor, b. Rome; d. there. At his accession to the See, the Eastern Church had been split by the Act of Union (Henoticum) of Emperor Zeno, which was intended to reconcile the Church and Eutychianism. The pope excommunicated the eastern bishops, Peter the Tanner, Peter Mogens, and the Patriarch Acacius and thus paved the way for the healing of the schism, 518, during the reign of Justinian. He also drew up the conditions to which the Africans who had apostatized during the Vandal persecutions were required to subscribe. Feast, 25 Feb.—C.E.

Felix IV, Pope (526-530), b. Samnium, Italy; d. Rome. As pope, in favor with Theodoric, Arian king of the Goths, he secured prestige for the semi-Pelagianism with his "Capitula," taken from the Fathers; they were later published as canons.—C.E.

Felix V, antipope. See Amaudus VIII.

Felix and Aduactus, Saints, martyrs (c. 303), d. Rome. Felix was a Roman priest; ordered to offer sacrifice to the pagan gods, he refused, and at his prayer the idols fell shattered to the ground. He was subjected to cruel torments and beheaded. According to the legend, while Felix was being led to his execution, a stranger, inflamed by his heroic example, professed the Faith, and was also martyred. The name of the stranger being unknown, he was called Aduactus (Added). Their basilica over the cemetery of Commodilla was discovered in 1905. Relics in Cathedral of Vienna. Feast, R. Cal., 30 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Felix of Cantalice, Saint, confessor (1513-97), b. near Cantalice, Italy; d. Rome. He entered the Capuchin Order, 1543, and for 40 years exercised a wonderful influence among all classes. He worked chiefly among children, whom he taught to sing the canticles which he composed. Though illiterate, he was so advanced in the spiritual life that St. Philip Neri selected him to assist St. Charles Borromeo in drawing up the constitutions for his Oblates. In his humility and simplicity, Felix styled himself the "Ass of the Capuchins." Represented holding the Infant Jesus in his arms. Canonized, 1712. Relics in the Capuchin church of the Immaculate Conception, Rome. Feast, 18 May.—C.E.; Butler.

Felix of Nola, Saint, martyr (3rd century), b. Nola, Italy. Ordained by Bp. Maximus of Nola, he was imprisoned during the persecution of Decius, but was set free by an angel. Refusing the episcopacy of Nola which the citizens urged upon him, he continued his duties as auxiliary; he devoted himself to the poor, among whom he distributed his inheritance. His sufferings have merited the title of martyr. Represented chained in a dungeon. He was buried at Cimitile, near Nola. Feast, R. Cal., 14 Jan.—C.E.; Butler.

Felix of Valois, Saint, confessor (1127-1212), founder of the Order of the Holy Trinity for the Redemption of Captives, b. province of Valois, France; d. Cerfroi. Of the noble family of Valois, he renounced all his possessions at an early age to live a life of prayer and contemplation in a forest in the Diocese of Meaux. Here he was joined by St. John of Matha, with whom he founded the Order of Trinitarians for the ransom of Christians held as slaves by the Moors of Spain and Northern Africa. They raised vast sums of money by parading in public as the people threw down to them their gold and precious stones. St. Felix labored in France, where he established the monastery of Cerfroi and looked after the interests of the congregation. Emblems: slave, flag, and purse. He was buried in the church of Cerfroi and his tomb became the object of frequent pilgrimages. Canonized, 1202. Feast, R. Cal., 25 Nov.—C.E.; Butler.

Fenelon, Francois de Salignac de la Mothe (1651-1715), author and Abp. of Cambrai, b. Perigord, France; d. Cambrai. He came of a noble family, and after studying at the College du Plessis, Paris, prepared for the priesthood at St. Sulpice and was ordained in 1675. In 1678 he was appointed director of a community of convert ladies at Paris, and, on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, was sent to preach to the Protestants of Saintonge. On his return, at the inspiration of Bossuet, he wrote a refutation of Malebranche's theories about grace and, shortly after, a treatise on the education of girls, at the request of the Duchess of Beauvilliers. In return the Duke of Burgundy secured Fenelon as tutor for the Duke of Beauvilliers secured Fenelon as tutor for the Duke of Burgundy, grandson of Louis XIV. This was the occasion of his writing his "Fables," "Dialogues of the Dead," and "Telemachus," through which he taught his royal pupil self-control and the duties of his state. Fenelon was rewarded with the Abbey of St. Valery, and in 1683 with the Archbishops' of Cambrai. The young prelate's future now seemed bright, but suddenly a storm broke. Fenelon had signed the "Articles d'Issy," drawn up by a commission, including Bossuet, condemning the quietist ideas of Mme. guyon, and explaining briefly the Catholic teaching on prayer. Later Bossuet wrote an explanation of the "Articles," which Fenelon refused to sign, on the plea that his honor forbade him to condemn a woman twice. He then set forth his own views in his "Explication des maximes des saints." This work provoked a lengthy controversy between the two bishops. Fenelon asked Rome to decide the points at issue, and when certain of his propositions were condemned he submitted publicly and unreservedly. He had, however, incurred the displeasure of Louis XIV, who commanded him never to leave his diocese again, and thereafter he devoted himself to the interests of his flock. He opposed all attempts to revive the Jansenist controversies, and energetically defended the Bull "Unigenitus." His published correspondence reveals him as a great director of souls.—C.E.
FENWICK, Edward Dominic (1768-1832), first Bp. of Cincinnati, b. Leonardstown, Md.; d. Wooster, O. His ancestors settled in Maryland with Leonard Calvert. Having joined the Dominicans at Borneo, Belgium, he became the founder of the order in the United States, establishing St. Rose's Convent in Washington Co., Ky., 1806. Here St. Thomas College was opened in 1807. He resigned as superior in 1814 to do missionary work in Ohio. In 1818 he built St. Joseph's, near Somerset, the first church in Ohio, with a Dominican convent nearby. Named Bp. of Cincinnati, 1821, he was consecrated, 13 Jan., 1822, at St. Rose's, by Bp. Flaget. His diocese included, besides Ohio, Michigan and the Northwest Territory. Having moved Christ Church to the corner of the Old St. Peter's Cathedral on the present site of the present St. Francis Xavier's College, and started a seminary, he went abroad for funds. On his return he laid the cornerstone of old St. Peter's Cathedral, 1826, and by 1829 opened the Athenaeum, a college and seminary, dedicated to St. Francis Xavier. In 1831 he founded the Catholic Telegraph. He was stricken with cholera in the midst of one of his many missionary journeys through his diocese.—C.E., III, 773.

BENEDICT Joseph (1782-1846), second Bp. of Boston, brother of preceding, b. Leonardstown, Md.; d. Boston. He studied and taught at Georgetown. In 1805 he entered the Sulpician Seminary, Baltimore, but on the restoration of the Society of Jesus in the United States, 1806, he joined the order. Ordained by Bp. Neale in 1808, he was sent to New York, where he became head of the New York Literary Institution, founded, 1809, as a college, on the present site of the cathedral, and closed in 1814, on the recall of the Jesuits to Maryland. He served for a time as administrator of the New York diocese and under Bp. Connolly as vicar-general. From 1817-18 he was president of Georgetown. Sent to Charleston, 1818, to arrange difficulties originating in the trustee system, he remained there two years after the arrival of Bp. England, 1820. He was again president of Georgetown, 1824-25. Named to succeed the aethor of Boston, he was consecrated in Baltimore, 1 Nov., 1825. He established a seminary in his own home, and by 1827 had a school in the basement of the cathedral. In 1829 he founded one of the earliest Catholic papers in the United States, “The Jesuit, or the Catholic Telegraph.” His efforts to save the Christians of Spain from the Saracen yoke were quite successful, Granada and Alicante alone remaining in the Moorish power when he died. He converted the great mosques of Cordova and Seville into cathedrals, and founded the University of Salamanca. A Franciscan tertiary, he led a life of great sanctity, Patron of the engineers of the Spanish army.

Ferdinand, Blessed, confessor (1402-43), King of Leon and Castile, b. near Salamanca, Spain, 1198; d. Seville, 1252. He succeeded to Castile in 1217, and Leon in 1230, and married Beatrice of Bourbon. He served as a hostage to secure the cession of Ceuta to the Moors. The Portuguese were defeated at Tangiers, and Ferdinand offered himself as a hostage to secure the cession of Ceuta to the Moors. The Cortes, however, declined to surrender Ceuta, and offered to ransom Ferdinand. The Moors refused and Ferdinand was flung into a dungeon at Fez, where after five years of insult and torture, born patiently, he died. Calahorr has made him the hero of his tragedy, “El Principe Constante.” Beatified, 1470. Body in the royal crypt at Batalha. Feast, 5 June.—C.E.

Ferdinand III, Saint, confessor (1198-1252), King of Leon and Castile, b. near Salamanca, Spain, 1198; d. Seville, 1252. He succeeded to Castile in 1217, and Leon in 1230, and married Beatrice of Bourbon. He served as a hostage to secure the cession of Ceuta to the Moors. The Portuguese were defeated at Tangiers, and Ferdinand offered himself as a hostage to secure the cession of Ceuta to the Moors. The Cortes, however, declined to surrender Ceuta, and offered to ransom Ferdinand. The Moors refused and Ferdinand was flung into a dungeon at Fez, where after five years of insult and torture, born patiently, he died. Calahorr has made him the hero of his tragedy, “El Principe Constante.” Beatified, 1470. Body in the royal crypt at Batalha. Feast, 5 June.—C.E.

Fergus (Celtic, man’s strength), Saint, confessor (d. Glamis, c. 730). He preached in the counties of Perth and Caithness, in Scotland, founding churches dedicated to St. Patrick at Strugheath, Blackford, and Dolfarlick in Perthshire; Wick and Halligarry in Caithness; and St. Fergus, in Aberdeenshire. He finally settled at Glamis, Forfarshire, where he was buried. His head was later transferred to Scone Abbey. Feast, Ireland, 8 Sept.; Scotland, 18 Nov.—C.E.

Feria (Lat., free day), in ancient Rome a day kept as a holiday. It is a liturgical designation for weeks—days to be observed and the least is celebrated; also for all weekdays divided according to rank, into privileged (Ash Wednesday, days of Holy Week, days within the octave of Easter and Pentecost), which exclude commoration of all feasts; major (days of Advent and Lent, emberdays, Rogation Monday), which must at least be commemorated in the Mass and Office of the day; and minor. From feria, the term fair, or fair day, is derived.—C.E.

Ferens, Diocese of, Ireland, comprises nearly all of Wexford and part of Waterford counties; founded by St. Aedan, 598; suffragan of Dublin. His early successors included Sts. Mochua, Moling, and Cill. Bp. O'Flynn (d. 1062), Ailbe O'Molloy (1185-1222), and Bp. John, who rebuilt the ancient cathedral, now in ruins. In the 19th century the see was occupied by Bps. Ryan (1814-19), James Keating (1819-49), Myles Murphy (1850-56), Thomas Furlong (1857-75), Michael Warren (1875-84), and James Browne (1884-1917). Present bishop, William Codd; residence at Summerhill.
Ruins of early priories and abbeys may be seen in the diocese. Churches, 92; priests, secular, 135; priests, regular, 20; religious women, 564; college, 1; high schools, 5; primary schools, 150; institutions, 10; Catholics, 98,134; others, 8816.

Fesch, Joseph (1763-1839), cardinal, uncle of Napoleon I, b. Ajaccio, Corsica; d. Rome. After ordination, he embraced the military career, becoming comissary of war under his nephew in 1796. When hostility to religion somewhat abated, he reentered ecclesiastical life and helped to negotiate the Concordat of 1801. In 1802 he was named Aib, of Lyons, and, receiving the cardinal’s hat in 1803, was appointed ambassador to Rome. He induced Pius VII to crown Napoleon in Paris, and was present at the ceremony. Though powerless to prevent the rupture between the emperor and the Holy See, he prevented Napoleon from acknowledging an independent Gallican Church, upheld papal rights in the matter of canonical institution, and fell into imperial disfavor by protesting his loyalty to the exiled pontiff. After the Restoration he resided in Rome, his lands being governed meanwhile by an administrator.—C.F.

Festivis resonent compita vocibus, or With glad and joyous strains now let each street resound, hymn for Vespers on the feast of the Most Precious Blood, 1 July. It was written in the 17th century, by an unknown author. It has five translations. The English title given is by T. Potter.—Britt.

Fetishism (Lat., factitius, made by art), a term first applied probably to the religion of idols and amulets made by hand and supposed to possess magic power. Bastiöld, 1805, claims as fetish “everything produced by nature or art, which receives divine honor, including sun, moon, earth, air, fire, water, mountains, rivers, trees, stones, images, animals, if considered as objects of divine worship.” Thus the name became more general until Comte used it to designate only the lowest stage of religious development, a theory now practically abandoned. The spirit supposed to dwell in the fetish is not the vital power belonging to that object, but a spirit foreign to the object, in some way connected with and embodied in it. Within the limits of animism, Tiele and Höfling distinguish between fetishism and spiritism; fetishism contents itself with particular objects in which it is supposed a spirit has for a certain time taken up its abode; in spiritism, spirits are not bound up with certain objects, but may change their mode of revelation. Also a fetish differs from an idol or amulet, though the distinction is sometimes difficult; an amulet is a pledge of protection of Divine power; a fetish is an object in which the Divine power is supposedly wholly incorporated, and idolatry in this sense is a higher form of fetishism.—C.E.; Windle, Religions Past and Present, N. Y., 1927.

Feudalism and the Church. When the Church turned from the Roman Empire to the nations of the West and gradually fashioned a civilization out of barbarian chaos, she earned the gratitude of kings and emperors who endowed her with vast property, although often as fiefs. It was in this manner that the Church took its place in the feudal system. This ecclesiastical property brought evil in its train. Disputes ecclesiastical elections followed, with coveted church property as the bone of contention; while secular princes claimed the right of investiture of spiritual offices. Owing to the great revenues coming from the landed estates attached to bishoprics and abbeys, members of the noblest families sought to buy these spiritual offices from the king or prince who granted the fief. They were willing to meet every demand of their lord if they received an office from him. Prelates holding feudal lands became governmental vassals. The secular rulers expected the Church to share the national burdens and duties, inasmuch as she was sharing the land-grants. The Church was in danger of becoming an annex of the State. Instead of being a universal Church, she was threatened with separating into a number of national churches under territorial princes. Feudalism was dragging her into a mire of secularization which culminated in the captivity of Avignon. Pope Nicholas II, in 1059, issued a decree which took the election of the pope out of the hands of the king, and placed it in the hands of the cardinals. This was the first step toward freeing the Church from the control of secular power. Pope Gregory VII, who ascended the papal throne in 1073, continued the work of reform by attacking the practice of simony, by forbidding married clergy to perform religious functions and by depriving kings and feudal lords of their influence over the choice of bishops and abbots, evils which had resulted from the feudal system in its relation to the Church.—C.E., VI, 62; Guggenberger, A General History of the Christian Era, St. L., 1919.

Feuillantes, fī-yā’ā (Lat., folium, leaf) a reform of the Order of Citeaux, founded by Jean de La Barrière, 1573, at Les Feuillants, a monastery so called from its location in a shady valley. Several of the monks refused to accept the reform and dispersed to various Cistercian houses, leaving only five at Les Feuillants. The community increased rapidly, however, by the admission of postulants. In 1581 Gregory XIII issued a Brief of commendation, and in 1589 one of confirmation, establishing the Feuillants as a separate congregation. Sixtus V summoned them to Rome, 1587, and gave them the church of St. Pudentiana, while Henry III of France erected the monastery of St. Bernard for them in Paris. Clement VIII, 1596, withdrew the reform from the jurisdiction of Cistercian abbots and permitted the Feuillants to compile new constitutions. They acquired a second monastery in Rome, 1598. Urban VIII, 1630, separated the congregation into two branches: that of France, called Notre-Dame des Feuillants, and that of Italy, known as the Bernardoni or Reformed Bernardines. In 1654 these two branches modified the constitutions of 1593. At the suppression of religious orders in France, 1791, practically all the Feuillants were confessors, exiles, or martyrs. The Bernardines of Italy subsequently incorporated with the Order of Citeaux.

Feuillantines were an order of women founded by Jean de La Barrière, 1588, with the same rule and austerities as the Feuillants. During the French Revolution, 1791, this community disappeared.

Fiac, (Fiech), Saint (415-520), Bp. of Leinster. He was a nephew of Dubhtach, the famous bard, by whom he was instructed in the art of song. Saint Patrick ordained him missionary bishop for Leinster. He founded the churches and monasteries of Domnach-Flech, east of the Barrow, and Sletty, near Carlow. He is the reputed author of a metrical life of Saint Patrick, in Irish, said to be the earliest biography of the saint. He was buried in his own church at Sletty. Feast, 12 Oct.—C.E.

Fiacre, Saint, confessor (d. 670). Of noble Irish lineage, he was ordained to the priesthood, and embraced the eremitical life at Kilfera. He went to France, 628, and settled at Breuil, near Meaux, where he led a life of prayer and mortification, later founding a monastery for the many disciples who flocked to him. He was famous for his miracles and after his death his tomb became a place of pilgrimage. Patron of French cab-drivers. The Hôtel de St-Fiacre, Paris, which had as its sign his image, was the first to have coaches for hire, and so his name became the word for cab. Represented in monastic garb, holding a spade in his hand. His relics were preserved in the cathedral at Meaux. Feast, 30 Aug.—C.E.; Butler.

Fideism (Lat., fides, faith), a false system of philosophy, closely related to Traditionalism (q.v.), which denies the ability of unaided human reason to arrive at certain knowledge of matters metaphysical, religious, and moral, and which insists that an act of faith alone is the means by which to attain certitude. Its criterion of certitude is authority, which has its foundation in Divine revelation. The latter is transmitted through the ages by society, in the form of tradition, common sense, or some agent of a social character. The exponents of this philosophy, among whom were De Bonald, De La Mennais, Bonnetty, Ventura, and Rohrbacher, were theologians and philosophers who wished to offset the prevalent materialistic scepticism and to place Christianity on a firmer basis than human reason can furnish. The system, which arose in France at the beginning of the 19th century, was extreme, and led to scepticism, subjectionism, agnosticism, pragmatism, and positivism. It was expressly condemned in two Encyclicals (1832, 1834) of Gregory XVI.—C.E.; Rickaby, The First Principles of Knowledge, Lond., 1901.

Fidelis of Sigmaringen, Saint, martyr (1577-1622), b. Sigmaringen, Prussia; d. Sevis, Switzerland. Graduated at Freiburg, 1603, he was admitted to the bar, 1604-10, received his degree of Doctor of Laws, 1611, and began to practise at Ensisheim, where he was known as "lawyer of the poor." He became a member of the Capuchin Order, 1612. After his ordination he was famous for his preaching which he directed toward the conversion of heretics; while employed thus at Grisons, Switzerland, he incurred the fear and hostility of the Zwinglians by whom he was murdered. Emblems: a club, a two-edged sword, a Camerican. His body was preserved at Feldkirch, head and arm at Chur. Feast. R. Cal., 24 April.—C.E.; Butler.

Field Afar, The, a magazine published eleven times annually at Maryknoll, N. Y., by the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America and devoted to missionary activities in the Orient; founded, 1907; circulation, 100,000. (E. A. D.)

Field Mass, name for the Holy Sacrifice when celebrated in the open air, as in time of war, or in peace on special occasions with the permission of the bishop.

Fig-tree. The Bible supposes the presence of the fig-tree throughout all Palestine, and regards it as one of the characteristic products of the land, which has neither fig-tree nor vine is considered wretched (Num., 13). The tree loses its leaves during the winter, but these begin to grow again towards the end of March, or the beginning of April. As early as the end of February, little figs grow at the junction of the old wood and the leaves, but they develop only to the size of a cherry, are inedible, and soon fall for the most part. The few that continue to develop ripen in June, and are "the figs of the first season," described as "very good" (Jer., 24). In the meantime other buds grow which form the real crop, ripe in August. Figs were eaten fresh or dried, and in the latter case were pressed into solid cakes (1 Kings, 25). Figs were also used for medicinal purposes as in the poultice which healed the boil of Ezechias (4 Kings, 21). Both the sweet fruit and the abundant foliage, which protects from the sun, are often referred to in Scripture, in descriptions of peace and prosperity (Judges, 9; 3 Kings, 4). The fig-tree figures in the N.T. in the symbolic action of Our Lord (Matt., 7 and 24; John, 13; James, 3; Apocalypse, 6). The parable of the Barren Fig-tree is given in Luke, 13, in connection with the call to repentance, inspired by recent misfortunes which should cause the nation of Israel to think, else destruction awaits them. The parable speaks of a fig-tree, planted in a vineyard. After a lapse of time which would allow the tree to grow to the bearing stage, the owner comes three years in succession, but finds no fruit. Disappointed by continual failure which leaves no hope for the future, the owner orders the tree cut down, but at the request of the vine dresser he consents to try again and to spare the tree for another year. The vine dresser hopes that additional care may help the tree to bear fruit. The application of the parable to the case of Israel is sufficiently clear to need no further explanation. Like the fig-tree Israel receives special care from God; the mission of Christ is the last of those proofs of the Divine love for the nation, and if the people fail to respond and to heed the call, they are doomed to destruction.—Fonck, tr. Leahy, Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915.

Fiji, Vicariate Apostolic of, comprises the islands of the Fiji Archipelago and of Rotuma, located in the central part of Western Polynesia; established, 1887; entrusted to the Marist Fathers. Julian Vidal, first bishop (d. 1922), was succeeded by Charles Nicolas (1922); residence at Suva, Fiji Stations, 21; priests, 29; religious women, 134; children attending Catholic schools, 3300; Catholics, 13,536.

Filioque (Lat., and the Son), a word that briefly recalls the Catholic doctrine which insists against Greek Schismatics, that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, as from one principle, and by act of love. The Greeks first objected to its insertion in the Nicene Creed, as against the discipline enjoined by the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431), and later as they drifted into schism under Photius (c. A.D. 870), they challenged the doctrine, and denied the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son. The “Filioque,” which expresses the ancient Christian tradition of even the Greek Fathers, first crept into the Nicene Creed in the liturgy of Spain, in the 6th century, and gradually prevailed in Western Christianity as the official and liturgical expression of the revealed truth, that the Holy Ghost proceeds at once from the Father and the Son, as from one principle, and by act of love. The Greeks first objected to its insertion in the Nicene Creed, as against the discipline enjoined by the Council of Ephesus (A.D. 431), and later as they drifted into schism under Photius (c. A.D. 870), they challenged the doctrine, and denied the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Son. The “Filioque,” which expresses the ancient Christian tradition of even the Greek Fathers, first crept into the Nicene Creed in the liturgy of Spain, in the 6th century, and gradually prevailed in Western Christianity as the official and liturgical expression of the revealed truth. The “Filioque” was condemned by the Council of Florence in 1439, and was thus once again excluded from the Nicene Creed. However, it gradually reappeared in the liturgy of the Western Church, and by the 19th century for its celebration in the Western Church, the Filioque was reintroduced, and is now used in most Western liturgical traditions.

Finding of the Holy Cross, Feast of the, first celebrated in Jerusalem to celebrate both the finding of the Cross by St. Helena (14 Sept., 326), and the dedication of two churches (14 Sept., 335), built by Emperor Constantine on Mt. Calvary. The commemoration of these events was annually solemnized not only in Jerusalem, but also in Constantinople and Rome. Since a similar feast was kept, 3 May, in parts of the Western Church, this date was chosen at the beginning of the 9th century for its celebration in the Western Church, although the real date of the discovery was most probably 14 Sept.—C.E.; Kirchenlexikon. (A. B.)

Finland, republic in northern Europe; area, 132,642 sq. m.; est. pop., 5,526,350. The region was pagan until the 12th century when Christianity was introduced by Vassievolodovich, Grand Duke of Novgorod, who sent schismatic missionaries to the Karelians, and by King Erik of Sweden who undertook a crusade to Finland in 1157. Bp. Thomas (d. 1248) established the first see at Räntemäki, later transferred to Abo. In the 16th century Lutheranism was forced upon the people, and the Catholic Church was thrown out of the country. Finland gained its independence in 1917, and was proclaimed a sovereign state. Protestantism is the national religion, but freedom of worship is granted to all. The Catholic Church is represented by the Vicariate Apostolic of Finland, founded 1902, with 3 churches, 5 priests, and 2000 Catholics.—C.E. Suppl.

Finn, Francis (1859-1928), author, b. St. Louis, Mo.; d. Cincinnati, O. He entered the Society of Jesus, and was ordained, 1893; became professor of English literature at Marquette College, Milwaukee, Wis.; directed the parochial schools of St. Xavier's, Cincinnati; and wrote numerous books for boys, including "Tom Playfair," "His First and Last Appearance," "Percy Boys," and "Percy Wynne." (a. e. a.)

Finnian, Saint, confessor (c. 495-589), Bp. of Moville, b. Ulster, Ireland. He was a descendant of Fiach the Fair. He studied under Sts. Colman, Mochae, and Ninian. Returning from a pilgrimage to Rome, he founded the monastery of Druim Fionn, and the school of Moville, and composed a rule and penitential code for his monks. He is venerated by the Welsh under the name of St. Winin, and is believed by some to be identical with St. Frigidian of Lucea. Patron of Ulster. Cult approved, 1903. Feast, 10 Sept.—C.E.; Butler.

Finnan, Saint (d. 661), Bp. of Lindisfarne, and apostle of Northumbria, b. Ireland. He was appointed Bp. of Lindisfarne, 651, and built the cathedral, and the monasteries of Gilling and Whitby. Feast, 9 Feb.—C.E.

Finbar (Lochian), Saint (c. 550-623), Bp. of Cork, b. near Bandon, Ireland; d. Clony. He evangelized Gowran, Coolacashin, Aghahoe, and founded the school at Eiree. He visited Rome, Scotland, and Wales. Feast, 25 Sept.—C.E.
Fioretti di S. Francesco d'Assisi, See Little Flowers of St. Francis.

Fire, Liturgical Use of. (1) As a symbol of the Death and Resurrection of Christ, fire (candles and lamps) is extinguished on Good Friday, and rekindled from a flint on Easter Eve. (2) Prayers concerning the emission of liturgical fire and light are part of the Candlemas and Holy Saturday liturgies.—C.E.

Firmament (Lat., firmamentum, support), the vault of the heavens. The idea of firmness in the sky, is due to the Hebrew word which stresses the notions of solidity and expanse. The biblical narrative, which describes the physical universe in a popular way, shows the Firmament to be a strong ceiling that divides the waters above from those below; it serves, too, as a support for the heavenly bodies (Gen., 1).—C.E. (J. A. N.)

First-begotten of the dead, Our Lord (Apoc., 1, 5), because of His Resurrection. (Ed.)

First-born, a title which indicates the special value attached to the first male offspring, both human and animal. In the Bible the first-born males belonged to the Lord (Exod., 13). In instances, however, both the firstling of the flocks and herds, as well as the first-born son, could be redeemed. The rights of primogeniture were highly regarded; for they affected inheritance, authority, etc., in the family.—C.E. (J. A. N.)

First Communion, the first reception of the Consecrated Host. Those in authority are obligated to furnish careful preparatory instruction.

First-fruits. The biblical word includes the best as well as the earliest fruits or crops, both natural and prepared, drawn from such sources as the threshing-floor, the wine-press, and the oil-press (Deut., 18). They are mentioned in the Law as offerings to Jehovah (Deut., 26), under the titles of gifts, tithes, sacrifices, etc., and on prescribed occasions, especially the feasts of the Passover, Pentecost, and Tabernacles.—C.E.

Fiscal Procurator, a diocesan official who initiates all criminal proceedings in ecclesiastical courts.—C.E.

Fish, an ancient Christian symbol of Our Saviour. In art it often resembles a dolphin. The Greek word for fish is ichthus, spelt in Greek with five letters only: I-C-H-T-H-US. These form what is called an acrostic, being the initial letters of Iesou Christou, Theou Vios, Soter (Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour). The fish is also a symbol of Christians in general, typified by the miraculous draught of fishes mentioned in St. John's Gospel, 21, 11, and is thus emblematic of the vocation of the Apostles, the "fishers of men."—C.C.; Catholic Faith in the Holy Eucharist, ed. Lattey, St. L., 1923.

Fisher, Philip (real name, Thomas Copley; 1565-1652), Jesuit missionary, b. Madrid; d. Maryland. In 1637 he took charge of the Maryland mission, but eight years later he was sent to England in chains. After much suffering he was released and returned to his missionary work.—C.E.

Fishekerman, The title of the pope, because most of the Apostles were fishermen. Our Lord said He would make them fishers of men (Luke, 5); this term designates especially their chief, Peter, and his successors. The papal ring seal is that of the fisherman. (Ed.)

Fishes, emblems in art associated with St. Corentin, as a fisherman.

Fishing Net, Parable of the. This is one of the parables concerning the Kingdom of Heaven which St. Matthew has grouped together among the parables spoken by Our Lord by the seaside (Matt., 13). It is followed immediately by its explanation. The fishes' net catches all kinds of fish, good and worthless, and it is only when the fishing is over, the net having been pulled to the shore, that the selection can take place. The point which the parable teaches is that in the Kingdom of God, as realized on earth, there shall be good and bad members, and that the separation is reserved for the end, the final judgment. It thus forewarns the disciples against scandal resulting from the presence of evil in the Kingdom, and reminds them that the establishment of the Kingdom of God will not result in the disappearance of evil from the world. The disciples, therefore, must not expect a sudden, miraculous transformation of the world, which would make it resemble heaven, and must not be scandalized when persecution comes, as it is bound to, from the coexistence of the Kingdom of God and of evil.—Ponek, tr. Leahy, Parables of the Gospel, N. Y., 1915.

Fitton, James (1805-81), missionary, b. Boston; d. there. Ordained by Bp. Fenwick, 1827, he carried on missionary labors in New England for nearly 25 years and was the founder of the academy which later became Holy Cross College, Worcester.—C.E.

Fitzherbert, Maria Anne (1756-1837), Catholic wife of Thomas Fitzherbert, she married George, Prince of Wales, 1785. She separated from him during his union with Caroline of Brunswick, and then after a nine years' reconciliation, left him permanently. —C.E.; Wilkins, Mrs. Fitzherbert and George IV, Lond., 1905.

Fitz-Simons, Thomas (1741-1811), statesman, b. Ireland; d. Philadelphia. He was in America as early as 1758, and took a prominent part in the Revolutionary movement; his election as one of the Provincial Deputies in July, 1774, is the first instance of a Catholic being named for a public office in Pennsylvania. He was a member of the Continental Congress, assisted in drafting the Constitution of 1787 of which he was one of the signers, and was elected a member of the first Congress of the United States. Probably he was the first to suggest a protective tariff to help American industries. He was one of the founders of Georgetown College. —C.E.

Five Nations, a confederacy of five, afterwards six, tribes of Iroquoian stock, Mohawk, Oneida, Onondaga, Cayuga, Seneca, and later Tuscarora, extending across New York State to Lake Erie. Their government was based upon the clan system, with descent in the female line, each tribe having its women's council, chosen from the mothers of the tribe and taking the initiative in public matters, such as the right of adoption, the jurisdiction of territorial domain, and the decisions of questions of war and peace. They dwelt in “long houses,” engaged in hunting and agriculture, and were monogamists although with easy and frequent divorces. With firearms obtained from the Dutch, they made relentless war on surrounding tribes, killing them, incorporating them, or making them tributaries, and extended their rule from the Ottawa River to the Tennessee, and from the Kennebec to the Illinois and Lake Michigan. During the French and Indian wars, and the Revolution, they sided mainly with the British. The refugees in Canada were settled near Brantford, Ontario; those in New York have reduced their territory by treaty cessions, and part of the Oneida have removed to Wisconsin. They are of interest to Catholics because they caused the martyrdom of Blessed Jogues, Brébeuf, and their companions.

Five Scapulars, The. The Church has approved 18 kinds of scapulars. Any five of these may be worn together, if the wearer has been invested with each of the five. Those commonly used for that purpose are the blue scapular of Mount Carmel, the red of the Passion, the black of the Seven Dolors, the blue of the Immaculate Conception, and the white of the Trinity.—Sullivan, Externals of the Catholic Church, N. Y., 1918.

Fixed Festival, one that occurs each year on the same date. The observance of some of them follows from Christmas Day, 25 Dec., e.g., the Circumcision (1 Jan.), since the Jewish law prescribed this rite eight days after birth; and the Purification of the Blessed Virgin (2 Feb.); for this was required of a Jewish mother 40 days after the birth of a male child. The date of Christmas led also to the institution of the feast of the Annunciation (25 March), nine months before, the beginning of the pregnancy of the Blessed Virgin. Other fixed festivals have been assigned to certain dates by ancient tradition or by special decree of the Church. Some are observed universally, others only in certain places. Some are very ancient, others of recent origin. Some religious orders have their own calendars of saints’ days, differing here and there from that of the Church in general. The feast of a saint, in many cases but not in all, is observed on the day of his death, the beginning of his heavenly glory.—J. F. S.

Fizeau, Armand Hippolite Louis (1819-96), physicist, b. Paris; d. Nanteuil. He was associated with Foucault in the optical experiments leading to the downfall of the emission theory, and was the first to determine experimentally the velocity of light, and to show that ether is carried along by moving bodies.—C. E.

Flagellum (Lat., fan), liturgical fan made of leather, silk, parchment, or feathers, with long handle, intended to keep away insects from the Sacred Species and priest.—C. E.

Flaccilla, Aelia (d. c. 385), wife of Emperor Theodosius the Great. She is lauded by S. Gregory of Nyssa as a pillar of the Church and a model of Christian virtue, and is venerated as a saint by the Greek Church on 14 Sept.—C. E.

Flagellants (Lat., flagello, scourge), fanatical and heretical sect which flourished in Europe in the 13th and succeeding centuries.

It appeared first at Perugia, 1260, and spread rapidly to other countries, its members marching in procession and scourging themselves for their sins and the sins of the world. Because of excesses they were suppressed by the pope, but reappeared, 1349, after the devastation of Europe by the Black Plague. In the northern countries they became an organized sect with severe discipline and extreme claims, a ceremonial was developed, and a specialized doctrine, which soon degenerated into heresy, taught. The leaders began to cast doubts on the necessity and desirability of the sacraments and pretended to absolve one another, to cast out evil spirits, and to work miracles. They were condemned by the pope in letters sent to the bishops of France, Germany, Poland, Sweden, and England, and their numbers gradually diminished. They had not died out, however, and throughout the 14th and 15th centuries there were recurrences of this heresy. Their practices were later revived as a means of orthodox public penance, processions being encouraged by the Jesuits in Austria, the Netherlands, the East Indies, and South America. These, however, were under ecclesiastical authority and are not to be confused with the heretical outbursts of the Middle Ages.—C. E.; Walsh, Curiosities of Popular Customs, Phila., 1897.

Flagellation, punishment or voluntary penance administered by means of a whip, rod, or stick; very ancient, others of recent origin. Some religious orders have their own calendars of saints’ days, differing here and there from that of the Church in general. The feast of a saint, in many cases but not in all, is observed on the day of his death, the beginning of his heavenly glory.—C. E.

Flagellation of Christ, the scourging of Our Lord by command of Pilate, after He had appeared a third time before the civil court and before He was condemned to be crucified. The Column of the Flagellation of Christ is a famous relic; half of it is in Jerusalem, the other half was brought to Rome in 1222 by Card. Giovanni Colonna and placed in his titular church, S. Prassede (St. Praxedis), where it still remains. Among the many masters who have represented the subject of the Flagellation of Christ in art are: Alberti, Bellini, Duccio, Ferrari, Fra Angelico, Luini, Palma, Rembrandt, Romano, San Sepolcro, Signorelli, and Velasquez.

Flaget, Benedict Joseph (1763-1850), first Bp. of Bardstown, b. Contournat, France; d. Louisville, Ky. Educated at the Sulpician Seminary, Clermont, he joined the Society of St. Sulpice in 1783; and was ordained priest at Issy, 1787. He taught dogmatic theology at Nantes and at Angers, but left France during the Revolution and arrived at Baltimore, 1792. He was appointed missionary to the Indians at Fort Vincennes, 1792; professor at Georgetown College, 1794; and then was sent to help found a college at Havana, 1798. He returned to Baltimore, 1801, and was consecrated Bp. of Bardstown, Ky., 1810. The diocese was large, having within its jurisdiction at first the territory now approximately comprising 10 states; it was devoid of funds and in need of spiritual care. Bp. Flaget consecrated his cathedral at Bardstown in 1819. In 1834 his diocese was limited to Kentucky and Tennessee, and it had then a seminary, 4 colleges, 3 religious orders of men, 3 convents, several academies, and an orphan asylum. A visit to Europe, 1835-39, netted him financial aid for his diocese, which was transferred to Louisville, 1841. Here he built a convent for the Religious of Our Lady of Charity of the Good Shepherd of Angers, 1843, with his private funds.—C.E.

Flandrin, flah-drah', Jean Hippolyte (1800-64), painter, b. Lyon, France; d. Rome. He was a pupil of Jean-Auguste Ingres in Paris, where he won the Grand Prix de Rome, 1832, and spent five years in the Eternal City, one of his works of that period being the “Christ Blessing the Little Children” in the Lieieux Museum. He returned to France determined to revive religious art and his noblest works adorn the churches of Paris, among them those of St. Séverin, St. Germain-des-Prés, and St. Vincent-de-Paul. In the last the beautiful frieze of saints in procession is his masterpiece. His most ambitious work, the decoration of the nave of St. Germain-des-Prés, undertaken in 1856, while admittedly fine in symbolism lacks something in color and life. Among his successful portraits are those of Napoleon III, in the Versailles Museum, and the “Study of a Man,” in the Louvre.—Jean-Paul (1811-1902), painter, brother of preceding, b. Lyons; d. Paris. He was also a pupil of Ingres, and was celebrated as a painter of landscapes in the classic manner.—C.E.

Flaviana Domitilla, the Younger, Saint, virgin, martyr (1st century). A niece of St. Flavius Clemens, she was banished by Emperor Domitian to the island of Pontia and later martyred at Terracina with her servants, Nereus and Achilleus. She was buried in the catacomb on the Via Delle Sette Chiese which was originally the vault of St. Flavius Clemens and his family. Feast, 12 May.—Butler.

Flavian, Saint, martyr (449), Bp. of Constantinople, d. Hyppea, Lydia. His election was opposed by Chrysaphius, minister to Emperor Theodosius. At a council of Constantinople, 448, Eutyches, a relative of Chrysaphius, was accused of heresy and excommunicated by Flavian. Later the emperor called the Robber Council at Ephesus, under Dioscorus, Flavian’s rival. Flavian, who had no voice in the proceedings was condemned and deposed, and Eutyches was declared free from heresy. As a result, Flavian was so ill-treated that he died within three days. At the Council of Chalcedon, 451, the Acts of the Robber Council were annulled and Flavian eulogized as a martyr. Relics at Giulia Nova (Apulia), and one of his arms at Recanati. Feast, 18 Feb.—C.E.; Butler.

Fléchier, Claude (1640-1725), historian, b. Paris; d. there. After practising law for nine years, he became a priest, and for over 30 years was tutor to several young court nobles. The most notable of his many works is his immense church history to the year 1414, continued to 1595 by John Claude Fabre. Though his judgments are tinged with Gallicanism, they are expressed moderately and with restraint.—C.E.

Fléury (FLEURY-SAINTE-BENOÎT), Abbey of, situated on the Loire, near Orleans, France, one of the oldest and most celebrated Benedictine abbeys of western Europe. Tradition attributes its foundation to Leo the Baldus, c. 649, on the site of a Gallo-Roman villa, and Fléury’s records number Card. Richelieu among its 89 abbots. The abbey also claims to possess the relics of St. Benedict, said to have been transferred from Monte Cassino after the Lombard invasions.—C.E.

Flight into Egypt. After the departure of the wise men, the angel of the Lord told Joseph to fly into Egypt with the Infant Jesus and His mother, as Herod had evil designs against them; there they remained until the death of Herod (Matt., 2). Among the many masters who have painted this subject in art are: Corneille the Elder, Dürer, Ferrari, Fra Angelico, Murillo, Patinir, Rembrandt, Rubens, and Van Dyck.

Flood, The. See Deluge.

Florence (It., Firenze), city and former state of Italy. It was a flourishing municipium under the erection of the first church, nor of the earlier Mendoza as pastor. There is no exact account of the beginning of the parish of St. Augustine, the part of the diocese of Santiago de Cuba, with Fr. first in the United States. It was established as a place, 8 Sept., and Mass was immediately offered in honor of the Nativity of Our Lady, at a spot named it in honor of the day's feast, there were, with the four priests, including Fr. Francisco Lopez de Mendoza Grajales. The landing took place, 6 July, 1493, yet in Russia the Muscovite princes, and in Byzantium (now Constantinople) the Byzantine clergy and people, refused to abide by the decrees of the council.—C.E.

Florence, Council of, the Seventeenth Ecumenical Council (1438-45), held in the pontificate of Pope Eugene IV, first in the city of Ferrara and later at Florence, Italy. Its aim was the reunion of the Eastern Churches, especially of the Greek Orthodox Church, with the Catholic Church. Although at the council the Greek representatives, headed by the Greek emperor, agreed to the famous decree of union (Laetentur Celi) which was announced, 6 July, 1438, yet in Russia the Muscovite princes, and in Byzantium (now Constantinople) the Byzantine clergy and people, refused to abide by the decrees of the council.—C.E., VI, 111.

Florentine School of Painting, founded 17th century, largely through the efforts of Giotto di Bondone, and in the 15th century the leading school of the world. Many of its painters were sculptors also; among the latter the most famous are Brunelleschi, Donatello, and Michelangelo. Its illustrious painters include Fra Angelico, Botticelli, Lippi, Masolino, and Masaccio.

Florida, the 21st state of the United States in size, the 32nd in population, and the 27th to be admitted to the Union (3 March, 1845); area, 58,606 sq. m.; pop. (1920), 968,470; Catholics (1928), 324,856...
St. Fursey. After the destruction of this convent by the Mercians, Foillan journeyed to Péronne, France. A little later he established a monastery, under Irish discipline, at Fosses, Belgium, near the famous convent of Nivelles. He was murdered by robbers in the forest of Seneffe. Patron of Fosses. Represented in art with a crown at his feet. Relics in monastery at Fosses. Feast, Fosses, 16 Jan.; Namur, 31 Oct.; Mechlin and Tournai, 5 Nov. — C. E.; Butler.

Folkstone Abbey (or Parish), Kent, England, originally a monastery of Benedictine nuns, founded in 630 by St. Eanswith, grand-daughter of St. Ethelbert, first Christian king in England. Destroyed by the Danes, a monastery of Benedictine monks was erected on the same site. Removed from the sea coast to the site of the present church of Folkstone, 1137; it continued to the time of the dissolution, 1535. Of the monastic buildings, a Norman doorway remains. — C. E.

Fontenelle, Abbey of, or Abbey of Saint Wandrille, a Benedictine monastery in Normandy (Seine-Inférieure), near Caudebec-en-Caux, founded by St. Wandrille (d. 697). The basilica he erected was consecrated, 657, and was subsequently destroyed and rebuilt several times. After its destruction by Danish pirates, 862, the community sojourned in other centers but was restored to Fontenelle, 966. Fervor and learning characterized the monks and many privileges were granted to them. The monastery was famed for its library and school, where calligraphy in particular, as well as letters, sciences, and the fine arts, were cultivated. The introduction of commendatory abbots in the 16th century lessened the prosperity of the abbey, but it enjoyed some of its earlier prestige when taken over by the Maurists, 1536. Suppressed in 1591, it was sold the following year. From 1893-1901 it was held by the French Benedictines. The chapel of St. Saturnin, also erected by St. Wandrille, overlooks the abbey. It is one of the oldest ecclesiastical buildings in existence. — C. E.

Fontevrault, Order and Abbey of. The monastery of Fontevrault was founded by Bl. Robert of Arbrissel, at the close of the 11th century, on the confines of Anjou, Tours, and Poitou. It was a double monastery for monks and nuns, following a rule supplementary to that of St. Benedict, and governed by an abess. At the death of the founder, 1117, the order enjoyed great prosperity, but by the end of the 12th century the nuns were obliged to gain their livelihood by manual labor. When Mary of Brittany became abbess, 1457, she appointed a commission of religious of several orders to draw up a specific rule based on the rules of St. Benedict, St. Augustine, Bl. Robert, and the Acts of Visitations. Her successor, Anne of Orleans, reestablished discipline in a number of priories and gained a victory over the rebellious religious at Fontevrault. This resulted in the admission of a great number of novices. Jeanne Baptiste de Bourbon finally brought peace to the order; in 1641 she secured royal confirmation of the reform and quashed the claims of the monks who sought to organize themselves independently of the abbess. In the 17th century the order comprised the provinces of France, Brittany, Guernsey, and Auvergne, besides houses in Spain and England. A Fontevrast school was opened at Chemillé, 1803, a community was started, and the ancient rule was preserved. By 1849 there were three houses of the revived congregation, which became subject to the ordinary. There were no Fontevriast monks. — C. E.

Fool (in Scripture). (1) The atheist: “The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God” (Ps. 13; 52). (2) The rich fool: “But God said to him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required from thee: and the things which thou hast provided? Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell-fire” (Matt. 7). — Williams, Textual Concordance of the Holy Scriptures, N. Y., 1908.

Fool, a figurative expression in Scripture to denote the humiliation of the enemies of Christ (Ps. 109), and therefore emblematic of His kingdom. — M. E.

Forbidden Degrees, degrees of relationship, whether by blood or by marriage, within which it is not permitted to marry, as explained under Affinity and Consanguinity. (Ed.)

Forbin-Janson, Charles Auguste Marie Joseph, Comte de (1785-1844), Bp. of Nancy and Toul, b. Paris; d. in Marseilles. Supposing a political career under Napoleon, he became a priest in 1811, and with Abbé de Rauzan founded the Missionaries of France. He was raised to the episcopate, 1824, but had to leave France, as he refused to sign the Gallican declaration of 1682. At the request of Bps. Flaget and Purcell, he was sent by Gregory XVI on a successful missionary tour through the United States and Canada, 1829-41, and in 1842 went to Rome, where he was made a Roman count and Assistant at the Pontifical Throne. The following year he returned to France and founded the Association of the Holy Childhood. — C. E.

Fordham University, Fordham, New York, N. Y., founded, 1841; conducted by the Jesuits; preparatory school; schools of arts and sciences, law, pharmacy, business administration, social service; teachers' college; post-graduate and summer schools; professors, 215; students, 8019; degrees conferred in 1929, 942.

Foreign Mission Brothers of St. Michael, an auxiliary branch of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America at Maryknoll (q.v.). The Brothers devote themselves to mission work without pursuing higher studies or entering the priesthood. Statistics: 60 Brothers, in the United States, China, Korea, Hawaii, and Rome.

Foreign Mission Sisters of St. Dominic (Maryknoll), a congregation founded by Mother Mary Joseph, O.P., under the direction of Fr. James A. Walsh, at Maryknoll (Ossining, N. Y.), 1921. The sisters engage exclusively in foreign mission work and take charge of Orientals on the Pacific coast. The congregation has 20 houses, including schools, orphanages, and a hospital; missions are established in China, Korea, Manchuria, and the Philippine and Hawaiian Islands. The mother-house is at Maryknoll; the total number of religious is 356.

Foresters, Catholic Orders of, three fraternal insurance societies organized on the plan of the Foresters' courts: (1) established in Massachusetts, 1879, with membership confined to the state, and one court at Providence, Rhode Island; (2) established in Chicago, 1883, and extending into 26 states and Canada, with an official organ "The Catholic Forester," published at Milwaukee; (3) for women only, established in Chicago, 1892. -C.E.

Forgery, a fraudulent interference with, or alteration of truth, to the prejudice of a third person. In canon law, forgery may be by word, as false testimony; or by writing, as falsification of a document; or by deed, as counterfeiting money; and finally it is also the conscious utilization of such forgery. -C.E.; P.C. Augustine.

Forgiveness of Sins. Catholics believe that sins forgiven are removed from the soul (John, 29), and not merely covered by the merits of Christ. Only God can forgive sin, since He alone can infuse sanctifying grace by which sin is expelled. God can forgive sin either immediately, in response to an act of perfect contrition (q.v.), or mediately, through a sacrament. The sacraments primarily directed to the forgiveness of sin are Baptism and Penance (q.v.).—Pohle-Preuss, The Sacraments, III, St. L., 1924. (w. j. b.)

Forked Cross (Fr. croix fourchée), a cross having the ends of its arms divided in a V-shaped form. (J. F. S.)

Form, Sacramental, a theological term used to designate the determining element of a sacrament. The form is composed of words pronounced by the minister over the matter, thereby determining the manner and raising it to the dignity of a sacramental sign, capable of giving grace from the institution of Christ; e.g., "I baptize thee," pronounced as the minister pours water on the head of a person. (R. B. M.)

Formosus, Pope (891-986), b. probably Rome, c. 816; d. there. As Card. Bp. of Porto he achieved many important diplomatic missions following the disruption of Charlemagne's empire. He waslegate to Bulgaria, and was subsequently sent to France to settle the marital strife between King Lothair and his wife Theutberga. Later he went to Trent where he settled the question of the successor to Louis II by conveying the papal invitation to Charles the Bald to receive the imperial crown. His decision caused dissatisfaction in Rome and he fled. He was excommunicated, 872, when he refused to return. Pope Marinus restored him to his diocese, 883. As pope he preserved the unity of Lombardy by crowning Guido of Spoleto emperor. In the dispute over the Bishopric of Bremen he gave the decision to Abp. Adalgar of Hamburg. He incurred the enmity of Agiltrude, wife of the deceased Guido, when he crowned Arnulf emperor, 896. She revenged herself after Formosus's death by forcing Pope Stephen (VI) VII to pronounce a condemnation judgment on his corpse, which was then mutilated and sunk in the Tiber. Theodore II, 987, reinterred the body in St. Peter's with full honors.—C.E.; Mann.

Fornication, the free act of carnal intercourse between persons who are not married but who are free to marry. Fornication is always gravely wrong because it deprives sexual intercourse of the order which the good of the human race demands. It is a substantial inversion of an essential order.—Koch-Preuss.

Fort Augustus Abbey (St. BENEDICT'S ABBEY), Fort Augustus, Scotland, founded, 1876, by Dom Jerome Vaughan of the Anglo-Benedictine Congregation, upon the site of a fort built, 1729. Made an independent abbey, 1882, under the immediate jurisdiction of the Holy See, the primacy exercises the powers peculiar to the head of a congregation; priests, 16. The Abbey School, a boarding-school formerly connected with the abbey, is about to be moved (1929) to Edinburgh to the Melville Grange estate on the outskirts of the city. Ten boarding-houses, each with rooms for 50 boys, will be provided for the students; a monastery for 100 monks and an equal number of lay brothers will be established; and a church will have accommodation for 1000.—C.E.

Fortem virili pectore, or HIGH LET US ALL OUR VOICES RAISE, hymn for Vespers and Lauds for the Common of Holy Women. It was written by Card. Silvio Antoniano (1540-1605). Nine translations are in existence. The one given in Britt is by E. Caswall, the fourth verse reads:

O Christ, the strength of all the strong;
To whom our holiest deeds belong!
Through her prevailing prayers on high,
In mercy hear Thy people's cry!

For Thine Is the Kingdom, and the Power, and the Glory Forever, an addition to the original text of the prayer of Our Lord, Our Father, inserted in the East and adopted in the form used by Protestants. (Ed.)

Fortitude, enduring courage; strength of character in bearing pain with patience or in meeting danger undauntedly: a supernatural virtue strengthening a person's irreducible appetite so that not even the greatest temporal risks can deter him from the pursuit of supernatural good.—C.E.

Fortnightly Review, the, a Catholic review published at St. Louis, Mo., by Arthur Preuss and containing articles of special interest to the clergy and educated laity; founded, 1893.

Fortunato of Brescia (1701-54), morphologist and Minorite, B. Brescia, Italy; d. Madrid. He was secretary general of his order and first brought together the teachings of Scholasticism and the discoveries of physical science. By his microscopic studies he succeeded in classifying tissues and organs before the discoveries of Bichat.—C.E.

Fortunatus, Venantius Honorius Clementianus (c. 530-600), Latin poet, b. between Camada and Treviso, Italy. He was educated at Ravenna. About 568 he went to Poitiers whither he was attracted by the renown of St. Radegunde and her monastery, and where, shortly before his death, he became bishop. When St. Radegunde received a relic of the True Cross, Fortunatus composed a number of religious poems, two of which, "Vexilla Regis" and "Pange Lingua," are read in the Liturgy. He also wrote a poem to St. Martin and rhetorical prose lives of several saints.—C.E.

Fortunetelling, pretense to know and tell the future. It is a system of deception by which over-curious people are led to believe, or grow apprehensive over, assurances which mimic real prophecy; this form of divination is wrong because it is an inordinate craving to know what Providence has in store for one, and because such knowledge is obtainable only by powers not acting in accordance with Divine Providence. It is one of the commonest impostures.

Fort Wayne, Diocese of, Indiana, embraces that part of Indiana north of the southern boundary of Warren, Fountain, Montgomery, Boone, Hamilton, Madison, Delaware, and Randolph counties; area, 17,431 sq. m.; established, 1857; suffragan of Cincinnati. Bishops: J. H. Luers (1858-71); Joseph Dwenger (1872-93); Joseph Rademaker (1893-1900); Herman H. Alerding (1900-24); John F. Noll (1925). Churches, 177; clergy, 213; religious women, 3473; university, 1; college, 1; seminaries, 2; academies, 8; high schools, 2; primary schools, 114; pupils in parochial schools, 38,373; institutions, 20; Catholics, 183,372.

Forty Hours' Devotion (Forty Hours' Prayer, or Forty Hours' Adoration) consists in a solemn exposition of the Blessed Sacrament during 40 hours, continual according to the "Instructiones Clementinae" (Clementine Instructions), in honor of the 40 hours during which the Body of Our Lord is considered to have rested in the tomb. In countries where the nocturnal exposition is not feasible the exposition is held on three consecutive days. The indulgences of the devotion were at first limited to the exact ritual observance of the devotion, but by decree of Pius X, in 1914, the indulgences may all be gained even when the devotion is interrupted as is the custom in the United States. Introduced by Bp. Anthony Mary Zaccaria in Milan and Vicenza, 1527, it was spread to many places in Italy by the Capuchins, Joseph of Fermo, and was introduced into Rome and Germany by Jesuits under St. Ignatius. The devotions were approved by Pope Paul III in 1539, though some say Clement VII in 1534. The Clementine Instructions, the right form for this devotion, were given out at Rome in 1705 by Pope Clement IX. At first the instructions were only for Rome itself, but at a later period were extended to the entire world. The introduction into America is disputed. The first to hold these devotions with any degree of regularity was Bp. John Neponenene Neumann of Philadelphia. In 1857 Abp. Patrick F. Kenrick obtained from Pius IX the modifications which are in use in the United States. A plenary indulgence is granted to all persons who, being truly contrite and having received the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist, visit a church in which the exposition is held on one of the three days and pray there for the intentions of the Holy Father. A partial indulgence of 10 years and 10 times 40 days may be gained for each visit, provided a short time be spent in prayer at each of these visits. All these indulgences are applicable to the souls in Purgatory.—C.E.; Beringer, Les Indulgences, Paris, 1905. (P. W. N.)

Forty Martyrs, Christian soldiers who died for their faith (309) at Sebaste, Armenia. They were exposed naked on a frozen pond, their bodies later being burnt. Feast, R. Cal., 10 March.—C.E.; Butler.

Forum, a public square in Roman cities where markets and assemblies for judicial or political purposes were held; hence a court, a tribunal; a place of jurisdiction. The law of the forum is the law of the place where a suit is to be tried. In canon law, internal forum, the realm of conscience, is contrasted with the external or outward forum; thus, a marriage might be null and void in the internal forum, but binding outwardly, i.e., in the external forum, for want of judicial proof to the contrary.—C.E.

Fossors (Lat., fodere, to dig), grave-diggers in the Roman catacombs in the first three or four centuries of the Christian Era. The office was brought into existence by the determination of the Christians to bury their dead in their own cemeteries. They ranked among the minor clergy.—C.E.

Foster, John Gray (1823-74), U. S. general, b. Whitefield, N. H.; d. Nashua. He served in the Mexican War of 1846, and in the Civil War, and distinguished himself in the defense of Fort Sumter and the capture of Savannah. In 1861 he was received into the Catholic Church.—C.E.

Fould, Constant (1837-1903), ecclesiastical writer, b. Eislebf, France; d. there. Ordained in 1861, he devoted himself to the classics and biblical science, received the degree of licentiate in letters, 1867, and taught classics at Boisguillaume until 1876. As professor of Holy Scripture at Rouen (1876), and member of the Biblical Commission (1903), he continued his study of sacred sciences and in 1880 began to publish “Les Origines de l'Eglise,” a scholarly work written as an answer to Renan, which contains several books on the Life of Christ, St. Paul, St. Peter, and St. John, presenting a faithful picture of early Christianity.—C.E.

Foucault, Jean Bernard Léon (1819-68), physicist, b. Paris; d. there. He refuted the corpuscular theory of light and by his automatic regulator rendered electric lighting practicable. By his pendulum in the Pantheon he demonstrated visibly the rotation of the earth, and confirmed this by his invention of the gyroscope.—C.E.

Foundations, Pious (Lat., fundamentum, basis), temporal goods given to an ecclesiastical moral person with an obligation, perpetual, or for a long time, to say Masses annually, to perform definite ecclesiastical functions, or to carry out works of piety or charity with the revenue of the donation. Once accepted, it takes on the nature of a bilateral contract. The quantity of the endowment is determined by the bishop and his written consent must be obtained before its acceptance. The money is to be invested and it pertains to the bishop to see that the obligations are fulfilled. The supervision of foundations made to exempt religious, even though in their parish churches, pertains not to the bishop but to the major superior. The reduction of the obligations is reserved to the Holy See unless the document of foundation expressly gives the bishop this power.—C.E. (E. F. Mack.)

Founding Asylums, institutions for the care of abandoned infants. Unnatural parents, especially unmarried mothers, refusing to face the responsibility of rearing their children, often abandon them. This practise has been sufficiently common in all times and places to give rise to a special work of charity in caring for helpless infants. There were asylums under Christian auspices in the 6th century, and the Second Council of Nicea, 787, ordered that one such institution be maintained in every city. Modern work for children is traced to St. Vincent de Paul, who made the care of foundlings a prominent part of his work, to be carried on by his foundation of the Sisters of Charity. In the United States, the first orphan asylum was founded in New Orleans, 1729, by the Ursuline Sisters. The foundling asylum of the Sisters of Charity in New York City is one of the first institutions dedicated to this special work, and dates from 1809. The great objection to such institutions has been the high infant death rate, and the imperfect education given children who remain in the institution until maturity. Modern social science seeks to prevent abandonment, by removing causes that lead parents to take this step. This failing, the asylum is used for emergency care, but every effort is made to find a proper foster home for the child, that it may grow up in a normal family atmosphere.—C.E.
